524 hours until they begin to feel exhausted. At times their eagerness borders on abandon. This is understandable, since now, no longer bound by the strict čiéxaus program, the people are free to burst out without restraint. The young people are called upon particularly often. Here in the open, in front of everyone, they are supposed to show also the skills they have acquired in the social games which they were often called upon to join in the čiéxaus hut (p. 813).

X881 The conversations and games after the big feast finally come 533 to an end. At the proper moment the overseer or some older person intones the táxer song, and all the participants promptly join in. They immediately try to assume a respectful pose and to make their voices solemn. This táxer song is the actual farewell song, during which all "spirits" arrange themselves and with which they are given an accompaniment back to their particular abode by the people here, just as this was done on almost every evening (p. 787). The people present, however, sing this song for themselves, too, before they take leave of each other, for today or tomorrow they will leave this place and probably not see each other again for a long time. This is why they put into the final táxer song all their feelings of joy and gratitude for their renewed vigor during this enjoyable, inspiring čiéxaus celebration. The song dies away full of melancholy, and silently and for a long time thereafter everyone gives himself up to his thoughts.

X881 Gradually one person and then another get up and go back once more to the Great Hut. Here he collects his utensils, tools, and ornaments, and takes final leave of this place. Everyone takes care of his own things and moves them over to his own dwelling where, after a long time, he again settles himself for the night. If the weather is good, a family may board their canoe that same day and depart. /955/ Most of the people definitely leave the following morning and enthusiastically welcome the longed-for freedom to rove far and wide without restraint. The place where many people were still gathered together for the common celebration just a short time ago becomes depopulated surprisingly
346 After that no one pays any attention to the Great Hut.

Deserted and unprotected, it remains exposed to the raging natural forces; storms work havoc with the roof and finally with the whole framework, and sooner or later it collapses. The decorated sticks and ornamental plaques are also destroyed with it. After a few months only a person's memory can tell him where the čiěxaus hut recently stood.

X881

Now the place where for weeks many human beings meditated about their own egos and where they adapted themselves to a time of restraint is silent and deserted. The rough wind again bravely shakes the branches through which, shortly before, thin columns of smoke curled up into the treetops. It drives withered leaves over the grassy area on which young and old delighted in lively games.

3. Meaning and Value of the Initiation

No matter how one looks at the čiěxaus celebration, its individual components work together to achieve the one definite goal of making the maturing young people spiritually and physically competent to fulfill the duties of a grown man or woman independently. It is above all a training of the mind; hence the teachings and exhortations make up a considerable part of the whole affair. In order to make the minds of young people susceptible and receptive, their bodies are forced to become subservient to it through difficult exercises in self-control, including physical immobility, constant silence, curtailed sleep, and considerable fasting. Beyond the self-control to be achieved, the spiritual life of the young uswala becomes considerably enriched by the myths and legends, some of which are revealed to them here for the first time, as well as by the social games in which they must here, for the first time, publicly test themselves. Added to all this is the training in the required accomplishments and successful methods of work which make every man and every woman capable of obtaining a living as easily as possible for himself and his family.

Actually, the adults achieve this twin goal with their uswala through a faithful application of the principles esteemed in the čiěxaus. Convincing proof is furnished by those upright, virtuous

X881 persons who live according to these principles all their lives and who are an honor to their people, in other words, a shining example for youth. Proper tribal members have little or no regard for adults who have not experienced the initiation because, through unusual circumstances, there was no room for them in previous times. /956/ As a single example we need mention only the two brothers Sarmiento and Balfour, sons of old Peine, each of whom had different Europeans as fathers. They constantly lived on farms and year after year they avoided participation in the youth initiation. The older men are very mistrustful of these two and obviously exclude them from their intimate circle.

Moreover, this long description clearly and unequivocally shows the moral value of the čiéxaus institution. One need only consider the individual instructions, and he will be unable to conceal his astonishment at their superior content. This opinion will be heightened by considering the original derivation of the youth initiation, for the Supreme Being himself is regarded as its founder. The uǰwíala are frankly told: "All that goes on here [the daily program with its details] is not our invention; Hidábuan himself wants everything to be done in this way!" They are admonished: "What we tell you here [in the way of precepts and instructions] originates with 'the-One-up-there'! He wants everyone [Yamana] to adapt himself faithfully to it. Fulfilling all this is your [personal] affair, we cannot force you. But Watauinéiwa always sees you, he will also see it if you secretly evade something that we recommend to you here in the čiéxaus. He himself will punish you for your faulty behavior by an untimely death, or he will let one of your children die. Therefore, observe what we tell you here, for that is the way Watauinéiwa wants it!" During the initiation the candidates are repeatedly told that the teachings and precepts presented come from the Supreme Being who watches over their exact fulfillment and punishes their neglect. If one considers the important place of the čiéxaus in all the educational work of the Yamana, he sees surprisingly clearly how deeply their educational principles are anchored in religion.

X881 113 Although the ideas inherent in the youth initiation are derived from religious conceptions, there is also a particular historical derivation. It does not disturb the Fuegian temperament

X881 773 that the two trends of thought are incompatible. During the course of the celebration the story of "hamanăulum wătuwa" is told to the uĭwăala, and it was on this occasion that I, too, learned it.

In the eastern corner of the Bay of Ushuaia there were, once upon a time, several families camping. They heard that in the west there was a stranded whale. Three men got into a canoe. Two of them were yĕkamuš, the other was not. The former two were Hĕpul (366) and Yo'okalĭa (367). The three men rowed off in a westerly direction. Their canoe was extraordinarily swift. Quickly it glided past Puerto Olla (368). Their canoe kept going farther and farther /957/ and came to Hapananúsĭ (369). The Halakwulup, a dangerous, bad people, live here. The three Yamana saw the huts of this people here, left their canoe, and climbed ashore. The two yĕkamuš were invited into the same hut, the third man was called to another hut (370). When the two wicked people to separate the three visitors from one another, so that it would be easier to overcome them individually.

yékamuš entered the hut the many children inside shouted with joy. They cried loudly: "yárum káiya, but quickly now!" This means [in their language]: "We want to devour these two immediately!" The adults, however, replied: "hamašúnna, not until tomorrow!"

The two yékamuš soon understood [the meaning of these words]. One of them also saw a woman inconspicuously cut off a piece of her breast and put it on the glowing charcoal as a roast, for she wanted to invite the two of them to a meal. Héspul was shocked. He snatched the piece of meat from the fire and threw it out of the hut in a wide arc. Thereupon he said furiously: "I did not come here to eat human flesh!" He reached for his yékuš /arrowhead/ and cut off a piece of whale meat which he laid on the glowing coals. A thick smoke formed, which lulled the people in the hut to sleep, for he was a yékamuš (371). All the people, even the vicious dogs, were overcome by deep sleep.

Then Héspul said to his companion, who sat next to him: "Let's quickly see which fatty parts are best. We'll put them aside for ourselves!" They looked around, cut out the best fatty parts and the nicest pieces of meat, and dragged them to their canoe. Soon the canoe was filled to the brim and hastily they went off. They rowed busily and worked all night until they came to Asúsiwaia early in the morning.

When they slipped past this little harbor, they heard the Halakwulup throwing large stones after them with their slings, for the Halakwulup had decamped and rowed after them. Every stone that fell made a loud bang. Without hesitating, the three Yamana threw many pieces of fat into the water, in order to lighten the canoe so that they could get away quickly. They rowed with the greatest effort and soon reached Ušuwáia. Here they noticed that the Halakwulup had, after all, been unable to overtake them and had turned back. After that Hěspul remained in Usuwáia.

Those Halakwulup got together. They decided: "The three men of the Yamana came here and wanted to murder us; they took away our meat and escaped into their territory. Now we want to /958/ build a very large hut and equip ourselves. Afterwards we shall build a long canoe, and we alone, without the women, shall row to the Yamana, seize them, and kill them. That is how the čiéxaus began there. From the Halakwulup it later came to the Yamana (372).

372. There in the west, Halakwulup and Yamana were in contact with each other. Thus the latter learned the youth initiation from the former, and gradually it was also adopted by the central and eastern Yamana. -- A variation of this myth is given below.

In order to imitate what the Halakwulup had planned, the Yamana capture live birds and bring them into the Great Hut where they remain (373). These birds remind them of the Yamana whom the Halakwulup had intended to catch. -- So goes the story.

373. This custom is not followed very strictly. It is more a kind of amusement for one of the participants to catch a bird and in doing so to meet the requirements of this custom.

I was also told that some men and women of earlier generations gave certain directions and commands during the čiéxaus celebration in the Halakwulup language. The Yamana like to cite this as proof of the origin of the secret celebration in the west.

We cannot judge here the historical value of this myth, and it will suffice to point out that among the Halakwulup, exactly as among our Yamana, the youth initiation is an independent institution, separate from the men's ceremony (374).

374. These two affairs are known to be blended into one, called "Kloketen," among the Selk'nam. Compare Gusinde (bb):370 and (dd):1083.

X881 182 177 Since the intrusion of European culture in the Cape Horn Archipelago, the strict procedure of the youth initiation has been relaxed, gradually and imperceptibly, but ultimately to the detriment of our Yamana. The initial indulgences obviously led to a regrettable deterioration of the original serious spirit of the čiéxaus celebration. It is the old people, who were brought up in the strictness of former times, who complain most of all about present-day laxity, inasmuch as they see in it a serious disadvantage to youth and a threat to the people as a whole.

X881 182 On March 5, 1922, Gertie told me in detail about a considerable length of time she had spent, as a girl, at the Tekenika Mission. No religious influence from that period was apparent in her and I became convinced that the teachings of the missionaries had left absolutely no impression. She said: "At that time there were still many Yamana living. But since then most of our people have died, precisely because they are very careless about observing the former strict customs and have become very indifferent about many things. When I first entered the čiéxaus as an ušwāala, I trembled with fear and terror. Full of awe, I showed my sponsors that I was willing and obedient. I carefully and faithfully fulfilled what was demanded by the daily program, which at that time was still very strict. At present even boys and small girls are admitted as ušwāala. They are not bound by strict discipline because they are still too young. /959/ Because of all this, the good ancient customs are given up. Even important arrangements are no longer taken seriously enough [she means, besides the initiation, the general conduct of the tribal members]. This is probably why our people are now dying in such numbers. The rules of conduct and precepts of our ancestors were excellent, although strict and serious, but people lived well by them and were a great people!" Gertie is a person who appreciates the value of strict tradition and clings to it tenaciously.

X881 182 576 Without doubt, even in the last few decades, the initiation was conducted, by and large, along the lines of ancient tradition. A minor incident in March, 1922, shows that, despite some laxity,

X881 182 516 the former strict regard for the prevailing regulations of the daily program is still demanded. One evening, shortly before the general dancing began, Adelheid inconspicuously handed Koppers and myself a few swallows of red wine from a small tin container beside her. Soon afterward she stepped into the ranks of dancers. While she was moving with them back and forth in the hut, her sister Gertie, who had been quiet up to now, seized the vessel of wine and ran out with it. After a few minutes she unexpectedly dashed back into the Great Hut, behaved very excitedly, and loudly cried: "A while ago my sister [Adelheid] handed those two [Europeans] there some wine, and only them. Such [partiality] is not customary in this hut; here all [present] must be invited if there is anything to be distributed! That is why I took away the wine that stood in a container beside her. I filled a bottle with it and have brought it back. All the other people should have some of it too!" Then Gertie placed herself approximately in the center of the ciexaus hut and let the whole row of dancers pass by her. She handed the bottle to each one as he stood in front of her, so that he could take a swallow of wine. The dancer did not stop, but moved forward with short, mincing steps, swinging his dance staff. He merely bent his head to one side and opened his mouth. Walter stood at the main entrance as the winefkēxa, but since no one may be overlooked if there is something to be distributed, Walter likewise came dancing up to Gertie and let her put the wine bottle to his mouth, from which he took a swallow.

It is a general rule that everyone may help himself in case only individual persons have been remembered when edibles are being distributed. Anyone who has been passed by and wishes to retaliate will pull out a few branches from the covering of the hut or pick them out of his sleeping-place, light them, and excitedly rush up to the person who overlooked him. He terrorizes him by threatening him with the burning or smoldering branches; in fact, he sometimes burns him. No one is offended at this rough, violent treatment; rather, it is regarded as mild punishment for the monstrous selfishness displayed by the person in his partiality toward a few. Everyone present /960/ appreciates the indignation of the person seeking revenge, for their innermost feeling peremptorily demands that everyone conscientiously follow the most important rules of conduct, at least on the solemn occasion of the initiation.

X881 182 576 Gertie's interference shows how well she is acquainted with the prevailing custom, and how conscientiously she respects all the details. Just the day before she had assured me: "What I was taught, as uswála I faithfully kept and ineradicably preserved in my memory. This [faithful fulfillment of duty] brings everyone happiness and benefit!" The whole conduct of this woman, who was my sponsor, showed conviction and loyalty to principles.

X881 182 177 If one wishes to be fair in judging the modern Yamana, one must consider a few reasons that justify their relaxation of the procedure during the last few decades. In modern times they cannot count on being free of annoying hindrances, nor are the families independent in choosing the locale and season for the initiation. Always and everywhere they must reckon with interference by the Europeans settled there or they are obliged to work on the farms. As a result, all or most of the tribal members can no longer join in this celebration for a long period.

X881 182 In view of these considerations, it happens that now and then immature boys and girls are admitted as uswála when their judgment is not yet sufficiently developed. No one knows when or whether the next čiéxaus celebration will take place, and they do not want these young people to be deprived altogether of this group training. Their lack of physical development forbids their being subjected to the original rigors of fasting and curtailed sleep. Nowadays strong measures are even less appropriate, since the middle-aged adults themselves are unable to summon enough will power to endure the rigorous regulations of their fathers. They lack the determination to make personal sacrifices. They realize this with shame, and they by no means conceal this situation from the young people. They say frankly: "In former times the uswála came back to the camp from the Great Hut completely emaciated, weak, and exhausted at the end of the čiéxaus; nowadays they are hardly bound by a few insignificant restrictions!"

X881 182 147 We cannot deny the obvious fact that in modern times the physical resistance of the Yamana has considerably diminished. The old people say: "In former times toothache was unknown, nor did one see gray heads among the aged. The Yamana of today are not as hardy as their ancestors. The decisive factor lies in their changed diet, in their consumption of sugar and alcohol, coffee

X881 182 147 and tea, salt and tobacco. European clothing has also contributed a great deal to this decline. But no one has the courage /961/ today to go back to the life of the ancestors. Thus the ruin of our people draws ever nearer!" Concurrent with the physical weakness of the present generation is laxity in the general sphere of morals, which is continually spreading.

X881 182 The čiěxaus celebration, the principles of which have not essentially changed, is not without some effect on young people even in modern times. The logical application of these principles to life, however, has more or less ceased because the middle-aged adults no longer encourage this strongly enough by setting an example.

In the course of this description we have repeatedly mentioned the individual events which fill each day in the čiěxaus hut. An hourly time schedule is unknown; the group depends on the momentary mood of everyone, on personal whim, the weather, and unpredictable coincidence. Certain general trends, however, mark each day. Hence I believe that I may refrain from describing here the exact succession of each particular event on each day of the initiation, which I experienced twice. Anyone who wishes to know this is referred to Koppers (a):45.

The perpetuation of the Yamana as a people throughout the centuries is largely due to the high moral level of the educational work achieved with the young people in the čiěxaus hut. After the strict supervision of the original procedure was relaxed, the stability of the society disintegrated, and it inevitably drifted toward destruction. It is useful for the history of human education that the educational art of the much misunderstood Yamana, as it is clearly and completely revealed in the čiěxaus celebration (375),

375. The youth initiation of the Halakwulup, which I discovered on my fourth journey, shows the same essential characteristics as that of the Yamana. For the time being, compare Gusinde (o):541 and Schmidt (d):977.

has become illuminated and quite minutely known to us Europeans, even as the declining years of this people have set in.

E. Property Relations

42 The orderly and peaceable coexistence of the Yamana is largely made possible by the fact that their property relationships are regulated according to ancient laws. No one questions how these arose or upon what they are based, since for each generation up to the present time traditional custom was the immutable guiding principle. Certain legal titles are based on fact; the prevailing laws of custom are primarily decisive. Actually our Yamana have an adequate number of legal concepts, which they followed in olden times as well as now (376). The economy and the social organization have played a part in the formation of certain relationships involving property. These relationships /962/ are particularly apparent in the social intercourse of persons or groups and in the relations between members of the most intimate family circle (377).

376. With a view toward facilitating comparison as much as possible, this section was organized to some extent according to the pattern in Volume I, 423. Compare Krickeberg (a):331.

[171] 377. Since the economy and the social organization of our Yamana agree to a great extent with the Selk'nam forms, it is not surprising that the property relations of both are almost completely alike.

A careful observer can easily determine the prevailing legal conceptions of the Yamana insofar as they pertain to property, for they are simple and definite in themselves and are also translated into action. This is not to deny individual violations against the law, but the characteristics of the law may be recognized in these very transgressions. One need not be put off by the contradictory judgments of travelers and missionaries. Some facts and observations have simply not been correctly interpreted.

42 Sometimes it can even be shown that this or that person expressed himself first one way and then another. If one takes the trouble to evaluate the actions of the natives from their standpoint, it becomes clear that they are almost never in violation of the legal norms of Europeans. The repeatedly circulated opinion that our Yamana have no feeling for "thine" and "mine" and that therefore they practice uninhibited theft and robbery is wholly unproved slander. If we were to assume such behavior, how would peaceful coexistence with their own kind be possible? Every Indian knows the laws pertaining to common property as well as personal property, and there are all kinds of considerations that force him to observe them carefully; otherwise he could not live in the society of his fellow-tribesmen.

a. Kinds of Property

In view of the unique position of the Yamana within the totality of lower primitive peoples and also for an exact understanding of the individuality of their culture traits, it is advisable to point out definitely at the beginning what a well-developed conception of property our Fuegians possess. They have a clear conception of "thine" and "mine"; accordingly, they understand occasional violations of property rights and actually observe the titles of possession which are current there. They use possessive pronouns [192] (Pronomina possessiva) to distinguish a specific person as the owner of certain things. There is a large selection of words designating theft and damage to goods belonging to others, and there are plenty of opprobrius terms for persons who seize the property of others (378).

378. Strangely enough, Spegazzini (a):177 maintains that among all three Fuegian tribes "the verbs to take and to steal are equivalent" /translated from Spanish/. A glance into BD and at the word lists of the Selk'nam and Halakwulup would easily have shown him his mistake.

421 /963/ They not only acknowledge that material goods have a definite owner who has sole right of disposal, but they also apply this acknowledgment to specific relationships between individuals. [859 736] Accordingly, children belong to both of their own parents as their property, and one spouse has an actual right to the other. Step-parents have similar rights to children who have only one parent or are completely orphaned. We shall soon discuss the fact that certain groups have a definite title of possession for sections of land marked off with boundaries.

The social order of the Yamana recognizes two types of property, namely, common possessions and personal property. The former is based on the absolute necessity of hunting and the roving mode of life. Since everyone, or rather the individual family, is thrown back on its own resources for a considerable time, it is also the sole, unrestricted master of everything it carries along, and it disposes of this quite freely. This distribution of possessions is natural; we come across it not only among all three Fuegians tribes, but quite generally among peoples with a low gathering economy.

It would be a mistake to regard the common property as a communistic form of possession, for the individual person only has the usufruct of it under certain conditions. In like manner it would [476] be incorrect to explain along these lines the obligation of mutual aid which is emphasized to a remarkable degree among the Yamana (379). Voluntary distribution of possessions in the form of

379. Hyades (q):243 opposed such an obviously false interpretation: "They like to share what they have with those around them, and one cannot say that this is because of the community of property. This community does not exist in Fuegia" /translated from French/.

booty and tools occurs as a result of social considerations, but leaves completely untouched the right of disposal itself.

1. Common Property

186 The consciousness of ethnic unity is very pronounced among 423 our Yamana, as among all primitive peoples. It is based on identity

18 80 423 of language and way of life no less than on sharing the same native region. They regard the fragmented maze of islands within the triangle between the Cape Horn cliffs, Brecknock Peninsula, and Punta Julieta at Bahía Aguirre as their country, within whose boundaries they alone, from ancient times, have the exclusive right to live and to hunt. Actually they make their property rights, in the widest sense of the word, apply to this whole area.

423 649 They condemn the crossing of these borders by their Indian neighbors in the northeast, as well as in the southwest, as trespass on their land, simply because it belongs to them alone (380).

> 380. Spegazzini (a):168 has mentioned "that the boundaries of a tribe are well defined; no Alucilif /Alacalif/ canoe goes into Iajan /Yahgan/ territory unless it has a particular and important mission" /translated from Spanish/.

They do not drive off the intruders with weapons, but they regard their encroachment quite /964/ frankly as a legal offense. Only the families who reside in an area may grant their neighbors free entrance if personal reasons make it advisable.

423 649 797 They also regard it as robbery when Europeans settle on their land and crowd out their countrymen. For the last few decades they have become resigned to this condition of constraint because they feel too weak to resist. Formerly they overwhelmed many a European ship with hostility and made its landing difficult in order to deprive the unpopular Whites of any possibility or desire to settle here (p. 250 /untranslated/). For the same reason even the missionaries were made to feel the resistance of the natives. For example, it cost the former much toil and labor to found the mission station in Ushuaia, but this did not make that region the property of the missionaries, according to the Indians, and they actually had to submit to all kinds of annoyances. It was only after direct negotiations that Bridges (MM:IV, 133;1970) could content himself with the following solution: "I got full permission from the natives of Ushuaia to take possession of any land for house and gardens. Next time I intend giving them some thing as a small acknowledgment" /cited in English/. Although

423 opposition for a long time has led to absolutely no result, the 648 Yamana have never given up their exclusive legal claim to their 791 native region.

They trace this claim back to their so-called revolutionary 423 myth, which tells that in ancient times the women who were play-173 ing kina pushed into this region and continued their secret ceremony here. Since this time, they say, all the Yamana have remained in one and the same place, and inasmuch as they were the first to take possession of this land for themselves, it has become their property.

423 The nature of the landscape has divided the whole Yamana territory into five large districts in which an equal number of dia-635 lects have developed (p. 199 /untranslated/). Each dialect group regards its home as, in a special sense, the common property of all its members. It is the field in which each one may devote himself to the hunt for food without restraint. To begin with, the individual has no vested right to a specific animal and no priority in obtaining special products of the land. Without discrimination, everything within the boundaries of the dialect region is available to everyone living there. Thus, with regard to the natural products of their circumscribed homeland, there is no personal property right; this becomes valid only at the moment when a person appropriates something for himself.

423 It is no less important to point out that only the members
635 of the same dialect group may take what their circumscribed area /965/ holds. Persons whose homes are in a neighboring 685 district generally do not have the right to cross the boundaries. A few exceptional cases are regarded as legally valid. If these exceptions are misused, however, disputes may be kindled and, to be sure, precisely because of violation of the sovereign rights which only the actual owners of this region enjoy. They alone may indiscriminately appropriate in it whatever they need in the way of animals and goods, even if some of it serves in barter with people of another group.

It is obvious that every individual will defend the common possessions of his dialect group, to which he belongs by birth or marriage and in which he himself has a share. Whenever and wherever he observes encroachment by a neighbor, he at least disapproves of it and speaks of it to others in his immediate

423 neighborhood. Sometimes the malefactor must atone dearly for 635 his offensive violation of land rights. The Fuegians are even 685 capable of ruthless intolerance toward him. The treatment accorded a certain Okokko may serve as an example. The missionaries with whom he had lived for many months on Isla Keppel wanted him to start a sort of "model farm," like the European prototype, in the center of the region of his countrymen, namely, in Liwya. This, however, was not his home. A small frame house was built for him and a goodly store of provisions left behind so that he could get along for about seven months. His native neighbors, however, would not tolerate him there, for, according to them, he was an intruder. They avenged the violation of their land rights in that "Okokko's house, and goats, and property, had been destroyed by fire" /cited in English/. In this case, envy doubtless intensified the mania for destruction (p. 297 /summarized/).

423 Despite due recognition of the land rights belonging to each 635 dialect group, certain circumstances have nevertheless created legally valid exceptions to the exclusion of one group by another. The basic idea holds for an emergency situation when all doors must be open to every member of the tribe from every direction. This applies first of all to the procurement of raw materials for objects which no one can do without. Uniform, thick beech trunks which furnish suitable pieces of bark for the canoe flourish only in certain places, and there are only a few spots where flint is to be found (p. 41). For anyone seeking these two indispensable kinds of objects the boundaries of the dialect groups, which are drawn on other occasions, do not exist.

Furthermore, anyone who suffers serious hardship in his own region and is threatened by hunger may, without formality, cross the boundary and supply himself in the neighboring territory. It would be inconceivable for our Yamana to deny anyone access to a place where he can save himself from death by starvation. He is permitted to remain there undisturbed until he can demonstrably find subsistence in his own homeland. The most common causes of temporary calamities are: persistent bad weather /966/ regions where canoe trips are difficult in any case, namely, near the outlying islands; no less frequently, the loss of one's canoe; less often, the death of a wife who leaves a man with several small 423 children while his relatives live far away.

635 Finally, there is a completely different kind of occasion

225 when all boundaries are ignored, namely, when a whale is stranded.

423 A certain priority is conceded to those in whose house district this

425 mighty animal is deposited on the shore, for sometimes they have

635 worked hard before the rich booty is spread out before them (p. 224). Nevertheless, their priority consists chiefly of the privilege to determine the so-called distribution of the fat and meat. It is not left to the discretion of the individual to go up to the animal and cut out a piece here or there for himself. Rather, it is the task of a few men to cut up the big animal properly and to give something to each one present if he wishes it (p. 225). This is the only way to prevent useless waste.

Anyone within the widest radius who learns of the stranding of a whale may head toward the spot considered and remain until all the suitable parts are consumed or distributed. The people native to the region arrive ahead of the visitors from a distance; nothing prevents them from taking the prized whalebone and from having the tastiest pieces cut out for themselves. Hence the people within the bounded area where the mighty animal was washed ashore do enjoy certain advantages. It is easy to see why other tribal members are also allowed to share this rich gift of Mother Nature, according to common law. A small number of people would be unable to consume the considerable amount of fat and meat quickly enough in the short time before it spoils. Therefore, nothing would be more natural than to apply, without restraint, the common principle of sharing with others, especially when there is abundance to be had without effort. Alerted by dense flocks of sea birds, the Indians come pouring in to the stranded whale, even from some distance, and they all enjoy the excellent taste of the blubber. No one would dare rebuff a visiting stranger nor hinder him. If one were to do so, he would be loudly decried as a selfish human being.

423 As for material goods that are common property, our Tlingits have only the two Great Stone Dolls for the [illegible] and the [illegible], the man's ceremony. Both serve in the fulfillment of a task for which the group as such is obligated, and the adult participants busy themselves at it quite as a matter of course. From the start

613 it is their intention to work for the benefit of those events, hence they forgo a property right which otherwise would accrue from their personal work. Later, after the end of the ceremonies when the Great Hut is abandoned by the group, the latter automatically recognizes its right of disposal. Anyone who then establishes himself in it /MS/ or who wants to use a few sticks from it is not prevented from doing so, since he is appropriating something that has been acknowledged as ownerless.

613 615 Although the Tamana emphasize their right to sole possession of their native area and entirely guard the respective boundaries of their dialect groups, they are just as lenient when distress or expediency make it advisable to waive special rights. They put the life and livelihood of each of their fellow-citizens far above these rights.

5. Private Property

614 Like their neighbors, the Sulu'tawa (Vol. 1, 613) and the Gatatawiyap, our Tamana also make a sharp and clear distinction between common possession and personal property. The former belongs to a larger group or to the whole tribe; private property belongs to only one person as his individual possession, or, as family property, to members of the same family, in the limited sense of the word, who comprise an economic unit. In everyday speech this distinction between individual possession and family possession is clearly expressed (MS). For example, the men speak

MS. The data of other observers are not always clear and comprehensive. Thus Hyades (4:308) in one case states: "Property is individual, there is no chief, social hierarchy, or slaves" /translated from French/. In another place (p.310) he admits that there is common property, besides personal property: "Property is individual and hereditary without a will, but this applies only to personal effects: canoes, hunting or fishing implements, skins of animals, each person having only what is necessary of these objects" /translated from French/.

421/ of his weapons, the woman of her little baskets, and the child of his ornaments, each one emphasizing his unlimited right of disposal, but each of them can only speak of "our hut," for it belongs jointly to the members of the same family. The designations for the right of ownership in the two cases are different.

d. Personal Possessions

422. At every turn the careful observer comes up against the unequivocal determination with which every Indian lays absolute claim to his personal possessions and defends them against misappropriation and damage. He regards himself as the exclusive master and owner of certain things to which other persons have no right. He alone disposes of them according to his own free will or he loans them for temporary use to a person who urgently requests them and pledges to return them. No one presumes to lay hands on the personal possessions of someone else, unless he is a thief.

It is easy to determine what belongs to the individual, because no one overloads himself with possessions and because /989/ clear, definite legal titles are behind them. Moreover, it follows from the nature of the simple economy of the Yamana that one person possesses no more, essentially, than another of his fellow-tribesmen. Finally, the little that one person carries with him is quite openly exposed to view and can easily be observed by his neighbors (989).

> 989. Bridges, in (1):22 and in MM:III, 115; 1869, listed the total number of objects that constitute "a Yahgan's property" /cited in English/. He does not mention which is the special property of the man, the woman, and the children.

Fully aware of having a general and actual right to the possession of his own things, everyone guards what he has with obvious jealousy. It takes forms that are incomprehensible to us, especially when someone owns things of European origin, for these 422 more strongly provoke people to theft. Bridges describes with striking accuracy the concern of the Yamana for their few possessions: "The begging and stealing propensities of the natives discourage laying up stores of fuel or food, and engender slyness. When they sell skins or other things to us, they aim to do so unknown to their fellows, in order to keep what they receive to themselves. Thus they secrete what they bring under their clothes, or hide it near by, till obnoxious observers and waylayers have departed. Again, if they have any supply, they cannot keep it in their own possession, and so they leave it with us. A great powerful fellow lately bought some biscuit; he wished me very much to keep it for him. Twice or thrice a day this man came to our door, and would take out three or four biscuits at a time, and always watched for opportunities to time his visits privately. Before leaving our door he invariably concealed the little he used to take. As the man with his biscuit above-mentioned, so with those who have swedes; daily, or several times a day, will they come for two or three. The people here cannot leave the canoe furniture in the canoes for fear of theft, and so have to be constantly taking backwards and forwards paddles, spears, and every trifle" /cited in English/ (MM:IX, 218; 1875).

Each one claims for himself the sole use of everything that he possesses in the way of property. One can most clearly recognize what belongs to an individual on the basis of this attitude (383).

383. Cooper:179 cites the following from the direct experience of reliable observers: "The sense of ownership of personal property, such as the spoils of the chase, artifacts, and the movable windshield or hut, is clearly marked, and the right definitely recognized" /cited in English/.

It is easy to keep separate the personal belongings of each member of the family. The man owns only what he wears and carries in his hand, that is to say, his clothing and his even more unpretentious body ornaments, as well as his weapons and the tools with which he makes them. Raw materials that he obtained for

422 himself to use in making things also belong to him, such as sticks for shafts, tendons for cords, and the rib bones of whales for spear points. Finally /969/ his property consists of such objects as he has made for barter and which he saves for a suitable opportunity. His dogs and the live birds that he has caught and kept with him must not be forgotten. A Yamana man finds these few and very simple earthly goods sufficient for his way of life and his happiness.

The woman is not much richer. She does, however, own a greater number of smaller objects, whereas the man has a few substantial pieces which he calls his own. Her belongings consist of what she needs to cover and to ornament her body, furthermore a small basket or so in which she keeps small artifacts, such as fishhooks, fire implements, pouch for pigments, knife, scraper, strap, etc., and finally the mussel breaker and the long crab fork, although these two articles were made by her husband. Nowadays she also carries from one place to another the tin dishes, cloth garments, and all kinds of trifles that she obtains from the Whites.

[858] From its early years the child, like its father and mother, disposes of his own possessions, which include clothing and ornaments, playthings, and all the tame animals that were given to him for his amusement. There is no lack of examples from olden and modern times which clearly show that even the parents do not consider themselves entitled to dispose of some article belonging to the child without his consent (384).

384. Relying on several written sources, Cooper:179 comes to the conclusion that "women and children have well recognized property rights" /cited in English/. -- The same conditions hold no less strictly for children's right of ownership among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 432) and the Halakwulup.

It follows naturally from this segregation of goods that no one may arbitrarily dispose of something that belongs to another. Whenever Europeans wanted to trade for some object and approached the wrong person about it, they were always referred to the real owner. Fitz-Roy (a):76, 237 definitely became acquainted with 422 this method of procedure by our Yamana on two occasions. Once he bartered tobacco with a man for a dog, but since the dog belonged to the man's wife, she forced Fitz-Roy to give the animal back to her. Snow (b):264 also confirms from his own experience: "I believe they have a sort of property right amongst them, and I have seen one of the oldest women exercising authority over the rest of her people. Wishing to buy a canoe, it was refused me on the ground that it belonged to her, and she would not part with it" /cited in English/.

Every Yamana is completely free to take good care of his property or to neglect it completely. No one even prevents him from wantonly destroying his things. If he lacks something he must personally look around for a replacement. Objects that are [425] found may not be appropriated by the finder, and if he nevertheless keeps them, he risks being labeled a thief. Whatever a person has owned in life /970/ remains his after his death. That is [768] why the belongings of a deceased person are burned and destroyed, inasmuch as no one could legally take them as his property. One does not even encroach upon a dead owner's right to his personal [428] property. The Yamana are unacquainted with the actual inheritance of anything whatever.

β. Family Property

Since every person owns his individual property, he also 422 brings it with him into his marriage, without, however, giving up 593 his exclusive right to it. He uses each article freely and without hindrance and replaces for himself anything and everything that has become unserviceable or is lost. As we have just said, one of the partners in marriage would not dare, at his own discretion, to dispose of an object belonging to the other partner.

When a marriage takes place, a new configuration of life is 423 always begun, for the family forms a very compact economic unit. 593 The word "family" is used here in its narrower sense, namely, as the social unit of father, mother, and unmarried children. The new configuration of life also demands its own right to certain implements common to the union as such. The solidarity of family

423 593 members is visibly symbolized by the hut in which they all find shelter. The man and woman are simultaneously active in its construction, although he is obliged to do the heavier work and she the much easier light work. The children work, too, no matter how slight their participation is. In like manner, both spouses equally keep the hut in repair after it has been built. It is primarily the woman's duty to perform minor repairs. The skins needed to cover the hut framework are furnished by the man from hunting, while the woman dresses the skins. She stores and transports these pieces of leather in her canoe. No other articles are required as common property for the construction of the hut. Naturally, everyone, without discrimination, enjoys the benefit of the fire, since all the members of the family, in one way or another, see that it does not go out.

423 592 If, in an exceptional case, two or three families should erect a common dwelling (p. 32), they readily agree on the division of space, within which each one does as he pleases. If one family wanders off sooner than another, they take down their pieces of leather from the framework and load their own things into their canoe. The family that stays behind then closes off the space that they still want to occupy.

423 594 Only the husband or the wife has the right to permit this guest or that visitor to enter their hut. It is generally regarded as an encroachment to enter a hut without permission, although this is usually tacitly assumed. Once the family has given up their campsite /971/ and departed with their implements, the hut framework left behind is regarded as ownerless. Whoever first takes possession of it lawfully owns it and may settle in it undisturbed.

422 593 In a certain sense the various foods are also doubtless regarded as common property of the family, the idea being that the husband and the wife are obliged to seek food for themselves and the members of their family. The Fuegians' convictions concerning this obligation comes out most clearly when an indolent, lazy [626] man neglects his hunting and lets his family starve. The whole neighborhood expresses its displeasure, and the society even grants the wife the right to leave such a neglectful husband. The man collects meat for the whole family, and the woman gathers smaller animals for all her loved ones, indiscriminately, for

422 everyone has his own right to whatever serves for the support and 593 sustenance of family members and he may be deprived of nothing. Thus the husband or wife does not work for himself alone in obtaining food.

The little supplementary word "sē" clearly emphasizes the 422 urgent concern for all the members of the family to hunt and gather 593 simultaneously and without exception. BD:379 states: "sē [is] used 192 by one person to another in giving any orders or expressing their desires and conveys a sense of mutual interest and ownership, or rather right to the results of what is done or obtained. sē čkālli manǰax ālan, go and get us some fuel, for the common good. sē kipajuin ēruf (a man to his wife)come, get us some mussels" /cited in English/.

Every occupant has access to everything in the dwelling in 422 the way of foodstuffs, although in many cases the wife and mother 593 puts the roast or the mussels on the fire in response to the wish of 264 the husband or children. Guests and visitors, however, wait for a 576 special invitation before reaching out for food, and this difference in behavior should be clearly emphasized.

Among themselves the Yamana are pledged to mutual aid; 431 hence everyone generously shares with his neighbors the things he 476 brings home. This does not alter the fact that sometimes a family 593 saves larger pieces and more delectable bits for its members. Even during the distribution of booty among others the joint procedure of the two spouses is in evidence. While the man cuts up a sea lion, for example, the wife will decide on some piece for this or that family, at the same time anticipating their tacit agreement. To show favoritism toward dear relatives and intimate acquaintances is, after all, a common human trait from which our Fuegians, too, are not exempt. If the husband or the wife is for any reason prevented from hunting for food, it is the duty of the other partner to be twice as active to provide enough so that no member of the family suffers harm. If a neighbor must be supported because he is ill or /978/ has lost his weapons, the woman takes him more food than is customary, but only after discussing it with her husband, inasmuch as she feels that she alone is not entitled to dispose of what the man brought to the family hut from his hunting or she herself from her gathering, which should serve the whole family.

431 Nevertheless this does not entirely deny a person a certain preroga-
47 tive over whatever he has brought in, and a completely equal right
593 to it in the communistic sense is never granted to the members of the family (385).

385. This opinion is clearly expressed in BD:319 in the explanation of the verb "mōtabaku: To take or make use of what is not one's own but yet is proper to take or use, as for instance a husband his wife's fish, or a brother, if hungry, fish belonging to a brother or sister during their absence, though when he saw them he would tell them what he had done" /cited in English/.

422 For the individual family, the vessel, whether it be a bark
593 canoe or a flat skiff, is no less important than dwelling and food. Although it is made by the man, it is the woman's duty to service it, guard it, and care for it (p. 134). During the trip through the channels she has authority in the canoe, because she alone usually rows or paddles. Also, after landing and before departure it is only her concern. Since, however, the canoe serves all the members of the family without exception and since neither the individual nor the family as a whole can do without it, all separate rights or privileges cease, although the husband built the canoe and the wife made it.

Hence we must regard the few things that rightfully belong to the self-contained family and each member of this familial unit as actual "family property." As such, this includes only the dwelling, the canoe, and food, and toward these an individual person cannot claim any special rights and privileges. Obviously this legal situation strengthens family ties and increases the feeling of responsibility of one toward the other with whom he is intimately associated in the life of the individual family.

b. The Right of Possession

421 The Yamana recognize actual possessions as personal property, aside from a few common possessions. Institutions and principles pointing to pure communism are completely absent. They are familiar with several titles for the right of possession, which we must now discuss, after having described the actual forms of property. In this respect, too, our Yamana agree almost completely with the neighboring Selk'nam (Vol. I, 434). The recog-[171] nized legal titles are as simple and clear as the forms of the possessions of this tribal society.

1. Right of the Supreme Being as Creator

421 Later on we shall speak of the religious convictions of the 776 Yamana, which culminate in the recognition of a Supreme Being. Common names applied to this being are Watauinéiwa, "the /973/ ancient one," and Hidábuan, "my father." He is lord over all visible things and their supreme owner. The compound term Watauinéiwa-sír, which is often used, evidently means: the sír, or thing in the sense of property, of Watauinéiwa (386). Practically everything visible and tangible, without reservation, is regarded by our Fuegians as Watauinéiwa-sír; therefore the Supreme Being is the owner of visible creation.

386. BD:379 interprets this word with: "tools, implements, vessels, toys, goods, property, things in general" /cited in English/.

421 Among all that has been created, the necessary daily food is 776 the most important for our Indians. Heading the list are the game animals hunted by the man and the many lower animals which the 825 woman gathers. Although the individual exerts himself personally for these, it is nevertheless as though he first had to ask permission from Watauinéiwa for each piece, hence his repeated request in actual prayers to the Supreme Being for the things he needs for his subsistence. In this procedure there is a faint hint that Watauinéiwa will benevolently give each human being some of that which he

421 alone has the right to distribute. The Yamana accepts the slain 825 animal and every other thing as a gift voluntarily bestowed by the 776 Supreme Being; consequently he does not fail to thank his deity expressly for this now and then.

The Yamana have the same idea in mind when they say that everyone should kill and gather only as many animals as are needed for the moment. Beyond that it is punishable to destroy wantonly and aimlessly a number of animals which are not used in the household and which finally putrify. With this restriction they first of all want to check senseless waste of useful animals, but they do not overlook the fact that in such action there is also a violation of the primary property right which belongs only to Watauinéiwa. It is said that he voluntarily lets each individual Yamana have exactly as much as he needs for subsistence, and he punishes a person who, over and above that, wantonly destroys something of his.

If there is a ceremony for the dead or if, on another occasion, someone gives expression to his grief, he sometimes, in self-justification, lets the Supreme Being know that all his life long he has never illicitly, that is, through misuse, laid violent hands on animals which were made available to him for his own subsistence. If anyone has really done wrong in fits of anger and has given vent to his rage by unjustifiable destruction of many animals, he is soon remorseful and begs sincerely for the forgiveness of Watauinéiwa because /974/ of the harm he inflicted upon him. Sometimes an excited person will threaten Watauinéiwa with specific words, thus wishing to avenge himself for some misfortune, saying that he is going to slay masses of his living animals in order to harm him greatly. In these condemnations the deity is clearly set forth as the owner of available material goods, among which animals are regarded as primary.

The Yamana do not give a definite reason why the Supreme Being has the legal title to all creation, primarily all animals. Nevertheless, this idea lives very clearly and definitely within them and serves as a guide for their actions. We shall speak of supplementary details in our description of their form of religion.

2. Taking Possession

425 The most common and the simplest way of making oneself the owner of an object is to take it and confiscate it. The assumption is that, as ownerless property, it really does not belong to anyone. This includes, first of all, the things that are indispensable for life, such as food, wood for the fire, and sticks for building the hut, as well as such things as bones and whalebone for tools, pieces of bark for the canoe, and rushes for basket-weaving, and finally snail shells and tendons for ornaments, mineral pigments for body painting, and pieces of leather for various uses. Obviously all these things come from the kingdom of nature over which Watauinéiwa actually has the primary right of disposal. The Yamana have a more or less distinctly pronounced conviction that everything around them has been granted by Watauinéiwa so that they may have the usufruct of it. They make use of this general dispensation, for in no other way would they come into possession of the things they need. They do not each time expressly remember this lawful condition, but now and then the commandment not to kill more animals than are directly required for the household flairs up in their memory.

Merely by his conduct a person shows that he intends to make himself the owner of an animal or a thing. Anyone who goes into the forest and gathers firewood, anyone gathering mussels and snails along the beach, anyone who kills a larger animal with his weapons or acquires something in a similar manner thereafter regards himself as sole owner of what he has acquired. At the same time his right is recognized by other people. If, after a certain [673] object has found its master, anyone should disturb the latter in his right of ownership, that person is unequivocally regarded as a thief. Thus it is sufficient for anyone simply to lay his hands on ownerless goods, for in this way he identifies himself as their owner. He remains such as long as he keeps these goods or until he has consumed them. Even married persons take this into account in their behavior 425 toward each other, as /975/ Bridges (I):21 has already assured us: 543 "What the wife caught or obtained was her own, the husband only used of it what his wife gave him, and she did not ask his permission when she would make presents to her friends" /cited in English/ (387).

387. Hyades (q):243 writes in a similar vein: "Each properly possesses what he has produced by his labor, what he has harvested in fishing or hunting, what he has found washed up on the beach; even small children themselves have full ownership of what has been given them" /translated from French/.

Sometimes the new owner does not immediately use what has hitherto been ownerless property. In a given case he will make known his right to it by special signs, if it is not obvious from the surrounding circumstances. For example, if someone comes across large pieces of a recently killed sea lion stored in tree branches, he immediately concludes that the successful hunter did not want to or was unable to take along the whole booty and left part of it behind which he will pick up soon. It is not permissible for another person to take possession of those pieces of meat. We know that the Yamana collect branches and trunks for firewood, place them upright against each other in the woods, and let them dry out for a few days. A person passing this bundle of wood immediately recognizes the work performed by another and does not take any of it. If someone finds a sling fastened in the grass (Fig. 59) in which possibly a few wild geese are caught, it would never occur to him to appropriate either of them, and he leaves undisturbed the claim of the one who laid the snare. The surrounding circumstances alone, therefore, make it clear whether goods are ownerless or whether someone has already made himself master of them. The Yamana do not use special property marks since these are for the most part superfluous or would be difficult to apply.

In general the Yamana derive the legal title for the assumption of ownership from the work and effort involved. The ensuing right of possession is recompense for the previous work. Therefore, anyone who of his own accord and with his own labor has accomplished this work enjoys possession of the goods earned. Naturally, in each case only the amount affected by individual effort passes from the ownerless state into that of personal possession.

425 423 We know that the large territory of the Yamana is divided into five zones with boundaries (p. 199 /untranslated/) which also apply to the right of free food-seeking. Within one's home territory he has free access to everything that nature supplies, but if he goes into neighboring territory and there takes possession of something for his own use, he must be able to justify it. Obvious scarcity of the necessities of life in his more limited home territory or the stranding of a whale affords such justification. A friendly visit is also sufficient reason, for sometimes someone marries into another dialect group from which his nearest kin occasionally visit him. The stranger would not be able to stay too long in the neighboring territory without /976/ arousing displeasure among the local residents and even evoking grave hostility (388). Hence, there, too,

388. I believe that this is the meaning of the following words of Bridges in Hyades (j):180: "The natives dare not go to places where they do not have friends or where they are not known, for they would probably be killed" /translated from French/.

everyone knows (known) the owner of whatever he directly confiscates as ownerless property. The members of each dialect group, however, regard themselves as having priority over all natural stores and animals in their local area.

425 When the rightful owner of an object hands it over to another person, he relinquishes his right of ownership and it passes to the other person. The free decision of the owner himself is required in [428] such cases. The Yamana are unacquainted with an actual hereditary right in the sense that certain descendants can legally take over the possessions of an owner after his death, simply because of their [68] kinship with him. Actually, when a person dies, everything he has owned is purposely destroyed by fire because no one has a right to it as such. Anyone who has received something from another person or is keeping it for him soon returns it (389), simply because the wild fowl for them, and in so doing I always intimated that it was for the women and children; when, no matter to which of the men I gave the bird, it was invariably taken to those for whom it was intended" /cited in English/.

389. Snow (x):f, 245 confirms this from his own observations: "Several times I procured

other person is the owner and is expecting it.

3. Procurement and Production

Often one must equate taking possession of goods as just described and so-called procurement, for in this form it is a matter of acquisition by bringing in something. It is not a matter of barter or gifts, but of seizure of ownerless goods which someone drags to his hut or his canoe. A particular effort is connected with their procurement, for example, in the case of the person who peels off pieces of bark from a beech trunk and trims them for canoe construction, or of the person who on a distant beach picks out the rib bones of whales, which he needs for his harpoon points, and finally of a person who undertakes a distant journey in order to dig out from a rock wall a piece of pyrite for striking fire. As we have pointed out, such procurement usually involves strenuous treks and long canoe trips.

Detailed argument is not needed to prove that all raw materials when purposefully worked become the property of the one who has produced the article. The primary and exclusive purpose of the worker is to produce an implement for his own use that will make his work easier or insure greater success. This /977/ has produced and still produces the manifold articles and the various weapons found in the possession of the Yamana. Whatever an individual has produced in this way for his personal needs belongs to him quite exclusively. From the start, in the fashioning of the raw materials, he proceeds according to his own wishes and the demands of his habits. Anyone who can more easily and surely handle a thick harpoon shaft or a longer sling or a markedly curved bow-staff will naturally fashion this characteristic form out of the raw material when he is making a new piece. A woman who likes to see herself in a 425 particular type of necklace or other ornament will copy it again and again. A child time after time procures for himself the outstanding toy that is his favorite. Everyone puts his particular wishes into the fashioning of an object and it thereby becomes his property.

Many statements could be quoted which come from every Fuegian's conviction that by the mere production of an article he makes himself sole owner of it and that special confirmation of his right of disposal is not necessary. Other people keep their hands off it; otherwise the owner would defend his property by merely pointing out that he made it. Any object that has been fashioned has its particular owner, either the husband or the wife or the child belonging to the same family. No one would take liberties with the articles of another without making himself guilty of theft. These personal belongings should be kept distinct from those few things which, in the service of all the members of the family, are available to everyone equally as "family goods."

Obviously the lawful title to every article made arises from the work involved. The individual purchases with his own physical strength and skill the object that he makes out of the raw material. Everyone says: "I made this object, therefore it is mine!" Anyone who wishes to have an object that he sees in the hands of another and admires acquires it for himself most easily by making it. The above rules of common law are so very much taken for granted by the Yamana that in everyday life they are hardly ever mentioned by anyone, although old and young invariably conform to them in all their actions.

4. Barter, Loans, Gifts

421 The different treatment of possessions and the use to which they are put derive from the right of ownership. For example, the owner can let his things go to ruin or purposely destroy them. No one will stop him, although his behavior may be characterized as unwise and senseless. The Fuegian does not possess an abundance of goods, and everyone must /978/ sooner or later obtain or make for himself, sometimes with great toil, whatever is indispensable to him and what he has destroyed without reason.

437 Although by and large every adult is able to make for himself the articles necessary for his way of life, nevertheless he obtains all kinds of things through barter. We mean by this the arrangement whereby, upon mutual agreement, one object is put up for another and the owners make an exchange. Our Indians lack [436] real media of exchange, such as money, shells, and the like, but they put a lower or higher value on each object, to which they decisively refer during the exchange. The value of a thing increases if it is naturally beautiful, for example, in the case of an [435] otter skin, or if it is carefully made and reliable in use, for instance, a long harpoon point, and finally in relation to the difficulty with which it was obtained, as in the case of soft pieces of guanaco leather. If a person wants an object, the owner evaluates it and compares it with the merit of the thing the other person offers in exchange. They try to make up for the lack of merit of one object as against another by increasing the quantity. The [434] Indians are unfamiliar with weights as measures. If both parties have agreed on the equivalence of the objects to be bartered, they make the exchange.

There are several expressions in the Yamana language from 437 which we may clearly recognize the customs involved in barter as 439 described above. For example, BD:307 gives matĕxgĭmatapai, "to make mutually an exchange with each other" /cited in English/; likewise, matĕxgĭmata, "a thing (things) given in exchange" /cited in English/. Earlier observers were convinced that there was lively barter among our Yamana (390). Darwin (d):261 wrote:

> 390. Cooper:179 is correct in his summary: "Barter between the Fuegians and the whites, between the three Fuegian tribes, and between members of the same tribe is a common feature of Fuegian life" /cited in English/.

"Several of the Fuegians definitely proved that they had a good idea of barter. I gave a man a large nail, without making any kind of sign that I expected a return gift. He immediately picked out two fish and handed them to me on the tip of his spear. Whenever there was a gift meant for a canoe and it was dropped near someone else, it was always given to the rightful owner." This last statement confirms what was mentioned above, namely, that no one keeps for himself something that belongs to another. "Strange to say," Snow (b):262 confessed, "I found all of the Fuegians I met very honest in barter" /cited in English/. In addition, we quote Lovisato's (b):140 testimony: "The Yahgan seemed to us to be quite familiar with barter...Upon receiving from us a piece of bread or any article whatsoever, they immediately offered some fish strung on a stick or some crabs" /translated from Italian/. The natives evaluated the merit of the object given them and in return gave something comparable (391).

> 391. Unfortunately some Europeans consciously or unconsciously disregarded this point of view of the natives. Hyades (c):243 also complains about this: "It often resulted in misunderstandings with strangers who planned to buy weapons and skins for furs in exchange for an insignificant trifle, while the Fuegians thought they themselves had made a gift which was not repaid in subsequent meetings /translated from French/. Having grown wise by many disappointments, the Indians use a well-known trick which Martial:204 clearly describes: "The seller never parted with the object that he wished to exchange until he had received the price, and when he had several objects he was very careful to show them successively, so as not to decrease the value of his goods" /translated from French/.

/979/ Since Europeans have dominated the Cape Horn Archipelago, our natives have also bartered with them, above all with the missionaries. How actively barter was sometimes carried on was described by Bridges on April 21, 1870, as follows: "There is no market in Fireland. The natives cover our food, clothing, and goods. Women, one after another, bring bundles of small fish for sale. One wants in exchange much biscuit, another a comb, another a handkerchief, another sugar, etc., others bring crabs and

437 others shellfish, and oftentimes there is such a flow that we must
439 stop and refuse. . . Many come with baskets, spears, dolls, fish-lines, eggs, shells, and curios of every imaginable kind, -- mats, seals' teeth, birds' claws, feather headbands, clays, fungi, wood, etc. -- wanting every description of goods in return" /cited in English/ (MM:IX, 217; 1875).

437 One is justified in assuming that the Tanaana greatly enjoy exchanging their articles and, indeed, for the sheer pleasure of having something in return as soon as possible. Bridges (ibid.) is also of the opinion that "the natives are always buying and selling, exchanging canoes and everything" /cited in English/. He also adds: "Their manner of doing so is very unsatisfactory" /cited in English/. True, to a certain extent everyone concerned with barter evaluates the articles to be exchanged, but they lack unequivocal measures of value, such as money, and hasty arbitrariness is unavoidable (305). The various unpleasantness sometimes results from > 305. On April 11, 1875, Bridges mentioned an incident "that occurred a few days ago. Palakiian, a man about thirty-eight, has three wives and three little children, and had a good canoe. Another man, a widow here, not living with Palakiian, intends to give his canoe to Palakiian. Palakiian does not wish it, and hears of it indirectly, and is troubled what to give in return. He told me all about it. Palakiian at length is told that such and such a canoe is his, not, however, by the gives. Palakiian then seeks him, and gives him a large axe, well handled. Thus there is no mutual agreement previously made, and most of their transactions are performed in this loose manner" /cited in English/ (MM:IX, 218;1875).

436 Our Tanaana practice lending less frequently, but sometimes they find themselves forced to resort to it because of need and unknown requirements. Almost always only articles that someone

426 urgently needs will be borrowed wherever they are to be found, no matter whether it is a canoe or an insignificant ornament for a dance. The original owner puts his property at the disposal of the person who asks him for it for only a certain time. The borrower must, therefore, return the borrowed article to its owner at the end of the period agreed upon. If, in an exceptional case, the owner /980/ cannot be asked for the desired object, the borrower trusts that he will consent; in other words, he tacitly assumes that he will agree and afterwards explains what he has done.

Nowadays the Yamana obtain some European goods which, to a great extent, they leave behind in their little houses in Puerto Mejillones while they are on trips that last several months. I repeatedly saw one or another of them temporarily use an article from a neighboring house and later put it back. When I questioned him, his answer usually was: "The owner agrees to lend it, but I must return what I have borrowed!" It is not customary among the Yamana to admonish a person to return something he has borrowed; the owner waits patiently until the person remembers his duty. If anyone who has borrowed something should lose or damage it, he himself provides for an adequate substitute. The Yamana also did not fail to return the things they borrowed from the missionaries (393).

393. Bridges (MM:IX, 217,1870) says briefly: "Many come begging; many to borrow this thing and that thing, then afterwards to return the article borrowed" /cited in English/.

Their language has terms for borrowing and lending, as well as for the return of what was lent. BD:346 gives mîne, "to lend," manîku, "to borrow" /cited in English/. Making a fine distinction, BD:96 also mentions lmîtalîpata, "to take without asking, to take during the absence of the owner" /cited in English/. Other expressions also show that lawful conditions for lending are clear and familiar to our Fuegians (394).

394. Here is an example of how punctilious they are about returning things that have been lent to them. Stirling gave an iron axe to a certain Tweenot, with which he was to cut firewood for the mission ship. "When I lent him the axe, people on board the 'Allen Gardiner' thought and said, 'You will not see that axe again. As for the wood he promises to cut and carry, and get ready by the time the ship comes again, you may whistle for it'; but I made the experiment, and it answered well. The wood was ready, the axe was returned on our next visit some months after" /cited in English/ (MM:VI, 88:1872).

431 STT

Great generosity and unselfishness are conspicuous basic features in the character of the Yamana. The duty toward mutual assistance demands that everyone distribute his booty among others without reservation. Beyond that, some people take particular pleasure in lavishly remembering neighbors with the yields from hunting and gathering (980). We shall not speak here of this habit.

> 980. Hyades (q):243 gained the impression "that the natives especially enjoy ownership in order to have the right to distribute what they have and for the pleasure of being generous" /translated from French/.

Understandably, the giving of presents takes on considerable proportions. The articles involved are primarily foodstuffs which everyone can easily and quickly obtain, ornaments, and, finally, articles for daily use. It is taken for granted, so to speak, that women who occupy the same camp for a few days surprise each other now and then with gifts of meat and fruit. A visitor from far or near always brings something along /981/ which he offers the others, chiefly fresh meat or a beautiful skin. This makes it necessary for the recipient to show his appreciation as soon as possible. This is usually done by giving someone who is departing something special, above all tools and handwork. The men offer finished weapons or parts of weapons and raw materials, the women primarily ornaments and small baskets. The gift is given and received without any formality, without a word, without meaningful gestures expressing one's feelings.

It is one of the inescapable obligations of every Tonsea to come now and then with a gift for someone. Anyone who neglected this beyond a certain time would inevitably acquire a bad reputation. It is just as much a matter of course for the recipient to respond to the attention paid him, not immediately, to be sure, but within a certain time, with a gift of equal value. No one would demand this, but one does not forget who owes him a return gift. This gift, no matter who has given it, is critically evaluated. Woe to the one who has behaved shabbily, that is to say, who has given insignificant, useless things in return! He is soon known far and wide as selfish and stingy. Someone who gives a person a valuable or rare present usually puts him in an embarrassing situation, for then some equivalent is expected of him which he usually does not have on hand. Actually, everyone would prefer not to receive special gifts from the man.

It is very significant that, according to Kuypers (d) 194, the Tonsea language "scarcely has an actual term meaning 'to ask for gifts,' but all the more terms for 'expecting gifts.'" BD-71 mentions lilgilim, "to expect as a man does gifts when visiting his relations who have much blubber" /cited in English/. Still other words express "not to give" and "to give no more." The conduct of a selfish, stingy person is described with the verb ralagiim, "to not take, bring, eat, show any food or other things in the sight or presence of friends nor they are one to give them a part. ralagegilomo, to be, act stingily by not letting others see one bring or use supplies of any kind and thus abstain from giving them a share" /cited in English/ (BD-57). The word ralgo, "a friendship formed between two persons, accompanied with exchange of gifts" /cited in English/ (BD-55), seems to promote a favorable mutual relationship by means of gifts.

As a rule, the giver does not pay any attention to the needs or wishes of the one to whom he gives gifts, rather, he gives him what he himself can easily do without. This increases the embarrassment of the recipient still more. Nevertheless, he must accept the gift with a certain show of satisfaction and with a certain amount of hypocritical pleasure. To refuse it would be the equivalent of a bad insult and public humiliation (106). Also, it

106. In this connection Kruijer (c) 209 has already said: "Gifts are most common, and it is considered a great affront to refuse a gift, which is also expected to be returned with something the giver wants" /cited in English/. Cf. Cooper 176.

It not customary among these Fuegians /302/ to wish for a particular present from someone. Such expressions would be rebuffed as bold presumptions. Anything a person needs he can and should obtain through barter. From all this we see that gift-giving, which, as such, is limited, has many unpleasant aspects.

5. Violation of the Right of Ownership

Our Fuegians anxiously guard their right to the various belongings which they call their own. Violations are judged very severely and are avenged by giving the person a bad reputation. Not a single reliable observer will deny that now and then there is a case of theft among these Indians. Many exaggerated judgments, however, must be rejected as false and unfounded assertions (303). For example, Admiral R.J. Fitzroy gives no justification for representing them as among the most thievish of human beings (Abt.IV,131; 1881). Hyades (g):30 approaches the real facts of the matter in the following words: In the settlement of the Mission Ushuaia in Orange Bay, "Where they were permitted entrance and free movement throughout the day, there were nevertheless not the slightest thefts. In this respect, therefore, the Fuegians are decidedly better than their reputation." Dumont, on his journey through the territory of the Yaghans, was occasionally accompanied by Jemmy Button and his family.

303. In Gusinde (g):13 we read the following obvious exaggeration: "The dogs, like their owners themselves, steal a good deal and, if not carefully watched, lost the more of provisions" /translated from Spanish/.

On Pizzin Island and in Wulaia, Jemmy had to defend himself energetically against the thievish behavior of his countrymen. Nevertheless Despard (8):734 comments upon this: "As on our former visits, not the slightest connection marred our harmony; we found no thieving attempted on our property on shore, though some small articles were stolen by a visitor or visitors on board" /cited in English/. Bridges warns in his judgment and once mentions that the Indians steal from each other when one pulls out the other's swedes where they are planted. Hence no one leaves his swedes in the ground until they are fully matured. "they are not half grown, but he cannot venture to leave them longer on account of the stealing" /cited in English/. The same missionary adds: "The natives respect our things much more than their own people's, and we oftentimes wonder that with so little power to repress or punish, we are so little troubled by the audacity, stealing, or vice of the people" /cited in English/ (MM:IX, 12;1875) (398).

> 398. On August 15, 1875, Bridges corroborates his opinion with the following observation: "As usual, gave a contribution of cooked rice in school-room, and am truly thankful that on no occasion have we missed any of the spoons and vessels used promiscuously by the natives. There are twenty-four canoes here [illegible] 100 persons living in twelve different houses" /cited in English/ (MM:IX, 193; 1875).

In April, 1884, he writes: "They cannot cease stealing, and parties on the eve of departure come /985/ into the gardens by night, and fill their sacks and depart, committing lesser thefts meanwhile. The temptation is great, and as they can do so, and suffer little, they hesitate not" /cited in English/ (MM:XVIII, 183; 1884). A person who judges fairly must admit that theft occurs sporadically and is always branded as a crime (399).

> 399. In this respect Cooper:178 correctly says, "stealing is considered decidedly reprehensible" /cited in English/.

674 Without wishing to detract from the true uprightness of the Yamana, it must be pointed out that a number of circumstances make stealing difficult. The total possessions of every person consist of only a few pieces. He can therefore easily keep an eye on all that belongs to him and would immediately notice something missing. As soon as it is missed, the one person who could be the thief is easily identified, for there are no crowds in which the guilty one could disappear. Everyone notes very carefully who has come near his hut on this or that day. A further difficulty is hiding a stolen article and keeping it safely concealed. The owner would immediately recognize his own work, and he watches attentively for what he has lost. The filched article would invariably stand out among the few items that anyone owns. Stealing would be just as unprofitable among our Yamana as among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 439). Even an insignificant article that has been stolen never makes the thief very happy (400); sooner or later he will get

401. On April 26, 1871, Bridges (i):20 had a surprising experience. "This evening, Oosiahgoo came to the door saying he had a dreadful pain in his stomach. I let him in and immediately he began to retch most dreadfully. Before I could pass him to get a light he gave me my knife which he stole last Friday evening. He pretended to have vomited it up, which of course I would not credit. However when he came into the kitchen I saw that the violent retching had brought great abundance of tears to his eyes, which had run profusely down his cheeks" /cited in English/. Then Bridges remembered

674 the circumstances under which the Indian mentioned had filched the little knife unnoticed and probably immediately swallowed it in order to remain undetected.

685 558 626 The high degree of sensitivity of the Yamana is sufficient to explain why they seriously punish a thief. Thievish actions by one of their people affects them very painfully and unpleasantly, even if they themselves are not harmed by it. The thief is generally despised, and even after many years of irreproachable conduct, he rarely succeeds in improving his reputation. Only in exceptional cases is the thief given a few blows by the injured owner (402).

402. Only Dabbene (b):198 mentions that "the thief is castigated when he is discovered" /translated from Spanish/.

In case of aggravating circumstances, a theft may even lead to a dispute involving several families. In general the Yamana avoid associating with a thief or they turn away from him with unmistakable /984/ aversion, so that, excluded from the society of his nearest fellow-tribesmen, he stands alone (403). This punishment of being ignored and ostracized is more effective than scoldings and whippings.

403. Darwin (d):243 evidently met such an ostracized individual in Goeree Road near Lennox Island. "The man evidently lived by himself and York Minster said he was a bad man who had probably stolen something."

673 577 The extent to which the Yamana abhor a tendency to steal can be surmized from their urgent warnings to young people, as well as from their many expressions and linguistic subtleties in the designations for stealing. Koppers (d):189 took most of the expressions from BD. "There are words for thief, stealing, robbing. Furthermore for: to cause theft, to accuse of theft, to punish it. Also, however: to return stolen goods, to steal no

673 more. Finally: to guard against being robbed, and, with this in 577 mind, to entrust someone with the duty of watchman." The Indians are quite right in being concerned about their goods and chattels which, as such, are meager, for what they own is usually of vital necessity to them, and they could hardly relinquish them without seriously endangering themselves.

674 Since stealing does occur, however, in spite of being severely condemned, an explanation must be sought. One must never forget that the Yamana consider themselves to be at a disadvantage with Europeans and that they have been dispossessed by all those who have settled there as farmers or traders. They rob the Whites in order to get their rights and particularly to be repaid for losses. A person who is only trying to recover damages cannot be labeled a thief in the strict sense of the word (404). Moreover, the natives have been cheated in barter by many a European who did not know their principles and ideas of value. When this happened, they sought, by confiscating useful things, only what belonged to them according to their own ideas of justice. They saw an abundance of objects, whose value was unknown to them, in the possession of Europeans who visited them in the past century. According to their tribal custom, everyone shares his abundance with others; hence they thought they were justified in stretching out their hands toward the supposed abundance of the Whites.

Weddell's:182 supplies of iron were stolen twice, whereupon, by means of light punishment, he called the attention of the thief to his wrongdoing. A different attitude then developed among the natives and "they were ever after afraid even to lift a piece of iron without permission" /cited in English/. After that nothing was stolen from Weddell. He, as well as many another seafarer,

674 expressly points out that the rich selection of the oddest things and the strangest implements fairly challenged these natives to reach out for them and /985/ entertain themselves with them, without actually intending to steal. They have pilfered all kinds of things just for amusement or in roguish high spirits.

How punctiliously our Yamana respect the property rights of Europeans is shown in recent times, since they have formed a clear opinion about their relations to the Whites. The belongings of the latter are just as safe in Tierra del Fuego as in other parts of the world, but anything that they leave lying around in the open is thoughtlessly abandoned to confiscation by the first person who comes along. No European in the Cape Horn region need fear major burglaries and premeditated banditry on the part of the Yamana. Although I lived with them for months, I never lost the most insignificant thing. On my third journey, as I was leaving Puerto Mejillones after the Kina celebration, I threw away a pair of worn-out stockings beside the wooden house of Santiago. I was already sitting in the canoe when Santiago came running and, waving them high in the air, called loudly: "Martin, you left your stockings here!" It was not until I told him, "I do not need them anymore, keep them for yourself!" that the faithful old man calmed down and went back into his house.

The relatively clear and definite regulation of property relations among the Yamana contributes very considerably to the orderly, peaceful existence of the tribal society. Each of them is very exact about the prevailing rules and customs, and violations of the rights of ownership and property of tribal members are actually rare.

F. Feuds and Blood Vengeance

156 578 Compared to the Selk'nam, the Yamana impress the superficial observer as peaceable people. We must also admit that protracted hawis do not occur as often among them as among the Selk'nam. All this, however, does not alter the scarcely surprising fact that our Yamana, too, are very excitable and easily offended out of an exaggerated feeling of honor. In many things pertaining to their person, things that we Europeans regard as utterly unimportant, they show a sensitiveness which is quite

156 incomprehensible to us. They lose their equanimity particularly 578 in cases of intentional insults and humiliations. This is even more true in instances of a serious offense against their own rights and especially of murder, each case of which is sooner or later avenged if the culprit does not atone for it in time. Almost no one quietly endures insults, no matter how small; instead, he uses the first good opportunity to obtain satisfaction. One must realize, however, that a person is able to wait years for this, and he may take his revenge at a time when the other party has almost completely forgotten the incident. Since the Yamana have such /986/ character traits, less serious brawls between individuals and between small groups are by no means rare. Bridges (1):13 has correctly characterized them as "very quarrelsome and touchy and the weaker were very careful not to offend the stronger and were very courteous in their manner and language, often dissembling with smiles and words of peace their hatred and disapproval" /cited in English/.

627 Since the entire tribe is broken up into very small family communities or hordes(p.632), it is impossible from the start for considerable masses of people to band together for battles or wars. Inasmuch as actual revenge for murder is obligatory for the nearest kin of the murdered person, the matter is settled only between them and the opposite party. In any case, however, such occurrence rare in comparison with the above-mentioned quarrels. It would be entirely mistaken to assume that this ethnic group composed of several large divisions is constantly at war with its own kind. By nature they are anything but pugnacious, no matter how vengeful they are and how jealously sensitive of their personal honor. Anxious concern about their daily food requirements leaves them little time for the troublesome effort of constantly or almost constantly lying in wait for a hostile division.

648 We need not repeat here anything about the relations of our Yamana with the Selk'nam (p. 334 /untranslated/), whom they generally met with apprehension, and with their western neighbors (p. 341 /untranslated/) whom they feared as cannibals (405). Their

405. Hyades (4):240 speaks without sufficient proof of an alleged hatred which "shows itself especially with regard to the neighboring people, Alakaluf /Alacaluf/ that is often bloody" and Ona; in this case it results in strife /translated from French/. Cooper:174 sums up the situation correctly, namely, that "as a rule on border territories the relations have been fairly peaceful" /cited in English/.

relations with Europeans (p. 246 /untranslated/), especially to missionaries (p. 288 /untranslated/), has also been treated in detail and has long been known. Cooper:174 characterizes it correctly and briefly as follows: "More commonly, however, the white man has, deliberately or unwittingly, been the first to give offence" /cited in English/. After the Whites spread out in the Cape Horn Archipelago and confiscated the useful land for themselves, there was nothing for the former sole owners of this region to do but to give in without resistance and with quiet resignation.

a. Causes

The Yamana know no more than other primitive peoples how to control their hurt feelings, especially their feeling of injured honor, nor how to settle insults or humiliations in the amicable way of quiet, matter-of-fact explanation or through a sort of arbiter. /407/ Everyone personally and with his own fist seen to it that justice is done him and that he obtains what he believes to be adequate satisfaction. The individual is first of all sole judge and avenger; in certain instances his nearest relatives help him in protecting his rights.

The desire and passion for revenge are extraordinarily emphasized among the Yamana (406). Sometimes they are so carried

406. It is misleading when Hyades (q):240 maintains: "The desire for vengeance does not occupy the Fueglans much..." /translated from French/. The small number of words for the feeling of revenge is no measure of its strength. In this connection see other opinions in Waitz:III, 507.

152 away that they are completely incapable of anything like a sensible judgment of an incident. A person will literally foam with rage, in fact storm around as though he had taken leave of his senses, and will even vent his wrath on persons who are intimately connected with the offender who is not within his reach (407). Nevertheless,

> 407. In agreement with Dabbene (b):198, Bridges and Furlong assert: "The Yahgan are very vengeful, and in the event of serious offenses or of homicide they are not so concerned about pursuing the criminal when he has successfully escaped, but in their fury they inflict vengeance on any member of the guilty person's family" /translated from Spanish/.

he can muster astonishing self-control when he realizes that he is too weak to stand against his opponent. He is even capable of hiding his feelings until he is sure of superior strength. This conduct obviously betrays genuine cowardice, and it was no different toward Europeans, for, as Cooper:174 definitely says, they have "often shown themselves hostile, aggressive, and treacherous, when they felt they were numerically superior" /cited in English/. According to the Indian, every satisfaction for an insult or an injustice is an actual act of revenge. This becomes clear from what Hyades (q):240 says, and even more so from the words of Bove (e):159: The family and friends of the injured person exact revenge. It is surely not love for the injured that causes a tribe [a family group] to take up arms, however; the spirit of revenge rules supreme in their hearts."

152 Closely connected with their exaggerated sensitivity and the desire for revenge which is constantly alive in them is a high degree
578 of suspicion. "There is, or was, a good deal of bad feeling for one another between the members of the three Fuegian tribes" /cited in English/ (Cooper:174). As a matter of fact, no one quite honestly trusts another, among men as well as among women, and everyone lies in wait, so to speak, as though at one time or another he expected a sign of hostile feeling or malevolent intent. Being conscious of this, the individual is more or less painfully exact and very cautious

152 in associating with others. In spite of this, the suspicious eye of a 578 neighbor is always discovering something, even though he does not look for it in a decidedly malicious way, and so he interprets this word or that attitude as an offense or a slight, as a threat or a challenge. This kind of character promotes vehement /988/ arguments and wild brawls. The supposed opponent who is attacked is, in most cases, not only innocent, but even completely without presentiment.

578 Linked with this tendency toward constant active suspicion is a never-resting implacability. This is understandable to us and taken for granted by the Yamana. It is why people who have once had more or less serious altercations almost never find their way back to complete mutual trust, no matter how well they seem to get along outwardly. They simply can never forget the incident. No one can conceal his suspicious or hostile attitude toward another person to the point of complete deception. That is why everyone is on his guard if he meets another person or has dealings with him. From all this we now see that the urge of the individual family to be alone, completely cut off from other people, is perfectly understandable, for grave suspicion, together with cowardice and the feeling of the inadequacy of one's own powers, forces them far away from those who could do harm or exact vengeance. Even though the joy of social intercourse now and then brings individual families into contact, they are, as a rule, content with a short period of being together and feel relieved when, soon after, they are once more on their own, free from the glances of suspicious critics. Social intercourse with others is never sincerely friendly without a shadow of mistrust. They are, according to Lothrop (b):164, not an "amicable people, according to most accounts. When two groups camped together trouble usually arose, and the weaker group moved away. This as well as the food quest accounts for their frequent changes of residence" /cited in English/. Hyades (c):375 emphasizes their implacability: "The offense which occasions the quarrel is sometimes very old, which proves that the Fueglans are vindictive" /translated from French/.

578 Inasmuch as the Yamana are incapable of completely hiding
152 their inner feelings and emotions indefinitely from a sharp observer, anyone who believes that he has been offended soon adopts a

578 152 discernible counter-position. With such an attitude, insulting words soon follow. For example, several men will be sitting in a circle; someone will be talking with his neighbor and affecting a mysterious air, meanwhile casting a fleeting glance toward a person who is not fond of him. This alone may cause the latter to become falsely suspicious and to assume that the other is talking disparagingly about him. He watches them more sharply, confirms his preconceived idea, and becomes angry. When the circle breaks up or when he feels more confident among another group of people, he will go up to the other man and say to him excitedly: "You have evil designs on me!" The other, being unsuspecting, is dumbfounded for a few minutes and then replies vehemently: "You want to be hostile to me!" The eyes of both men blaze, and immediately, with growing /989/ excitement and more and more loudly, they hurl serious words of suspicion at each other. If they feel they are a match in strength or cowardice, they part sulkily after some blustering. Anyone who feels that a person has spoken disparagingly about his troublesome dog, his naughty child, a personal fault, his laziness in hunting, his neglect of his family, or his illicit relations with a woman, even if he has no further proof than his own suspicious assumption, will usually confront his supposed opponent on the spot and demand an explanation. Without exception, the latter will flare up and resort to invectives or threats which finally lead to blows. A person will be especially annoyed when insulting words and wounding opinions that were actually spoken are brought by a tale-bearer. This is especially the case among women. They are not only quicker to have it out with words, but are also ready with fists.

Such occasions for feuds are frequent and hence an everyday matter, so to speak, because they arise out of the association of a number of people. The situation becomes much more serious in case of adultery. It makes no difference how this becomes known. The mere suspicion creates a dangerous situation for both parties, even though one or the other is innocent. Actually, all the Tamana, without exception, are severe in their condemnation of this error, whether it is convincingly proved or merely probable, simply because they are decidedly jealous. This does not alter the fact that some of them in their own personal behavior may err even more

571 152 seriously and habitually. The same serious situation arises when a woman leaves her husband, for she usually tries to steal away because of a love affair with another man.

627 674 The thirst for revenge is, of course, most deeply aroused by an actual, premeditated murder, and nothing sets families against each other so violently as this act. For the Yamana every human life, even that of a child, is most precious and sacred (Bridges [h]:200); hence murder is an utterly abhorrent deed (408). There are exceptions, however. Most murders come about through adultery. [837] For example, if a married man is looking for a new tie and leaves his wife without cause, her relatives take her part, and they demand that the faithless husband give an account of himself or they simply take the law into their own hands and murder him. They say: "This woman joined herself to this man and they should live together to the end of their lives; since he failed in his duty, he must be punished!" Divorce without adequate cause is an offense against a generally recognized law. Each murder of this kind unleashes a serious /990/ danger for another human life because of the obligation for blood vengeance, and the danger is even greater in the case of a murder for an insignificant reason (409). In view of the dangerous position one puts himself into by an act of murder, the individual holds himself in check, even on occasions of greatest excitement and the almost uncomparable passion for revenge.

408. In this connection compare our account of infanticide (p. 328) and abortion (pp. 491, 526).

409. Bridges (VSA:XI, 200,1884) mentions: "If a man kills another carelessly, his relations are greatly displeased, since it brings each one of them into danger. This is a great preventive to blood-shedding" /cited in English/.

674 It must be said that murder is rare among the Yamana, although we cannot give exact figures (Cooper:170). On June 20, 1884, Bridges (MM:XVIII, 224; 1884) attempted some statistics on murder:

674 "Since her coming here in 1871, we enumerated with the natives twenty-two murders, or deaths from violence amongst the Yahgans" /cited in English/. Hyades (r):721 regards this figure as low: "it means an average of less than two violent deaths per year, and this in a country where each one redresses wrongs and exacts justice for himself" /translated from French/. He (q):375) believes that one reason for this low figure is a deeply rooted conviction of the Indians "in regarding human life as sacred" /translated from French/. Bridges later only very rarely mentioned a murder (410). All this, however, does not make me change my own opinion that murder occurred at least twice as often as Bridges and Hyades say. I am relying on the dependable reports of the Lawrence brothers and aged Indians. We must keep in mind the irascible nature of our Yamana and the many occasions for this deed, at a result of which they had to take the law into their own hands.

266 It would be unbelievable to imagine that they would murder a person out of cannibalistic intentions. There is no convincing proof of anthropophagy; reliable informants emphatically deny this custom, and the Lawrence brothers never heard of it, to say nothing of never having observed it. Instances of it, beginning with the L'Hermite fleet (p. 81 /unpublished/) which is referred to for affirmation, have never been absolutely settled. Bridges (l):14 decidedly opposes this false accusation, since for all of them "is human life a very sacred thing and for this reason all the relations of the murdered person were in honour bound to avenge his death" /cited in English/. The Yamana even detest animals that gnaw at human corpses, such as foxes, rats, and vultures. They do not even take water from brooks where there are many rats, and they give as their reason: "Animals that devour human flesh drink of this water!" If they see a dog come up to a corpse and start devouring it, or even try to dig out a body, they beat it on the spot, even

266 though, as we know, they set great store by a dog. Whenever I /991/ wanted to discuss anthropophagy with them, they persistently refused because of aversion and disgust, and they shook their heads as a sign that they regard such a thing as impossible even among other peoples.

627 Every murder, no matter how the murderer justifies or ex-578 cuses himself, brings revenge in its wake and usually involves a number of persons. Details will be given below. The yékamuř with his machinations is a by no means surprising cause of serious quarrels. It would be premature to go into that at this point; his behavior must first be described in detail, which will be done later. Hostilities and acts of murder arising from his interference are, as usual, settled by the parties involved and with the help of friendly yékamuř. Thus, the causes of discord and disputes among the Yamana are the same as among other peoples; in view of their character traits, the causes are primarily "insult, theft, adultery, and the death of a relative" /cited in English/ according to Lothrop (b):164 and Hyades (q):374. Mistreatment of the wife should be added. In general, quarrels and discord are not prolonged and sooner or later they are settled again. As has already been reported in Outes (g):59, "small differences are settled among themselves without much difficulty" /translated from Spanish/.

b. Ordinary Quarrels

578 The Yamana certainly are extraordinarily irascible and vengeful; sometimes they simply cannot control themselves and are little amenable to appeasing words. They are neither warlike nor combative by nature, however. This characterizes their natural inclination, but it by no means denies that they easily become involved in quarrels and brawls. "They are," as Hyades (q):374 confirms, "very susceptible and, as a result, inclined to quarrels and strife" /translated from French/. Their predominant tendency is to live in peace with others as much as possible and not to become involved in disputes. This is the sole reason why a family will sometimes remain hidden for years and have no contact, or almost none, with any of their countrymen. Despard

578 (b):717 has already pointed out "that warfare is not fashionable among them, since they have no chieftains, no military weapons of offence and defence, no fortified places, no war canoes" /cited in English/ (411). Gatherings of many people for warfare would therefore have been impossible. /992/ There are no reports anywhere concerning them. Finally, one must also take into account the undeniable fact that these Fuegians are very cowardly toward each other.

411. Bove (e):139 too obviously exaggerates: "until a few years ago only very few [Yamana] died a natural death, and the terrible scars which cover the bodies of the oldest ones prove how warlike the Fuegians were and still are. The jus talionis is still in full force among them." He probably relies on Bridges (i):13 who, however, exaggerates when he says: "Their many offences against the dearest rights of their friends and neighbours kept the community in a chronic state of unrest and fighting" /cited in English/.

On the other hand, quarrels between two persons are a frequent occurrence. Martial:207 is right when he says that "quarrels between neighbors are frequent" /translated from French/. It would be hard to decide which of the two sexes outdoes the other in this respect. Usually false suspicion or unfounded vindictiveness starts a loud exchange of words, which becomes more intense. Excitement grows on both sides, the two who are quarreling come closer, seize each other or strike each other with the first stick they can lay their hands on, choke each other, and tumble until much blood flows or until sharp pain paralyzes them and their weakened strength fails. Only then do they silently let go of each other. The whole thing is a regular brawl (412) which is violent or more moderate, brutal or less furious, according to the nature of the combatants. Women, after a brief battle of words, flare up more quickly, seize each other more brutally, bite some part of the body, strike with their fists against mouth and nose and scuffle while pulling very painfully and convulsively on a thick bunch of hair. They do not say anything, but merely hiss and groan. Usually men or other women must pull the raging pair apart. From the start, men try to keep hostile women away from each other. Therefore, the women take advantage of a lonely meeting in the woods or on the beach, where they can really show each other their mutual dislike. Not every man is sufficiently confident of his strength and courage to fight with his opponent (413), and therefore he consciously avoids > 413. Nevertheless, Bove (x):159 has correctly observed: "Quarrels and fights are common, even in Ochuwela itself, so that, after one has spent a few days there, their occurrence is no longer surprising."

412. Spegazzini (e):188 says briefly: "Warfare, properly speaking, does not exist between these communities; usually it is a matter of quarrels over particular questions" /translated from Spanish/.

the other's presence and finally forgets unimportant annoyances, but he always avoids coming in contact with someone who might involve him in a brawl.

We insert here an incident that Bridges (b):13 noted in his diary: "Ohuwela, March 24th, 1972. Hatawelangen very ill from the effect of injuries received from Cowlinj who was jealous of him (414). March 28th. This morning Hatawelangen died.

> 414. He suspected him of adulterous relations with his wife, according to Bridges (Mbl.VI, 15b, 1972). On May 22, 1972, he (Ger. cb.) described this quarrel in more detail.

He has been in a very dull state...I fear that the violence of Cowlinj has caused his death. March 31st. There have been some few demonstrations of anger by one and another for the death of Hatawelangen and Cowlinj has had to give away his blubber and other things, and in other ways to suffer. 8th [April]. Today a party of 16 canoes arrived with intent to avenge the death of Hatawelangen. /999/ Cowlinj made his escape...The occupants

657 of the 16 canoes, having landed, lost no time in meeting the people here. All on both sides, men and women, were armed with sticks, spears or paddles and all who were connected with (Ketowelangan or Cowlitz) indicated the same by the paint on their faces. They hastened on and Mescal presented himself as the chief object of their revenge, being the nephew on his mother's side of the murderer.... There was much shouting and rushing about, great noise and confusion, much downcasting and fierceness of manner, but very few blows. Mescal, after the affair was over, was obliged to lay down the principal of his possessions to further appease the angry feelings of the dead boy's relatives....July 11th. Went to seek Cowlitz who has been hurt by a cousin of the boy Ketowelangan of whose death he was the cause. His head is much hurt and he received several blows about the body" /cited in English/.

518 The fight between two men sometimes starts in a flash and is usually over after a few minutes. In the case of particularly angry opponents who are a match in strength it sometimes lasts longer, and now and then others are also embroiled, for anyone who sees his relative or friend fighting an opponent immediately comes to his aid. Thus, from a single fight a disorderly scuffle of two groups develops, and in the end even the women join in. A fight between individuals is the rule, however. The two seize each other by the throat, wrestle, scratch each other's faces, use their fists indiscriminately, grasp the head of their opponent in an effort to break his neck, and spend their strength. The individuals on the periphery of the entanglement attack themselves to the considerably locked pair or seize women and sticks which they hurl with great force. Even the wildest brawls of this kind die down after a few minutes. Panting and groaning, the excited opponents withdraw and creep into their huts where they sink down exhausted and therefore do not even mention the fight again. This is precisely the course of most of the fights. Of course if people notice that the two opponents are becoming excited and show signs of preparing for a scuffle, they try to calm them with amicable words, take their weapons, and forcibly keep them apart, but such mediation is not always possible. The situation is actually just as Bridges (1936:55, [illegible]) has described it: "A single combat often ends in two whole families fighting together, when they try not to kill, but

539 to exactly relative" /Aimed in English/. In the same note Kyaden (pp.374 adds: "All weapons are then good for the fight: fists, stones, sticks, clubs, harpoons, swords" /Translated from French/.

As an example here is an account of a fight reported by Bridgen (pp.[illegible], 1970) on March 7, 1970, which arose from unhappy marital conditions: "One day, a certain man named Richard Alexandrowsson, who has taken Joe's sister to wife, and through her and his own evil passions brought himself /[illegible]/ too much turmoil, went down to Jonnisson wigwam to fetch his eloped wife. He went in a very threatening manner, with spear in hand, into a hunter's tent. The ill-will of her relatives had often been stirred up by his violence to her, and now seeing him come among them in this threatening manner, their evil passions overflowed all bounds and a savage assault was made. Richard's friends came to his aid, and a scene of universal hell and violence was the result. It occurred during the dinner hour. As usual I rang the bell for work, but no workmen appearing, I rang a second time, still none came. At last Samuel came up to tell me all the people were in a great figure, and had hurt each other very much" /Aimed in English/.

Such brawls — there is no other name for these quarrels — are neither premeditated nor carried out according to a specific pattern (610). It would be inaccurate to speak of actual battles.

> 610. "When they fight, it is generally an affray of words, women, spears, and clubs, with many on both sides" /Aimed in English/, according to Bridgen (pp.[illegible]). This missionary has a number of times expressed himself in these words, and he is quite right.

"among the Tolagan there are seven expeditions of war" /Translated from French/, according to Kyaden (pp.[illegible]).

629 These public brawls and noisy scuffles are clearly distinct from the particular hostilities which I should like to characterize as exceptionally premeditated acts of revenge, with which someone will settle an injustice done far in the past. It is either dependency and convention on the knowledge of his opponent's superior strength

627 that makes a wealthy act seem advisable to a person. This is a favorite procedure of the yékamuł. The following method has proved successful. A person who wishes to do away with his opponent inconspicuously will discuss his plan with two or three trusted friends. One day they invite the opponent in the most unobtrusive way possible to accompany them on a hunt for young or full-grown cormorants. The other may not and will not refuse the invitation because of the compulsory rules of social intercourse. Unsuspecting, he lets himself be tied to a rope at the top of the steep rock wall and slides down (p. 230). At the proper moment and without any kind of signal, his adversaries cut the rope at the top, and he plunges down and breaks his neck. These malefactors afterwards tell other people that the man, due to his own carelessness, was killed on the cormorant hunt. Spears:68 mentions this stealthy procedure, as Outes (g):50 did earlier, and is right in calling it "a favorite way of killing an enemy" /cited in English/; this method, however, is rarely used.

278 The plant kingdom offers not a single efficacious poison, but the blubber of the grampus ʍ́ɸáɸłi (Orca magellanica), a 825 pilot fish of the large cetaceans (p. 27 /unnumbered/), is re- 627 garded as poisonous. I was assured, confidentially, that this blubber had been given now and then, its efficaciousness having been discovered long ago. Mawenkum told me the following story which is widespread. Once in the west several people found a dead ʍ́ɸáɸłi lying on the beach. /995/ Its meat and fat were still fresh, so some of them ate some of it. Soon afterward these people died. Once Hawaum also came to this place. He was a crafty man. Before he ate, he wanted to find out whether this fat caused death. Unobtrusively he gave a man a small piece of it. The man immediately died. Thereupon he said to himself: "Good, that serves my purpose!" He took a large piece of fat from the ʍ́ɸáɸłi, cut it into small pieces, and filled a pouch made of the stomach of a łáłaf (Chloephaga hybrida). Then he returned to the east. If he wanted to kill someone, he stealthily stuck a small piece of the fat from the ʍ́ɸáɸłi into the person's food. He did this several times and a number of men died. Hawaum was quite generally hated and avoided because of his malevolent disposition. -- Thus it was through him that the actual or alleged strength of this poison became known.

273 We should also mention that the present-day Tenene almost 578 without exception partake avidly of alcohol whenever they can get it. When intoxicated, they quickly lose control over themselves, become pugnacious, and get into noisy, brutal quarrels, in which many a man has been badly wounded, made a cripple, or forfeited his life. Even the gentle, quiet Richard killed his first wife in a state of complete drunkenness, as Paul Lawrence declared. Such disagreement with serious consequences was unknown in the better olden times.

c. Blood Vengeance

628 Premeditated, serious brawls between two large groups are always the result of a murder. Inasmuch as a person's life is regarded as precious and not to be bartered (p.888), murder is considered a most execrable deed which, for lack of an existing judicial power, must be avenged by the nearest relatives of the unfortunate victim. Blood vengeance in this case, therefore, is the equivalent of a demand for expiation of the crime which caused the death of a member of the tribe. It does not matter in the least whether death occurred immediately or some time after an attack. This idea of blood vengeance is complemented by the duty of the nearest relative of a victim to carry it out personally or to take part in carrying it out. All adults are in complete agreement on this point.

Without doubt, the fear of strict and inexorable expiation for every murderous deed contributes to everyone being carefully on guard to avoid it. Bridges (Mbl.33, 115,1870) confirms this: "Fear is the powerful agent, fear of man, fear of death; without the latter there would not be the former to any profitable degree. A man is restrained from taking life by fear, fear of his friends, as well as dread of those whose vengeance he has incurred by taking the life of one of their kin. For according to native usage, and necessarily springing from it, all the kindred /886/ of a murderer are held as sharers of his offence, and frequently suffer in his stead. For though they (willfully) may be ever so angry with their relatives, the murderer, for thus making them liable, yes, not only liable, but certain to be partners of his punishment, yet they will not give him up to death, but will avenge his death if he is killed" /tried to English/.

64 As we have said, there is among the Tswana a clear and definite duty for blood vengeance, which quite generally falls upon the nearest kin of the victim. On July 28, 1896, Dwapad (59-92, 5:1860) noted: "My lads told me that the law of retaliation for murder exists in their country, and is exercised by the nearest of kin" /cited in English/. Some after this he (5:[illegible]) adds: "A murderer must expect, sooner or later, to be killed by the blood-avenger, and next of kin to the victim" /cited in English/. This way of expressing himself is rather vague. Actually, the murderous deed involves everyone who for one reason or another was close to the victim, and together they more or less furiously strike out in revenge. Moreover, the Tswana feel that there are no limits to the measure of punishment, in case the guilty one remains alive. Bridgen, on March 7, 1878, mentioned these ideas, which the missionaries now exemplified a number of times, as follows: "Tswana etiquette and customs require that all the relatives of a murdered person should be lost and frantic in their angry demonstrations, and that they should visit their displeasure upon every connection of the murderer, each personally. Thus a man may be much hurt by a party of enraged and demon-like avengers, and though the poor fellow may have suffered ten times more than he deserved, yet another party of avengers who had not punished him themselves would not let him escape in virtue of what he had already suffered, but would, moved by their own law of vengeance, and prescribed customs, wreak upon him further punishment. Or suppose a man has many things, and the avengers are willing to accept /his/ gifts in lieu of their right to the infliction of suffering, then every avenger expects some gift from every person liable by family connection quite as much as by participation in guilt. That such a season is quite a harvest time to the aggrieved party if they have power to press their claim" /cited in English/. This means, in fact, that for the rest of his life a murderer cannot escape from the importunities and demands of each of the relatives and acquaintances of his victim. In fact, Bridgen (4:[illegible]) emphasizes: "The duties of vengeance were strictly carried out."

The murderer's deed has grave consequences not only for him, but also for all his kin and his intimate circle of friends. The avengers, however, pounce directly on the one actually guilty. The latter, realizing what is in store for him, always flees as quickly as possible or, hidden by his relatives, remains under cover. Hence the avengers attack the first person they meet who has connections with the killer. They are to a certain extent justified, for, although the relatives of a criminal do not in the least condone his murderous act, nevertheless the mutual /007/ ties of family solidarity are so close and strong that they not only refuse to hand him over to the opposers, but even protect and defend him against them (416). This does not prevent them from being extremely > 416. Bridges (Mbid.IX, 111.1972) confirms this: "Society, as here is constituted, supports, aids, protects, not the innocent or injured, but each clan its member, guilty or not guilty" /tried in English/.

angry with him; positively because, by his fateful deed, he has put them all in a very embarrassing and disquieting situation, indeed, even in serious danger (417). Truly, a murderer can no longer enjoy life, for not only the ancestors of his victim give him no peace, but even his own relatives never cease their reproaches. The whole group to which he belongs scorns him, pushes him aside, and positively casts him out (418). Everyone will agree with Bridges (Mbid.

> 418. "In general," as Dobbeme (Ib.138 says, "one who kills is deserted by everyone in the tribe and he must take refuge in the woods in order to live" /translated from Spanish/.

XXI, 134.1972) who characterizes this case of affairs, in its importance for the general safety of life, as "the greatest safeguard to human life we can conceive. I have witnessed the anxiety of man's minds after a quarrel, when any have been seriously injured, to know how the injured party is doing when fears are felt for his death, and I have heard them express the horrible sensations which creep over them when the sense of blood-guiltiness is likely to be charged against them" /cited in English/. The attention of the people in general and of every individual group is earnestly directed toward preventing any murderous deed.

Whenever such an act occurs, the nearest relatives of the victim adopt a special facial painting. Duepand (VP:VII, 9:1860) (419)

> 419. Earlier Fitz-Roy (r):177 noted: "White feathers, or white down, on the fillet, is a sign of hostility, or of being prepared for war. Their white paint is added to the red when preparing for war; but the marks made are more double, of the rudest, if of any design. Black is the mourning colour" /cited in English/. Dobbrow (b):198 and Hyades (q):375 write in a similar vein.

has already mentioned "white stripes dotted with black, in regular rows on the face" /cited in English/. Sometimes the whole body is uniformly smeared with black. All other persons who are close to the deceased also paint themselves in some way, but usually are satisfied with a few red, white, and black lines on their faces, in an arbitrary pattern. Around their foreheads they tie a narrow strip of skin with down, spowlers. In doing this they are following a custom that is general when death occurs. The actual decoration signifying a murder consists of several vertical red lines on the face, spreading out in rays from the level of the eyes.

The persons concerned set about spreading the news of the murderous deed without delay and, along with reliable friends, form a fighting group, for the duty of blood vengeance hammers insistently on everyone's conscience. It applies to every friend and relative, as is shown by the specific /908/ term matija-magowa, "a man against whom persons have a grudge and purpose to fight with and punish because he did not take up his and their murdered friend's cause as he ought" /cited in English/ (BD:304). When a considerable horde of avengers has banded together, the opponents,

628 who anxiously watch every development, know it, and they, too, assemble in as great a number as possible. When both parties feel equal to each other, they prepare a regular attack. The able-bodied men and women get into their canoes, after they have provided themselves with ample supplies of stones and weapons (420).

420. I have nowhere found confirmed what Fitz-Roy (a):196 maintains: "When the Fuegians are inclined to attack an enemy with stones, they generally try to raise a breastwork of boughs or logs" /cited in English/. Another fact which he (a):186 mentions, however, is correct: "Hostilities are usually carried on with slings and stones rather than by close encounters" /cited in English/. Compare Bove (e):158 and Lothrop (b):164.

Persons who are old and feeble and children must remain behind in the camp. Usually it quite naturally happens that a capable yékamuł or a clever, reckless fellow commands and leads the whole [302] group. As a rule, the persons who were associated with the dead person paint their whole bodies black, and the opposing group, red.

The canoes then push off from shore and arrange themselves in an exact row so that their keels form a straight line, each about two meters apart. The so-called commander is very much on the alert to make sure that no canoe gets out of line. If it does, he hurls a stone from his sling into the water in front of the canoe as a warning. Thus lined up, the two fighting groups approach each other. During the slow journey, they stir up their excitement and fighting lust by means of loud talk, agitated gestures, and insulting calls directed at the opponents. When they are only about 20 meters apart, both sides begin hurling stones from their slings. When the two groups are close enough, they begin a furious scuffle, for as soon as the canoes touch lengthwise, the men face to face beat each other with clubs and poles, spears and harpoons. Meanwhile the women, paddling and maneuvering on either side, keep the boats of the fighting men close together. Soon the men shift over to actual wrestling: they seize each other and tug hard, opposing one another until both fall down or one falls overboard or the canoe slips away. In all this the women have a difficult task and are especially concerned with keeping their vessel from capsizing, since the men's movements are violent and completely unpredictable. The previous exact arrangement of the canoes is soon broken up, because, from the start, the group of attackers aims to get at the actual murderer among the opponents. When they see him, they noisily turn their entire attention to him and push toward him. The others take note of their movements and try to cover the murderer as much as possible. If the attackers succeed in getting hold of him, /999/ they beat him furiously and mercilessly. If he does not actually succumb, mortally wounded, he will at least be crippled (421). This is enough to satisfy the attackers, and they soon withdraw from the fight and return to their camp on the shore. The others, if they are not superior in strength, breathe a sigh of relief that some other person close to the murderer did not lose his life.

421. Hyades (q):375 maintains that "the bodies of the slain enemies are often mutilated" /translated from French/. Among the Yamana it is not customary to mutilate the corpse of an enemy deliberately.

As the two groups separate, they continue to scold and sneer loudly, to hurl mockery and abuse, and to reproach each other for a long time. One person or another has suffered serious wounds, perhaps a canoe was shattered, or a fighter even drowned. In any case, each group was so hard hit that the injuries they have suffered are quite enough and they long for rest.

The lust for revenge, however, quickly flares up again if, for some reason, the murderer was not subdued. His relatives and adherents hide him or guard him in a hideout (422), but the others

422. In connection with this Bridges (VSA:XI, 260; 1864) says: "A murderer is generally disliked, but they very often escape their merited end" /cited in English/.

(2) will not rest until one of them succeeds, perhaps only after many years, in ultimately killing the murderer. Some time after the fight, or particularly if it did not take place, the relatives will content themselves with a payment in compensation for the murder. BD:66 gives ťia, "gifts in atonement for murder" /cited in English/. This consists of many gifts which gradually must be paid to the individual relatives for an indefinite period, since the latter feel justified in making demands over and over again (423). This is further confirmation that, for the rest of his life, a murderer finds no rest from his pursuers.

> 423. Bridges (a):207 asserts: "Sometimes the murderer is suffered to live, but he is much beaten and hurt, and has to make many presents to the relatives of the dead" /cited in English/.

The story of the fight and its outcome is told far and wide, which serves somehow to interdict any act of murder. In the language of the Yamana amaiiuťina is "a murderer" /cited in English/ (BD:21). The considerable number of words referring to an act of murder strongly suggests that it was not too rare an occurrence. Otherwise there would not be specific rules of procedure, such as Bridges (VSA:XI, 259;1864), for example, recognized: "If a man kills another, the friends of the dead man combine together, and hunt the murderer till they find him. If they are the stronger party, they demand the murderer to be given to them by his nearest male relative, which, if it is in his power to grant, and he refuses to comply, the avengers will take, if they can, his life, and let the murderer go free, and no more molest him. /1000/ But if the murderer is given into their power, they kill him, and it may be cut him up in pieces afterwards" /cited in English/. (Cf. Hyades [q]:375). They call the struggle of two hostile groups yamalaťemōina yťkuna mťja, whereas they refer to the small fights and brawls simply as yťkuna mťja (424).

> 424. Among these hot-blooded Yamana, a serious attack can take place merely on the basis of a false rumor; Hyades (q):375 mentions one of this nature.

(2) 721 Although isolated quarrels and fights between two persons may have occurred often, a battle between two groups provoked by a murder was rare, for a murder is now and then secretly avenged by a single relative of the slain person. The Yamana are not familiar with actual marauding attacks by one group upon another, such as are customary elsewhere. Influential men sometimes try to mediate disputes with friendly words. Fitz-Roy (a): 179 reliably reported: "Warfare is so desultory, and on so small a scale among them, that the restraint and direction of their elders advised as they are by the doctors, is sufficient" /cited in English/. Despard (b):717 expressed himself just as definitely: "Warfare is not fashionable among them" /cited in English/. The basic way of life among the Yamana is not such as to permit them prolonged fights and constant quarrels (425). Every murder agitates them terribly, and its effect is long-lasting. Persons who have more or less settled serious quarrels between them avoid meeting each other as much as possible.

> 425. Dabbene (b):194 is right when he says: "Wars, in the true sense of the word, whether between themselves or with neighboring tribes, have always been very rare" /translated from Spanish/.

G. General Social Obligations

101 The Yamana as an ethnic unit are separated from all their neighbors by natural boundaries alone. Everyone recognizes his membership in this ethnic unit by a common language and mode of life. Just as definitely as they differentiate themselves from other peoples by the name Yámana (p. 197 /untranslated/), they also simultaneously emphasize the solidarity of all fellow-tribesmen in the same area. This entails many personal rights, but also obligations of all for one and of one for the society. The rights to obtain food belong among the former; property relations are based upon the latter.

643 On the basis of population, the Tamana were and are a small nation. In spite of everything, they lack a common head, whether we mean by this a person who through heredity or election is provided with special sovereign power, or one who has earned a dominant position as a result of accidental or successful activity, or one who is superior to his nearest kin, such as the first-born of a patriarchal extended family. /1001/ The influence which a tamana occasionally achieves is a certain moral prerogative resulting from personal virtues.

631 Again, it was the given geographical facts which divided the country of the Tamana into five districts and, on the basis of this, the people as a whole into five tribal groups (p. 199 /untranslated/). Since these groups live more or less strictly apart from one another, certain peculiarities of speech and living habits have developed in the course of time. These are the factors which easily and naturally distinguish each group. Obviously this tribal division is purely external because it is spatially conditioned. Within each of the five large dialect groups geographical conditions have brought about further division into local groups (p. 620) which, in turn, are made up of a few kinship groups. The relations of the individual families in each of the latter are very close and firm; these families regularly and frequently have social intercourse with one another.

183 The above-mentioned organization of the Tamana people as a whole is a loose one and largely external, since unification under a common head is lacking. Nevertheless, fixed rules, with unavoidable obligations for everyone, determine the social intercourse of the divisions mentioned and of individual persons. They ensure coexistence without friction and a well-ordered social life. In an extremely simple society like that of our Tamana one might find it astonishing that there are certain arrangements to regulate intercourse with others, and, even more surprising, that they have subjective value and are successful and dependable. They guarantee, above all, the stability of the individual family and the harmonious coexistence of its members. Their vital significance stems from the fact that the unity of the whole ethnic group rests on the individual family as the single definitely determined social structure. They therefore protect and support many thoroughly effective general rules.

13 Besides that, the great mass of people are led and ruled by unwritten laws which, in a word, can be designated as the demands of the traditional law of custom. Every adult knows it and is thoroughly familiar with it; the younger generation learns it in the family and in everyday association, as well as quite purposefully in the indispensable youth initiation (p. 717). The wiser and more influential old men regard it as their particular task to insist, over and over again and on suitable occasions, on the observance of traditional customs and on keeping their exact meaning unchanged and uncorrupted.

While this, directly and indirectly, ensures the common welfare, there are, in addition, specific rules of conduct for the general populace and for a larger group in the case of a specific misfortune of an individual. No matter how loosely these Fuegians /1002/ are held together as a people, they know that they are obliged to lend effective aid in case one of their members is in any kind of danger. On the basis of this they have developed rules for a kind of assistance that approximates a general welfare service for the needy and helpless. Earnest scrutiny shows that such things are not lacking in the extremely simple social order of the Yamana.

These many rules and regulations direct the individual in his conduct toward others and bind the people as a whole to certain needs and demands. They were not developed and are not observed merely for their own sake; rather, they clearly aim toward the personal safety of every member of the group and toward a peaceful existence of the whole. They have a power that dominates all members of the tribe and that, without exception and with a view to the well-being of society, binds everyone. This is nothing less than a power of state, although still modest in form. Even though it is unimpressive and its action has not yet been set forth in written formulas, it has at least held together in social amity the individual members of the widely scattered Yamana tribe and guaranteed the individual, as well as the society, an existence worthy of human beings within the possibilities offered by the environment (p.910).

In the following account we shall not discuss each and every thing that serves the common weal and that may be regarded

183 as public welfare, for this would, after all, include the mutual relatives and members of the local dialect group, as well as the many precepts pertaining to the youth initiation (p. 719) and the menarche (p. 571). We shall list only the rules for social intercourse and the duties toward the needy which have not yet been mentioned in the preceding sections.

a. Custom and Justice

It would have been impossible for the Yamana people as a whole to have perpetuated itself as a vital entity if it had not been directed and unified by an all-embracing social order. The prevailing laws are nowhere to be found in writing, but they operate with relentless urgency as vital forces. Their success is obvious. The relations of individuals to one another and to the society as a whole disclose a balanced harmony (426); everyone feels completely safe in his common nationality /1003/ and knows that he is protected against possible dangers from other tribesmen. As a matter of fact, order prevails, which, in short, means that everyone in his attitude toward life completely submits to the recognized regulations, and that disobedience of any kind is exceptional and is always censured and punished.

426. It is inconceivable to me how Bridges (MM:IX, 218;1875) could write, on April 21, 1875, that "horrible looseness prevails through everything. No discipline, no order, no agreements or arrangements; hap-hazard, confusion, 'happy-go-lucky,' these are the usages of Fireland life. A general absence of confidence, faithfulness, and love is everywhere apparent. There is a great show of friendship, but little sincerity" /cited in English/.

These laws, or, as the Yamana themselves express it, "the traditional custom," are universally binding. Only in this way can they ensure the peaceful coexistence of all tribal members

183 within a common society. As a matter of principle, no one claims an exemption for himself. If in some situation he occasionally lets himself be led astray from the path of recognized duty by passion or by the weakness of his nature, he himself clearly feels that he has made a mistake and is doing wrong. The disapproval of his wrong-doing by the members of the tribe who learn about it also has a definite effect on him. Naturally, certain regulations apply to every age and sex, without exception, others only to children or adults, man or woman. No one, no matter what the situation, would, by word or action, presume to intimate to others that some custom which everyone in his position observes has no meaning for him and does not obligate him. Such behavior would make it impossible for him to live in Yamana society. Quite the contrary, as we shall soon show, everyone is anxious to avoid any suspicion that he, on occasion or as a matter of principle, disdains any law of custom whatever.

183 The Yamana can justify this inescapable pressure on everyone by referring to Watauineiwa, their only deity. Their whole 196 body of custom, so to speak, embraces the true moral law in the narrower sense of the term, as well as all obligations for social coexistence and for the individual toward himself, in the widest sense of the term. The Fuegian has a general formula with which he derives this, his body of custom, that is to say, all the principles and guides practiced, from his deity as the ultimate source; he says: "Watauineiwa wants everyone to be a good human being! -- Watauineiwa wants it that way [as custom has hitherto decreed]; he watches carefully to see whether everyone is acting accordingly!" He does not remember his lawgiver on the occasion of every single act, which would be superhuman, but this general formula remains in his subconscious and at times he is very definitely openly conscious of it. Just as this deity remains the same and has in no way and at no time changed the obligations once set forth, so these obligations endure in unmitigated strictness and retain their unchanging character through all generations. For the Yamana the terse, definite wording above gives /1004/ the ultimate source and universal duty, embracing all times and persons, toward every kind of valid obligation. Further details will be given in the section on the actual moral law.

183 Thus, in everyday reality the sole guide, the established norm of life, consists of the prevailing customs, the tradition of the ancestors, the conduct of former generations. Old and young take this so much for granted that it seems to have become second nature to them. It is neither criticized nor resented, never attacked nor altered. Everything characterized as ancient custom is regarded as legal and therefore binding; whatever is contrary to it is universally condemned as unjust or improper.

Everyone pays great respect to traditional custom for its own sake and as a compulsory expression of the will of Watauineiwa. Certain institutions, such as the Kina, kina, and kina, are cherished with exceptional care; other customs, such as the instructions for girls at the menarche (p. 571) and sharing of spoils brought home from hunting (p. 314), are cultivated with great conscientiousness. Everyone accepts his individual obligation as fact and yields without contradiction; it suffices for him to know that this or that has always been accepted among the Yamana, which is enough to make it binding for him, too, under like circumstances. It is the oldest persons of any group who, of their own accord, feel the greatest urge to follow exactly along the lines of ancient custom in their personal conduct. They are clearly aware of their duty to set a good example for the younger age levels, since this is more impressive than words. As often as there is an opportunity on public occasions and in private exchanges, they demand strict observance of the traditional order and good ancient custom. They also admonish anyone who in any particular point becomes negligent toward universal custom. Several men will even confer among themselves to see how they can stem the increasing offenses of a younger member of the tribe, with severity, if need be. Everything that was handed down by their forefathers is much too sacred to them to have it destroyed, even in small part, by thoughtless young people.

183 In this attitude their sound judgment concerning the value of the good things of old is a contributory factor. The group of young people cannot yet appreciate this value, but the old people are absolutely convinced of it and therefore base upon it alone the firm continuance of their society and the contented existence of the individual. Many an old Fuegian emphatically told me, "If our forefathers found all our institutions good, why should they not be just as advantageous for us!" Their rigid adherence to traditional

183 custom is based on the tested experience of generations. They interpret every deviation from it, no matter how small, almost /1005/ instinctively as disadvantageous and harmful for their society. This judgment may rest to a considerable extent on the balanced harmony between their needs and their environment. It has been shown that they have adjusted in the best possible way to the vital demands of their homeland and have identified themselves so well with it that other wishes and needs do not arise, so to speak.

177 This rigid, infantile attitude of self-contained ethnic unity
183 at first excluded all the innovations that reached the Yamana from contact with European culture. Gradually a few new materials and 182 objects that seemed advantageous to them, iron, for example, came into their possession, but even the strong and continuous influence of the Anglican mission has been unable to change anything in their social order and their spirit world (p. 304 /unassimilated/). It is only in the last few decades that Indian culture has been torn asunder and more than once harshly opposed by foreign settlers. After that it was impossible to continue to live according to ancient custom, and the doom of our tribe was sealed. Many old men and women who had had the good fortune to grow up amid the unadulterated customs of their people were obliged, with tears in their eyes, to see the acceleration of this fateful grievous devastation. Their bitterest laments were unable to exercise the evil. They frankly stated that, with the initial relaxation of the strict customs of former times, the disintegration of the people as a whole began.

183 Among the more general fundamental considerations pertain-
626 ing to the value of traditional customs, the personal sense of honor is, in practice, still strong in its effect. No one wants to be regarded as an inferior member of the tribe, as disloyal to the customs of his fathers, as indolent and negligent, as quarrelsome and selfish. On various occasions the ideal image of the "genuine, proper Yamana" is very clearly unfurled, everyone sees it spread out before him in all its details and in bright colors. A person who deviates consciously or habitually from this ideal displays a considerable degree of wickedness and inner corruption of which he himself is aware, as well as his entire neighborhood. The disgrace

183 is too profound, the infamy too humiliating for anyone to bear any 634 length of time if he finds himself shunned and rejected by many persons as disloyal to ancient custom! Ambition, self-love, and the desire to be esteemed among his fellow-tribesmen soon force every delinquent back on the path of universally observed proper behavior. For the Yamana this is the strongest motive forcing them to a way of life which is as blameless as possible, according to the example of their fathers. Not even the prospect of punishment by Wonaemu'ewa is as directly effective as a person's ambition to be regarded as a true Yamana by his fellow-tribesmen.

Everyone knows only too well how carefully he is being watched by all the people of his immediate /1006/ and more distant surroundings, how very much in detail his conduct, even in minor, unimportant matters, is discussed and judged by others. Sooner or later everyone learns clearly and definitely how everyone else feels about him and how they evaluate his conduct. The individual succeeds in swaying public opinion in his favor only by absolute, continuous rectitude, in accordance with prevailing customs. Thus a person's concern about his own good reputation (427) is much more effective in forcing him to observe the customs of the ancestors than, for example, the threat of police or written laws. Anyone who habitually deviates from the good ways of old loses all esteem and value in the eyes of the people.

b. Social Intercourse

156 Since every Yamana consciously desires to count for some-577 thing among his fellow-tribesmen and to be spoken of in terms of praise, he tries to accomplish these ends by his mere appearance and manners. He quite obviously makes an effort to be tactful toward everyone and to offend no one; he is anxiously concerned about his whole outward appearance. He is particularly careful to avoid open hostility with anyone, for he might suddenly, by the

156 malevolent humor of overwhelming natural forces, find himself
577 in an embarrassing situation in which he is dependent on the help of any fellow-tribesman who happens to come along. The [471] nomadic way of life in a native region fraught with dangers insistently demands that one person willingly aid another whenever it is necessary (428). A distressing situation which repeatedly

> 428. Bridges (MM:IX, 216;1878) confirms this: "The wandering habits of the natives result in making them servile to each other. Not knowing whom he may meet in any place, yet having to seek shelter with any one he may find there, a native would find it very awkward thus to meet a man and his friends whose enmity he had incurred, causelessly or otherwise" /cited in English/.

assumes different forms has developed rules and obligations for social intercourse which the Yamana observe very punctiliously, keeping in mind their personal advantage and the public good. Everyone can be sure that fate will soon strike him, perhaps even harder than it is now hitting his neighbor. Sympathy for every fellow-tribesman is very highly developed among our Fuegians, even if the thought of one's self and of praise may have something to do with it.

1. Special Forms of Social Intercourse

576 Among the considerable number of customs and rules that apply to the social behavior of the Yamana, there is a conspicuous absence /1007/ of marked formalities. They meet one another neither noisily nor excitedly, but rather with a definite repression of their really animated feelings of joy and friendship. We Europeans might interpret this cool, impolite way of meeting one another as dullness or lack of feeling if we were not certain of the sincere feeling behind it. This is not to deny that sometimes two good friends reunited after a long separation hurry toward each other with loud shouts, embrace and shake each other as though

576 they were mad. Some women also behave with exaggerated impetuosity when they part after having had a good time together, for example, on the occasion of the Yaiagn. These are not everyday forms of behavior, however.

On the other hand, there is a definite, conscious calculation in the movements and the talk of people who visit each other. Quietly and inconspicuously the visitor enters the hut and squats down near the fire. It is not customary to offer a seat. The visitor keeps his eyes on the ground in front of him and never looks around freely and openly. When he speaks, even at length, he raises them only now and then and does not look fixedly at anyone present. His words are measured and fall as though each one were carefully weighed beforehand. At the same time his bearing, even when he sits, is noticeably rigid. In the presence of others one may not lean back negligently, lounge around comfortably, or luxuriously stretch oneself. Even very old people avoid behaving in an unmannerly way or otherwise acting without restraint. If a person is all alone, however, he rolls about in utter exuberance and stretches himself until he displays his whole body, for now he knows no inhibitions. All the more credit must be given him for the self-control which he imposes upon himself even in front of his own children, to say nothing of visitors.

157 As a matter of principle the Yamana behaves as quietly as possible and without conspicuous vivacity wherever he is, whether he is eating or working and whether or not he is being observed. To a European the movement of a Fuegian is like that of a thief creeping up and stealing off again. The Fuegian has himself firmly under control, and he does not lose his poise even when strange objects fascinate him or foreign visitors face him with their outlandishness. Artlessly he shows a silent, motionless reserve (429), /1008/ which most of the seamen of earlier times

429. Spegazzini (a):167 gives a pertinent opinion: "The Fuegian is very quiet and restrained, especially with a stranger, covering all his feelings, all his passions, with a cloak of indifference" /translated from Spanish/. He gives an example of > this attitude. Debenox (p.197) is still more explicit: "The Yaigans are somewhat mediative, melancholy, and taciturn, especially in the presence of a stranger. No object, even though new to them, is capable of arousing their interest or curiosity. They have a dismal look, like the land that they inhabit, and their physiognomy on all occasions shows complete indifference. For this reason it is very difficult to understand the emotions and feelings that dominate them" /translated from Spanish/.

interpreted as dullness and stupidity. Consciously or unconsciously, this was a false judgment.

The extent to which the Fuegian has cultivated self-control may be seen in his amazing ability to maintain silence. True, this is more calculation than virtue, but it is extraordinarily effective in his contacts with suspicious fellow-tribesmen. Except in cases of obvious and continual offenses against important laws of custom, everyone is cautiously reticent about his judgment of another in the presence of visitors and friends. Even less does he publicly make known his dislike or even hostility, and, cleverly calculating, he lets a large circle of people persist in their erroneous opinion about his relationship to a person. Although such behavior is neither distinguished nor courageous, it avoids unrest and excitement, altercation and quarrels in the group. Everyone is inclined to weigh carefully everything he says, but he is even more strongly impelled to do this by the suspicious alertness with which his every word is examined by others. He is just as careful not to expose anything that might cause other people to judge him negatively. The atmosphere of suspicious fault finding and the [626] tormenting fear of being exposed before one's own kind apparently are deadening pressures on many a circle of men and women and prevent a free exchange of opinion; most of them sit around as though they were utterly unable to speak. To a foreign visitor it seems at first glance as though they were intimidated or frightened and did not dare say anything because of anxious fear or justified

15% bright. The presence of a heavy silhouette of ill repute has an even more deadening and paralyzing effect on any exchange of views within a group. In free gatherings, however, where all is games and after a successful hunt, the atmosphere is gaily noisy and merry without restraint.

15% 5% The restrain, quiet behavior of the Tongans is also an expression of their natural modesty. This characteristic is clearly apparent when one compares them with the proud, self-confident Sulu Moro (Vol. I, 1140). It is not the nature of our Tongans to be noisily conspicuous or to push themselves forward, to boast in front of their own people or to act important among their neighbors, to intimate others with their own feats of strength or to brag about real achievements. Careful European observers are struck by the shy reserve and timid anxiety of the women and girls. This disposition naturally determines social behavior. On their errands and in their wanderings the women generally keep their eyes on the ground in front of them; one scarcely ever meets a woman who animatedly and inquisitively glances all about her. In a circle of women squatting around the hot fire one is very much aware of how they have control of their eyes; they will sit for a long time as though they did not dare raise them and give them free play. As a matter of fact, /1009/ even in old age they retain the retiring, inconspicuous behavior that is imposed upon every girl on the occasion of her menarche (p.549). Molly Lawrence was particularly careful about it, which seems all the more strange since a free, self-confident bearing would have been justified by her higher social position. In spite of this, however, she was proud to follow exactly the ways of her ancestors.

Moreover, etiquette imminently demands, even for adults, 134 a degree of the separation of the sexes required of young people (p.549). If several families gather together, the men and women immediately separate, and each group stays by itself if there is a long conversation or entertainment. It is true that they often join in group games because they take place in the open and in front of many people. If they assemble in a dwelling, the women squat either in a closed group near the entrance or in a circle behind the men who sit down around the fire. It is not permissible and at the very least arouses suspicion if a man enters a hut in which a woman is sitting alone, nor would a woman enter a hut where a man is [illegible] [illegible] In such cases the visitor is supposed to remain standing in front of the hut [illegible] and from here make known his or her wish, unless they prefer to wait for a more suitable occasion. As a rule, everyone first finds out whether the person to whom he wishes to speak is accompanied by others in the hut before he visits him. In order to prevent any misunderstanding or, above all, gossip, women who value their reputation carefully take a child along whenever they enter a strange hut. Molly Lewenson made it a rule to do this. Although she was the mistress of the house and on each of my four journeys I was a guest of long standing in her house, nevertheless she never visited the room assigned to me unless she was accompanied by at least one of her children. Gertie did the same. If a successful hunter has his wife distribute some of his booty among the neighboring huts, she observes the prescribed rules (p. 478). It is well known that, in spite of this, a man now and then secretly meets a woman for illicit intercourse, and the persons who arouse justified suspicion are carefully watched. It has been mentioned several times that gifts are never directly given to a woman by a man or to a man by a woman.

[illegible] What we have just said about prescriptions for social intercourse does not mean that it is basically undermined or seriously curtailed. As a matter of fact, frequent visits back and forth are not only a social requirement, but also a very human, psychological one. Under the pressure of the daily food quest the family must, in any case, again and again go their way alone while persons, as well as children, are fully occupied with the tasks assigned them. /1010/ It is only in the evening that they have a few hours of intimate social life, if indeed they are not too tired. In the long run, however, this is not enough. Hence, they gladly welcome every visitor who comes to them. He will surely have something new to tell them, report all kinds of incidents, and answer a few questions and inquiries. Both parties are pleased and stimulated by the meeting. Occasionally a family must seek aid among others, for example, when they have lost some implements in a storm, when they lack food or materials for implements, when they find themselves burdened with a helpless sick person, or have suffered loss by death. Since assistance in such cases can be obtained only from other families, they are urgently drawn to them,

574 and they cleave to these families wherever they meet them.

Aside from that, each family must now and then appear among their nearest relatives; otherwise the latter might suspect dislike or even animosity, and the former could not count on aid in an emergency. Anyone who has a crime on his conscience, however, remains hidden and for many months avoids being seen by others. Even if a hostile person should arrive on a visit -- this would happen only if the person were impelled by urgent necessity or were in the company of others -- he would never be refused admission by a Yamana. The visitor may stay as long as he likes; the owner of the hut would not by the faintest sign give the impression that he is tired of him.

No matter who arrives, he is received with warm hospitality, and this is especially true of relatives and good friends. If a family in a canoe sees another family on the water, they hasten toward each other and usually agree to head for shore where they will erect huts next to each other. A man on shore who sees a canoe coming toward him will hasten down to the water and say to the one who is disembarking: "Come quickly into my hut. I have a good fire, rest yourself there!" He will call to the man's wife: "Tie up your canoe quickly. You, too, come immediately to my hut, it is wet and cold out here!" The two men immediately go to the hut and the wife of the visitor will soon follow. They warm themselves at the fire and eat what the mistress of the hut offers them. They stay near the entrance so that they can easily keep an eye on their implements and belongings. When they have refreshed themselves, are thoroughly warmed, and have rested sufficiently and talked a little, they get up and hasten out. The owners of the hut follow them, and all join forces to build a hut for the new arrivals. No matter who requests admittance into the huts of our Yamana, even if many people have to crowd together in the small space, they are always welcome and no one is sent away, least of all when the weather is threatening.

Just as every visitor is readily received, so that one scarcely /1011/ notices a difference in the treatment of friend or stranger, so is he generously provided with food. The owners of the hut spontaneously and regularly offer the best they have. They

574 hold nothing back, for they aim to please and satisfy their guests, and they are not sorry if their entire supply is consumed. Even a person who has come for the express purpose of eating his fill for once -- perhaps he saw his last remaining home with rich spoils -- is not turned away, but can freely indulge his appetite. It is not customary for the visitor to ask for anything. The owner of the fish already knows the other's intention and serves him everything he has on hand. He is glad to do this also because, at the next opportunity, he will visit the one who is now his guest. Thus a person may eat first in one hut and then in another, but eventually he also must show that he is a generous host. No one expresses thanks for what he has eaten, even if choice tidbits have been offered him (430). Since everyone wishes to avoid being called stingy or mean, he offers his guest everything he has with unmistakable generosity (431).

> 430. Bridges (k):260 was acquainted with this custom which is strange to Europeans: "The natives...never express thanks, but on every occasion are prompt to repay [the] services" /translated from Spanish/.

> 431. According to Dabbene (b):260 the Yamana are "hospitable, and however scanty the provisions may be, a new arrival will always find a place near the fire and some food. But they accept it coolly in silence, and if one has provisions, he must divide them with the rest" /translated from Spanish/.

576 264 In view of this, it might seem surprising that our Yamana also regard moderation as one of their social virtues. Everyone must act as though he did not care anything at all about eating. Not even in front of his own family, let alone as a visitor in front of others, would a person say that he is hungry. Quite the contrary, if something is offered, he acts almost as though he were offended and waits quite some time before he actually helps himself. At the same time his stomach often grumbles so loudly from hunger

576 that everybody in the vicinity knows about it. A person who be-264 haves too greedily and hastily at meals, who audibly drinks and smacks, is unquestionably regarded as a glutton and sacrifices a great deal of standing. When one is hungry, he cleverly feigns otherwise and fills his stomach without making his hosts consciously aware of it. Very early Despard (b):680 observed this attractive trait: "They hold gluttony in great abhorrence. In their language the word for gentleman is 'small-eater'" /cited in English/. In this respect they are exactly like the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 474).

When the Fuegians are by themselves, however, or in the 264 small circle of most intimate friends, their great voracity occasionally breaks all bounds, and the sight is sometimes repulsive even to their own countrymen (p. 331). As is well known, they grasp the usually very hot piece of meat /1012/ with their hands, put it to their mouths, and tugging hard, they tear off thick pieces with their teeth. The abundant blubber and meat juice ooze out of both corners of their mouths, and thick drops of it fall on their torsos and thighs. They rub it on their faces and bodies and lick their sticky fingers with their tongues. The scene around a stranded whale is almost disgusting, for everyone discards the customary cautious self-control and stuffs himself with such large amounts that his taut belly stands out prominently. In drinking, which 271 was formerly limited to water, no one need restrain himself. The Yamana drink large quantities daily.

574 Ordinary visits are quiet and without ceremony. The visitor 576 enters the hut, looks around, and sits down near the fire. Considerable time goes by before the owner of the hut addresses him, and then there is another interval before the visitor consents to converse or to make known his reason for coming. He leaves again just as wordlessly. Certain forms of greeting, however, are 576 customary among them (432): when they are separating to go long

432. Therefore I reject what Spegazzini (a):166 says, for example, and what Despard (b):698 maintained in the following words: "There are no gestures of affection amongst them; they neither kiss, rub noses, nor shake hands. Nevertheless, the affection exists, and is strong" /cited in English/. The former, > however, admits: "Although there are no manifestations of love, neither kisses nor caresses, it nevertheless is much in evidence" /translated from Spanish/.

distances, when they have not seen each other for a long time, when they pass each other in their canoes without stopping, and when they have spent some time together happily. Intimate friends, whether men or women, rush impetuously toward each other after a long separation, embrace enthusiastically, and shake each other with impulsive hugs. They utter only sounds of joy, not definite words of greeting, until they let each other go. Snow: I, 346, for example, experienced the heartiness of their embrace: "It was in their friendly hugs that I felt most of their power, and the unpleasantness of too close a contact. The strength displayed in these hugs was greater than I could have supposed. It was, indeed, no joke to have this manifestation of their good-will. It was liked being pressed in a wedge" /cited in English/. Adults do not kiss, but even today, just as formerly, women and, occasionally, men press their mouths hard against the cheek of a baby among their relatives. This type of kiss, ūpásv (433), > 433. Hence the assertion of Spegazzini (a): 166, for example, or of Hyades (p):334 that "the kiss is quite unknown" /translated from French/ is incorrect BD:101 translates the above expression as follows: "to make any smacking noise with the lips or mouth, or fingers; to kiss" /cited in English/.

576 Anyone who takes formal leave says loudly, "hála, yělla, I am going away"; according to BD:263, "I'm off, I'm going away" /cited in English/. According to BD:263, hála kātakīa, meaning "I will go, i.e., I will wait no longer, I think I had better go" /cited in English/, is more explicit, as is hála yellīa skáia. As Bridges (MM:VII, 118;1873) reliably maintains, /1013/ this is "the only form of farewell known here" /cited in English/.

516 This greeting is usually not answered. If someone wants to reply, he says: "ma yella, you may go"; "leave me, or You may leave me" /cited in English/.

If a person meets another in friendly fashion, he throws out an "ápa sá, how are you?" If the other has nothing special to report, he smilingly repeats this ápa sá. Often, however, he comes out, rather unconsciously, with: "bāf hāima, I'm not too well!" No one takes this seriously, however. Others who are not so close to each other walk past utterly mute and are content with a few mutual glances in which, however, they visibly express all kinds of feelings (434).

> 434. Spegazzini (a):167 who denies that our Yamana have any kind of social etiquette nevertheless confesses: "They exchange looks that are as eloquent as any speech..." /translated from Spanish/. Compare also the brief footnote 433.

514 From an earlier period Despard (b):716 describes a form of welcome which I cannot confirm from my own experience. "The mode of receiving strangers is strange. Comers are seen approaching -- wigwam people hear the news -- and consult as to who they may be, look about inside, and make as many spaces round the fire as there are guests to occupy them. Newcomers enter and occupy. Then the in-party turn their back to the fire and make a simultaneous talking. The newly-arrived make a general response. Then both parties assume the face-to-fire position and the ceremony of reception is concluded" /cited in English/.

514 302 An actual visit is quite generally referred to as tēppi, not just under the circumstances mentioned by BD:409. The visitor is not supposed to appear without any kind of body painting. At least a few white or red lines are drawn on the face, following the pattern customary for the uǩwāala in the čiēxaus. Women and children are much more punctilious about this duty than are older men. For simple visits one or two horizontal lines, say from the corners of the mouth to the ear lobes, suffice. A person who wishes to honor the other particularly not only paints his face more elaborately, but also very precisely. Besides their faces, older women in particular also decorate the entire upper part of their bodies with

302 plicated, is used when a child appears before its parents, a bridegroom before his bride, a woman before her intimate female friend. Young people who have already gone through the čiéxaus would not be permitted to present themselves before their sponsor or their adoptive mother, adakutŕuwaxípa, without this decoration. Such negligence would be tantamount to an insult or contempt. A person who hears that he will soon have the pleasure of a visit quickly paints himself to show how pleased he is. If he has not had time to do it, he paints himself in the presence of the visitor. The sponsor loves to visit her protégé of the čiéxaus and paint

514 Linked with this requirement to decorate oneself for visits
515 is the related one of physical cleanliness. Everyone at least removes the worst dirt from his face and from hands and feet, arranges his hair, and puts on his cleanest back-cape. No one makes great demands in this respect, but every visitor must at least show that he has done a little something to appear clean. Naturally he puts on his most precious ornaments. All this is to show that the visitor esteems the one whom he visits.

514 Although the Yamana are unpretentious about physical cleanliness (p. 28), they are remarkably strict with regard to their 516 natural functions. No one speaks of them. A person who wants to relieve himself quietly leaves the circle of people and goes some distance away. Two people would never do it close together; boys who venture to do so and are observed must expect to have stones thrown at them and be beaten. A person who has to go out at night must not show annoyance at having to go far away from the hut or he would be severely reproached. Children and young people may not loudly break wind in the circle of older people; the latter, however, are free to do so and reap smirks of approval.
516 Very loud and vigorous belching does not disturb anyone, nor do 515 the rasping clearing of the throat and the constant spitting. They are always scratching their heads and all over the body to relieve

576 the burdensome itch caused by lice. When they are not doing 575 that, they habitually pick their noses with their thick fingers, and with the flat of the hand they wipe off the phlegm from their noses and smear it on the ground or on the wall of the hut. In all these things our Yamana resemble the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 465), but the latter are in general cleaner than the Yamana. Every European is considerably repulsed by their offensive behavior which is so far removed from our rules of decency.

We must also briefly describe how conversation generally 574 takes place during ordinary visits. A person who has entered a 573 hut as a guest crouches silently by the fire for a while. He does not look about inquisitively nor make conspicuous movements (p. 914). Finally he manages to say a few words in a low voice and leads into unimportant matters. Presently he describes his canoe trip and his experiences with the weather during the last few days. If he happens to have had an exciting hunt, he takes particular pleasure in describing it in minute detail. Meanwhile he works himself into quite a lively state. After that he goes on excitedly and from /1015/ one experience to another, to the satisfaction of those present, and he stops only after many hours. No one dares interrupt him; no one would show boredom, no matter how much he felt it. No matter how great the suspense of those present about a certain incident experienced by the guest, no one would ask specific questions if the guest himself did not get around to telling about it. They do not want to annoy him in any way or to show inquisitiveness by a direct inquiry. The guest ends his tale when he feels like it; no one may presume to ask him to stop because of the late hour. Sometimes a long report is given by a talkative old man, which the company in the circle has heard more than once, but since memories concerning unwritten laws and ancient custom are always interwoven with it, such a story does not fail to have educational value for young people and does a great deal of good.

Frequently an account first given by a man alone develops into a real discussion, but there is never a loud confusion of voices or a disorderly hubbub because the younger people hold back their remarks in favor of their elders and by no means interrupt them. If women are present and something is discussed that concerns them, too, they may of course express their opinions within limits.

551 If matters pertaining to a specific person come up in the conversation, his name is not mentioned but is indicated by circumlocutions. The Yamana are particularly adept at this. Two men or women are all the more likely to do it when, in low tones, they discuss someone present. A person is never addressed or called by his first name; this also applies to children. People
192 who are fond of each other avoid flirtatious and endearing expres-
201 sions in front of others. Also, no one shows his dislike for another person. The Yamana do not have expletives and swear words. They roar with laughter, double up and roll convulsively on the floor. When they answer in the affirmative, they utter a deep n sound between closed lips and slowly raise their heads; they express a negative with a long drawn-out "bāf."

It is not only improper but very serious to poke fun at anyone 576 present in such a way that he himself becomes aware of it. Peo-
574 ple who have a guest from distant parts are extraordinarily careful not to arouse the least suspicion that they are disparaging or disdainful about his countrymen or his country. They are governed primarily by the fear that out of revenge for bad treatment the strange visitors might cause them much harm through their yékamuš at home and might refuse to help anyone from this group who later came to them. They do not have this fear toward children.
522 Since the Yamana /1016/ have a tendency toward ridicule and 576 sarcasm, however, they do not hold back critical and joking opinions in front of those who cannot properly defend themselves. In March, 1923, I had sent a boat from Beagle Channel to the Wollaston Islands with a special message. After a few days it brought back a lad about ten years old, whom Gertie took in temporarily. On the very first evening I saw how all the people present openly made fun of the boy's unfamiliar accent. He spoke the pure southern dialect (p. 200 /untranslated/) of the Yéškusinālala /southern group/. When I expressed my astonishment that they were deviating from their customary behavior, they justified themselves: "That boy speaks a different language than we do. Some words we don't understand. Everything he says sounds so strange that it makes us laugh! After all, he is still young and small, so he can't hurt us if we openly show our amusement!" No one would dare behave this way toward adults from distant regions. When the guests have departed, however, intimate

522 576 friends discuss in detail, even scornfully and with much amusement, everything they noticed about them or fancifully attribute to them.

431 574 Unlike the habits of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 470) our Yamana regard it as a duty, so to speak, to give presents to a visitor or guest from distant regions when he leaves. This is altogether in harmony with their unmistakable tendency toward unselfishness and noble generosity. According to Hyades (q):243, their "generous disposition is a characteristic trait of the Fuegians" /translated from French/. I personally had much more opportunity than he did to observe this and to appreciate it. Sometimes, under the influence of great enthusiasm, a person will bountifully give away everything he can possibly do without. One would obviously be unjust to these Indians in supposing that they were generous only so that they would occasionally be praised and repaid with a return gift. Admittedly, they certainly expect it. To that extent Dabbene's (b):200 assertion is correct: "If the Yahgan shows generosity, he does not do it spontaneously, but in the hope that his generosity will be generously repaid" /translated from Spanish/ (435).

435. Earlier Bridges (a):213 had pointed out that "these people like to be thought liberal. They therefore are often very generous, and often give away everything they have, but they know they will soon be well rewarded by gifts in return. When fish, or blubber, or any other food is divided, the divider reserves none for himself, and those who come first are sure to be helped the best" /cited in English/. Compare Hyades (q):243, Outes (g):57.

Without much ado and without saying a word the owner of the hut places the gift into the hands of his guest and gives him a friendly look. The guest's face lights up with sincere pleasure, and he accepts it silently, without carefully examining or evaluating it. A man, of course, gives his friend the tools that he /1017/ uses in his work and in hunting. A favorite present is some object that is abundant in one region but scarce elsewhere. To this

431 category belong bone points for the harpoon, made of a whale rib
574 (Fig. 45), lumps of pyrite (p. 41), guanaco leather, and so forth. A woman, on the other hand, will please her female guest with one of the various ornaments and chooses a form that is not made elsewhere. Whatever a person hands his guest at parting, as a souvenir, as it were, should be particularly valuable, without blemish, and of the finest workmanship! This is the attitude behind the instruction regularly given the uswala in the kizaus. When the other person reaches home, he will have leisure to examine the gift and evaluate it. He will soon tell his neighbor what he thinks of it. They speak favorably and respectfully of the giver only if generosity and magnanimity are reflected in his gift.

572 Besides the need for the company of others, a highly de-
574 veloped feeling of friendship impels certain individual families and smaller family groups to gather together more frequently. Inasmuch as they understand each other better, usually because of their natural disposition, they appreciate each other more and this awakens the desire to meet often and be together for a longer time. One really finds genuine friendship among the Yamana, which is self-sacrificing and entirely unselfish. The persons linked by such friendship are, like loving brothers and sisters, closely allied for mutual assistance.

574 Families who have little or no contact with one another separate after a brief exchange without a formal farewell. When 576 they do not want to stay longer, they silently and without fuss drag their things to the canoe, load their meager belongings in a few minutes, and, without a greeting, row off in the chosen direction. When relatives and good friends take leave of each other, however, there is a noisy and animated farewell. They discuss their decision beforehand. If one family should remain behind, they help the other in moving. If two or more families have decided to abandon their common campsite at the same time, they have a last, long talk, then they soundlessly gather their things together and do not let another word fall as they depart (436).

436 Bridges (MM:III, 11;1869) soundly confirms this: "When there is a new arrival, a greater or lesser public demonstration in loud speaking and vociferation, according to the feelings of the person speaking. So also, when a canoe or canoes depart, a public notice in the same way is given" /cited in English/.

576

There is an atmosphere of intimate friendship among families who travel together for a certain time and camp beside each other. They are constantly finding occasions for neighborly visits on the beach. In any case the hunting successes of one family will attract the other, or one brings home things that the other could not find, and these are now /1018/ exchanged. Moreover, implements must be mended or new weapons made. For all this they like to ask the help or at least the opinion of their neighbor, if only out of the need to chat once more. These people are so intimate that they are as much at home in each other's huts as in their own. Whenever a family comes home with rich spoils, these in themselves have sufficient power of attraction to draw the neighbors without an invitation. Sometimes they are specially called together (437). If the gathering is somewhat large, it is known as

437. Bridges (VP:XIII, 213;1866) refers to this: "Sometimes a man and his wife give a feast; they then make a great fire, and cook what food they have, and when all is ready, they call the people to come to partake. The host serves out the feast, and behaves very generously, and they are then very chatty" /cited in English/.

Ckinaspi and has a certain formality. No matter what the arrangement, however, the atmosphere is intimate and unconstrained.

2. More General Forms of Communication

In the preceding we have described the everyday and more intimate intercourse between individuals and families. In what follows we shall speak of the regulations governing general communication and public order. The mutual relations of the Yamana are determined by a greater or lesser degree of unselfishness, according to personal disposition and the connection with the other person. I have repeatedly referred to this virtue of the Fuegians, for it is much practiced, and in order that it not be lost, it is more emphatically impressed upon the younger generation as a duty then are many other things. Most adults and children have an opportunity to practice it almost daily. A person who should fail in this would fall into hopeless ill-repute and open scorn. Everyone knows that he is closely watched, particularly when he distributes his spoils (p. 314), but it is not altogether out of fear of unfavorable talk that a person sometimes gives so much to others that he has nothing left for himself; he actually wants to show that he is unselfish. Whoever asks a favor of anyone can absolutely count on its being granted, no matter how much personal exertion and unpleasantness is connected with it. It is probably unnecessary to repeat the admonitions pertaining to this which are given the uwala in the [illegible]. Children, even in their earliest years, are taught to practice generosity willingly, and it is touching to see that even the smallest when they are eating give large pieces to their playmates. The Yamana feels uplifted and obviously happy to have served another unselfishly (438); it gives him

438. Dabbene (b):200 believes: "Among their defects....one can easily note a certain egoism which shows in most of their actions" /translated from Spanish/. It is true that they are not completely free of it. It is an obvious exaggeration, however, to maintain with Lovisato (b):146 or with Bove (e):159 and (g):234: "Selfishness is their dominant character trait." Even the parents, he says, are solely "governed by love of their own ego. How often when I entered a hut did I see the father devouring the food, and women and children with intent eyes, their faces distorted with hunger, sat beside the husband and father, timidly gathering the crumbs that fell from his meal..." A horrible picture such as could arise only in the wild imagination of a Bove! He must have been completely blind to the fact that Mother Nature did not scatter food so meagerly there, and everyone, large and small, can in most places conveniently gather it (p. 281). I also wish to refer to the detailed description, "How They Eat" (p. 322).

pleasure to give his guests beautiful presents and /1019/ his neighbors heavy pieces of game. Bridges (k):241 writes pertinently: [574] "The natives are accustomed to go freely to persons who have game or other excess food, in order to obtain part of it, and they always go away satisfied. They never beg for anything, but the purpose of the visit is understood perfectly. They never offer thanks, but on every occasion they are prompt to repay such services" /translated from Spanish/.

We have just shown (p. 877) that gift-giving is actually a well-developed and well-regulated custom. These Indians also help one another by lending various tools and utensils (p. 875). A person is immediately given anything he asks to borrow, and no matter how long he keeps it, the owner never asks that it be returned, although he does not forget it. Also, I never heard the owner press the other person or say, for example: "Take good care of this article!" Once I observed that someone had to interrupt his work for two days because he had lent his neighbor his iron chisel and did not want to ask for its return. No one, of course, would ask for food, no matter how hungry he is. The obligation to be frugal (pp. 327, 919) and personal pride would forbid it. A calm and optimistic feeling of great assurance gives everyone the happy conviction that he can everywhere count on the best possible help and assistance from the first person he happens to meet! Mutual aid is not limited to near relatives and

577 friendly neighbors, but is willingly offered to every fellow-tribes-
476 man.

484 Each of the many individual families is constantly traveling about, not only under the pressure of the daily food quest, but also from a natural wanderlust (p. 363). They move slowly, but nevertheless cover long distances in the course of time. Definite boundaries separate the many local groups (p. 630) and the five dialect groups (p. 199 /untranslated/) from one another. These boundaries may be crossed under certain circumstances, and no visitor from another region can be lawfully prevented from doing so by the local residents. In general every family stays within its narrower home area, if only because they do not like to meet strange groups.
[609] It is a universal characteristic of the Yamana to stay away from strangers in the first place or at least to avoid them; they feel constrained in the presence of strangers, and suspicion makes them almost ill (439).

> 439. Bridges (a):210 gives a reason for this which is not quite correct: "These people dare not go where they have no friends, and where they are unknown, as they would most likely be soon killed"/cited in English/. We have repeatedly mentioned that certain circumstances make it permissible for anyone to travel in the territory of another dialect group.

203 /1020/ The ceaseless travel of individual families who thus meet one another and whose travel routes intersect partly explains the remarkably good propagation of news, which works invisibly. Everything that happens and any event that is in any way noteworthy are circulated far and wide and with a speed that sometimes seemed inexplicable to me. This much is certain, the Yamana lack such means of communication as loud calls or drumbeats. I cannot reliably state whether or not they give each other digital signs within a visible range, but I infer this from careful observations. Every adult learns what has happened within the confines of a wide area and usually without much delay. Most news, of course, is communicated from mouth to mouth. The facts are inevitably altered

213 in various ways, and it sometimes happens that even the report of a death or a murder is false, which causes grave complications and unnecessary excitement (440). Since messages travel very quickly in all directions, it is obvious that on certain occasions a large number of families flock together with amazing speed.

> 440. Stirling (VS X, 196;1863) tells of an example. In the Wulaia region the rumor spread that Ukokko and his family, whose home was there, had been shipwrecked at Picton Island and murdered by the people living there. Without delay Ukokko's brother, along with a few friends, set out on an expedition for revenge and found himself in a very awkward situation when it became known that Ukokko had not been molested at all.

202 On special occasions this rather simple news service is supplemented by a few signal fires. BD:64 writes "aylna, Signal smoke or fires" /cited in English/. Earlier, Bridges (a):213 had already mentioned: "They signal to one another by fires, which they are very expert in making" /cited in English/. In reality it is less a fire than a thick cloud of smoke with which a signal is given. It is made in such a way that it cannot be confused with the ordinary smoke of the hut fire. First, rather thick pieces of dry wood are brought to a faint glow. Meanwhile the natives gather many branches of the evergreen beech (Nothofagus betuloides), which are the length of an arm and covered with dense foliage. A large bundle of these branches is then gathered together and pressed down on the glowing fire. Now no flame can arise, but a thick cloud of smoke immediately ascends. When it has reached a height of about five meters, the fire is quickly put out, and, as though cut off, the balloon-shaped cloud rises perpendicularly into the air. The thick mass of smoke remains intact for a long time, reaches a considerable height, and is recognizable for some distance as an actual signal. If /1021/ it did not have this balloon-shape but rose up in a long column or even as an irregularly shaped smudge,

If the Yamana let a single cloud of smoke, ukéjli ukéf, rise up, they are announcing a serious illness or an accident and want other people, above all the yékamuf, to bring help soon. In order to make two to four clouds of smoke, they previously prepare the corresponding number of fires which are placed about four meters apart. With two smoke clouds, kémbíbe ukéf, they announce a condition of serious distress that might be caused by all kinds of reasons, for example, loss of the canoe and the hunting implements or serious damage to them, the loss of the hut fire, or total lack of food. Three smoke clouds, mérem ukéf, announce a death. With four smoke clouds, wíru ukéf, they announce that a whale is stranded. Finally it is customary to let one or more large smoke clouds ascend as a farewell to Europeans. They prepared this pleasure for me personally on two different occasions, when once a Chilean cutter, and the next time the "Garibaldi," picked me up in Punta Remolino and carried me westward. On the trip past Puerto Mejillones on the southern coast of Beagle Channel this sign of a final greeting arose with unmistakable distinctness. Long before, in March, 1834, Darwin (d) 263 was honored in this strange fashion. On the last visit of the "Beagle," after the well-known Jemmy "had reached land, he lit a signal fire, the smoke rose up and gave us a final and long farewell as the ship was on its way out to the open sea." The Yamana do not, however, greet each other with smoke signals; they use them only for the above reasons.

476 From the duty of mutual assistance there has arisen the rule that everyone must respond to an invitation for a common search for food, which applies particularly when a few men decide to search for cormorant nests. This enterprise is successful only if several of them join forces (p. 235). Anyone who is asked may not refuse to take part. Likewise they must join in an attack on a herd of seals (p. 38 /untranslated/) which is to be undertaken from a favorable shore. In the same way two or more canoes go out into a channel together where the women hunt for fish, crabs, and mussels for hours. They also invite each other to gather firewood in the forest. Such joining of forces is also necessary for personal safety in all kinds of dangerous undertakings.

511 Although many practices governing mutual association among the Yamana have arisen out of the necessity to help one another,

571 a few go back to the clearly recognizable tendency toward gregari-ousness. It not only draws individual families together often, but keeps them together until urgent duties once more separate them.
If two canoes meet, one can /1922/ almost always rely on their 571 meeting toward the nearest landing place and building their huts 521 next to each other there. Then they sit huddled together hour after hour and talk to their heart's content. "They are extraordinarily fond of long talks and stories, a good part of the day is filled in this way" (Aspinall:270). Some but will have a special attraction for all who are camping in the same place, without any particular reason. Even before darkness has fallen, one person after another will inconspicuously steal toward it and squat down beside the fire. Everyone feels content in such a circle of intimate friends, and the conversation fills long hours. Bridges (VSA:XII, 7; 1863) says: "They are certainly much given to talk, and when seated before a good fire, engaged in conversation, they seem most happy. When they are cheerfully inclined, they are much given to immoderate laughter, but when mildly inclined, it is difficult to remove them to cheerfulness" /cited in English/(441).

441. Of the 12 Yamana who at that time were staying on Isla Keppel, Bridges (VSA:XII, 9; 1863) reported on September 16, 1864: "The natives are certainly of a social turn; of evenings they generally meet in one house or another, and spend their time in conversation and merriment" /cited in English/. Reports of other missionaries confirm that in the mission, also, families of all areas lived together amicably.

521 Minor happenings and the sometimes wholly insignificant details of a day are the subject for conversation; they are by no means as completely insignificant and meaningless for the Fuegians as for a European passing through. J. Rae (VSA:XI, 291; 1864) referred to this in his remarks on August 1, 1864: "Often I wondered myself about their long conversations which they keep up when they are by themselves; several times I thought what they were talking about. Once I listened, and I found they were talking about a subject of which others take not the slightest notice. For

52 instance, one told to the others in an evening, how he had seen, during the daytime a fanirook, a black bird, passing down a sloping hill, step by step; the bird looked round about, then at once it commenced to shake its feathers and flew off, about which they burst out into a loud laugh. Another began to tell what he had seen strange, when he was out on horseback, and the third what he had seen when he drove the cattle home" /cited in English/.

52 Meanwhile everyone rests comfortably, and anyone who feels 203 like eating is immediately served by the mistress of the hut. None of those present knows when there will be another opportunity for a comfortable time together. On its trips each family usually spends only one or two nights in the same place. If entertaining fellow-tribesmen offer them company on an evening, they take advantage of it until long after midnight, and yet early the following morning they are ready to travel on. The ample, unconstrained exchange offers the incalculable advantage of keeping the individual members of the tribe from far and near in close touch and of laying bare everyone's actions. In this way all their /1023/, traditions are kept alive and transmitted, and any deviation from ancient custom can be prevented if it should become noticeable in any way.

52a Finally we must mention a custom that is practiced by the [171] Yamana exactly as it is among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 471), a diverting, half-serious, half-humorous talk contest between two people from different regions who have met in a hut. One of them will intentionally challenge his opponent with jokes and banter by praising the virtues of his own home and the capability of his own local group. Soon the other interrupts him with laudatory remarks about his region, his relatives and friends, the habits and qualifications of his group. The verbal exchange goes back and forth and is attentively listened to by all present. Finally when the two opponents have exhausted their repartee and their wittiness, they resort to mild insults and definite accusations. Now one tries to outdo the other in this without letting it become obvious that he feels hurt. At the dangerous moment, however, the bystanders, who unerringly recognize it, break off the talk contest between the two with very loud applause, thus preventing an unfortunate outcome of the initially

522 harmless game. Naturally, only skillful talkers and quick-witted humorists take up this game. Each member of the two groups for a long time afterward discusses the retorts and opinions given by the friend and by the opponent. Here, too, obscenities or offensive remarks are not permitted.

431 There is another practice which seems strange. Out of sheer 152 exuberance a man will silently leave his hut, hurry down to the 522 beach, and smash the canoe of his guest. The latter watches the performance dumbfounded, and he says passively, half-jokingly, half-sighing: "What in the world is happening to my canoe there? If it lies shattered, how shall I get back home?" The other replies from the beach: "It shouldn't really matter to you if all your things are smashed!" Meanwhile he returns to the hut where a regular talk contest begins, which this man had intended all along. He finally justifies his action by giving his guest a new canoe which he had purposely made for him. His gift is supposed to become known everywhere as such, and that is why he destroyed the old canoe. It is only in exceptional cases that such a mad prank has dire consequences.

152 The same exuberant desire to smash and throw everything
522 into disorder sometimes seizes a whole group as, noisily and obtrusively, they assault the visitors from another region. Before these people can offer concerted resistance, their canoes, huts, tools, and utensils have long been chopped to pieces. They declare themselves conquered and withdraw as though defenseless until the opponents cease their raging, or they pull themselves together courageously, fall on the belongings of the others, and hack them to bits likewise. No one knows how this /1924/ mad prank is going to turn out. Usually the opposing parties come to terms and laugh heartily over their destruction. They quickly rebuild what they have lighheartedly destroyed. All effort seems slight compared to the great exuberance involved in their devastation.

Anyone who seeks diversion from monotonous daily work in the company of happy fellow-tribesmen can find it. To this end there are a number of practices which cultivate a community feeling and promote good fellowship.

c. The Commonwealth

(27) The Tamana are linked together in a definitely circumscribed area by a common language and a uniform way of life, but as a whole they are not under the administration of an authoritative person (p. 904), nor are the various groups, large or small, led by a chief (p. 602). In reality there are a number of strong but invisible forces which command with coercive force and which without doubt must be deemed a supreme power. This imposes order upon relationships which lie outside the organization of the sole social structure, the family, and for which the public, so to speak, is responsible. In this category belong the administration of justice and many obligations or customs which have already been discussed. The public itself is responsible for the enforcement of individual regulations and vigilantly heals them.

1. Rules of Justice

(13) (27) The coherence of our Fonglan society is possible only on the basis of a conception of justice which protects each person and at the same time obligates him, both in an effective manner. Everyone retains his personal freedom and a far-reaching independence, but, along with these, there are also many obligations anchored in universal justice. One must not underestimate their number; moreover, like a net, they encompass all relationships. For example, these obligations determine the everyday life of the man and woman, the mutual relations of husband and wife, parents and children, closest relatives, local groups, and dialect groups, the public education of young people outside the family in the Zilange, and the further education of boys in the Kiwa; they secure material possessions and personal safety from any kind of danger. This system of justice is not written, and no one can boast of being permitted to administer it. It simply exists and is supported by the public, which sustains justice and guards against its being altered. Expressed in a few general formulas, it is traced back to Wanagulwa as its source, which determines its immutability and its binding force.

/1910/ Nevertheless, properly understood, public opinion would be regarded as the guardian and executor of the individual obligations which universal justice has created. The judgment of the public is reliable and decisive, not that of the individual person who speaks for his own advantage. Public opinion evaluates every concrete detail of traditional custom which is regarded as a reliable and immutable standard. No one concerns himself about purely theoretical considerations. Hence the judgment of public opinion is usually effective. Anyone whom it concerns must yield to it absolutely and immediately if he wants to save himself from being universally ostracized. This strikes every guilty person harder than severe blows. Our Tamaris are unfamiliar with any kind of formal judiciary. Instead, to put it briefly, just action is approved without reservation and every unjust act is definitely condemned by the public. In both cases the public expresses itself loudly and fearlessly, for it has the advantage in any case over the private individual. The great pressure it puts upon a person can be clearly seen from the fear which everyone, not only the average Indian, has of a bad reputation and even more of public correction. If he sees himself condemned by it, he promptly returns back to the path of virtue and commonly tries with exaggerated zeal to change the bad opinion about him into a good one. Those of this manner, however, to a dishonorable person who has lost all sense of shame. In larger cities such persons were scarcely to be found, only recently, under the influence of some Europeans have they sunk so low that they must avoid the company of their fellow-citizens. An attentive observer does not fail to note this state of affairs since it is so significant. Hyeden (p.263 writes: "When they steal among themselves, they seek to touch as possible to conceal their thefts; when the culprit is discovered and charmed, public opinion is satisfied. The murderer is ostracized by his companions, isolated from everyone, he is finally condemned to garish of hanging or someday to fall under the blows of a group of extemporaneous judges. Mr. Bridges in his conversations with us has put a great deal of emphasis on the importance of public opinion among the Fuegians" /translated from French/. One could speak of public opinion as the guardian of laws and as the avenger of serious transgressions. It acts no less successfully than a police force or a court of justice.

(2) In all this the individual is by no means without rights. In

[67] fact, his specific rights are recognized and defended. Sometimes it is definitely up to him to seek his own justice. This is particularly true in case of a murder, and similarly if someone suffers damage to his vital possessions or if his reputation or that of his close relatives and friends is belittled. A person whose own life is threatened or whose close relative falls into the hands of a murderer has a right to exercise club law (642). This is most obviously revealed in the obligation for blood vengeance, which affects a wide circle of people (p. 861). /[illegible]/ Public opinion is the indisputable, sole power that preserves all their arrangements and their traditional customs. It also is the means for providing the individual and the community adequate satisfaction for any injustice which they have suffered. All kinds of proof of this are offered by each of the different age groups and in everyday life with its changing events.

[71] [72] Inasmuch as the individual is a member of the whole -- no matter whether this is thought of as a small or large circle -- his honor is also its honor, and from this our Yaghans derive the duty to protect and defend, not only the reputation, but the rights of the other person generally. Everyone must intercede in favor of his relatives and close friends, he must defend their good reputations and their possessions. For example, this implies that in the presence of guests one must not speak disparagingly of their habits or their home districts, should one do so, the guests would immediately have to defend themselves. Following this line one also finds an explanation for the fact that disputes between two or three persons are supposed to be adjusted as soon as possible by those who are close to them. It is even more imperative for everyone to see to it that he is on the best of terms with his relatives, they he does not treat them even in an unfriendly fashion, much less harm them or wrong them. The Tenenesa use a very meaningful word, according to SD-438, [illegible], "to relatives with much to-do the relatives

577 or clansmen of a murdered or dead person for neglect or illtreat-
626 ment of him when living" /cited in English/. Bridges (MM:XIII, 153;1879) furnished an account of a noteworthy occurrence: "There was a man named Muriyan. This man has to wife the two sisters of Detamahgan, and as a consequence the two men were much together. But Muriyan was often weary of his dull and unattractive brother-in-law, and was often unkind to him. All very well so long as the man lives, but no sooner is he killed than his connections count up his grievances, and visit with punishment, more or less severe, those who in past times have been specially unkind. Muriyan was in this way called to account, and in hopes of escaping, lived away apart from the places or resort of these he had occasion to fear" /cited in English/. Moreover, this one example shows how the conduct and speech of the individual are closely watched and long remembered. The Yamana never forgets an injustice that he has suffered directly or indirectly.

888 The persons of more advanced age, men and women, are consciously or unconsciously regarded as the representatives and supporters of universal justice and traditional customs. They are shown respect and veneration on all sides. Even Fitz-Roy (a):186 learned that "much respect is said to be paid to age" /cited in English/. The more distinguished and conscientious an old man is, the more he is esteemed, the more willingly /1027/ does one defer to him. This is also true of older women whose words and advice even young men in a larger gathering take seriously. No one would have the audacity to interrupt an old person or to contradict him (443). Quite the contrary, everywhere the old people have the prerogative; when the food is passed around they are served first, the most agreeable place in the hut is left free for them, in their presence the younger people behave inconspicuously

443. Fitz-Roy (a):179 writes: "In each family the word of an old man is accepted as law by the young people; they never dispute his authority" /cited in English/. This applies also to every casual group made up of several families.

888 and speak only in a low voice. All this is proof of the respect which is shown them. A very experienced and upright old man fairly embodies the law of custom and tradition; he is, therefore, a living example and a constant admonisher for the younger tribal members.

2. General Welfare

577 A death or an accident on the one hand, sickness or physical disability on the other, can cause a person who is alone serious difficulty in case there is no definite person to come to his aid. The public knows that it is now duty-bound to come to his rescue, and in doing so it follows a certain course of action which has been accepted since ancient times.

888 Every human society counts among its members, temporarily or permanently, old persons with the infirmities of age. They are 737 no longer capable of acquiring their subsistence singlehanded. They must be cared for, according to the strict custom of the Yamana, by their own children, as well as by their nearest relatives and the neighbors who happen to be present. When it comes to fulfilling this duty, there are no degrees of responsibility; in fact everyone is required to look after an aged person who is staying near his hut. The old person is probably never left completely alone, except perhaps temporarily because of urgent work. Usually one of the grown children constantly takes the widowed parent along on his own trips. If both parents are still living, they always stay together; they are often visited by their children who cheerfully fulfill their needs for food and clothing, firewood and tools. Hyades (d):308 assures us: "Adults have due respect for their parents and old people are never badly treated" /translated from French/. It is also said, "They are cared for and fed until their death" /translated from French/ (La Nature:311), and Despard (b):698 asserts that "children care for parents and grand-parents with kind consideration" /cited in English/. As long as a person has the strength, he helps himself; otherwise he must accept the help of his children and friends. As Bridges (a):205 reports, "grown-up children are expected to support their parents when they become aged; the son generally makes his father, if he is past work, a canoe every /1028/ season, and if the aged man is a

888 widower he lives entirely under the charge of his eldest son"
737 /cited in English/ (444). Naturally some children are more tender and loving toward their aged parents than others. A person who no longer has any children of his own joins a related family or friends. This much is certain, no one is abandoned because of his infirmities. I personally repeatedly witnessed the willing care given even those persons whose lot in old age was a long, burdensome invalidism.

> 444. This hardly agrees, however, with what he (a):206 adds soon after: "The aged are often much neglected, yea, cruelly treated, and I have heard of cases where by their own children they have been killed, to get rid of the trouble of keeping them" /cited in English/. A person who is displeased with the treatment he receives from his own children easily finds refuge with relatives and friends.

758 The nearest relatives and all the neighbors no less attentively care for a sick person. There are no medicines in Tierra del Fuego. They keep the sick person company and never leave him in some place all by himself. Hyades (d):307 and (p):331 repeatedly asserts: "The sick are not abandoned, and the feeble are helped" /translated from French/. Bridges (h):209 agrees: "The infirm are well cared for, especially by the women" /translated from Spanish/, and elsewhere (i):14 he says even more explicitly: "Great consideration was shown to the sick, they were well attended and as far as possible their wishes were fulfilled. The nursing chiefly fell to the lot of the women" /cited in English/. BD:427 even gives the special expression, tauuxdátu, "to often visit as a man his sick friend" /cited in English/. If their own child is seriously ill, the helpless parents are in actual despair; adults, too, are deeply affected by the physical suffering of one of their loved ones.
732 For decades old Whaits has been totally blind. It is touching to see the help and attention which his own daughters bestow on him, as do old and young in the neighborhood. Everyone is concerned about him, and one competes with another in loving service for him. It

732 was really superfluous to teach us uswáala in the čiéxaus how we were to take care of him.

Elsewhere (p. 514) the concern of the public for orphans has 736 been described in detail. The orphaned boy, wēšakíya, as well
597 as the orphaned girl, wēšakiyakípa, remains with the surviving parent until the latter marries again. Bridges (a):202, 183 correctly asserts: "If the father of a woman is dead, the mother has the right of disposal...If the mother dies, the little one soon finds a foster-mother, by whom considerable affection is shown" /cited in English/. The nearest relatives, too, in particular the so-called adoptive mother, adakutáruwaxípa, keep an eye on the orphans. If a nursing infant loses its mother, it is reared by another woman who gladly undertakes this service (445). Thus there is not the slightest doubt about the rearing of every orphan, which is assured.

> 445. The Yamana women, as Hahn (a):806 reports, "often rear foster children who do not belong to them, but the child is then regarded as their own and owes them the obedience and respect of an actual child" /translated from French/.

/1029/ It is probably unnecessary to refute once more, as 888 a figment of the imagination, the opinion circulated by Darwin in his day about the fate of old women. Bridges (k):235 undertook to do this decades ago: "The tales that have been spread about their killing old women who were unable to work are pure fables. These old women had as much security as other individuals as the tribe, for they had children and grandchildren who certainly would have defended them against any assault" /translated from Spanish/. Hyades (g):35 has made clear how valuable they can still be to the entire tribe: "The old women are by no means as useless as [Darwin's] story presupposes; their experience makes them decidedly valuable in securing food, as well as in the other household tasks, and it is not at all rare that young people prefer to marry an experienced older woman rather than a young girl, even though she is prettier. Older women whose husbands are dead very definitely exercise all the rights of a family head; even when they

888 live alone, they always have a few children or grandchildren with them who are absolutely obedient to them." In common with reliable observers, I, too, have denied the false accusation of cannibalism among the Yamana (p. 252 /untranslated/).

734 763 It is often said that it is customary among them to strangle certain people who are dying (446). Early in 1863 young Bridges

446. It is known that the same assertion was made against the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 480), but they themselves energetically denied it.

(VSA:X,171;1863) first wrote about this: "Ookokko gives me a sad account of some of the Fuegian tribes. It is a practice with some when a man is very ill, and likely to die, to cut his time short in a violent manner, and kill his young children by suffocating them. But some of the tribes, he says, are very good to the sick, and show much commiseration for their pain" /cited in English/. Later he (e):332 relayed his opinion about this to a number of Europeans and said very emphatically: "Old and hopelessly sick persons were seldom done away with before their natural end; when the faculties of speech, sight, and movement were lost and if the case was of long duration, then the dying person was strangled, and thus the end was hastened for him and his family in a merciful manner." Later he (h):209 and (i):14 repeats the same thing: "The Yahgans occasionally hastened the end of their relatives by strangulation. This was kindly meant and there were good reasons for it. It was only resorted to in cases of long continued unconsciousness and utter weakness, preceding death, when the dying person neither ate nor drank, spoke nor moved. The act was done openly and with the consent of all except that of the victim, who was too inanimate to do anything. This act was called tabacana and it was done to any class of person in the above hopeless condition, either man or woman" /cited in English/. This spelling, tabacana, is probably a mistake; in BD:394 it is given /1030/ correctly as tatabŭ́ku, "to kill any person or animal which is sick and in pain in order to put him out of his misery" /cited in English/. Martial: 205, as well as Hyades (p):333, (g):39, and (q):235 have accepted this opinion from Bridges. The latter does not in any form mention

T34 a definite instance which he might have observed, and Hyades
T63 (q):242, referring to alleged infanticide and the strangulation of individuals on the point of death, relies on statements of the missionaries and is careful to say that "personally we have not been able to verify these last two assertions" /translated from French/. As late as 1929, Spencer:88, leaned toward this view, without any kind of proof.

A way out of this uncertainty is provided by an opinion for T63 which I am indebted to the brothers, Martin and Fred Lawrence, with whom I had long discussions. They said that it is possible and most likely that some one, at the sight of a relative caught in the death struggle, lost control of himself after several hours. In his agitation, driven by his own pain at the imminent separation from the dying one and impotent in the face of the hopelessness of recovery, he may have seized his throat and strangled him so that instantly the death rattle and any movement stopped. This happened, however, only when the dying person was completely unconscious and there was absolutely no hope of recovery. The desire was simply to terminate his agony.

Only once did I come across the following remark, "taken from conversations with Mrs. Burleigh" /cited in English/ (MM: XXVIII, 126;1894): "In some cases when the wife was near death the husband would put her into a canoe, take her miles away and leave her, hoping that exposure and starvation would hasten death" /cited in English/. Such behavior so obviously contradicts everything that has been definitely proved about the value of Yamana put on human life that any comment is superfluous. They have never been cannibals (p. 254 /untranslated/), nor does suicide

The entire social order of our Fuegians impresses one as kind 181 and worthy of human beings, for it rests on natural marital relations and favorable mutual relations between parents and children, between the members of a kinship group, and among all the local groups. The small population and the lack of serious disturbances from without facilitate the cohesion of the people as a whole. This social order is conditioned by the nature of the economy of our Yamana. The charming picture of the harmoniously balanced

181 play of forces in this ethnic group on the Cape Horn Archipelago now belongs to the past. /Fig. 88 appears here./

/1031/ Part 4

The Spiritual World of the Yamana

114 There was a time not far back when people quite generally and as a matter of course inferred from the poverty and simplicity of the external arrangements and the objects used by a primitive people that they were lacking in ideas and that their spiritual world was limited. Ever since the Yamana were visited and superficially observed by European navigators, the entire cultured world has classed them among the most unworthy representatives of the human race on account of their inhospitable native land and the unfavorable conditions of their existence. Roskoff:49 and others often repeated: "The Fuegians are, according to Reinhold Forster's remarks, 'apparently the most miserable of all peoples.'" They were judged solely by what caught the eye and by the hasty first impression that their nakedness and unattractive appearance, their way of life, and their wild behavior inevitably makes upon every European. Once established, the general opinion became deeply entrenched and continued to be untouched by this or that report which sounded somewhat more favorable. How could such a report have brought about a complete change of the previously held view when the Yamana themselves did not change in any way externally!

114 It is not enough to evaluate a human group solely by what 121 strikes the eye; for that reason modern ethnography in all seriousness desires penetration into the spiritual domain of every tribe.

114 Unfortunately, the Europeans who had all kinds of opportunities
121 to do this during their sojourn on the Cape Horn Archipelago did not fully meet this demand. In their defense it is willingly admitted that they were given no particular assignment to do this, nor were they specially prepared. The English missionaries, who, in retrospect, must be loudly praised for their exemplary zeal in the study of the Yamana language, strangely enough made almost no effort to gain a deeper understanding of the souls of these Indians, despite the fact that they lived with them for decades. A small residual group of survivors was already on the brink of the grave into which a once populous tribe had by now disappeared, when as yet no full account of their /1032/ spiritual endowment had been offered by reliable research and preserved for the history of humanity. Hence I chose to make it my most important task to rescue these treasures at the eleventh hour. No less a person than W. Schmidt (d):879 declares "that, as far as the spiritual culture of the Fuegians is concerned, [my] four expeditions alone surpass in quantity as well as quality of achievements all the work of the previous authors put together."

121 A number of favorable circumstances helped me in this work, and these will have to be mentioned in the proper place. In spite of decades of contact with a great many features of European culture, the Fuegians have retained the total content of their spiritual heritage, not only practically intact, but also in its pristine state. This shows that it was vital and irreplaceable for them, and that after it was lost the undisturbed continuance of the people as a whole was impossible. The Yamana themselves know what it was that held them together and what was guaranteed them by orderly, peaceable conditions of life; they called it simply "that which was handed down to us by our forefathers in the way of habits and customs." They were also sensitively aware that their doom would be sealed the moment they deviated from it or were prevented by outside influences from carrying on their tribal life according to the previous patterns.

114 I remained aware of my serious responsibility while undertaking
123 the four expeditions into the Cape Horn region, and I ceaselessly tried to feel my way into the strange conceptual world of the Yamana. This required time and in this I was helped by the long free months away from Tierra del Fuego between the four separate

114 expeditions. My repeated return, on the other hand, properly
123 strengthened the Indians in their belief that I esteemed them and their various institutions highly. That is why they proved more accommodating and more trusting from one year to the next and were more willing to let me take part in one thing or another from which they had previously excluded me. The more I tried to rid myself of the European way of thinking and acquired values and to exchange them for those of the Fuegians, the more advance I made in learning their subjective qualities. The hoary connoisseurs of tribal tradition felt this approach very definitely and with great satisfaction, regarded me more and more as one of themselves, and finally let me penetrate into the immeasurable depths of the inner spirit of their tribe. After arduous research and by means of constant observation and thorough discussion, those treasures from the spiritual heritage of the much misunderstood Yamana which fill the following pages were brought to light. They are all the more valuable because they reach back into the early age of mankind from which they have been preserved down to our own day because of the complete isolation of the feared Cape Horn Archipelago at the southern tip of America.

/1033/ A. Religion and Morality

771 Because of their nomadic way of life the Yamana do not present the compact unity enjoyed, for example, by an agricultural society. It is probably for this reason that they have cultivated a high level of mental flexibility and that they show alertness in all spheres of their human endeavors. Hence it was possible for definite, universally binding forms to develop only to a limited extent, since, on the one hand, the numerically scant population lives scattered in many, small fragmentary groups and, on the other hand, each of these groups, as well as the single individual, strives to preserve for itself the greatest possible freedom and independence.

Even more striking is the scarcity of definite forms expressing their religious conceptions. As such, these are very limited, and people like our Fuegians do not parade them. Quite the contrary, everything supernatural is regarded by them with such seriousness and piety that they do not make it the subject of long, penetrating

111 discussions even among themselves. Even less would they expose it in front of Europeans who, from the start, prove unworthy of it. This circumstance alone sufficiently explains why many travelers have learned absolutely nothing about the religious conceptions of our Indians. Moreover, they carry on their religious practices not only irregularly, but quite inconspicuously; hence, an outside student does not clearly understand and correctly evaluate the things that he might see or hear. I myself was obliged to take a roundabout course and to wait a long time for the favorable circumstances provided by chance or luck before entrance into the world of the religious conceptions of our Fuegians was opened to me.

Although their store of religious ideas and all of their moral precepts are very simple and straightforward, their import is surprisingly rich and deep. Their more important details seem humanly natural and impress one favorably. Distorted images and perversions which are found in the religious heritage and rites of many other primitive peoples, as well as among some civilized peoples, are totally lacking among our Yamana.

a. Investigations of the Yamana Religion

The imaginative world of our Fuegians is animated by many spirits which are differently rated and whose relationship to human beings is by no means uniform. Just as the Indian himself keeps them clearly separate, so must they be regarded in a careful description. The religious element in the strict sense of the word occupies an area by itself and it is difficult to define in relation to other conceptual areas. In this book the religious concept or the religion of the Yamana /1034/ includes everything concerned with the appreciation and veneration of their particular deity, a Supreme Being, who has several names and who is definitely contrasted with them as a supra mundane, spiritual personality. Everything that is involved with their knowledge of this Supreme Being must be regarded as a religious activity and worship, whether it be ceremonial services, prayer formulas, or spontaneous words. The sum total constitutes their true religious heritage. Most 111 closely associated with it is the entire store of rules and regulations which can be described, in a word, as their universal moral law, which really involves moral responsibility. In this abstract limitation of religion there is no place in the religious sphere for the belief in other spirits, in souls living after death, in ancestors and culture-bearers; hence these beliefs will be discussed in separate sections. This sharp distinction, which is based on the different ideas and conceptions of the Yamana, is primary in giving an outsider clear insight and reliable judgment.

111 It must be surprising to learn that until the most recent 114 times travelers and missionaries have categorically denied that our Fuegians have any religious ideas and practices. Some Europeans did not even credit them with the necessary mental capacity. Hence the Yamana were universally regarded as irreligious. Occasionally there were references to a belief in spirits and certain supernatural beings, but, besides being extremely inadequate and inaccurate, they do not even pertain to the realm of the strictly religious. It was not until my journeys that this ideological heritage, which deserves consideration because of its richness and its characteristic value, was uncovered.

No other aspect of the cultural heritage of a people poses so many and such serious difficulties for European investigators as the religious. A definite method for its general evaluation can hardly be devised, but one who strives for any kind of success may not deviate from certain guide lines. Those navigators who had only fleeting contact for brief hours with individual Fuegians were obviously incapable of grasping anything tangible about the natives' religious heritage, for, as has been said, the Yamana certainly do not parade their faith.

It surprises everyone who reviews the situation, and justifiably so, that this field was not opened up even to the missionaries, in spite of decades of association with the Indians (1). Although the

1. Even Tylor, Anfänge der Cultur /Beginnings of Culture/, Vol. I, p. 411, acknowledged: "There is no people without a language and without religion, for even if individual peoples maintain that they have no religious concepts, it is to be suspected that they conceal their thoughts, especially since the missionaries are not always able to gain the confidence of savages or to understand their views."

missionaries tried to approach them, they did not take the right /1035/ course (2). It is a well known fact that, since the estab-

Despard (b):746 very early speaks of his efforts: "We used our increasing knowledge of the language, to ascertain their ideas on religious subjects, and we discovered that they have no knowledge whatever of God, or of a First Cause in creation, no idol or other object of worship, no custom of prayer or incantation" /cited in English/.

lishment of the Protestant mission, travelers in the Beagle Channel region have not only relied on the opinions of the missionaries living there for their judgment of the Yamana, but have almost imperceptibly adopted this opinion as their own, the foremost example being the members of the Mission Scientifique, whose publications have served others, in turn, as their only source. Individual efforts to grasp the religious ideology of the Yamana were only occasionally made by this or that traveler. If one examines their procedures more closely, he will realize why their efforts remained fruitless. For example, Spegazzini (a):191 declares: "I have asked the oldest people if they know where they came from and who their ancestors were; they looked at me in wonder, and answered that the grandfather had died in a neighboring bay, like their father, and that they had never said anything on the subject. Religious ideas, too, are completely lacking, and the sole belief is one about the spirits of the dead, but it is neither very nighly developed nor very definite" /translated from Spanish/. Even Hyades (f):587 realized that the goal would not be reached by direct questioning (3). Although he personally did

3. He clearly confesses: "I need not say that direct questions addressed to the Fuegian savages are useless for any light on the question of a special cult among their people. Similarly, they will never spontaneously make any disclosures on this matter" /translated from French/.

not notice any kind of religious activity, he had the right idea when he warned that on the strength of this alone one should not conclude that they were entirely without religion (4). His well

4. He (b):1346 says: "We have never seen evidence of any kind of cult; we have no clear proof of a belief in a future life. It might be beneficial to remark that these negative signs do not constitute positive proof of the absence of all religious feeling" /translated from French/.

considered words were completely ignored by others, which is precisely why there was a constant repetition of thoughtless statements about the lack of anything religious among the Fuegians. Adding up these voices does not in itself increase their credibility, for they all more or less go back to a single source, namely, the view of the English missionary Thomas Bridges (p. 144 /untranslated/) which has proved to be erroneous.

1. Opinions of Travelers

As may be expected, the navigators of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, in other words, of the older period, dismissed the religious views of the Yamana with a few superficial words. They were /1036/ unable to communicate with them even by means of elementary signs, let alone by speech. There are no visible portrayals of religious faith, any more than there are conspicuous rites. How, therefore, could these Europeans who had almost no preparatory training for such difficult observations learn anything about the strictly guarded treasure of spiritual possessions!

Weddel made a first attempt, which was seriously meant, but very inappropriate, when he "read them a chapter out of the

111 Bible." He himself was not surprised that the Fuegians "did not seem 114 to understand" him (p. 70 /untranslated/). Captain Fitz-Roy (a):
179 was not able to determine definitely whether they believe in any kind of divine being: "Ideas of a spiritual existence, of beneficent and evil powers, they certainly have; but I never witnessed or heard of any act of a decidedly religious nature, neither could I satisfy myself of their having any idea of the immortality of the soul" /cited in English/. Wisely, he abstained from further opinions. The reports that Darwin sent out into the wide world about their spiritual life were very nearly disastrous for our Indians. We shall repeat here only a few sentences from (f):I, 123: "The belief in spiritual forces will easily lead to the belief in the existence of a god or of several gods, for savages will naturally attribute to spirits the same passions, the same lust for revenge or the simplest form of justice, and the same affection which they have experienced within themselves. In this respect the Fuegians seem to be in a middle state...And yet we could never find that the Fuegians believed in what we would call a god or that they carried out any kind of religious practices. Jemmy Button stoutly maintained, with justifiable pride, that there is no devil in his country, and this assertion is all the more strange since, among savages, the belief in evil spirits is more common by far than the belief in good ones..." Briefly and precisely he also assures us: "We have no reason to assume that they practice any kind of religious service" (p. 102 /untranslated/). He and Fitz-Roy refer to the same informants, namely, the three young Fuegians who were brought back to England in 1830 on the "Beagle" (p. 88 /untranslated/). They cannot be regarded as reliable because of the contradictions and inaccuracies contained in their statements (5).

5. For example, Darwin (d):245 relies on Jemmy Button in his assertion "that in winter when they are tormented by hunger they would rather kill and devour their old women than slaughter their dogs" (pp. 102, 235 /both in untranslated portion/). As for Button's companions, Darwin (d):246 also asserts: "The nearest approach to a religious feeling that became known to me was shown by York Minster, who, when Mr. Bynoe shot a few very young ducks as specimens, declared in the most solemn manner: 'oh! Mr. Bynoe, much rain, much snow, much blowing.' This was evidently meant as punishment in retaliation for devastation by human beings."

While these three young Fuegians were in London in 1830 they were carefully examined. In the "Phrenological Remarks" given in FitzRoy (b):148, "strong feelings for a Supreme Being" /cited in English/ are set forth. These few words are to me no proof for the definite and clear form of belief in a deity which our Yamana actually have. Compare Koppers, in Anthropos, Vol. 22, p. 286; 1927.

Nevertheless, from all sides Darwin's assertions have /1037/ received full credence and the opinions of subsequent decades continued to refer to him, although toward the end of his life he changed his opinion in favor of the Fuegians (p. 106 /untranslated/). On the other hand, Roskoff:49 did not take a stand until rather late when he briefly corrected Darwin as follows: "But this does not deny the Fuegians any trace of religion, even though it cannot be surprising that the Englishman does not find among them his own belief in a God."

A few decades after the second trip of the "Beagle," that is to say, in more recent times, English missionaries began their [197] activity on the Cape Horn Archipelago, and after that the number of European visitors to that region increased. They all, practically without exception, sought help from the missionaries, or at least had temporary contact with them. This is true first of Bove and his companions who crossed Tierra del Fuego in 1882 and 1884 and stayed for a while in Ushuaia with the missionaries there (p. 148 /untranslated/). Relying on their reports, he (g):236 first of all judges: "The Fuegians are not very superstitious and they have only very rudimentary religious beliefs" /translated from Italian/. He also (d):297 and (e):159 asserts: "They have a good and an evil deity, but the one is neither more nor less esteemed than the other. Cungi, the devil, sometimes avenges himself, however, with storm, snow, and rain. The rainbow is a sign of his anger; the women and children are afraid of its appearance, but the men scold and spit at it" (8). There is some value in repeating a number of false statements; they clearly show how cautious one must be about accepting other reports by this same authority. Accordingly, it is not surprising to find his companion Lovisato (b):149 maintaining in similar tones: "They do not have any notion of God, hence no religion and no amulets of any kind" /translated from Italian/. Spegazzini (z):171 also traveled there at the same time (p.147 /untranslated/). Of the Yamana he says only: "Religious ideas are completely lacking, and the sole belief is one about the spirits of the dead, but it is neither very highly developed nor very definite" /translated from Spanish/.

The members of the Mission Scientifique who, in their own opinions, were almost completely independent of the English missionaries, touched but lightly on the subject of religion for that very reason. They did not succeed in making successful observations of their own. Hyades (g):38 declares: "The French were unable to discover a trace of religious ideas among the Fuegians; as we know, the missionaries did not fare any better." Nevertheless, a number of indications made him (f):587 cautious in his judgment: /1038/ "All we can say about the religious feeling of the Fuegian savages is that it is limited, externally at least, to a hint of attention and feigned contemplation in the presence of a strange religious ceremony. Let us add that the Reverend T. Bridges positively told me that before his apostolate in Tierra del Fuego the Fuegians had no idea whatever of religion" /translated from French/. In his principal work he (q):253 repeats this view: "We have not verified any sign of religious feeling among the Fuegians..." /translated from French/. He is well aware of the grave import of his words, yet he persists in his 111 114 conviction: "We do not believe that we can modify our opinion about the absence of religious feeling among the Fuegians. We observed them very attentively from this point of view during the year that we spent among them; we were never able to perceive the slightest hint of any kind of cult or religious idea" /translated from French/.

One has the impression that, in view of such definite statements, there could be absolutely no contradiction (7). Even later, > 7. Martial:212 takes into account the serious difficulties of the investigation being discussed, as a result of which, he says, it would not be easy "to obtain readily a clear idea of their beliefs about the deity and a future life" /translated from French/.

Dabbene (b):202, for example, maintains: "There is no knowledge that a religion exists among the Yahgan, since they practice no rite that reveals any cult whatsoever" /translated from Spanish/. According to Spears:70, "they knew nothing of God, and had no word expressive of such an idea" /cited in English/. Furlong (b): 137 agrees. The Fuegian "has no religion in the general acceptance of the term...No word for God, Creator, or pray has ever appeared in his language, nor from any action, ceremony, or custom can a belief in these things be inferred" /cited in English/. Lothrop (b):171, however, already had access to some of my conclusions which he took into account. Thus, more recent research also comes to the opinion that the Yamana are without any kind of religion. Compare the data that Cooper:148 assembled.

2. Opinions of Missionaries

111 114 797 Although the men who put themselves at the service of the Fuegians through their mission work are only now being heard, this does not change the well-proved fact that they were the ones who told ignorant navigators and travelers of their own experiences and observations. They were obliged, for professional reasons, so to speak, to investigate the religious ideas of their wards.

At the beginning of their activity they occasionally mention -- as did one or another navigator, for example, Parker Snow:1, 337 -- that during a brief religious service the Fueglans who happened to be present were silent and reverent. To me this is no proof of their own religious feeling, for such an attitude is not unusual among them. Despard wrote on October 4, /1038/ 1859 (VP:VII, 51;1860), as follows: "No word has appeared for God, or Creator, or pray. They have a word for Spirit Cashpeak, and they are very uneasy at hearing it, for they say they shall see it if named" /cited in English/. He (h):696 contradicts himself, however, in the sentence: "The Firelander has no religion at all. He knows neither God, nor idol, nor spirit, and has accordingly no word for either of these" /cited in English/. Stirling, on the other hand, nowhere expresses himself definitely about the religious ideas of the Yamana.

The position of the much-quoted Bridges on this question deserves all the more consideration inasmuch as most of the travelers in Tierra del Fuego during the last decades have adopted his opinion. In 1866 he (a):181 first published a general survey of the living conditions, institutions, and customs of the Yamana. He also devoted a few lines to their conceptions of supernatural things and so-called spirits. He disposes of the religious in the true sense with a single sentence and merely says: "They have no knowledge of God, no thoughts of a future state, either of reward or punishment" /cited in English/. Strangely enough, Bridges did not deviate from this first opinion even after decades of association with the Yamana and often repeated it, word for word. For example, he (b):207 says: "They do not acknowledge a creator and neither have any idea of the future nor expect anything after death" /translated from Spanish/. Moreover, he (k):227 says again: "They lacked any idea of a Supreme Being, although they believed in the existence of spirits or souls... They offer no sacrifices nor have any idea of atonement for sin" /translated from Spanish/. Finally the unequivocal opinion (e):332 follows: "As for religion, we can say that they had none." If occasionally an Indian showed signs of religious feeling, Bridges put it down solely to the success of missionary influence (8).

8. Once a lame man said to him "that God struck him. It is pleasant to realize that the

knowledge of God is taking root in the minds of the people, and that they themselves attribute to Him the acts of his providence" /cited in English/ (MSS.X, 10,1878).

His co-workers in particular echoed him in this assumption, especially the younger men. The last two of them, John Lawrence and John Williams, emphatically assured me, independently of each other, that they had never come across religious expressions among the Indians which were their own. Each of these missionaries took the view of the other without examining it and blithely adhered to this conviction. Aspinall 270 noted it once more: The Tamana "devoid of all religious ideas and duties, know nothing except the vague concept of spirits of the dead which go about in the forests and which they fear."

Thus, like the Europeans who visited the Cape Horn region, all the missionaries labored under the false impression that the Tamana are completely irreligious. Every unprejudiced critic will realize that they did not come closer to the facts because of their negative attitude toward the /1040/ Indians. Elsewhere (p. 302 /unpublished/) it was proved in detail that Bridges especially had no desire whatever for a calm and just evaluation of the store of ideas of the Indians; in fact, faced with his ill-humor, they carefully and purposely concealed what was dear to them and what he would have defamed with his disdainful, disparaging remarks. After I personally had learned many of the prayer formulas with which they address themselves to their deity, I freely expressed my pleasure. More than once on such occasions Molly Lawrence would add: "We never told Thomas Bridges these beautiful things, for he would have been scornful and ridiculed us!" At the end of my fourth journey I again presented to the worthy Reverend John Lawrence a short summary of what I had learned about the religious heritage of the Tamana. This time, too, as on my third visit, he was sincerely pleased, for it meant that shortly before the end of his life he was permitted to see corrected a false opinion of the Tamana, to which the missionaries had also contributed.

D. My Own Conclusions

It was anything but encouraging at the start of my journeys to be faced with the strange fact that all the visitors to Tierra del Fuego, as well as all the missionaries without exception, denied with emphatic, unequivocal words that our Indians had any kind of religious view and practice. Everyone regarded the Yamana as irreligious. On my first and second visit, therefore, I consciously avoided touching upon this subject in my conversation with the members of the Lawrence family and in my contact with the Indians. Besides, there were other, more immediate problems which first had to be solved.

The traveling investigator must be favored by fortune, otherwise his efforts are in vain. I obtained the first indications of the religious ideas of the Yamana quite incidentally and without my doing anything. One evening on my second journey I was again sitting with a group of several men who were explaining to me the ancient traditions of their tribe. It was then that I learned for the first time about their myth of a great flood which, in history or myth, had inundated their present homeland. All of us who had listened with obvious seriousness to the old storyteller were silent for some time and thought about the catastrophe of that flood. Afterward one or two men made some dour explanatory remarks. I now bravely ventured to ask:"Whence came that big flood?" Everyone present immediately became quiet and a painful silence followed. Embarrassed, they lowered their eyes and avoided my gaze so that they would not be forced to answer me. I repeated my question and in a friendly way asked for the desired explanation. Old Alfredo who had done the talking that evening replied /1341/ emphatically: "Lawaxlaga sent that tremendous flood." When he did not add anything more, I asked: "Is Lawaxlaga really so mighty?" Alfredo replied: "As a matter of fact it was strong Wenaxlagen who sent the general flood. Lawaxlaga persuaded upon him to do it; it was her intention to demolish the whole world. With Wenaxlagen she succeeded in having the great flood come!" Naively I asked again: "Who is this Wenaxlagen?" This very obviously increased the general embarrassment and everyone present maintained strict silence. I felt as though I had been guilty of an impropriety or had ventured on dangerous ground.

124 After a good long time and probably also in order to break the general silence, Chris boldly said: "Wanaginiwa is [similar to] 113 what God is to Christians [Europeans]." His brief words were 116 spoken in a tone which made it clear to me that further questions would not be in order. The attitude of all the men was clearly aloof. Some of them had an expression suggesting that in this discussion some information had heedlessly slipped out which should have remained secret. After that the men timidly exchanged a few words and the gathering soon broke up.

On the next evening I dared not ask about Wanaginiwa again. I suspected that the people would misunderstand. It was partly caution and partly disappointment that made me think the missionaries had told them indeed the Biblical account of the flood, but that they had not completely understood it. Hence I entered the following remark in my diary: "Probably Christian influence by the missionaries" and marked the whole paragraph with a question mark.

123 A week later the secret gathering of the Yahgan began, in 116 which I was able to participate in March, 1920 (p. 176 /unexamined/). At that time I was treated as strictly as the Indian girls and was not allowed to ask questions or to take notes. I remember clearly that at this initiation the names Wanaginiwa and Hiuliagan were repeatedly used, but I was fully aware of what they meant only two years later when those names were again recalled to my memory. Although I did not grasp the fact on that occasion, I had actually discovered the Supreme Being whom the Yamana worship. I had finally come close to their religious faith.

123 On my third visit at the end of January, 1922, the men were not yet free for the planned Yahgan celebration (p. 184 /unexamined/). In order to spend the time profitably, W. Koppert, who accompanied me at that time (p. 101 /unexamined/), and I did a good deal of research during the day with the Indian women. Nelly Lawrence was regularly and gladly present and thanks to her personal mimeisation the women willingly answered our questions. We all wanted to be undisturbed, and so we assembled daily in the shed, a special corrugated tin house in which the /1042/ Lawrence family had major housework performed, laundry, for example. This house stood apart from the small dwellings of the Yamana families.

124 776 Again one day old traditions were discussed, and the name Watauinēiwa was directly mentioned. Full of suspense we pressed for a further explanation. This caused great embarrassment among the women and there was deep silence; not even the otherwise brave Nelly ventured a word. Finally, in order to ease the constraint, old Mary summoned up her courage and said briefly: "Watauinēiwa is like God, like Christian God /cited in English/!" I was nonplused and again faced the same barrier that I had experienced two years before, apparently on the threshold of a new world of ideas to which the Indians refused admittance. Importunate questions on that afternoon would have been futile and would surely have evoked ill humor. Mary only disclosed that upon the death of an own child or a near relative, the neighbors point to [761] the mourner with the expression: "Watauinēiwa is punishing him!" This means that the deceased and his family have been punished by Watauinēiwa through this death.

After a long pause the Indian women attempted a digression. I could not accept this and ventured cautiously to come back to that anxiously guarded name. My efforts remained unsuccessful. The whole conversation flagged and our discussion simply could not get started again. In order to satisfy us and put us off once and for all, the women finally started to tell about ēkētēmakalowatauinēiwa. How craftily they had chosen this way out of their embarrassment! We surrendered our hope of finally finding out more about the real Watauinēiwa. Actually they only offered us the [713] story of the small band of people who, in olden times, had set out for ēkētēmaka, where there was stranded whale, and afterwards they remained in that region west of Ushuaia. In this combination the designation watauinēiwa has nothing to do with the name for the Fuegian deity. The crafty Indian women in this way slipped out of the trap and very smartly duped us without betraying their secret. In any case it was now clear that all kinds of things worth knowing were concealed behind that name, and to discover them would probably justify serious effort.

Several times Nelly Lawrence had willingly helped me obtain information I sought in my research on the institutions and customs of her countrymen, and this time, too, she did not fail me. As I definitely learned later, she valued the native heritage of religious ideas extraordinarily highly, and inasmuch as she assumed that I was of the same mind, she worked toward making it accessible to me. Three days after the discussion described above, on Wednesday, January 25, 1922, /1043/ she again invited us to the large workshed, with the enticing prospect: "Today Adelheid and I shall tell you everything about Watauinéiwa!" Nelly explained candidly why these two women were the only ones who came: "Watauinéiwa has punished neither of us, he has not let a single one of our children die, so we are not ashamed to have him mentioned in our presence. We may freely speak of him [in front of others also]. The other women, however, whose children he took away [through death which he caused], feel that they have been punished by him; they find it unpleasant if he [Watauinéiwa] is mentioned in their presence!" These very significant words contain a complete explanation of the strange behavior of the people when I asked about Watauinéiwa (9).

9. It is conceivable that this also explains the Yamana's cautious silence in the presence of earlier travelers. Some of them probably noticed this, for example, even Darwin (p. 102 /untranslated/); they were not aware of the ultimate and most profound reason, however.

Whenever I had questioned them, there were always a few persons present in their circle who were obliged to lament the loss of a close relative. It would have been the equivalent of pillorying them if the others present had spoken in detail about Watauinéiwa in my presence. Considerately, Nelly came only with Adelheid, for these two could describe Watauinéiwa, what he is and how he acts, freely and without embarrassment. On that Wednesday we learned most of the names which are given him, as well as a few definite prayers directed toward him.

Obviously, that discussion did not exhaust the subject and bring to light all that the Yamana carry within their hearts in the way of ideas about their Supreme Being. I realized that the rest could be obtained only through a wise procedure, and our course lay outlined in the explanation that Nelly had just given us. After that the other people probably learned that we were familiar with their conceptions of the person and actions of Watauinéiwa. When 124 Being on suitable occasions, I did it very considerately and with sympathetic understanding for the depressed feeling of a person who is reminded of one or several deceased persons who were dear to him whenever the name of Watauinéiwa is mentioned. This gentle manner, which was shown intentionally to avoid hurting anyone, was not only comforting to all the Yamana, but steadily diminished their aversion to brief discussions about that feared spirit. In the course of time the discussions gradually became more open and free, and finally, despite a respectful attitude, were almost completely without restraint. Our own attitude toward the ideas sacred to them also helped; we neither criticized nor made fun of them; rather, we valued them highly and treated them with the same respect that they themselves showed. /1044/ Even earlier I had repeatedly heard their comparison: "Christians speak scornfully of their god, revile him and even reject him. No Yamana speaks of our Watauinéiwa in this way!" It was obviously consoling to them that we, too, showed veneration toward him. Some of the Fuegians, however, continued to be reticent whenever Watauinéiwa was mentioned. Although this was always done with genteel reserve, nevertheless it seemed incredible to many of them that something which they themselves revere as sacred could be the same to us.

776 I subsequently directed the conversation toward their Supreme

On that third journey I was permitted to experience the youth initiation a second time (p. 185 /untranslated/), where I heard new references to Watauinéiwa, which were in accordance with the ancient program for the čiéxaus (p.759). Finally on my fourth visit (p. 190 /untranslated/) I was offered an extraordinarily valuable addition to what I had previously learned with regard to a ceremony for the dead. Thus, several times, through none of my doing and quite suddenly, I came upon religious utterances of the Yamana. It was primarily for this that I sought uninterrupted and open discussions with all the older people. By doing so, I could bring to light what I have put together in the following pages. I know of no reason why they should have concealed anything from me.

114 There is no longer any lack of convincing explanations as to why these Fuegians have so anxiously guarded their heritage of 114 religious ideas and practices from every stranger since their contact with European culture and why they entrusted me alone with this precious heritage, albeit under very special considerations. I must say that the same is true of my participation on two occasions in their secret youth initiation, čiéxaus, as well as my direct experience of the men's ceremony, kina, and the school for medicine men, lójma-yékamuš. In their opinion I proved myself worthy of this extraordinary favor.

b. Content of the Yamana Religion

771 It is not a serious injustice to the Fuegians if, from the start,
128 one expects no systematic organization of their religious ideas, which do not form a complete, compact, interlocked chain of thought; in fact, wide gaps are sometimes apparent. Individual ideas are juxtaposed loosely and without connection. Although the Fuegian has these ideas, he does not bother to understand them completely, and also he does not seem to feel the need of having them arranged into a coherent whole. A summary and arrangement of what is presented here as the religious heritage of the Yamana would be entirely foreign to him. I have personally undertaken it in order to present a survey and to make possible a scientific evaluation.

776 On the preceding pages Watauinéiwa, the /1045/ sole deity of the Yamana in the more limited sense of the word "religion" (p. 949), has been designated as a "Supreme Being" (10). Although the Fuegian does not have this conception, he in fact knows no other spirit superior to Watauinéiwa. The latter is also the only one accorded a unique power and a superior position, whereby he stands far apart from every other being. Finally, his relationships to human beings are those of an absolute master and sole lawgiver; one renders religious homage to him alone. It is only in this sense that Watauinéiwa is called a deity, as is customary in theology generally.

10. For the same reasons I previously likewise referred to the deity worshipped by the Selk'nam as a "Supreme Being" (Vol. I, 496).

1. Personality of the Supreme Being

716 The thinking of the Fuegians is inclined (if one may express it thus) toward concreteness. Their conceptions have definite forms and clear outlines. Their Watauinéiwa especially is a sharply delineated, independent person standing by himself and far removed from every other spirit. For the Yamana he is not a completely formless creation of thought, but an individual spirit-being with an autonomous form and an independent manner of existence. He is never referred to with a universal, generic designation, but only a proper name or, in its place, a clear, conventional circumlocution. The characteristics attributed to him are evident in part from these names, but even more from the prayer formulas (11). He makes himself clearly felt as an altogether independent personality, in particular by his intervention in many ways in the life and existence of the individual, as well as in the destiny of the whole group.

11. Most of this has already been published by Koppers (e):12 and Schmidt (d):927.

a. His Name

Some of my informants were familiar to a certain extent with the meaning of the words "Dios" and "God" as they are used by the Whites. They never used them directly to refer to their Watauinéiwa, but always used the customary names, of which there are several. They are not proper names in the strict sense, of the type, for example, given each Yamana; rather, they are words with an emphatic meaning and of greatest import, which, as such, are applied exclusively to this deity. In this respect our Indians differ from the Selk'nam who use an actual personal name, Temáukel (Vol. I, 497).

Often they use Watauinéiwa in the sense of "the very ancient one," that is, the /1046/ unique very ancient one who, in permanence of being, surpasses every other old one. Sometimes this word 776 is also applied to the ancestors of antiquity, the first arrivals, the places which they settled in those times and which today are already fossilized. In this case its meaning is, of course, limited, for there is only one, namely, the Supreme Being, who is properly and truly the very ancient one. BD:632 also gives the word wātauīnaiwa, "the ancient one who changes not. A suitable term for God indicative of his eternity and unchangeableness" /cited in English/. Bridges here gives the basic meaning. The accompanying explanation confirms the occasional use to which this word is put in referring to ancestors: "This term was used specially of [82] the Rainbow which coming ever and anon was regarded as ever living and the author of death [?]. Used also of Heroes of old time" /cited in English/. In connection with this the Yamana form the word Watauinēiwa-sēf, "the very ancient one in heaven." BD:379 gives sēif instead of sēf, "the (blue) sky" /cited in English/; also Watauinēiwa-aizāku, "the very ancient one and the one of boundless strength." In BD:10 one finds aizŏka, "immense, huge, very large" /cited in English/. Tānuwa has the same meaning, according to BD:421, "(My) father, my old man (fam.)" /cited in English/, which is something like /in German/ "mein lieber, guter Alter."

The Yamana no less frequently use Hidābuan or Hitapūan [601] as "my father" and Hāu īmun, "my father" or, by shifting the possessive prefix hi, also haianānin īmun, "our father." Occasionally Hāua ūšu, "my grandfather" and Kalaiēxēn, "dear little old father," are also used.

The following names are also to be interpreted in such a way that their unique meaning, applied to the deity, is raised to the highest degree of intensity. Abailākin, "the strong, the mighty." BD:14 gives abāila, "strong, physically strong, firm, powerful" /cited in English/. The combination hāim hūlu Abailākin stands for a particularly great intensification. The first two words can also be repeated, which gives the greatest possible emphasis. This construction, however, is used exclusively for Watauinēiwa. According to BD:261 hāim means "in a great degree, very exceedingly" /cited in English/. The Yamana also use the construction Abāila-Watauinēiwa and Abāila-sēf.

776 Manunākin is popular, as is Manauanākin, in the sense of "the sole mighty one." BD:285 gives these words in the combination manūnāki hauan, "this is valued" /cited in English/; it has the same root as auwēn, according to BD:65 auwōn, "true, sincere, in earnest, in truth" /cited in English/, and auwōnāki, "the good one" /cited in English/.

Only once was Tumūučikānaku used, "he who makes others angry and infuriates them." These words are also used by the Yamana in ordinary speech. Compare in BD:519 the expression tūmūučikāna, "cause, permit any person to učikana (BD:112), to annoy, trouble, vex by demands, requests, entreaties, etc." /cited in English/.

[761] On the occasion of a death and at a public funeral, Wēlapatux-sēf, "the murderer up in heaven," is often used and always with strong emotion. BD:619 clearly states "wōlāpatux, cruel, murderous; acting in a manner braving danger in a reckless manner as though one could not be hurt or as one was like hard stone and invulnerable" /cited in English/.

/1047/ Finally one also finds in BD:629 "wāgunāki, the upper or higher one, the one above, the highest one; a term for God as 'the Highest'" /cited in English/. I did not come across this word and Bridges does not give an explanation for it anywhere. A definite contradiction should be pointed out, however. In his dictionary he lists an expression for "God" and yet for decades he denied that the Yamana had any kind of religious conception.

The above terms for the Supreme Being are variously used, depending on the given situation, but never thoughtlessly and always with conscious reference to this deity. The expressions always show more or less veneration for the deity, except for the names which the poor human being angrily uses to relieve his soul concerning his own impotence in relation to him.

195 776 Often, though not to the same extent as the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 497), our Indians use circumlocutions in place of the designations just listed. On the basis of the position occupied by Watauinēiwa in visible creation, according to their belief, they more or less consciously connect striking events and important happenings with him as the true creator and ultimate cause. They say briefly: "This comes from above!" and use the particle kūp

195 or kūpa. Compare BD:210, 211. This replaces the name, but 776 is clear to everyone who hears it. Calderon and other men regard this substitution as "palabra política," as a wisely calculated way of speaking, outwardly mild but actually perfectly clear and full of meaning, somewhat like a key symbol in cryptography. Out of respect they avoid addressing the Supreme Being with the customary names as much as possible. Moreover, they do not wish to [765] hurt openly a person who is in mourning and who, if one of the customary designations were used, would be publicly shamed or reminded of the fact that the death just mentioned was sent as a punishment by Watauinéiwa. The nature of the conversation and the particular circumstances of an utterance safely prevent a misunderstanding of the circumlocution on the part of the persons present.

β. His Characteristics

776 The above names and the prayer formulas familiar to the Yamana both contribute their share to form a complete picture of the Supreme Being's uniqueness as it lives in the soul of these Fuegians. At first glance we recognize Watauinéiwa as an independent personality who is clearly distinguished from other beings of all kinds and, far removed from them, is completely independent. Watauinéiwa is a being apart; his whole nature is different from that of the other spirit-beings and even more from that of all human beings.

/1048/ We have already referred to his spirituality. For the concept "spirit" the Yamana use késpix. To them Watauinéiwa is the very great késpix who is properly, and more than other spirit-beings, a spirit in the real sense of the word. As such he is invisible and thus cannot be seen by human eyes. Repeatedly someone flies into a rage because Watauinéiwa has caused the death of a near relative, and he would like to confront him directly, but as késpix that one is inaccessible to any human being. Since he is incorporeal, no one has a perceptual idea of his person. I was emphatically told: "He does not have the body which every Yamana has down here [on earth]; he also does not die, as each

776 of us will when his kēšpix́ leaves his body." There are no pictorial or material representations of his person.

His abode is always far away from the earth and, in the invariable phrase, "high up there" in space. "From this great distance and because of the air space intervening no Yamana can see him. No one knows what he looks like, for he is kēšpix́!" That is all they say about how and where he lives "up there," nor do they picture details in their own imaginations.

Nevertheless, Wataąinēiwa is close to every human being 776 through a sort of omnipresence attributed to him. This character-
626 istic is expressed more tangibly when he is described as omniscient, so to speak. "He sees everything. -- He knows what everyone is doing. -- He also observes how a person behaves in secret [unobserved by his countrymen]!" I often heard this and similar expressions. In the čiēxaąs Chris told me: "He looks down from up there and he punishes here on earth. So he is also on earth! He reaches and punishes every lazy and good-for-nothing human being" (p. 766). When this same Chris was an ušwāala in the čiēxaąs, his sponsor reminded him: "Heed all this advice faithfully. Wataąinēiwa wishes it; he watches carefully to see whether you will act accordingly" (p. 736). Every candidate is emphatically warned: "Watch out for Wataąinēiwa, never forget him!" The awareness that they are always being watched by him is not without effect on the personal conduct of our Indians.

In the last analysis, this conduct is likewise determined by him through the prevailing customs and traditional habits, in short, through the whole body of moral law, the authorship of which is attributed to him. The Fuegians say very simply and plainly: "Wataąinēiwa wants everyone to behave as has always been customary among us Yamana!" They link with this the conviction that in the beginning these laws were drawn up by him to serve as guides for subsequent generations. With his omniscience 776 he sees to it that they are rigorously observed and he avenges
626 serious transgressions. This type of activity on his part is /1049/
761 most often mentioned because of its perceptible effects. He is maligned as the "murderer up there in heaven," Wēlapatux-sēf, for he causes the untimely death of adults and immature children. He causes everyone to die; hence the persons themselves and their nearest relatives, even the entire group, are punished and hurt.

776 He proceeds ruthlessly; he does not desist even in the face of the 761 tenderest age or the bitterest grief and greatest sorrow of a mother.
626 He is truly a Tumŭučikánaku, and the more helpless the poor human being feels, the more passionately he moves against him.

In his weakness the Fuegian is at the mercy of that Abāilā́kin, that hā́im hū́lu Abāilā́kin, the unlimited mighty one who punishes when and however it pleases him, heedless of the pain and woe of human beings. He alone is lord over the life and death of all. He grants life and therewith the child enters independent existence. He lets everyone have life as long as it pleases him. He takes it away and man dies. By way of punishment he sends a serious ill-
[753] ness; he liberates a person from it, but only occasionally. He causes dying "of his own free will, and no influence by natural forces or magic power is capable of prevailing upon him. The dying one resigns himself to the progress of a serious illness without much complaining about his fate. The relatives and friends also yield submissively; they say: 'Watauinḗiwa is much mightier than we, no one can stand up against him. He will carry this one off, we must let it happen, we can only weep!'" (Gusinde [2]:161.)

[821] In the same manner he bestows good and bad weather. If he wants to chastise someone, he has him tormented by storm and 776 rain; if he favors someone, he will let him be accompanied by 626 sunshine. He brings success in hunting to the men and success in gathering to the women, but sometimes he also arranges that they both come back empty-handed. In the final analysis, he is the author of every bad and fatal accident. A person who is dealt a severe blow regards it as a personal punishment; whether he is uncomplainingly silent or noisily abusive, he must accept it as one who is utterly defenseless. The threats with which our Indians try to ease their oppressed hearts do not touch that Abā́ilā́kin in the least. He does not use physical force, but operates merely by willing something. The Yamana express themselves as follows. For example, a girl was admonished in the čiéxaus: "Begin your day's work early in the morning. Watauinḗiwa sees every lazybones. Watauinḗiwa will [as punishment] make you die soon [i.e., prematurely] if you are a lazy lie-abed!" They also say: "He will look at you, then it will soon be all over with you!" Sometimes they also warn: "The one up there is looking at you!" This means: He has designs on you, he has long intended to punish

776 you. Thus, as everyone knows /1050/ and must yield to without 626 defense: this Watauinéiwa-aizáku, the very ancient one and the one of boundless strength, "has at his disposal a power which all the Y amana together are unable to resist, especially not if he arbitrarily takes away our children." They are all convinced: "We must fear him and be on our guard against him!"

The visible world lies in the palm of his hand, "all things belong to him"; he is the lord and the owner of all creation. A Fuegian judges everything around him as Watauinéiwa-sirž, a very common expression. BD:379 translates sirž as: "tolls, goods, property, things in general" /cited in English/. There is a friendly feeling connected with this word formation; according to it every "thing" is a piece of property belonging to the deity (p. 866). Evidently this means living creatures, chiefly the large mammals and the birds. He granted the Yamana all of these for their use and benefit; hence they are a true gift of God to human beings. Everyone may use them, but only to the extent that he needs them for subsistence. To misuse them arbitrarily or to destroy them willfully would be to turn against the intentions of their owner and would evoke his vengeance. "He watches carefully to see that animals are not needlessly killed and that meat does not spoil," but is utilized! The Indians often and in all earnestness impressed these words upon me. Without exception they are punctilious about this rule; I never saw them heedlessly leaving a slain animal lying about.

776 Furthermore, the Fuegians, with unequivocal explanations, make it clear that their Watauinéiwa also holds the fate of men in his hands. It is well known that malevolent spirits and, above all, the yékamuš practice their baleful influence on individuals. The yékamus have enough power to cause someone to become ill. They may breed mischief, however, only to the extent and as long as Watauinéiwa permits it. Neither a spirit nor a yékamuš can harm a person against the will of the deity. If harm befalls one, he is really personally in favor of it, and he himself is ultimately responsible. If a yékamuš realizes that a serious illness has developed, against which his knowledge is of no avail, on his own initiative he delivers the sick person to Watauinéiwa as the only one left who can help, but since he is, after all, Manauanákin, everything

116 significant that happens goes back to him, at least as something he has permitted. He also directs the forces of nature with his own hand; the Yamana definitely express this in various ways. In this connection compare Gusinde (l):161.

116 Is this ancient one to whom, as sole owner, everything visible belongs also regarded as its ultimate cause, as its creator?
113 It seems to me that the Fuegians do not have a clear conception of creation (12). /1051/ They never discuss in so many words the > 12. I shall let Bridges (i):19 speak on this question although he cannot be regarded as authoritative: "They have no tradition of their origin; for them the world was always what it is, and ever will be the same. For them it had no maker or master and they had not the least idea of pleasing or displeasing anyone beyond themselves" /cited in English/.

work of creation out of absolute nothingness, nor do they definitely emphasize that Watauinéiwa existed before the actual creations did. Nevertheless, that actually is their view, and they also see in him the origin of all that was created. They do not clearly express these truths, but tacitly they recognize them, for example, when they say: "Watauinéiwa existed alone at first! Then he made all the animals, and it was there in Yáiaašága. All animals [therefore] belong to him." Apparently no one speculates about the exact origin of human beings and all the rest; they are content to describe Watauinéiwa as the unlimited master and true owner. In this way they recognize him more or less as the sole and ultimate cause of the existence of the visible world. Compare Gusinde (l): 160.

In March, 1923, I discussed this and similar ideas with old Mašemikens, and I asked him how human beings had originated. This time, too, he replied clearly and emphatically: "It is not the first time that I have been faced with this question. When I was a young man I learned the story of the many animals who were transformed back there in the great revolution at Yáiaašága. I

773 and the most experienced old men, how that took place. No one knew the answer as to how human beings actually originated and where they came from. So to this day I do not know. I have often and persistently searched and tried to answer this question. At that time Tā́ruwalĕm burned up the whole world and all the animals. And this I can't understand either, how afterwards everything was put in order again, how the huge fire was put out, and how he again restored plants and animals to this land. All this we do not know. In former years I often asked the experienced old people about this." A few days later, I sat in a circle of several old men, as was my custom, and quite spontaneously the conversation again drifted to these things. Richard repeated: "We really don't know exactly how everything came about at that time. Of course Watauinĕ̄iwa already existed in the very old days, for heaven was already here above the earth, there where the clouds are and where Watauinĕ́iwa also stays. Before Lĕ̄m [sun] and Hā́nuxa [moon] and Akā́inix [rainbow] wandered here on earth like human beings, Watauinĕ̄iwa was already here, for heaven existed before all of them. At that time women ruled. We do not know how and from where children came at that time, for none of the women who then ruled the men slept with their husbands and cohabited with them in order to conceive children. None of us can say where children came from in those days. It is only since the great /1052/ revolution that women are subordinate to the will of men. It was back in the time when the great fur seal
[825 tĕpĕ́ya (Arctocephalus australis) discovered how man and woman
842 should unite, she underneath and he on top of her; that gives them
833] pleasure. Since then they have done it that way to this day. When husband and wife unite in this way, then children follow. So we know where our children come from now. Where they came from before that, no one can explain. We know equally as little about where Lĕ̄m and Hanuxa and the stars come from, which at that time lived on earth just like human beings. When they [the ones mentioned] and sĕ̄f [heaven], too, were here, Watauinĕ́iwa was also here, and he was here even long before that." Thus, no Yamana can explain definitely and clearly how the visible world originated. Nevertheless it is noteworthy that a deeply thoughtful and meditative man like Mašemikens felt this gap and tried to fill it.

776 If one carefully examines the words of the men mentioned, he can obtain from them a conception of the everlasting existence of the Supreme Being, without temporal limits in either direction. Our Fuegians do not even discuss a cessation of the existence of this "Kespix-up-there," and of all his characteristics they are most familiar with the one meant by the oft-repeated designation Watauinéiwa. According to their conception, this "very ancient one" has simply always existed, and no one questions where he actually came from or what his origin is. One may also assume that, according to the belief of the Yamana, this "very ancient one" has always remained the same. Nowhere do they imply, much less state, that he has changed his personal attitude toward human beings or the laws imposed upon them. In sum, he has remained personally the same, hence unchanging. In the strict sense of the word, he does not in any case let himself be influenced by human beings. "We Yamana often complain bitterly, but he deals with us as he pleases!" Mary said. She had explained to me that in distress and in serious illness those who are directly or in-[782] directly affected turn to the Supreme Being, praying for deliverance. He takes cognizance, so to speak, of these prayers and sometimes proves well-intentioned, but he would by no means feel pressed or forced to change his absolutely free decision. The Yamana are clearly convinced of this.

Despite the decided arbitrariness with which Watauinéiwa now and then obviously interferes with the fate of individual human beings, he is generally regarded as benevolent and good. They like to address him as Hidárbuan, for he is truly a father to each one and to the Yamana as a whole. This designation most often occurs in the old traditional prayer formulas. With the happy conviction that he is concerned about everyone, and especially that he will provide each one with the animals necessary for his subsistence, the Yamana trust him and his providence. Many approach him with the naïve, childlike confidence with which, in /1053/ human relationships, a child confronts its good father. Although grievous blows sometimes make the individual lose his mental balance, in general "the conviction of the benevolence of the Supreme Being" (Gusinde [ℓ]:163) predominates. Hence they also venture to address him with the intimate Kalaiéxen, "dear little father" and the friendly Tánuwa, "the dear, good old man."

776 A complete picture of the Supreme Being as it exists in the imagination of the Yamana must show his absolutely independent position with regard to all the other spirits and human souls. In none of the many myths that I collected is he included in any way; in fact, there is a wide gap between him and all the mythological personalities and the so-called kĩna spirits. It has been shown on page 765 to what extent he is linked with the Tánuwa spirit in the ʒiẽxaus. He is not viewed as sharing the conditions of existence which the Yamana regard as vital, such as being married. On 776 one occasion, with studied carelessness, as though it were an 124 everyday matter, I asked a few people: "To whom, I wonder, is Wataninẽ́ʌwa married?" In response an expression appeared on their faces, showing what, in their view, a very stupid, gauche utterance deserves. Nelly Lawrence seemed disconcerted, and long seconds passed before she regained her composure after the impact of that strange question. This time, too, as in all her other statements, she wanted to be accurate, and she assured me innocently: "That is something I never heard about! I'll ask the old people whether they perhaps know something!" She was already fully convinced that anything like it was utterly unknown to the old people also; that is why she never came back to the subject. Soon afterward, when Chris alone was asked this question, he replied indignantly: "Who in the world maintained that!" Calming him, we explained: "As a matter of fact no one maintained anything like that; we just wanted to ask!" He then fell silent and showed pity for Europeans who confused themselves with such useless questions. The Yamana have no conception whatever of how Wataninẽ́ʌwa actually lives -- that is to say, his dwelling, food, weariness, sleep, etc. -- and they have nothing to say on the subject. They definitely know that he has a very unique manner of existence; this is enough for them and they have no desire to find out about details.

776 All the characteristics attributed to Wataninẽ́ʌwa add up to quite a richly endowed personality, despite the simplicity of the picture. He has a wholly independent position above all creation, as well as separate from other spirit-beings and from human beings. His intervention in the destinies of the inhabitants of the earth, and thus his activity in general, is revealed in the association

116 which the individual human being has with him and, above all, in the prayer formulas.

/1054/ 2. Religious Activity

116 All accounts clearly indicate that the Supreme Being of our 111 Yamana does not, like the chief personages in their myths, dwell far beyond the clouds, unconcerned with the events on earth. Quite the contrary, Watagin̄iwa truly and attentively follows the activities of the individual, often directing fate against the person's hopes and desires; indeed he is more active than is agreeable to many. Everyone knows him as an active, alert being. Thus, no one loses sight of him entirely; much less would anyone purposely and heedlessly ignore him altogether. It is true that some Indians are more eagerly concerned about him, more actively engrossed with his characteristics, and therefore think about him more often than do other fellow-tribesmen, but there is not a single Fuegian who is completely "godless." Without any effort on his part, everyone is often enough reminded of Watagin̄iwa by his relatives and neighbors and is included in their religious activity. For that very reason no one loses the religious customs as practiced and handed down by earlier generations. To what extent and how often each individual practices religion by himself cannot be determined precisely, nor can it be shown that women do more in this respect than men. As elsewhere, personal disposition and the influence of training in youth are decisive, as well as a person's immediate environment from early childhood.

a. General Practices

111 The amazing simplicity revealed in the Yamana way of life is, naturally, also apparent in the religious realm. Except for specific prayer formulas, their outward religious activity is remarkably limited. They have no actual portrayal of their Supreme Being or particular places reserved for his worship, nor do they have any kind of sacrifice. A priesthood and religious ceremonies are also lacking. The gathering of many families on the

711 occasion of a death cannot be regarded as a religious ceremony since this is held primarily because of grief over the loss of a dear relative. The religious heritage of our Indians is never seen by a European visitor, and that alone explains the agreement of all the travelers and missionaries who depicted them as absolutely irreligious (13).

> 13. I often spoke freely with the older men and women about the services and the religious functions to which in earlier days, as children and young people, they were invited with a certain regularity by the missionaries in and outside of the mission stations. Each time I had the impression that it was completely incomprehensible to them how one could please the deity by a public appearance and in an assemblage of many persons. It is much more in keeping with their own frame of mind for an individual to face the Supreme Being by himself and to settle with him alone whatever he has on his mind.

626

One could probably describe as religious activity in its wider sense the firmly established, equable mental attitude of deep veneration toward /1055/ Wataginéjwa that the individual maintains. Not everyone is always conscious of it, but in some way it has a decisive influence on him to move along certain paths and to be led by universally valid principles. In its effect within the religious sphere this veneration is comparable to what a conscience is in the field of moral obligations, namely, a sort of leitmotiv by which the individual person is led. This mental attitude is the reason for the unchanging acquiescence of the Fuegian to the demands of the moral law. He submits to it without contradiction, although he cannot explain it in any other way than by repeating the well-known saying: "Wataginéjwa sees everything. -- He wants everyone to conduct himself in the way that has always been customary among us Yamana!" For him the rule of conduct lies in this and similar words, and that is why it has not changed through successive generations. It is true that the fear of punishment

781 often protects this or that person from lapses, but it is really be-776 cause of the ancient tradition itself that they adhere to its de-626 mands. No one would ever complain of the tight bonds imposed on free action. On the contrary, the customs of the old people are everywhere highly respected, because ultimately Watawineiwa appears as the guardian of public order.

781 Inasmuch as he must be approached with piety, no one dares 776 repeat his name without a special reason, much less hold it in 195 contempt. If the Supreme Being is mentioned, the Yamana shows decided piety and a certain solemnity in his whole outward bearing when he speaks his name, thus giving the spoken word a marked note of consecration. The various names applied to the deity are never thoughtlessly uttered. Another sign of pious respect is the use of circumlocutions. These are used most often when in the course of a ceremony of mourning an excited person struggles with Manunkin, "the sole mighty one." It is as though he wanted to dampen his improper conduct, as though he would not turn immediately and directly to the familiar deity. The habitual respectful attitude of the Yamana toward the person of the Supreme Being himself faces them, so to speak, to the greatest possible fidelity to tribal custom, particularly the moral obligations, and does not let the thought of contradiction or renunciation arise.

B. Prayers of Supplication

782 The Yamana and the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 909) are exactly
[171] alike concerning the form and distinctive character of their religious veneration, but they are /1056/ conspicuously different in the use of prayers and invocations to their deity. Whereas the Selk'nam dedicate to their Temaukel a few more or less freely chosen words only on rare occasions (Vol. I, 510), our Fuegians have at their disposal a long list of established prayer formulas which everyone uses according to the given circumstances. They have adhered to them so strictly that they still repeat them even today, although individual words and expressions are no longer used in daily life and have even become incomprehensible, only the general sense of the whole formula has been preserved.

It is understandable that lamentations and formulas of remorse are most numerous, inasmuch as every death agitates our Indians to an extraordinary degree and stirs him to the depths. By comparison, the prayers of supplication are plain and simple. The latter will be given first, with brief explanations of the meaning, and afterwards the other prayers and related invocations. I may properly omit a grammatical analysis because we have Bridges' dictionary and because Hinnemann has undertaken special investigations on the grammar of the Tsimsia, to which we refer.

(1) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].
My father, to me be merciful.

These words are a general supplication which the Supreme Being is asked to fulfill, for example, to grant success in the hunt or good weather during the canoe trip. -- BD.XII gives [illegible], "do act kindly, to do good, show pity or mercy" /cited in English/.

(2) [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
My father, now then, to me be kind

today.

Obviously this request is similar to the preceding one. It is uttered immediately before a trip, a hunt, and similar occasions.

(3) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].
To do be merciful today,

my father.

This request is again like the others. It is most heavyweed in the early fourteen shortly before they set out on a major undertaking or a long canoe trip.

(4) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
Show them, them, be merciful (to me), my father.

This petition seems to be a general one, but it is used especially by a mother whose child is ill, so that [illegible] will not let it die, but make it well again.

(5) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
My father, let me go, I am making it known to you.

A person who petitions in this way is really asking for good weather. Desire he announces to the Supreme Being that he will soon start on his trip. /[illegible]/ -- NO-DO gives [illegible], "to let walk about, to let wander" /tried in English/, and NO-DOO adds [illegible], "to show, cause to see" /tried in English/. -- The Tsimsie also often address the Supreme Being in spontaneous utterance. If a family has planned a long trip, the father will get up early from his bed, move to the hut entrance, and look appreciatively at the clouds or the direction of the wind. If good weather is in the offing, he says to the-see-up-there: "I thank thee, [illegible], that thou hast sent us favorable weather!" If the prospects are not so favorable, he fervently supplies: "[illegible], thou knowest that we wish to travel on, be kind to us and send us good weather!"

(6) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
Show them, to us all be kind every day,

my father.

Before a family lies down to sleep in the hut, one of the older members repeats this saying. It sounds like a short evening prayer containing gratitude for the passed day and a request for success on the following day. According to the people who explained it, the emphasis is on the request that [illegible] let all the members of the family be well and happy during the coming day.

(7) Anna, ngwidge mbawdgara, Hizadge,
Now then, or receive mercifully, my father, also.

With this request a person turns back to Hadhgan after he was punished by the deity through a death, he had quarreled with him, so to speak. -- BD:351 gives mbawdgara, "to take a person under one's care, to be kind and merciful to a person" /cited in English/.

(8) Ngwanidge Mbatomadge, Hizadge.
Or he will [surely] push forward, my father.

A person who is rowing on the water and is aiming for a shore or an island where there is game repeats this request, confident that Hadhgan will let the canoe glide there quickly as though he personally were pushing it with a strong hand. -- BD:177 mentions mbandid, "to shove, push, press, bear against with the hands" /cited in English/.

(9) Dadge mbadandan, Wazagadgan.
To me give a good course, the old one above.

A person makes this entreaty during the canoe trip if bad weather threatens, so that he will reach his goal or the nearest safe shore.

(10) Dadge Mbadawadge, Hizadge, Shandin Ibam.
To me be merciful, my father, save the boat.

In bad weather they ask that the good father-up-there lift the canoe over all dangers. -- BD:401 explains shandid, "to uprise in one's arms, to raise or lift up" /cited in English/. /1308/

782 This means: Send me help through an ašóula (the grampus,

(12) Sēskin	skāja	ki-wēla	kūpa	abājla
The heart	to you	[preserve]	from above	strong

[in] sitting here.

This request means: May the-one-up-there help you who are sitting here so that you will freely develop your strength and be able to go on singing for a long time. Adelheid spoke these words during the youth initiation, as she looked at old Richard who had been exerting himself for some time as the leader of the singing. -- The word sēskin, "heart," also has a further meaning, as in German, and BD:383 acknowledges this: "the heart, the affections, the soul" /cited in English/. According to BD:14 abājla means: "strong, firm, powerful" /cited in English/. The word mūtu here, according to BD:366, means "to sit, to be sitting" /cited in English/.

γ. Prayers of Thanksgiving

The preceding prayers of supplication follow a recognizably uniform pattern. The prayers of thanksgiving for all kinds of gifts, which as such are multifarious and are bestowed by the Supreme Being, have more variety. It is actually amazing that our Fuegians often feel a special urge to give thanks for the benefits that Watauinéiwa bestows upon them. Such a practice points to the stable, close relationship that the Yamana believe they have with their deity. Because it is easy for them to express gratitude, this relationship must be favorable and satisfy them very much. It makes them feel truly happy.

Thanks is given in this manner by a person who has again reached a safe shore after a canoe trip; while he is comfortably resting, he thinks about his trip.

(3) Ašár^{x}, hipikāja kēmētauwēxkete Hitapūan.
Thanks, to both of us was merciful my father.

/1059/ This sentence is likewise an expression of thanks for the favorable course or the successful outcome of some undertaking in which two persons were engaged.

(4) Ašár^{x}, Hitapūan, hāja kēmētauwāgude
Thanks, my father, to me was good

today.

A person who is luxuriating in the enjoyment of some success, especially one who is enjoying rich hunting spoils, does not forget afterwards to make known in this manner his grateful acknowledgment to the kind giver and benefactor.

(5) Hajananikāja kēmaustuxmēnax Hitapūan.
Us has protected my father.

With this formula one wants to express thanks for success, for some advantage which he achieved, or for particular protection granted him. One family greets another with this formula after they have returned home or when they meet on the water. -- BD:181 writes "kōmausteka, to go or come up in order to take care of; kōmaustuxmōni, to get up, or come up and stand guardian over" /cited in English/.

(6) Šābaguta Wačinēiwa Hitapūančikaia.
Satisfied I with the old one, my father.

Filled with gratitude, a mother who was worried about her sick child and is now happy that it is well again expresses herself in these words. According to BD:152, sabagūta is "to be happily, or at peace" /cited in English/.

(7) Annu, hāia kēgurat alagumutūkilē-
Now then, me it pleased to look upon

Watauinēiwa-sēī, hauančimāalan.
Watauineiwa in heaven, today.

One who was sick but has become well again gives thanks in this manner. Watauinēiwa had already "looked upon" him, that is, aimed at him with the intention of letting him die, but once more he desisted. -- BD:20 gives alagumūtū, "to gaze, look, watch sitting" /cited in English/.

(8) Annu hāia kētumāala tupāan Hitapūan.
Now then, from me bad time took away my father.

A person who was sick for a long time but who has completely recovered rejoices in this fashion; the torture of disease is over, and he experiences a new summer, so to speak.

(9) Annu, hāia kakūpa talagēnatupāan Hitapūan.
Now then, me from above looked upon my father.

782 These are the words of a man who felt he was near death because 539 Watauinēiwa cast his eye upon him. Because this man recovered, /1060/ he joyfully gives thanks for having escaped the threatening misfortune. -- BD:392 gives talagōnatapōna, "to look fixedly, gaze, be gazing intently" /cited in English/.

(10)	Annu,	hipāi	mērnārna,	ašárǰ; hipāi
	Now then,	we	new summer,	thank; for us

is winter	past.

782 As soon as the first signs of approaching spring appear, after the 539 long months of winter with its abundant snow, everyone breathes
825 more freely and joyfully expresses his feelings of renewed zest for life with these words. -- Compare tupāana in BD:556.

(11)	Hītēpan	hītēki	hakuāluš.
	I myself	saw	sea anemones.

More precisely this means: I was the first to see with my own eyes the sea anemone. -- According to BD:260, hītōpan is "I only, I by myself" /cited in English/; according to BD:270, hākūāluš, "the red sea anemones" /cited in English/. The small scarlet sea anemones, also called sea roses (Actiniaria), can be found all the year round; nevertheless it is always an occasion for great rejoicing when, in waning winter, one discovers the unusually bright-colored colonies of these small animals. They are greeted as harbingers of spring which everyone hopes to live through. The Yamana thank Watauinēiwa with the above prayer formula for this favorable prospect. In sheer exuberance the people dance and hop about, even in the fragile canoe, regardless of the great danger of treading a hole in it and smashing it. The person who first sees a bright-colored sea anemone behaves very boisterously.

782 (12) Annūēčia, hipāi mērnārna, ašárǰ;
539 Now then, us new summer, thank;

annūēčia,	hipāi	mērnārna.
now then,	us	new summer.

782 539 With this longer phrase the people thank the Supreme Being for providing them with a new summer and with it another new bit of life. -- BD:25 writes annūōčia.

(13) Ašárǰ, hipāi tumiāana, Thanks, us we paint with egg yolk,

In detail this phrase means: Thanks be to thee, Watauinēiwa, that [through thy grace] we may experience this new summer; as an expression of our joy, we are painting ourselves with egg yolk. -- BD:262 writes hākukísin, "the other, another summer" /cited in English/. BD:493 gives tūmīaana, "to beautify or adorn oneself in any way" /cited in English/. -- With this exclamation they in-[302] vite each other to make a special facial painting as soon as the first birds' eggs are available in spring. With the yolk of a fresh egg they smear /1061/ a line the width of a finger, which begins at the edge of the hair, goes across the forehead and the bridge of the nose, and down to the upper lip. While this is going on there is lively and sometimes boisterous merriment. Filled with gratitude, they do not always address Hidābuah directly with this prayer formula, but it is done indirectly whenever they recite it.

(14) Annu, hāia, kēmaustuximaxuiāina yārum,
Now then, for me troubled himself for favorable weather

hipikāja kēmaustuximāgua Watauinēiwa.
for us troubled himself Watauinēiwa.

With these words, too, they thank the Supreme Being for the favorable weather which he provided for the canoes. An individual is speaking for himself personally and for his companions. -- Compare ūīaina in BD:66, as well as its use in Formula 5 (p. 983) and Formula 2 (p. 983).

wēlitës hipā̄i tauwarā̄gude ā̄nen, merciful us he rescued the boat, hipā̄i šabā̄gudagu Hitapū̄ančikā̄ja.

we congratulate [ourselves] on our father.

These longer words of thanksgiving are repeated by those who have found safe refuge after a dangerous sea voyage. One should visualize the sudden change of weather which sometimes overtakes a canoe in the middle of a wide channel. -- BD:428 gives tauwā̄gū, "to keep near to in order to support or aid by one's presence, . . . to defend, aid by being present" /cited in English/. Compare also, in BD:152, šabugūdā̄gū, "to congratulate oneself on a happy success" /cited in English/. -- The above words, therefore, express how glad the Yamana are to have a benevolent father-up-there who cares for them and rescues them; they are congratulating themselves on having him.

(16) Sēnnakite Hā̄učélla hā̄ian hajanēate čiēxaus,

This long prayer was freely invented by Calderon at the conclusion of the youth initiation in March, 1922. An approximate translation would be: Without being molested by Hāučélla (14) we have celebrated the čiēxaus here in peaceful communion with the two strangers [Gusinde and Koppers]. They promised to help us (15).

15. I had assured the families settled in Puerto Mejillones that I would intercede on their behalf with the Chilean government to have this area ceded to them exclusively as their property. Compare Gusinde (c):434.

Because they are people of good will, they will fulfill their promise. Then this area around Puerto Mejillones will belong to us alone and be our property, and we shall be able to spend each winter here undisturbed. If only that "murderer-in-heaven" will not seize us and take us away! Thanks be to Watauinéiwa who still gives us life. Watauinéiwa will continue to protect us and care

782 539 for us, as he has these days. Our father will also protect these two Whites. For this, thanks be to thee, my father!

Just a reference to a few words which are also given in BD. BD:154 gives sönnakīta, "solitary, lonely, secluded" /cited in English/. BD:152 gives: sabagūdīa, "to lie down happily, to lie down in peace, to be or live happily" /cited in English/. BD:281 explains laša, instead of lēša given above, as, among other things: "shelving rocks with large spaces between them" /cited in English/, which is true of the coast at Puerto Mejillones. BD:177 mentions kögurāiūa, "to be impatient to get" /cited in English/. BD:181 gives kömausteka, "to go, or come up in order to take care of" /cited in English/. The word ketēgede is the same as kategata in BD:170.

It is surprising, to mention this again, that our Fuegians have created definite formulas of sincere thanksgiving for various occasions and that they often address these to their Supreme Being to pay their debt of gratitude to him.

δ. Laments

765 152 The formulas with which bereaved persons filled with grief pour out their hearts and with which /1063/ people also unburden their souls of other forms of sorrow are more numerous and varied. In such situations they show their very human and altogether sensitive natures which they never before revealed to a European as ~~openly as they never before revealed to a European as~~ openly as they did to me on the occasion of a large funeral ceremony or on a few other occasions. Besides the laments given here, the people of former times had a larger number which must be regarded as hopelessly lost. I was assured of this several times. 765 539 The prayers follow here in a rather free order, beginning with those that are actual expressions of mourning.

(1) Hitapūan, kēmudēkun hāja ka-kūpa
My father, why indeed me from above tutumeyuwakēte.

765 539 With loud cries and heart-rending sobs these words are repeated by women whose children have been allowed to die by Watauinéiwa. Each of them regards the loss of a child as a personal punishment. -- Anita who lost all her children without exception often speaks these words, according to her intimate friends, Nelly and Adelheid. The word kēmudékun is the same as kōmūdūa in BD:172: "what's the matter? what do you want?" /cited in English./ BD:564 gives tūtūmēiūa, "to punish, illtreat, correct by punishing" /cited in English/.

(2) Annūēčīa — Quare /why/hāia ūla — me sponte /freely/kūpa — desuper /from above/

tutumeyuwandēa — castigavisti /punished/
Hitapūan, — mi pater /my father/,

tālauwāja /translated from Latin; see p. 993 /.

Again a woman laments: Why did you punish me by letting my child die? -- BD:25 writes annūōčia. The word tālauwāja, frequently also talauwāja, serves here as an exclamation of emphasis, somewhat in the sense of: Great is my sorrow, I am completely crushed, thus I cry, full of sorrow. BD:389 also gives the word tellaaja, "being mourners or in mourning for the dead" /cited in English/. In this position and combination it corresponds to our "Woe!" Compare also the data on p. 1079.

(3) Kēnjūičīa — Therefore hāja — me
kūpa — from above
matauuwēxmutākude; — helped;

kītu — he himself
kūpa — from above
tstumīnatupuwičīa — again take away

Watauinéiwa-sef — the old-one-in-heaven ūpaj. — therewith.

A grieving mother realizes her plight and says: The-one-up-there seemed to be particularly benevolent to me; in reality, however,

765 he helped me to have a child with the intention of letting it die
539 and causing me great sorrow therewith. -- BD:307 gives matauuwōx́ or matauuwōštāgū, "to work with one another as companions" /cited in English/. From the use of this word one sees the Indians' idea that both the Supreme Being and the mother together help to produce a child. BD:494 gives tumīna, "to pick up with or in the hands" /cited in English/. /1064/

(4) Kënjūičīa hāia hixupa kičëxmutākude,
Therefore me the one-from-above afflicted, tālauwāia.

alas.

Again the lament of a mother and father who have been punished by Watauinēiwa with the loss of their child. -- The word kičëxmūt-aku-dē is derived from ōx-dātū in BD:50.

(5) Kënjūičia hāia ūla kūpa
Therefore me sponte /freely/ from above

kūrat, alakëxmutakilēra, Hitapūan.
gave, to take away again, my father.

Like the preceding formula, this also means: The Supreme Being gave the child to the parents with the intention of taking it away again soon and thus punish them.

(6) Kënjūičīa hāia ūla kūpa
Therefore me sponte /freely/ from above

winānude, Hitapūan.
has dishonorably taken away, my father.

Here the Supreme Being is accused of a deceitful, false intent which the parents now in mourning did not realize earlier. -- BD:611 gives wīnana, "to betray, act treacherously, to trick" /cited in English/.

(7) Ka-kūpa (hu)winā́nude hā́ia,
From above has deceptively taken away me,

tā́lauwāia, Watauinḗiwa.
alas, Watauinḗiwa.

This formula differs from the preceding one only in appearance. The meaning is the same in both inasmuch as Watauinḗiwa is accused of consciously intending to deceive the parents to whom he gave a child.

(8) Kḗtakēn! ka-kū́pa makaitū́šude Truly! the one-from-above let die

kalaiḗxēden čiḗxaus.
the old ones of the čiḗxaus.

Alfredo, who was the leader of the first initiation that I experienced (p. 179 /untranslated/), was constantly depressed by the knowledge that only a very small number of his countrymen were still living. He often lamented that the old friends whom he had formerly always joined in the čiḗxaus had long since been summoned by Watauinḗiwa. -- My informants assured me that makaitū́šude has not been current for some time.

(9) Aša hitēpā́ala ha-kū́tatumaiā́ala tupā́ana,
Indeed, I alone must find my way in summer,

tā́lauwāia, Hitapū́an.
alas, my father.

/1065/ The meaning is: Again I begin a summer and that alone, how shall I make out! A widow speaks these words in remembrance of her husband whom she has recently lost. -- BD:260 translates hitōpan as "I only, I alone" /cited in English/. Compare in BD: 495 tūmaiaana, "to be unable or find difficulty in doing anything" /cited in English/. I was told that tupā́ana is a word no longer current.

539

(10) Kagufwëmuǰátude, Hitapúan, háka,
Me he discouraged, my father, on my account,

tálauwāja.
alas!

One says this when he has lost a close relative and has been so deeply affected by the death that he sees himself facing his own demise. -- The above verb may be related to kāgufkilinata, in BD:200, "to get weat /sic/" /cited in English/.

(11) Watauinéiwa-sēf hāja kaguramínude,
The old-one-in-heaven me took away,

tálauwāja, ǰatambāančinéiwa Hitápuančikāja, alas, I am angry with my father,

tálauwāja.
alas.

A person declares quite openly that his anger is directed at Watauinéiwa because he let his relatives die. -- BD:153 gives ǰatambaa, "dissatisfied, displeased, discontented" /cited in English/. Nelly and Adelheid asserted positively that this pure form of lament is difficult to translate.

(12) Annu, hája, k-úla Indeed, for my sake, ipse sponte /he freely/

kúpa, tarawéna hauakipajémalim.
desuper /from above/ weep my relatives.

These words mean: Disaster has befallen me on account of the arbitrariness of the-one-up-there, namely, the loss of a member of the family. My nearest kin share this with me and weep with me. -- BD:422 mentions the commonly used tára and taratapōna, "to cry very much, to keep on crying as a young child in pain" /cited in English/. The word úla has been repeated several times.

Its actual meaning is: sponte /Latin/, freely, from one's own impulse, according to a personal decision, or, as BD:87 says: "without being bidden, i.e., on one's own responsibility, without being asked" /cited in English/. That is why I have translated k-ūla kūpa as "ipse sponte desuper." This describes the completely free, indeed arbitrary, behavior of Watauinēiwa, against which every human being defenseless.

(13) Annu, máte k-ūla kūpa yāiix tēpanāna
Truly, ipse sponte desuper tears he makes flow, kičimundēn, tālauwāja, yāiix yāmala, yāiix dāra, of the relatives alas, tears big tears all,

kandēn.

/1066/ The meaning of this is obviously similar to that of the preceding lament. The word tēpanāna is probably the same as tōpanana in BD:409. The meaning of this lament is impressive. --

(14) Kičikāi kipaiēmalim kakūpa makāi
Him from the old women the-one-from-above

tušākude, Hitapūan, tālauwāja.
has taken away, my father, alas.

While a few older women are grieving over a particular deceased person, someone present puts the situation into words: Indeed, the one whom you mourn was allowed to die by the one-up-there; that is truly a reason for mourning.

(15) Kíčin aizēx kīpa kakūpan,
His strong wife from above [afflicted], tālauwāja; ašár sēskin āalasina

alas; luckily heart strengthened

539

strong	wife	from above,	alas.

Referring to her brother-in-law, the weaker, grieving sister says: His brave wife [= my sister] was afflicted by the one-up-there, but fortunately that-one-up-there also gave her a stout heart and so she will overcome this sorrow. -- BD:63 also gives ʒálasina, "strong, energetic, not easily subdued" /cited in English/. The word aizéx is related to aizāku, or aizōka, in BD:10.

(16)

Kītépan	hāja	ka-kūpa	ǰituxmūtuten,
He himself	me	the one-above	shall marry,

my father,	alas.

Here we have the very perturbed burst of anger of a despairing widow who, after the loss of her husband, sees herself helpless and abandoned. She wants to say: Since I am alone and do not know what to do, the one-up-there shall marry me and assume the cares of a husband. -- BD:573 mentions tuxmūtū and tuxmūtūtas, "living happily with one's wife" /cited in English/.

Apitēpan	kečimūta	ke-kūpa
Without anything	[I] here	[through] from above,

mamuāpi tēpána,	tālaɣwāja,	mičí.
we in poverty,	alas,	place.

A widow describes to the Supreme Being the desperate situation of herself and her children, somewhat as follows: Bereaved of everything through the one-up-there, I am sitting here at my campsite with my children. Who will feed my children now that I am completely impoverished since the one-up-there has let my husband die. -- Compare, in BD:409, tōpōna and tōpanana, which is also related to apitōpan. Possibly mamuāpi given above and mamūāpai in BD:299 are the same. Compare kečimūta with the compounds made with kičī and particles expressing direction in BD:171.

539

(18) Ílatakíki ka-kúpa uwēxanīana, Widower [I] [through] from above snatched away,

tálaywāja; ánno, sikíla
alas; now then, You-up-there maułtexmíalawána Hidíbuan, Ajzíkun, care for them, my father, [you] hard one,

tálaywāja.

This means: I have now become a widower through that-one-up-there who has snatched away my wife. Woe is me! Now then, you-up-there, my father, provide sustenance for my children, you hard-hearted one!

(19) Kuí tumutekiyáguа Wataynéjwa-sēfinčikája,
Where is to be found the old one in heaven,

tálaywāja?
alas.

This is the threat of a person who in his grief is at his wit's end, and he rages: Where could I meet Wataynéjwa, for I should like to have it out with him! -- BD:395 gives tekiíšgū, "to find what is one's own, to find and appropriate" /cited in English/.

(20) Akájakeyíwa hája tekiyágu Wataynéjwa-sēfinčikája.
I desire fervently me to meet with old-one-in-heaven.

Just like the preceding formula this expression is used by a person who is very perturbed and who burn with the desire to settle ruthlessly with the one-up-there for his sad plight.

(21) Kuí híletekiyáguа Wataynéjwa-sēfinčikája,
Where could I meet Wataynéjwa-in-heaven,

tálaywāja.

559

This is similar to the preceding formula. Since this fervent desire, too, cannot be realized, everyone resigns himself to the tight fetters of those who are helpless and have no power.

(22) Kā́ja hā́ja killakupenā́ŋin, cīlaywīja,
Also me shall be carry away, alas,

Hitapā́ŋn.
my father.

A person in mourning longs to have his life's companion by his side, and since he does not want to be alone any longer, he cries emphatically: May the one-up-there likewise take me away from here and grant me death. -- Compare the compound with killa in BD:171.

(23) Ŝapūru-ā́ʼin-hā́ŋwa Hitā́ŋpenʼīkā́ia,
How terrible on account of my father, cīlaywīja, ukā́ali hja-kūpa mā́ʼin, alas, only [child] from above in danger, cīlaywīja, Ŝapūru-ā́ʼin-hā́ŋwa, calīŋwāja.

alas, I am afraid, alas.

/1068/ This is the lament of a mother who has already lost several children. She says: I have every reason to be afraid, for, since Hitā́ŋpen has let my other children die, the only one left to me is in danger of soon falling a victim to death. -- BD:186 gives mā́ala, "to expose oneself to danger" /cited in English/. BD:158 also gives sapurū-ā́ʼin-hatūla, "how dreadful, how horrible" /cited in English/.

(24) Hitā́ŋpenʼīx hā́ʼī ŝā́pagurʼī ŋā́ŋkūrʼī
Solitary I to feel happy in my hut, mātalapā́ŋkūrʼī hā́ŋpenʼīŋkā́ʼīx, cīlaywāja.

quiet the hut and the hut of my children, alas.

Now that I am all alone in my hut, how could I be happy, for it is quiet in my hut and in the children's hut because it is empty. woe

765 is me! This is the lament of a mother who looks around in her 539 hut and seeks in vain for her children, for death took them all. -- BD:260 gives hĭtopaĭpan, "I by myself, without anybody else whatever" /cited in English/. BD:152 gives ĭabagĭr̄ĭ, "to do happily, to be happily or at peace" /cited in English/. The children's hut, ĕkĕli, was described on page 34. Compare mötalapĕna, "to become quite calm" /cited in English/, in BD:320.

In a frenzy of emotion a grieving woman sometimes treats
765 the hut to pieces immediately after the funeral of her child.
152 Whenever she looks around in the dwelling, she is aware of the gap which death made in the circle of her children. Therefore, she wants to destroy completely this picture which awakens the pain anew. At the same time she destroys the utensils used by the deceased child. John Lawrence and his sons assured me that they often witnessed this kind of wild behavior on the part of grieving parents.

765 (25) Hauakĭlunĕ̄i akĭluwajakĭpan kagicĕ̄ende
539 I am from the sea the woman he took away hĭja, ĭōjma.
me, oh grief.

A widow mourns because the Supreme Being allowed her husband to drown in the sea. -- BD:16 gives akĭlĭaia, "a lake, pond, pool, puddle" /cited in English/. The above combination, a form familiar to the Yamana, says roughly: the woman who has something to do with the sea down there. BD:194 mentions kĭgicĕkĭ, "to rise up and get fast, so as not to be able to pull down!" /cited in English./ The exclamation ĭōjma here is synonymous with tĭlauwĭja. Compare laema in BD:282.

(26) Hĭla kĭpa-mĭyén mutĭpana, tĭlauwĭja,
Yet from above observe cease, alas,
Hitĭpuanĕikĭja.
my father.

Specifically this formula says: My father, I wish very much that you cease looking at me so sharply; otherwise I shall avenge myself soon enough and inflict a hurt on you, too. -- Compare mĭjalu,

765 539 "to observe, watch with a view to find out anything" /cited in English/, in BD:291; mutagwana, "to cease, desist" /cited in English/, in BD:366; hala and la in BD:277, 263. I heard this prayer several times at the great funeral ceremony in March, 1923.

765 539 773 776 (27) Amumuni, hala ŋkpa dhuukimanaŋka
Desire, yet up there take to task

Tɛjaaŋkpa-dhɔnlum ŋkpdo ŋkka in Tɛjaaŋkpa. up there be pleased ghaatipaŋkpa, dhɔgwɔkpa.

women from the north, also.

In order to understand this sentence one must realize that, according to the Tamana conception, all the animals were made by Watsginŋwa in Tɛjaaŋkpa where there was a great revolution when the women from the north who performed the kina settled there. Thus, all the animals belong to him as his property. Anyone who wants to give full vent to his grief expresses in the above sentence his desire to cause Watsginŋwa serious harm by destroying his animals. If he should succeed in doing so, he would feel adequately compensated. -- The individual words can be found in BD:38, for example, amumuni, "to be longing for" /cited in English/. The word dhuukimana in BD:321 refers to the strict treatment of the candidates and to the serious order of the day in the kina school. BD:400 gives dhɔka, "to laugh, twinge" /cited in English/.

765 539 Old Malemikam, who repeated this fixed formula at the large funeral ceremony in March, 1923, added a few personal thoughts and spoke freely as follows: "All animals went out from Tɛjaaŋkpa. Watsginŋwa brought that about. Therefore, since I cannot touch his person, I shall kill all his animals which he made. This will calm me and make me content, this will satisfy my lust for revenge!" After a long pause he went on with this thought, as follows: "Unfortunately I cannot new harm 'the-one-up-there' seriously, for I am too old [frail] and do not have enough weapons. I cannot undertake anything any more, for strength fails me, an old man. Formerly I used to carry out this plan; then I wantonly killed many animals, burned down the forest, chopped everything to pieces, just to hurt 'the-one-up-there.' Today I am no longer able to do it. I have grown too old. In those days I had fun striking about wildly and destroying everything to hurt Wenyenlipa. That was the only reason I killed many animals, it was not because I wanted to use them for food."

enjoy also Wenyenlipa.

As in the preceding, this utterance also assumes that Wenyenlipa is Tilpalipa made the animals, hence they belong /[illegible]/ to him. A person who curses a deceased person who was dear to him knows that he is being punished by the one-up-there, as though he had violated the right of ownership to the animals that is held by Wenyenlipa. That is why he explains to Wenyenlipa, using the words above: I killed and consumed your animals only with the intention of protecting myself from hunger and staying alive; other members of my family, that is, my wife, did the same. We had no other purpose in acting as we did. You punished me nevertheless and now I'm in trouble. -- Only [illegible], "having a savory smell" /cited in English/, in RD:[illegible], and [illegible] in RD:[illegible] are to be specially noted.

The meaning is roughly as follows: Why do you "strong-one-up-there" again look at me malevolently? Are you perhaps afraid that I will consume all your animals? One who is built as I am cannot even consume the fat and the meat of a wounded whale. So why are you angry with us all? We, too, are believing so that you can see, i.e., we, too, are showing you now that we are likewise displeased with you. Will "the one-up-there" leave me my son after he has taken away my daughter? -- I know all the words used here are listed in Kb.

This means: I thought only [illegible] above up there is angry with me. But no, a human being has also become the murderer of my child, just as when that-one-there is angry. Instead of the word for "man" or "tribal member," the word for "monster" is used here.

Old Emilia from the south, who never had any contact with missions, repeated these words. My informants emphatically assured me that they were unfamiliar with many of the expressions because the latter are old and belong to another dialect. The entire sentence has approximately the following meaning: On account of that-one-up-there an old man shed many tears for his daughter whom death carried away. He shed as many tears as flowed in Ushuaia where the-one-up-there /1072/ caused many people to die! The-one-up-there poured out his wrath [showed his teeth] on the daughter of this man. If only it were in our power to wrest from him the same great flood of tears.

[131] It is well known that after serious epidemics took the lives of many in the mission station of Ushuaia the Yamana referred to this region as wēlapatux-wāja, "the bay of the great murderer," i.e., of many deaths. See pages 298 and 340 /in untranslated portion/ for details.

(35)	Hāi	šatambāja	hāi	Hitāpuančikāja.
	I	discontent	with	my father.

Anyone who is in mourning can use this general expression, for the behavior of the Supreme Being is wholly inconsiderate.

765 All these sayings more or less clearly express the helplessness of the grieving human being before Watauinēiwa, the strong 116 one. The Yamana regard his action as arbitrary torture, for, 539 regardless of their sorrow and contrary to their pleas, he continues to treat them cruelly. They permit themselves such sharp threats only in case of death, and they think they are justified in ridding their oppressed hearts of their grief through bitter accusations and violent rage. They cannot defend themselves in any other way.

ε. Various Other Expressions

539

Finally there are a few more formulas with which the Yamana turn to their Supreme Being pleadingly or gratefully, as the situations of everyday life demand. All of them are brief and the meaning clear. Some of them are amusing, and it is surprising that our Fuegians, in child-like openheartedness, tell their Hidāʌuan even the most ordinary things.

(1)	Hitapūan	hāja	mētawēgūmeš,	ánnu,
	My father	me	protect,	now then,

hāj	mēčūan.
I	return.

When he bids farewell, the person leaving says: If my-father-up-there keeps his hand spread over me protectively, I shall come back to this place hale and hearty. -- BD:321 gives mōtawōgata, "to take a person under one's care" /cited in English/. BD:21 gives amaka, "place, position" /cited in English/. BD:311 has mōči, "to come home" /cited in English/.

(2)	Tūla	hāja	Hitapūan	talagēnakūru,
	Should	me	my father	want to take away,

tēneken	hāja.
seek me.

With these words a person is thinking of the possibility that death might overtake him during his voyage. He takes leave and says to the others: If this apprehension should come true, you will have to look for me a long time and still you won't find me. /1073/

(3)	Ūla yēlla	hājn dēpan,	Watauinēiwa
	Yes farewell	really,	the old one

katalagēna	kuruāna	hipikāja.
take away	wants	from one another.

The meaning of this formula is exactly like the preceding one.

539

It is used when a person sets out on a major journey and says farewell for a long time. It says: Our separation is truly forever if it pleases Watauinéjwa to take one of us away in death. -- BD: 262 gives hain tōpan, "now is the time, in real earnest" /cited in English/.

(4) Tūla Hitapūan hajakāja kēmētauwagumūtu,
In case my father to me merciful, ánnu hipāj čīla matauughājnan.

now then, us again unite.

This formula, too, contains the familiar idea: Should it please my father to preserve me from danger and death, we shall meet again, safe and sound, at the end of my long journey.

(5) Watauinéjwa hāja kumēkalēni.
The old one me westerly weather.

A person complains because Watauinéjwa surprised him on his voyage with westerly weather which is always unfavorable. -- BD:210 gives kūmōči, kumōka, "to go or come Westward" /cited in English/.

(6) Uxāja, lēmata wājauina, Hitapūan, uiāina
Ah, confused go about, my father weather

kēmūtua sa-t-arugatāra Hitapūan? kēmūtua why you burden my father? why eyes samunkēmbānata, Hitapūan, ikamāna.

closed, my father, with snow?

Angry old Peine suddenly spoke these words when she was obliged to wade through the snow in bare feet. Nelly had sent for her; it was on March 21, 1922. She meant the following: Hitapūan listen, I am so indignant that my head is swimming because I must stamp through the snow. Why do you annoy me with bad weather? Do you keep your eyes closed and not see how much snow there is here on the ground?

(7) Hāia čílla akigamāni Tānuwa asūnan
Me again hit the old one in the woods lēkēskēta; kēndam hitaualašinānude?

my head; how I bear it?

[753] /1074/ In wandering through the woods a man was in danger of being killed by a falling tree trunk; again he once was lightly struck. This gave him such a shock that he developed a headache. He mentions the old-one-up-there as the cause of it. That is why his situation is particularly serious and he does not know how he will regain his mental balance. -- Most of the words used here are repeated in the following exclamation.

(8) Tānuwa hāja cílla akigamanita lēkēskēta
The old one me again hit my head asūnan kēndam hitaualašinānude?

in the woods, how I bear it?

In content this saying does not differ from the preceding one and says the same thing, but it expresses more definitely and emphatically the intention of Watauinēiwa to let the man be killed. -- Compare the verb akigamata, "to hit unintentionally, or by mistake" /cited in English/, in BD:15. BD:183 translates köndām as: "such, so, in such a manner, in that way" /cited in English/. The word asūnan is evidently synonymous with ōsunna, "forest, wood, jungle, thicket" /cited in English/, in BD:46.

(9) Watauinēiwa čikāja kēlakanja sa-kumāsu.
The old one you will take away [if] you lazy.

[867] This formula is one example of the precepts which are given the candidates in the youth initiation. It warns the uiwala that the old-one-up-there does not tolerate a lazy person, but will let him die prematurely. -- The word kēlakanja is related to kōlenkōna, "to drive, shove, push away" /cited in English/, in BD:178, and to related forms.

782 197 Besides the formulas listed here the Yamana of former days used many others containing the same ideas, which now must be

782 197 regarded as lost. The few that were saved have unusual words and archaic sentence formations, showing their origin in the distant past. Even older persons were no longer able to give me an exact and detailed explanation of each formula, and they excused themselves by saying that such obsolete words and idioms were no longer used in everyday speech. It is therefore not surprising that old John Lawrence, as well as his sons who were versed in the language, was sometimes baffled by these sayings. The colloquial language of the present day is the result of considerable change since the time when the representatives of the individual dialect groups (p. 199 /untranslated/) were more crowded together and intermingled. Thus, although almost always only the basic idea of any given formula can be determined, all of them together furnish a sufficiently complete picture of the Supreme Being whose image our Yamana carry in their hearts and whose characteristics are familiar to them.

/1075/ c. Originality of the Yamana Religion

771 177 The above details taken from the religious heritage of the Yamana are not inconsiderable in number. All of them were brought to light only through my travels. These facts contradict the unanimous agreement of earlier travelers and of the missionaries, active for many years, who, so to speak, flatly deny that our Fuegians have any religious conception and religious activity. This sharp contradiction demands a reliable explanation, all the more so since the religious heritage of the Yamana not only proves rich, but also has a determining, guiding influence on the whole moral attitude of these Indians. It has been repeatedly pointed out, and must still be treated in detail, that all the moral obligations and the traditional customs are, after all, bound up with the Supreme Being.

By way of negative proof it can be convincingly shown that neither the navigators who lay at anchor for only hours or days in the Cape Horn region nor those Europeans who took individual Yamana to Europe with them offered actual religious instruction (16).

16. One may certainly assume that if Fitz-Roy, during the journey to England and back had influenced his charges in a religious way, he, and Darwin as well, would in some way have expressed themselves about the results. Their accounts do not contain a single word on the subject. Matthews (p. 94 /untranslated/) probably also did not do anything along this line.

Those three or four men who occasionally referred to the Christian idea of God or who read aloud a chapter from the Bible, Weddell (p. 69 /untranslated/), for example, were personally certain that their references had not the slightest influence. Incidentally, it is not like rough sailors when they land and happen to be with a few natives for a short time to fill those hours with preaching their own Christianity and Christian moral precepts (17). Even if one were to assume this improbability, no serious critic could concede that so brief an influence, which would necessarily have taken place without sufficient knowledge of the language on both sides, would provide a lasting effect and an inner transformation on the part of the Fuegians.

The definite determination to educate these people according to the Christian religion -- which, as has just been said, could not have been true of the sailors on their voyages through southern waters -- was, however, by contrast, the driving force among the missionaries who settled in that archipelago. Despite years of contact with the Yamana, they were the very ones, above all Bridges himself, who not only deny that the Indians had their own religious ideas and practices, /1076/ but who are constantly lamenting the poor success of their efforts which, in any case, reached only a few. None of these missionaries gives definite data about which Christian

797 adapted their everyday lives to them. The missionaries did not 177 achieve a genuine, inner transformation of their pupils and charges (p. 328 /untranslated/). In any case, no specific Christian idea is to be found in the religious heritage of the Yamana described above. What one Fuegian or another may have absorbed from the teaching of the missionaries remained, as can be shown, a mere bit of new information, for example, the English word "God." This slight increase of knowledge had no effect whatever; the Fuegian definitely separates it from his ancient heritage and even regards it as, for him, superfluous.

In particular one should note the small number of natives who, with few exceptions, always stayed at the various stations for only a short time (p. 312 /untranslated/), as well as the vast areas never reached by missionary influence, and, finally, the great fear the people had of coming near the mission stations after the ravages of epidemics. During the first decades mutual exchanges were greatly handicapped by insufficient knowledge of the language. The mere fact that small groups of natives listened attentively to English does not prove that they understood everything, much less that they would sooner or later have translated it into action from inner conviction (18).

> 18. On the subject of the natives sent to Isla Keppel, J. Lawrence (MM:VI, 37; 1872) writes, characteristically, on October 17, 1871: "Whenever I give them religious instruction..., they are most attentive, and while I endeavour, though very imperfectly, to explain to them some portion of Holy Scripture, they listen always with deep interest. If I question them as to their knowledge of Scriptural things, they confess they know very little, at the same time express their desire to know much more" /cited in English/.

They behaved as the missionaries wanted them to, and they also took part in the religious service and in the Bible reading as often

771 as they were urged to do so (19). Did this make them faithful

19. The prayer meetings of the Indians are always described by the missionaries as good or successful. But what is to indicate that these "savages" took part from inner conviction? In his account Lewis (MM:VI, 90;1872), for example, mentions that the Yamana "George Despard informed me he himself had been to some of the other people's wigwams talking to them of all he knew concerning the future world, and remarked that some listened attentively to what he said, whilst others would not listen" /cited in English/.

Christians? Spegazzini (a):180, for example, emphatically denies it: "The catechized Indian generally does not believe, and when I asked some servants of the English missionaries if they believed, they replied: 'And you have seen the spirits of the woods /monte/ and of the water?'... Those who believe do so solely in order to make use of the missionaries /1077/... The children of the establishment [of the mission] leave and find themselves without tools, without social backing, without anything; they have to live, and they go back to living as their parents did" /translated from Spanish/. In this environment they quickly lose everything that teaching offered them. From the start Spegazzini (ibid.) regards any attempt to influence older children as useless: "An Indian older than ten is not responsive to civilization; he already has his principles of freedom and laziness too deeply rooted in his soul" /translated from Spanish/. The number of baptisms and marriages solemnized at the mission stations is remarkably small (p. 331 /untranslated/). Bridges, however, translated individual sections of the New Testament and recently Williams published a few prayers in Yamana (20), but I do not know of a single Fuegian

771 who could have read these writings with understanding and profit.
797 It has likewise not been shown that those who received special in-177 struction transmitted their knowledge to their compatriots (21).

> 21. Despard (b):733 praises Button's good memory and says that the latter told on Isla Keppel "whatever he had learnt of religion and morality -- not much of these last, to be sure...When questioned as to the efforts he had made to impart his acquired notions of religion to his countrymen, he replied, 'Yes; me tell God very good, make everything; Jesus Christ God's Son, very good -- die. My people stupid -- no sabby [no saber]; I no tell more'" /cited in English/.

If one carefully surveys the entire religious heritage of the Yamana, its individuality is clearly apparent and nowhere can an amalgamation with Christian ideas be demonstrated. The belief in Watauinéiwa is not the result of missionary influence.

Without any doubt it proves to be the special heritage of the Yamana, which they held and cherished long before their first contact with Europeans. My own research, and particularly the wholly unusual, accidental way in which I personally stumbled upon their religious heritage (p. 958), in itself explains why it was withheld from other visitors and even from the missionaries. It is not necessary to repeat the details; they have been fully presented.

1. Its Intrinsic Value

771 Many unequivocal circumstances definitely and clearly 776 testify that the Yamana have preserved their heritage of religious ideas and practices and have transmitted it from ancient times to the present. Quite generally, these ideas and practices are to them a logical postulate of their thinking. This is not to credit them with a particular gift for philosophical speculation, but their

771 776 minds also demand a satisfactory answer to certain questions that arise. A person like Maŝemikens, for example, tried to fathom how people actually came into existence and how /1078/ animals began to appear after the universal flood (p. 972). Although certain situations continue to lack full and specific explanations, everyone rests content in the knowledge that although he lacks insight into the handiwork of Watauinéiwa, the latter, the true and actual Abálla, accomplishes everything that the human being is unable to grasp in detail. The pressure that traditional custom exerts on every Yamana without exception is, in the final analysis, regarded as an emanation of the will, as a command of Watauinéiwa. Everyone adapts to it as a matter of course, as though it could not be otherwise. It was always like this, ever since the Yamana existed, simply because "that-one-up-there" always existed and he himself does not change, any more than do his regulations. In the play of blind natural forces our Fuegians recognize the movement of their Supreme Being who guides them and holds them in his hands. Do they have any other choice, then, but to turn to benevolent Hidábuan with the request that he command those uncanny forces to desist when they might harm and endanger their own lives? New human lives arise from his sphere of power. The loss of a close relative through death, however, leaves a more enduring impression and is more keenly felt as an injury. This intervention is solely the work of the supramundane skill of brutal, heartless Wélapatux. Toward human beings he can permit himself evident high-handedness with the worst consequences, for he is safe far behind the clouds and inaccessible to all the lamenting and raging of helpless earthly pilgrims. From the closely linked chain of ideas concerning the personality and activity of the Supreme Being, only the most important have been mentioned here. On account of their simplicity they can be easily arranged into a well-ordered system.

Although no Yamana has undertaken a similar experiment for himself, the totality of his religious heritage is adequate for him because he is aware of its more important details in his everyday life on any given occasion. Actually, he accepts the various happenings, whether they be more agreeable or very bad, solely because he relates them to his Watauinéiwa. If the latter is the

771 driving power and active cause behind any occurrence whatever,
776 especially behind events of decisive import, then discussions, no matter how long, would change nothing, and the person affected has no recourse but to realize his own helplessness and to yield weakly to the situation imposed upon him. As may be expected, this decision restores his mental balance and calms even the greatest surges of fury against the severest losses and the bitterest disappointments. One must see these Fuegians on the occasion of a general funeral rite, yamalaŕemóina. Everyone in the company of others acts as though he were mad with grief, and a few hours later, at any rate by evening of the same day, ruefully and full of confidence, he again turns to /1079/ his Hidābuan with sincere requests for forgiveness and pardon for his excited, irreverent behavior which, he says, was, after all, not entirely unjustified.

771 The complete contentment which their religious heritage
791 gives the Yamana has prevented any desire for more. That is why 177 they regarded the Christian teachings presented to them by the English missionaries as utterly superfluous. It can scarcely be proved that a single one of them was drawn to these missionaries from a pure desire for Christian truths. In fact, the missionaries had great trouble getting a few children to stay in their stations for any length of time and occasionally gathering together a few adults for a religious service and instruction. The following statements illuminate the whole situation like a strong light. Mary told me that as a girl she was taken into the house of the Lawrence family in Ushuaia for a few months to do all kinds of work. She once described to me her usual occupations and also pointed out that every day ended with a short reading from the Bible, to which the missionary added a few explanations about his God. I asked her to tell me whether she welcomed this, whereupon she replied with surprising candor: "Oh well, I listened to everything. Mister Lawrence kept speaking about his God. He said: 'Our Lord' /cited in English throughout this pasage/ demands that everyone be a good human being, that everyone work hard, that no one steal from another, and that no man have anything to do with another's wife, that we should all get along with each other. And he repeated all kinds of other things. But what he told us about his 'Our Lord,' all this Watanineŕ revealed to the Yamana long

771 before, all this was always known to our own ancestors. So we 797 don't need his 'Our Lord'! Our Watauinéiwa is enough for us, and what he has told us suffices. I always realized that, each time 177 Lawrence spoke of his 'Our Lord.'" As was proved by my questions, Mary actually adopted nothing from Christianity. The attitude of Nelly Lawrence is even more convincing. As the daughter-in-law of this missionary, she lived in the same house with him for several years and was in daily contact with this deeply religious man. After I became acquainted with Watauinéiwa through her efforts, she no longer hesitated to refer to him. She plainly showed me how pleased she was that I, too, sincerely enjoyed her religious views. Not for that reason alone, however, but out of innermost conviction she confessed to me that the traditional Watauinéiwa faith was perfectly adequate for her and that she felt no desire for the thing John Lawrence so often mentioned about his "Lord" /cited in English/. "Everything that the Yamana tell about our Watauinéiwa is incomparably more beautiful!" She repeated this conviction to me several times with proud self-confidence. In the general register of baptisms there is no mention that she was baptized /1080/ (p. 331 /untranslated/), and I never discovered any traces of Christian faith in her, but in her ideas about Hidábuan she felt happy and content; hers was really a deeply religious nature.

776 natural figure passively hidden beyond the stars, but rather some-781 one they feel close to. They connect many of the minor details of everyday life with him, and by no means only the startling events. On August 9, 1923, I was in Punta Remolino, sitting at supper with the Lawrence family. Fred had a hired man in his service who came from Chiloé and who was old and quite stupid. Once again he had proved extremely awkward in his work, and Fred's description of it was so vivid that we all had to laugh heartily. Only Nelly remained serious and warned her husband with the following words: "Don't talk disparagingly about that old man. Watauinéiwa doesn't like it at all and will punish you for it. One must not make fun of old people!" Her reprimand to the whole group was so natural and serious that we were dumbfounded and, without demur, stopped laughing.

A few days later the Chilean captain of the little cutter "Garibaldi" which belonged to this farm indulged in loud outbursts of rage because of the unfavorable weather situation. Nelly happened to be in my room and I paid no attention to the man outside the house. Before she left she said with grave emphasis: "In the early days we knew nothing of the habit which Europeans introduced of always being discontented with the weather. The Europeans complain: now there is too much wind and now too much rain, now too much snow and now too little sun! We must take the weather as it comes. If a person flies into a rage, it just makes it worse, for Watauinēiwa will become angry and then it will be really bad!" This sounded like warning for me as well.

An old Yamana spent the forenoon looking out in vain for bright sunshine, but he did not lose patience. In reply to my teasing which was meant to irritate him slightly, he said: "It is Hidābuan who sends the weather, the heavy snow and wind and frost. We can't do anything about it, we must take it as it comes! There is no use scolding loudly about bad weather. That doesn't help a bit; it can only make matters worse simply because Hidābuan will grow even more angry. It is better not to say anything and not to think anything bad about Hidābuan who in each case can send us still worse things."

The religious heritage of the Yamana is adequate for the conditions of life allotted to them and for the slight demands which they make upon it. It is in complete harmony with them. They make use of the individual ideas in their world of religious belief quite as a matter of course in their everyday life and at their ceremonious youth initiation, at a general funeral rite, and for hushed individual sorrow, and they apply these conceptions /1081/ naturally and unaffectedly, as is possible only with an indigenous body of ideas. They appreciate their value consciously and unconsciously, and lacking nothing, they feel no necessity to ask for more or to take what the missionaries have offered them. I never heard a word of regret or discontent over the fact that all missionary activity has been suspended.

2. Its Characteristics

776 In a critical evaluation of the originality of the Watauinḗʌwa 797 faith the decisive fact is that the deity's characteristics and per-
177 sonality as imagined by the Yamana harmonize very well with the general psychology and the personal character of these Fuegians. To begin with it must be pointed out that clearly recognizable Christian characteristics are lacking. Not the slightest trace of the salient details which were constantly repeated in the teachings of the missionaries has remained among our Indians (22). Only the words "God" and "Our Lord" /cited in English/ are mentioned, but their meaning is synonymous with what the Indians themselves have put into the name of their Supreme Being. They also remember the references of the missionaries and individual farmers to the resurrection of the body, for it completely disconcerted them.

The Yamana have come to the conclusion that both figures are more or less one and the same person, and they make comparisons. On March 8, 1923, Nelly once again came to my room, accompanied this time by Sara, the Lēpakērawā́jakīpa and wife of Pedro Maľemikens. Sara gave me a small basket as a present. In return I hastened to give her a string of beads and a small mirror. While Sara was looking at herself in the glass, Nelly discovered a picture of St. Joseph on the back. He was portrayed as a venerable older man with a long white beard. Nelly said to Sara: "Look at the other side, there is the Watauinḗʌwa of the Christians!" When this name was mentioned, Sara was somewhat taken aback, but not markedly, and she asked Nelly softly: "Does this Martin [Gusinde] know who our Watauinḗʌwa is?" Nelly nodded affirmatively. Sara was content with that and obviously relieved. Only then did she look at the picture thoughtfully and turned to me,

old-one-up-there is concerned about us?" Her meaning was: Just as your Wataginéjwa takes care of you, the Whites, so /1082/ our Wataginéjwa is concerned about us! She said this quite naturally and without constraint while I was busy tying up the package from which I had taken the present; I did not influence her in any way. Among the Yamana the thought of their Supreme Being is actually ever present and not by any means concealed behind many other impressions and images from their everyday life. In judging this statement one must note the valuable fact that Sara's home is on the Wollaston Islands which were never influenced by English missionaries; she, therefore, had no definite conception of Christianity. Nevertheless she draws a definite dividing line between her own Wataginéjwa and a similar person who watches over the fate of Whites.

If our Fuegians are confronted with contrary or deviant European ideas, they usually refrain from asserting their own conception and defending it as the only correct one and as though the others were wrong. Nevertheless they once rebelled against their fellow-tribesman Ukokku whom the missionaries had sent to them as their teacher. Bridges (VSA:XII,276;1863) reports: "Lucca told me that Ookokkoo (he not being present) had often spoken to his people of God, or heaven and hell, and what sort of people should live in them; his people being very proud and had would not listen, and were sometimes very angry, and said that Ookokkoo told lies; that as he had never seen nor heard God they would not believe, and that man and all things had ever been as they are, without beginning and therefore without a Maker. One man, they said, pretended to be Jesus Christ; some were afraid to be in hell, and wished to become quiet as a requisite preparation for heaven; some threatened to kill Ookokkoo, but were afraid to" /cited in English/. The Yamana were particularly excited by the missionaries' references to the resurrection of the dead and a life of the

TB human soul after death under the most disparate conditions imag-
TB inable, in sharp contrast to their own faith. I myself experienced
TB this. During a burial, while the corpse in the grave was being covered with earth, an old man, in the helplessness of his grief, turned to me with the following words which sounded very scornful: "There he lies, my cousin. And yet you Europeans say: 'Every corpse will leave its grave and become that which it was in life.' No, there is no such thing!" This man, like all his countrymen, was simply not to be converted to the new teachings of the missionaries; he clung to the traditions handed down by his forefathers. They always know how to make a sharp division between their own indigenous body of ideas and newly introduced, foreign conceptions or views.

Furthermore, a characteristic feature of the religious ideas
TB of our Fueglans is their pronounced simplicity. The Supreme Being even lacks a proper name. Every Yamana is named after his /1083/ birthplace (p. 530). Is it not logical, therefore, that "the-one-up-there" has no such name because he was not born in the homeland of our Indians? Instead they use circumlocutions as ordinary social conventions. The names for the Supreme Being emphasize particular characteristics which are, however, intensified to the utmost. In both directions, therefore, tribal customs with regard to name-giving are transferred to him. If here below an aged person is shown general respect, all the more is this due the foremost and true "old one," Watayinewa. Similarly, the few remaining characteristics applied to him are part of the everyday events and social customs of the Yamana people. The fact remains, however, that he is a spirit and therefore exhibits forms of being that differ from people here on earth. Nothing specific is known about these forms. Truly, the Fueglan is consistent in his simple thinking, even concerning his deity.

Finally the considerable number and the diversity of their TB prayer formulas must be noted. The archaic wording speaks for TB itself. The Indians themselves vouch for the great age of these
TB short sayings because they contain many words and word combinations that have long since disappeared from ordinary speech. In addition there is the opinion of the aged John Lawrence and his sons who were well versed in the language and several times expressed themselves along the same lines. John Lawrence, after he had examined those formulas for the first time, assured me emphatically: "I have been associated with the Yamana for all of 53 years and I never learned anything whatever about this!" He examined them carefully and said afterward: "Neither the names for the native deity nor the prayer formulas disclose any kind of borrowing from our Christian conceptions. Everything throughout has the stamp of the original and genuine heritage of the Yamana!" He felt it necessary to point out emphatically and repeatedly that the words and grammatical construction of the prayer formulas are not current in the language spoken today (24).

> 24. The opportunity is open to everyone to examine these data, for we have Bridges' dictionary and a number of grammatical studies from the pen of Hestermann. Bridges' translations of the New Testament could also be used for comparison.

Stimulated by this new information, John Lawrence made personal investigations which added to the material. He began by asking general questions about Wataninewa of this or that aged Indian, all of whom were friendly and confiding. Later when he discussed with other people the religious ideas and prayer formulas which were now familiar to him, he obtained the same result: "This heritage of ideas is an unadulterated, genuine, and unique possession of the /1084/ Yamana!" The whole discovery gave him sincere and lasting pleasure. He realized how much more favorably these greatly misunderstood Fuegians must be judged if they possess such a beautiful, pure conception of God and practice religion. In the twilight of its existence this much maligned people had the great satisfaction of knowing that now at last European circles will obtain full knowledge of this ancient Wataninewa faith. John Lawrence expressed his admiration for the research work and frankly confessed: "Even if I could live here another 50 or 100 years, the natives would not give me the trust that you enjoy among them!"

He viewed his long years of mission work, which had ended earlier, in the light of this unexpected experience. He was honest enough to recognize clearly how very much this work would have been facilitated and advanced if it had been joined to the indigenous store of religious ideas. As though to reproach himself, he candidly complained: "If only I had looked for these things 40 or 50 years ago, how very differently our work would have developed! But at that time we were constantly preoccupied with what Darwin maintained about these natives, that they were completely irreligious." Deceived by this, the missionaries all systematically avoided a deeper insight into the habits and practices of the Indians. Consequently, much was concealed and withheld from them which would have helpfully supported their efforts to educate the natives and to make Christians of them. Repeatedly and without reservation John Lawrence admitted that the many details which make up the religious treasure of the Tamana should by no means be regarded as something brought to them by the missionaries. This honest admission deserves consideration. One day I described to him in detail the procedure of a large funeral rite and the initiation of the medicine-man school, both of which I personally experienced. He grew enthusiastic, but complained anew: "If it had occurred to me in the early days to visit such demonstrations, I would certainly also have learned, to the great advantage of my mission work, what these Indians believe and how they pray. But we missionaries were never enlightened about the fact that primitive peoples also have their own spiritual treasures!" To excuse these brave men it must at least be mentioned that at the beginning of their activity terrific obstacles had to be overcome before the way could be prepared for contact with the Indians. One should not, however, cite the decades-long inexperience to native affairs of this worthy missionary as proof against the originality of the religious ideas of the Tamana.

During the discussions just mentioned the three sons of John Lawrence were also often present. Agreeing perfectly, they recognized /1095/ everything put before them as part of the ancient, unadulterated, unique heritage of the natives. Nelly, who liked to be present during our discussions, enlightened them about minor details. Albert said that now and then he had heard the name Wataginkes mentioned, but he did not pursue the matter. Fred, on the other hand, who was probably better informed by his wife

111 Nelly, frankly said: "I have long known that the Tutuna worship Wanyinlyen, that, according to them, he causes death, and that they have many other ideas, but I never asked the people more specifically about these things!" When we asked why he had not disclosed all this to us on his own initiative, he replied simply and candidly: "How was I to know that people in Europe are interested in finding out about the religious ideas of the Fenglans!" He, too, was unable to comprehend that his own father and, above all, Bridges were completely ignorant about what he had repeatedly experienced for a long time. Nevertheless this strange situation can be easily explained. The native unanimously said: "The missionaries never asked us about these things. How could we, without having been asked, tell them about Wanyinlyen?" The following thought was even more decisive: "Too often Bridges and many another [missionary] reproached us, saying that what we had [in the way of customs and institutions] is bad and worthless and that we would have to abandon it! Such words, accompanied by scornful laughter, hurt us. Besides, whenever they told us about their 'Our Lord' /cited in English/, we realized that for the White he was the same as Wanyinlyen is for us Tutuna." This explanation agrees with the repeated reference to the conscious reserve of the Tutuna in front of the missionaries.

111 The Tutuna, far from regarding the malignant footnote with which they expound their most precious spiritual possessions to us, are proud that we too venerate their Wanyinlyen. For decades they were obliged to accept disdainful treatment because of the lack of knowledge of Europeans and to be discredited by the missionaries because they clung to their Wanyinlyen. Now at last we show a genuine and fresh appreciation for their "Old-one-up-there" whom they call "father." This gives them great satisfaction. Now at last they see fulfilled a wish they have long cherished, namely, appreciation for their Wanyinlyen. Their eyes shine when we tell them frankly: "Your Wanyinlyen is for you what our God is for us Christians!" They regard this comparison as a sign of the sincere esteem of the White for the spirit-being whom they regard as most sacred and who sends conjointly above everything visible.

The facts which must be summarized and evaluated as the religious possessions of our Fenglans are rich and many-sided.

111 Inasmuch as we have a considerable number of well documented details, the result of painstaking research and of a method which is beyond criticism and can always /[illegible]/ be examined, it will not be difficult for anyone to recognize the facts and abandon the long-held and widespread, but erroneous opinion that the Tehuelche are absolutely irreligious.

6. General Moral Precepts

111 The social life of our Fueguans and the behavior of individuals, regardless of age and sex, are regulated by definite, unchanging principles that obligate all tribal members without exception. They alone assure the tranquil continuance of the tribal society and guarantee peaceful coexistence for all its parts. These principles constitute the morals or the general moral precepts, and they, of course, reach beyond actual tribal morals and were rules for essential social intercourse.

This presupposes that our natives actually do have a moral consciousness. Obviously they do not lack the capacity for moral judgments and actions, they being it into the world as a natural endowment of blother Nature. With it goes an urge to exercise their spiritual power in the direction of what is good and just and to avoid what is unjust and impermissible. Conscience, which our Fueguans by no means lack, guides their unerring judgment in these matters. It teaches everyone the objective and subjective value of moral goodness and dictates the behavior of the will. To be sure these words describe a general human tendency, but one must state them specifically for the Tehuelche also (cf. Gusinde [c]: 188), for there is no lack of assertions to the contrary. Disregarding older statements, I shall here give space only to the amazing words of someone like Spegazzini (p.17), who spent insufficient time in Tierra del Fuego: "The Fueguans do not know this social convention that we call morals. They perform the natural functions of life, of any kind, in public, and what we call virtue exists only in rudimentary form among the women and, before marriage, consists of a reserve in granting their favors and of fidelity on the part of married women" /translated from Spanish/.

This opinion diverges considerably from reality and is invalidated, for example, by the following words of Bridges (b):236: "The ideas of this tribe with respect to good and bad are similar to those that prevail everywhere. Anything morally bad is also physically bad and, consequently, is condemned, not by the one who commits the act but by the one who suffers the consequences. In the same way, that which is just, right, and good is nearly always recommended because of its utility. But nowhere does the utilitarian system lead to virtue, and thus we see that bad is committed by those who in principle condemn it, and virtue, recommended by all, is practiced by few. It follows, then, /1087/ that in condemning others for what one does himself, a man always likewise condemns himself as a sinner. Virtue is gained by those who do not practice it" /translated from Spanish/. Although much of this seems inaccurate, he at least credits the Fuegians with a capacity for moral judgment (ib). Hyades (q):

> 15. Bridges (b):236 supplements his statement as follows: "It was said that they were anthropophagi and it was believed that they lived without any notion of social order. But when they became better known, it was discovered that they were neither cannibals nor polygamists, and that, in general, they respected the rights that come from family life" /translated from Spanish/.

1082 in his concise way judges more pertinently: "It is certain that the Fuegians have the feeling for good and bad and that they do not lack a moral sense" /translated from French/. Dabbene (b):187 seems a little reserved in his opinion: "As to the moral qualities of the Yahgan, it can be said that, while they do not have much virtue, neither do they have great faults, and they do not wholly lack a moral sense" /translated from Spanish/. Thus he, too, sees in these Indians the universal human tendency toward morality.

The many facts which have been recounted in the preceding pages speak decisively for themselves; it is superfluous to give

517 further theories and explanations based on casual expressions of opinion by an occasional traveler.

1. Their Content

In the final analysis all the precepts and obligatory customs which our Yamana feel are binding upon them belong to general morality in its wider sense. It would be unnecessarily repetitious to list them and arrange them here in their entirety; a brief survey will surely be adequate. They are most concisely arranged in the teachings given the uswala in the ciexaus (p.724) and in the instructions to the girls at the menarche (p.570), in the statements about child rearing (p. 555), property relationships (p. 851), and social relations (p.912). In sharp contrast to my assertions, other observers have described the Yamana as very poor in moral laws. A reference to the pages above is the best refutation. At least the view of the well-meaning Despard (b): 678 and 746 should be repeated here: "His code of morals is very brief. To kill, to lie, to steal, to commit adultery, are crimes; but the sole reason they see is in the punishment commission entails upon the offender from the offended. A murderer must expect sooner or later, to be killed...Their only laws seem: 'Thou shalt not steal'; 'Thou shalt not murder'; 'Thou shalt not lie'; 'Thou shalt not commit adultery.' Property, life, truth, and marriage are protected by the letter of traditionary statute, but violated perpetually through inherent wickedness. Murder is punished by blood avenger. Theft and adultery are punished by beating, and sometimes so severely as to break bones" /cited in English/. Later on it will be shown that the sanctions are of an entirely different nature /1088/ than mere threats of punishment and crude club law. The paragraphs above can also be appropriately cited as counter-evidence.

517 716 The laws that our Yamana observe are clear and easy to understand, simple and definite. They are headed by duties toward the Supreme Being. After all, these duties in their entirety are derived from him as originator, and he carefully sees to it that they are carried out. A person who wants to stand in favor with him need only follow his precepts. It is not proper to 776 to do so. Similarly, no one expects that his blameless conduct will be rewarded by an especially advantageous destiny here on earth. In their naïve innocence the Fuegians are so reverential that they do not make such demands on their Hidābuan; moreover, no one regards himself as absolutely without fault. Besides, everyone has an adequate living; hence he neither needs nor expects more. If they make requests, they are driven to it by their own helplessness in the face of the invincible forces of nature and the threatening arbitrariness of the Supreme Being himself. The veneration due him demands that his name not be spoken thoughtlessly. Since all animals are his property, every human being becomes culpable who misuses them and who, with evil intent, willfully kills more than he needs for his subsistence, for everyone is permitted only this much by their lord and owner. On suitable occasions the adults do not fail to acquaint growing children with these ideas.

577 grumble about them or to resist them, and no one would presume

577 The duties of self-love are also clearly defined to a surprising degree. They are most clearly expressed in the descriptions of the ideal that should be striven for by a true Yamana. The motto, "May everyone be a good and useful human being!" summarizes the personal virtues which everyone strives for primarily because of ambition. Conspicuous rivalry impels many a person to outdo his other fellow-tribesmen in faithful fulfillment of duty and blameless conduct. Diligence and industry, a sense of order and cleanliness, compatability and a quiet nature, unselfishness and constant willingness to help, moderation in eating, and respect for tribal custom in its many details are qualities which the 577 society as a whole expects from each of its members. Their sense 834 of modesty is well developed (26). In front of women /1089/ and 26. Hyades (b):1346 asserts: "The sense of modesty exists among both sexes, but it is more developed among the women and is given a special name" /translated from French/. Cf. also Hyades (q):239. In addition he (f):573 also mentions: "Masturbation is very exceptional among the Fuegians.

Probably because of the continual cohabitation, sexual relations begin early among small boys and girls, but do not then become habitual" /translated from French/. The following testimony of Bridges (1):19, who usually speaks of the Yamana in a consciously derogatory fashion, is creditable: "In their personal habits whilst there was much room for increased decency and cleanliness, yet there were many good points that did them honour as men. Incest is a crime unknown and utterly abhorrent to the native mind. Although too often in other respects most immoral, as regards this hateful offence the native is quite pure. With the women there is a great sense of decorum, and man, unless he seek it, will seldom see anything to shock his moralities in their conduct" /cited in English/.

children men avoid offensive jokes or obscene talk. In the camp and in the huts all the adults are clothed at least with a modesty-apron; only very old men are sometimes without it (p. 55). It is a fact that the true Yamana fulfills these duties more eagerly because he cares about his good reputation than because of his consideration for the lawgiver beyond the clouds.

577 It is almost impossible to select from the wealth of precepts and decrees the ones which are the most important props of the social order. Personal unselfishness and constant helpfulness, which are regarded as the chief virtues, must be mentioned again. The mutual relations of a married couple are happy for both partners, and from the first this favorable relationship is made secure to an important extent by the free choice of partners. Marriage between related persons is not allowed (p. 421) (27).

27. In this connection Bridges (1):19 asserts that "incest is a crime unknown and utterly abhorrent to the native mind" /cited in English/.

577 and a departure from monogamous marriage is not looked upon with favor. Within the family the woman's position is almost exactly on a par with that of the man. Since, according to ancient custom, the necessary tasks are tactfully and purposefully distributed among each of them with a view to their physical and psychological characteristics (p. 450), household management is orderly and marital duties, as well as all daily work, are more a pleasant occupation than an oppressive burden. The parents carefully fulfill their duty of rearing their children, and the latter love their parents sincerely. Respect for parents-in-law and the constant willingness of relatives to help one another encourage close bonds uniting a local group (p. 606). The modest reserve of young people in the presence of older persons and caution in front of visitors from other regions prevent hostilities (p. 912). According to the prevailing custom, the people in general care for the sick and infirm (p. 942), orphans (pp.574 , 943), and widows (p.412), independently of what the nearest relatives do for them. The concept of private property is definitely developed, and the property of the individual is safeguarded by specific laws (p. 858). Infractions against them are rare, since no one could conceal stolen goods for very long (28). The individual groups

28. The following opinion contains strange contradictions. Phillips:183 repeatedly caught the natives stealing in Isla Keppel. "They were called to account, and the men became so angry at the accusation that they made threatening gestures to kill the missionary, Phillips. From these and subsequent instances one should have learned the lesson that the Fuegians, although incorrigible thieves, nevertheless regard being accused of dishonesty as the worst disgrace, as though among them it is not the stealing but being caught that is shameful." Cf. Phillips (a):1011.

have at their disposal extensive areas /1090/ as hunting territory (p. 629), and these are used by neighbors only under certain

577 conditions. Actual barter and the distribution of hunting spoils, reciprocal visits and groups affairs, such as the ʒíʒaas and kina, take place according to definite, unchanging rules. Although tribal members are not united under a common chief (p. 601), they nevertheless feel and act homogeneously, guided and obligated by one and the same tradition which, though unwritten, is like a book of laws. No one would venture to neglect it and go his own way or even less to oppose it with scornful comments. There is actually an unseen power of state (p. 635), even though it is limited.

As is convincingly proved in real life, this long list of rules and regulations is perfectly familiar to every Fuegian; he conforms to it with more or less punctilious faithfulness.

2. Their Originality

577 626 One would be doing the Yamana a grave injustice to disparage or to be suspicious of their honest attitude toward the individual demands of their moral law. The experiences of reliable Europeans contradict the very general accusation of Bridges (h): 205 that they are "immoral and lewd in their behavior and conversation" /translated from Spanish/ (29). Every Fuegian regards

29. Interpretations of their conceptions of morality and their conduct from the obviously prejudiced point of view of someone like Spegazzini (s):177, for example, do not deserve to be specifically mentioned.

conformity to the demands of the moral precepts as a compulsory obligation. In his youth he is given ample instruction within and outside the family, as well as compulsory training as uwʒala in the ʒíʒaas. In later life he is supported and spurred on, even against his own will and personal indolence, by the example of the people generally. Anyone who habitually dared to ignore important rules, especially those pertaining to social intercourse, would be putting himself in an impossible situation. Actually many a person, out of pure human weakness, becomes negligent in his

517 626 private duties or drifts into deviations in the field of sexual morality, but he knows it and is made to feel that by doing so he loses the respectful opinion of his neighbors and is avoided by them, as though in punishment. After a time his sense of honor or a threat from the Supreme Being forces him back on the path of duty. There is every indication that these demands of justice, /1091/ and hence the entire situation pertaining to justice, have been preserved unchanged among the Fuegians throughout generations up to the present time (30).

[171] 30. In this respect our Yamana are almost exactly like the Selk'nam. The moral law of the latter has been characterized and explained with an abundance of detail in Volume I, 519. A person who would take the trouble to compare the two would find surprisingly many likenesses and similarities.

517 776 626 An adequate explanation for the gravity of the demands of justice and the power of universal duty is offered by the references to the ultimae originator of all this, namely, the Supreme Being himself. Our natives derive the existing custom regarding obligatory rules and laws from Watauineiwa in definite terms. It is he who demands that the individual Yamana "adapt himself [in his conduct through life] as has always been customary," that is to say, according to the principles that he himself issued from the very beginning. The mental make-up of our Fuegians is not the kind that would split hairs over individual conceptions and arrange the result in a complex chain of ideas. A general reference to traditional forms of conduct of their ancestors satisfies their intellect. What has been shown to agree with them is legally valid, and only for this reason. Thus the entire body of moral law rests on the firmest foundation and the compulsion toward duty is given the strongest impetus. This is not changed even by the following minor factor. Now and then I was told, but without noticeable emphasis: "Yálox let us know how we Yamana should conduct ourselves!" People like to say this to the uswála in the čiéxaus when they acquaint them with the myths that surround this figure.

577 Thus he is recognized as the deliverer of the regulations that 776 Watauinēiwa wants the Yamana to observe. No one would ever 626 dream of asking what justification Watauinēiwa had for putting him and his fellow-tribesmen under the restriction of his laws nor of examining their meaning and goal in any way. It is clearly a matter of course for everyone to accept and take into consideration without the slightest objection all the moral regulations in the traditional form handed down from earlier generations as the expression of the will of the Supreme Being.

577 This way of thinking implies the close connection between

31. This connection could not be closer or firmer, and this alone corrects the opinions collected by Cooper:152 that the two are of different origin.

mands are not suspended in mid-air, but, as has just been said, rest on a firm foundation, from which the sanctions for either a dutiful or a faulty act derive their effectiveness. The Yamana definitely express their conviction that Watauinēiwa sees to it that his rules /1092/ are observed and that he punishes serious transgressions (32). The fear of this punishment has beneficial

32. According to the Yamana conception only the guilty one is punished; his crime does not implicate other tribal members. In this sense Bridges (k):239 is right when he maintains: "A wrong that is committed concerns only the agent and the victim" /translated from Spanish/.

effects, although occasionally someone will purposely avoid a mistake so as not to forfeit his good reputation among his people. This is especially true of old people who are always aware of their duty to set a good example to youth. Granting all this, nevertheless the decisive factor in a person's behavior is the judgment of the Supreme Being. Everyone is afraid of his punishments, all the more so since one is helpless and defenseless against him. The

577 fear of punishment is heightened by the idea that the individual
626 human being has no chance to rectify or be absolved of his transgression in any way, either by prayer or sacrifice. He must yield to whatever fate "that-one-up-there" inflicts upon him. He is Abāila, the truly strong one towering over all, with whom no one can compete. A person who does his duty, however, feels safe under the benevolence and special protection of Hidāhuan; hence he must fare well. An evil-doer, on the other hand, in view of the punishment which is almost sure to follow, will never again feel quite safe. In his evident lack of success in hunting and in all his work he can see clear threats calling for the severest atonement, namely, untimely death. There is also the attitude of fellow-tribesmen against the evil-doer who forgets his duty. They ignore him and obviously avoid associating with him; they cast aspersions on him and warn him about his delinquency. They give him no rest and even pursue him if he is a murderer or adulterer. In such a way the society itself takes part in the prosecution of punishment for a crime. No one, however, speaks of punishment which the culprit is to expect in the other world because in general the Yamana maintain that they do not know what form of existence the soul has there. Thus, since everyone knows that adverse and baleful consequences follow wrong-doing, this knowledge gives a person sufficient strength to stay on the path of universally binding duty.

577 Actually, conditions in the simple social organization of our Fuegians are more orderly, principled, and peaceful than many Europeans might believe, although they neither have a police force and courts of justice nor are under the leadership of chiefs. Their bleak homeland and their meager way of life have made them undemanding and content. Licentiousness and cruelty could not become doctrine among them. There are all kinds of circumstances that lift their personal and general morality above that of other primitive peoples.

000 /1093/ On the preceding pages the position and the relationship of our Fuegians to the deity they recognize have been characterized, as is required by the concept religion in its narrower sense. Their relations with other spirits and mythological personalities, which shall be discussed later, are very different.

000 Supplementary data on their religious activity will be given in the description of their great funeral rite, which follows in the next section.

B. Belief in the Soul and Mourning

774 811 Conceptions of the human soul and of its continued life after death are closely interwoven, and the customs of mourning, for which our Yamana have created definite forms, are connected with them. The latter are probably based principally on the fact that the loss of each tribal member affects all the natives very painfully. In the following description one must keep in mind that European ideas and expressions do not absolutely coincide in every detail with the thoughts and words of the natives because the latter are much more unpretentious and poorer in ideas. Much of their thinking shows gaps and is not carried to its conclusion. In general it is not the habit of the Fuegian to complete what is lacking or to provide a suitable substitute. In view of this the investigator runs the risk of consciously or unconsciously substituting his own interpretation for the deficient forms of expression of the children of nature, which would give a distorted picture. My informants were sometimes at a loss to give satisfactory explanations in response to my questions and inquiries. This is the typical primitive mentality which does not concern itself with precise descriptions of every image and complete interpretions of every idea according to the rules of logic. It must be frankly admitted that there are gaps in the following account. I would be guilty of distorting the material offered if I were to fill them out according to my own taste and provide them with meanings from my personal opinion. Unadulterated single facts, even though they are deficient and fragmentary, can be used in making comparisons and will safely lead to the desired goal, whereas unreliable and arbitrary additions imperil the course of research.

a. The Human Soul

774 From the start the Fuegian differentiates between animate and inanimate objects. For him, human beings and animals, his Watauinéjwa, and the many different spirits are actually living creatures, whereas /1094/ he does not attribute life in the actual sense to plants and stones, the forces of nature, and his own implements. His idea of life and of being alive coincides with the possession of a soul. The soul is the true principle of life and, as such, it may exist by itself or be united with the human body. Hence, according to the clear conception of the Yamana, it is a being in itself, and thus something entirely different from a body. This interpretation more or less corresponds to what we Europeans mean by the words "soul" or "spirit."

775 The independence and individuality of a spirit-being is definitely emphasized by a distinct designation which, although a generic term, is used only for the human soul and actual independent spirits. It is "kĕspix," a word that has been repeated often enough by missionaries and travelers. The forms kĕbix and kăspix are also heard. BD:175 gives kŏspix, "a spirit, a ghost, an apparition, a man who has lost a brother or cousin" /cited in English/; the latter meaning was not mentioned to me. They use this expression exclusively with the basic meaning of "spirit-being." It was sometimes given unjustifiable limitations or inadmissible explanations. Bridges (I):15, for example, limits the meaning of the word kĕnif, as is sometimes permissible, as follows: "The Cushpij were spirits which at night could make themselves visible but not tangible. They were malign, and the yahgans associated them with sickness and death" /cited in English/. Nevertheless this description shows that pure spirit-beings have an independent form of existence. Hyades (q):255 has repeated this interpretation in an expanded form; he calls Kachpikh an "untranslatable term referring to fantastic beings" /translated from French/. Spencer:101 is more definite and uses the term only with reference to the human soul: "Cush-pik is the spirit part of man" /cited in English/.

Besides incorporeality, which seems to be an essential characteristic, at least externally, still other traits are attributed

115 to the kēspix. Above all, the human body is animated by it and it alone. Those kēspiſ who, to begin with, are not joined to a body have their own independent life, for example, the yefāčel, who, as forest spirits, can perhaps be compared to our fairies. The human soul, after its separation from the body, continues the same independent existence. As long as the kēspiſ remains in the body assigned to it, the human being remains alive. Dying begins, the Yamana say, when "the kēspiſ leaves the body; it is Watauinēwa who takes it away." Thus the soul outlives the body. Since, according to their conception, dying is a dissolution of the connection between body and soul, the isolated spirits, including the human soul, do not die after death; in other words, they continue to exist. Strangely enough, the Fuegians are unwavering in this train of thought. /1095/ They listened to my questions about a possible cessation of the spirit-beings with amazement, as though this imputation were in itself a contradiction.

It is also surprising that they do not admit any aging of the kēspiſ, for example, in the sense of the accumulating years of a man's life. They recognize, if one may so express it, differences in age and sex among the yefāče, adults and children of both sexes, just as among human souls after death. Once established, this condition continues without change, despite the passing of years, and "a child kēspiſ does not mature and become an adult spirit," as Malemihens emphatically assured me. The fact that the human soul does not cease to exist and does not change, even after ever so long a time, positively means that it is immortal. Several observers have pointed out this belief of the Yamana, while others have denied it (33). As early as 1866 Bridges (a):211

33. Cooper:150 has collected the individual opinions. An examination shows that some of the observers contradict themselves on this point. In view of this, one is probably justified in seriously doubting the credibility of the testimonies, and all the more so since even Bridges wavers in his opinions and maintains elsewhere (a):335: "They had no conception of a future good or bad existence or of the presence of a spirit in man, which survives the body." In the first part he is right; in the second he contradicts himself.

reported: "They believe in the immortality of the soul" /cited in English/. This is actually the case, and it is not worthwhile to consider contrary opinions.

774 Furthermore, the Yamana believe that the spirit-beings have unlimited freedom of movement, so to speak. During sleep, above all in dreams, the kēspiſ leaves the body temporarily and goes elsewhere. Spencer:101 also mentions: "When dreaming, the spirit goes out of him" /cited in English/. In this connection it is worth noting that the kēspiſ, after such a leave-taking, must be anchored to the body anew, as it were, by means of a ceremonial act, usually by a yēkamuš. This will be explained later. Several times my attention was called to an important distinc-
[828] tion: "While someone is dreaming, his kēspiſ merely goes for a walk, and of course soon returns, but if a person dies, Watauinēiwa takes the kēspiſ away and will not permit it to reunite with the body." When the Yamana say, "One cannot see a spirit-being, simply because it is kēspiſ," they mean: it is not corporeal, for only something corporeal is visible to the eye. Nevertheless they admit that such a spirit-being can occasionally make itself visible, but they do not explain this in detail. Once I asked: "If my 775 brother has been dead for a long time and then I, too, die, will my kēspiſ meet that of my brother, will it see him and be able to communicate with him?" In reply I was told: "We do not know that. We are completely /1096/ ignorant about how the kēspiſ behave over there." If the Yamana wish to explain their own vague idea about the existence of a kēspiſ, all they can say is: "It is something like the breath or the air that comes out of one's mouth."

774 It seems to me that their view of the derivation and origin of the human soul is not entirely clear. In a vague way they 761 admit that the Supreme Being plays a decisive role, namely, that the soul of the newborn child comes from him, whereas the body of the child owes its origin to its parents (34). Common

34. Spencer:102 says: "New born child gets spirit 'from nature'" /cited in English/. The Yamana does not express himself that way. Spencer adds, correctly: "Some imagine they see the spirits. Informant knows nothing of spirits' life except that they always remain" /cited in English/.

expressions also reveal this conception. For example, grieving parents say: "Watanine̓wa let my child die, the one he gave me," but they do not express themselves in more detail about the whole process.

714 815 Once I wanted to know whether animals also had their kĕspif. Apparently this thought had never occurred to them, for they shook their heads in denial. Then I said to them: "Animals are certainly clever, especially the dog. He understands the calls and gestures of his master, he helps in hunting and is faithful. How can that be?" They replied: "We care for the dog as for a child. He helps us a great deal. We never leave him behind all by himself in a deserted place, for if he were cut off from us we would always and everywhere be aware of the barking and howling of such an abandoned dog. Perhaps the dog does have a kĕspif of his own, but he is the only one, other animals do not have it." Thus, the Yamana do not in so many words attribute a kĕspif like that of the human soul to animals.

[171] 714 Their views are essentially like those of the neighboring Selk'nam about their kĕ̓pi (Vol. I, 537); even the names that the two tribes give to the human soul and to the spirit-being are almost the same.

b. Belief in a Future Life

715 Despite the contrary assertion of a few travelers who need not be taken seriously (35), the Yamana are, without exception,

35. Darwin (d):247 writes: "Captain Fitz Roy could never find out whether the Fuegians have any definite belief in a future life. They bury their dead sometimes in caves and sometimes in the mountain forests; we do not know what kind of ceremonies they have." Even Hyades (p):332 commits a serious error: "The idea of a future life does not exist" /translated from French/. Further references to incorrect views would not lead anywhere; hence they need not be specifically mentioned here.

convinced that the human soul lives on. They speak of this clearly enough in various ways. /1097/ It must be admitted, however, that they do not conceive of the other world as a secure situation or a definite place. This circumstance has led to the erroneous assertions of many observers who simply wanted to maintain that the Yamana, although adhering to the idea of the survival of the human soul, nevertheless are incapable of expressing themselves in detail about how the soul goes on living. The Fuegians do not waver in the one assertion that at death the kiepif leaves the body and continues a life of its own. Once soul and body have been separated by death, that is, as was said on page 1034, by the intervention of Wataginjiwa, any subsequent union is forever excluded. After that the soul stands alone, whereas the corpse decays.

Just as this belief must be regarded as reliably certain, so also it cannot be denied that our natives lack a fairly clear and substantial idea of the life of the soul after its separation from the body. They have only one answer to all questions pertaining to this: "We know nothing about those kiepif after death!" This answer occurs repeatedly in the accounts of earlier observers. Despard (b):698 wrote: "The Firelander thinks, when a man dies, his breath goes up to heaven; but for what, he has no notion, and is ignorant of a return to the flesh. He denies the upward ascent of breath to other animals" /cited in English/. In any case, it is certain that the Yamana have never maintained a transformation of the human soul or its transfer to another being. Bridges spoke of this several times. Very early he (a):211 said: "They believe in the immortality of the soul, their word Cahgahgoolno, signifying to fly up, evidences this fact" /cited in English/. Elsewhere, (i):18, (k):238, (h):207, he asserts: "They had no future, and expected 715 nothing after death. Anyway this was true for the most part; they had a word expressive of death Cagagulu, the meaning of which seems to convey an idea of an after spiritual state" /cited in English/. Dabbene (b):292, Spegazzini (a):172, and others repeat the same view. This word, with which, at times, a kind of idolatry was set forth in many a treatise (Cooper:111), is an ordinary intransitive verb and means, according to BD:195, given as kāgāgulū, "to die, to cease to be, get used up; be all gone or spent" /cited in English/. Often this verb has its original meaning and is not used exclusively in the sense of "to die." One could use kāhēpana with the same meaning.

The complete uncertainty of the Yamana about the fate and condition of a departed soul evokes that unusually high degree of grief among the ones left behind which strikes every outside observer. Their demonstrations of mourning are likewise very pathetic and deeply moving because they are born out of despair, as it were, because after death a reunion is impossible. /1098/ I was repeatedly told: "With death everything [every connection] between us and the kēpif ceases. We do not know how the kēpif comes when a child starts to live; nor do we know where his kēpif goes afterwards. It goes far away, far beyond the sea!" Nelly Lawrence once showed me an old photograph. It showed several persons who were together at one of the mission stations, only four of whom are still alive. Emphatically and seriously, but

715 717 quite ironically she answered me: "The old Yamana, even my own father and I myself, have never been able to believe that we would all see each other again after death. The missionaries maintain this, but none of us can believe it. Why, everyone can see how the corpse is laid into the earth and decays there; after a few years nothing is left of it. The talk of the missionaries is trickery; they want to deceive us. We never believed them and we don't believe it to this day!" After a short time she repeated, with a mocking smile: "There simply cannot be a reunion because the corpse completely disintegrates!" Her words were not in any way provoked by me, but they brought her visible relief. She often discussed this topic in detail with her people, and it seemed to me that this time she also wanted to confess openly to me. We Yamana will not let ourselves be deceived by anyone, not even the missionaries; we shall inviolably cling to our own truths which seem plausible

115 to us! There is some tragicomedy in the fact that the daughter-117 in-law of the missionary John Lawrence should have so expressed herself! With such tendencies on the part of our Fueguians it would be a psychological monstrosity to maintain that the figure of Watayinkwa was taken entirely from the Europeans. This one example shows how strictly they keep their own religious heritage separate from the teachings of their missionaries. They have their own explanation, derived from their characteristic habits of thought, for the divergent attitude of Christians. "The Christians," I was told by the Tamana, "do not show nearly as much pain and [51] grief for a dead person as we do! They do not even change their name" (36). It grieves our Indians to repeat the name of a dead

36. The conditions under which someone changes his name if it is identical with that of a deceased person will be given on p. 1969.

person, but this does not affect the less sensitive Christians. Gusinde said, "We are immeasurably sad when one of our people 115 dies because we do not know what comes after death. We do not know whether we shall be able to see and speak to the kikuli or how they are and whether they are happy. All that we do not know, that is why we are so sad and why we weep a great deal!"

They do admit the possibility of seeing one of their de-115 ceased relatives again, although they are not entirely logical about 117 it. Many a /1938/ Tamana said: "When I am very sad and long to see them, when I keep thinking about them, they finally come to me. I see them in my dreams. They are not just dream images, they are the real kikuli!" In my opinion these words point to particularly vivid dreams or actual visions which cause the delusion. It is all the more striking that in the mahonlu whose it is said that the kikuli of four deceased brothers and their nearest brother-in-law returned as actual human beings after their violent deaths and temporarily were in contact with their surviving nephew, like real people, but their behavior is described as that of mentally inferior persons. It is only in this story, not anywhere else, that the souls of deceased persons appear.

715 The Yamana say nothing about future retribution, which is 828 logical in view of the general uncertainty about the fate of the human soul after death. They do, however, definitely separate their countrymen into good and bad. I said to them: "Many people are hard-working and diligent, honest and good. They are always that way, whereas some are indolent and lazy." Their answer was: "The Yamana learn in the ʔ̍ʌʌxsa how they should conduct their lives, what is proper for a decent human being. Each person, when he was an ulwʌla, promised faithfully to carry out what the old people recommended. That is why these people work for themselves and their family; they care for their relatives, they give part of their booty to neighbors, they are good people and easy to get along with. But besides that there are also bad people. They are lazy and burdensome gossips; they no longer remember what was taught them in the ʔ̍ʌʌxsa and what they promised there; they no longer pay any attention to what the Yamana practice. That is why we despise them. Everyone lets them go their own way and holds himself aloof from them. Their fate soon overtakes those sloths and gossips. Wʌlʌyinʌwa lets them die prematurely! There are good and bad human beings. A bad human being behaves badly simply because he is bad; a good human being behaves well because it is his nature to be good. Whether the ʌʌʌpif of these people will be the same afterwards [after death]? That we do not know!" It is clear from all this that the Yamana do not know the condition of the soul after death. They view an untimely death as a punishment which serves more or less as adequate atonement for various errors, so that probably the necessary penance has been made.

Our Fueguians, finally, are just as vague about a definite 715 place of abode of the ʌʌʌpif. The two statements of Bridges (a): 211 and (b):238 are justified: "They have no thoughts of a future state, either of reward or punishment /cited in English/. . . They do not fear a future life or cherish hopes beyond the grave" /translated from Spanish/. The general opinion is that "they go far away beyond the sea." This particular expression is repeated again and again. Richard asserted what other /1100/ people confirmed: "The ʌʌʌpif go far out to sea, there where the many ʌʌʌʌʌʌ /killer whale/ are. The ʌʌʌpif stay near them and sometimes come with

775 the aiñula through our region here [as though they were on a journey]. as the yékamus who can see both [groups] tell us!" Exceptions to this general rule are the kúipuf of the yékamus and of persons who have drowned. Of the latter it is said: "While a person is drowning he thrashes about violently. That is his kúipuf which is leaving him. After that the kúipuf stays in that place on water. Sometimes one hears his call. It sounds like the barking of a sea lion, but it is the call of the kúipuf of the drowned person." As for the yékamus, "all persons surrounding a dying yékamus must continually utter a wailing ho ho ho; at the same time they let their arms hang down and move their hands forward as though they were pushing sand or water. These movements quickly drive far away the Hagúlla spirit (37) that is leaving the dying yékamus.

37. This spirit was characterized and described in detail on p. 748.

If this were not done, this bloodthirsty villain would remain at the place of death and harass all the people." Naturally, everyone present is painted with the white horizontal line from the nostrils to the ear-lobes. The kúipuf of certain persons, including those of the yékamus, are strongly attracted by Hagúlla. If they follow this woman, they actually go down into the earth with her and remain with her. Finally the Yamana also concede that sometimes a kúipuf appears near the hut and in the neighborhood of their own families. It whispers and groans, although so softly that the people can scarcely hear it, but that is how they recognize it (38).

38. Bove (d):297 and (e):119 assert: "In general the Fueguians are not very superstitious; if someone dies, they believe that the spirit leaves the body and roams about through the forests and beyond the mountains, variously suffering if he was evil in life, happily and quietly if he was good." His traveling companions Lothaire (b):148 and Spegazzini (a):178 repeat the same assertion. I did not encounter this

115 view. Spencer:101 generalizes an idea which, as such, is correct: "When he dies, the spirit remains alive and roams around place where he died" /cited in English/.

115 The Yaganes assume that the souls far out where the sun sets about freely and are not limited to a definite place or 117 crowded together. Several times they clearly and definitely asserted: "It was the missionaries who first told us that the souls of good human beings are assembled in a place apart from those of bad people. Everyone will be reunited there! The Yaganes never said anything like this, and we still do not believe it. A person who has died remains invisible and inaccessible to all others. We do not know whether later on the souls recognize each other and whether they will remember this country here (their home). The missionaries wind to comfort us in our great sorrow with words like these. They did not succeed, for we know better what happens to the souls!" Without doubt the explanations of the missionaries /1101/ provoked determined opposition among the Fueguians. This example also shows how they consciously separate their own religious heritage from the new teachings. They are actually proud of themselves and regard themselves as wiser than the missionaries who acted in order to substitute their so-called false views for the truth contained in the old Indian tradition (98).

98. Spencer:71 says the same thing in different words: "When the missionaries would have spoken to the Yaganes of his dead relatives they could not without offending him seriously" /cited in English/. This kind of statement shows the great weight of actual facts.

115 For the souls of their dead collectively the Yaganes use the general expression Mahélgin, that is, the people of the Mahé. RO:81 means Mahé as synonymous with Mélgin. They know nothing

185 about the fate of the spirits in the other world can do they fear Pana.

c. Mourning and Death Rites

185 The grief of our Fuegians over the loss of a tribal member to death has been described several times as unusually deep and lasting. It is caused chiefly by the uncertainty over the fate of the departed soul, for separation from a loss forever. For obvious reasons the Yaganes do not speak of events which agitate them and stir them to the depths. They hold back expressions of their grief especially in front of strangers. The travelers of earlier decades and the missionaries were able to furnish only brief and incomplete accounts. Favored by fortune, I had the opportunity to take part in the mourning of a small group of survivors, as well as in the general ceremony of mourning. Hence the following account describes my own experiences. At the very beginning it should be pointed out that, generally speaking, expressions of mourning among these Indians are not mere formalities without content, but come from the deepest feelings. From the most certain unreliable opinions from other parts are rejected (46). Anyone

> 46. For example, Lothrop (Ib.:140 see almost harrowing wonder: "Great grief for the deceased does not exist, the facial painting, the details, the blows, the wounds that the Fuegians make at the death of a relative, the destruction of the wigwam where the individual died, and so on... are mere mere practices, rules of custom, than sincere expressions of grief" /translated from Italian/.

[191] who compare the description of the mourning customs of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 142) with those of our Yaganes will find considerable agreement. One must accept this fact as it stands, and although historical connections may be mentioned as the only correct explanation for it, they can no longer be clarified in detail or even thoroughly investigated.

1. Death

The Yaghan faces all uncertainty with astonishing equanimity and quiet self-control. He is able /1102/ to await death with open eyes, without fear and alarm. Hyades (p)-328 expresses himself conservatively and merely says: "They have little fear of death" /translated from French/, but this is admitting too much. Bridges (1)-34 expresses himself more accurately: "They feared death because of the suffering and misery attending it and because it was the end of life" /tried in English/. Certainly, everyone clings to life and loves it very much, for that reason also the threats of Wonaimihwa of an untimely death have a sure effect on the individual's conduct. As soon as he sees there is no escape, however, he submits at once without complaint. One never hears a person regretting that he must depart from this life, although he knows nothing about the new form of existence which he is entering.

In earlier centuries, as in most recent times, almost all Yamana died a natural death. Fatal accidents were exceptions and murder even more so. It has been shown that epidemics have wrought havoc in the Indian population only since their closer association with Europeans. Except for children's deaths, the greater majority of Yamana succumb to old age. "Old people die because they are old!" Although in this case the Indians place more emphasis on the natural process as something they take for granted, nevertheless they do not completely forget that Wonaimihwa causes death.

The indications of approaching death usually appear suddenly. If a person feels his strength leaving him, he stretches out on his miserable pallet and informs those present of his condition. They immediately take it into account, and from then on the nearest relatives stay close to him in order to observe the course of events. In such a situation death usually follows within a few hours. Strangely enough they make no effort to relieve the dying person by attending him, but squat around the fire, apparently quite indifferent. The person himself does not want or demand anything, for he rapidly becomes weaker. Actually the people present are waiting for a quick end and do not watch the dying one closely because they know they cannot help him. When the 763 death rattle begins, they audibly start to moan and weep. This development almost always ends quickly.

The news has of course immediately spread to the nearest 763 huts. The neighbors remain quiet. They talk in subdued voices 152 among themselves and cease any work that might be disturbing. The longer this continues, the more silent, thoughtful, and sad they become. The reminder of death in the immediate neighborhood makes every Yamana serious. The neighbors, through messengers, keep other people in a wide area informed about the course of events. They are prepared /1103/ to appear at the place of mourning at the proper moment. It is not customary among the Yamana for many people to gather around the dying person. Distant relatives and neighbors arrive only after death has occurred. Every dying person, however, wants his intimate family to be with him during his last hours (41).

> 41. As Bridges (i):14 expresses it: "at the last closing scene all friends and relations were expected to be present and to make the occasion important by their united lamentations. It was a great gratification to the sick to have their friends around them and so much honour showing them" /cited in English/.

The nearest relatives of the dying person, however, observe him closely enough so that they can estimate when the actual death struggle will commence. The poor soul is by then already unconscious or at least insensible. Now the people standing around begin their loud weeping and pitiful moaning. They scream and lament as though in despair over the departure of this relative. They do not utter definite words, but constantly repeat their long drawn-out weeping and moaning cries, varying them in intensity and pitch and shedding copious tears at the same time. They get up and crouch down, or they throw themselves on top of the dying one and roll on the ground with dreadful contortions of their entire bodies. They can usually tell quickly and accurately when death is setting in, whereupon they cry out so shrilly and shriekingly that

763 one's blood curdles. Some of them behave uncontrollably, like 152 lunatics, and tear the skin all over their bodies, rumple their hair, thrash about wildly, cramp themselves up and roll over the body, shake the hut framework, and scatter the fire with their hands, completely beside themselves. It is only when they are exhausted that they completely collapse, trembling all over. It is shattering to watch such individuals. The others present also behave in a very excited and wild fashion. Weeping and groaning, they bend their bodies, repeatedly clutch their hair, and pull it angrily while a stream of tears flows unhindered down their cheeks to the ground. The shrill cry has told the waiting neighbors of the dying person's release; weeping and lamenting, they hasten there (42).

42. Bove (e):159 is the only one who reports on this and only briefly: "The last moments of a dying person are announced by a dreadful wailing; all who are present take part in the grief of the family. Women and men paint their faces and hands black and the nearest relatives even pull out their hair and cut their bodies with shells and knives."

763 There is little difference in the procedure when a person is 134 released from a long illness by death. His relatives have carefully observed his condition and discussed it with neighbors and visitors. The sick person was obliged to remain in one place almost continuously with one or another of his nearest relatives; friends occasionally came to inquire about his condition and to bring him food or things he could use. Meanwhile /1104/ his strength deserts him. Those who have taken care of him are exhausted after watching him suffer for a long time. The nearer death comes, the more irritable and impatient they become, so that when the death struggle actually begins they behave as though they were completely mad. The suffering and agony that they have had to see their beloved relative endure have lasted too long. If the death struggle is considerably prolonged and if a person finally loses control of himself, it does not seem at all impossible

763 that he might strangle the dying one in order to release him from 734 the death agony (p. 944). Loud, shrill cries announce the end to the neighborhood, and people arrive without delay. I myself witnessed the two cases just described.

Fatal accidents are not uncommon. A whole family may 731 be taken if a canoe capsizes. A few men drag the body of a per-766 son who has drowned or fallen from a rock into his hut if it is not too far away. Otherwise, if the men are far from their families on a cormorant hunt, they bury the victim then and there and hasten to bring the news quickly to the family.

The demonstrations of mourning begin while a person is 763 dying and immediately afterwards. All the neighbors assemble in 152 front of the hut of the deceased or inside and start a loud, irregular moaning. Copious tears flow from grief and sincere sympathy. Everyone is again vividly reminded of Wataníelwa who has taken this person away. As was learned earlier from Bridges (a):206: "When a person is very ill and likely to die, great grief is shown, and the near relatives keep near, so as to act as mourners at the decease of the sick. They show much grief, and when the sick actually dies great lamentation is made, and the mourners weep profusely" /cited in English/.

2. The Burial

764 There is a remarkable number of reports, most of them brief, 114 however, about the way our Fuegians treat the corpse. The dying one has scarcely ceased breathing when the persons present bury themselves over him. As Bove (e):159 says, this time accurately: "They wrap the body of the deceased, which is still almost warm in a few rags." They use large pieces of leather and nowadays also scraps of sacking. Usually they leave the body in the position it assumed at death. The entire sheath is fastened and tied with strips of leather which are tightly wrapped around it in various directions (43). This happens in any case; "the dead are always

43. Hyades (q):379 says briefly that "the body is wrapped in some old skins of otter or seal; it is then buried"; Lovisato wrapt up in skins either when buried or burned" /cited in English/, as Bridges (a):206 confirms. Nowadays the /1105/ body is straightened out and the arms are placed at the sides, because burial in the ground is now the exclusive custom. The eyelids are not closed nor is the lower jaw lifted to close the mouth. The face is quickly covered with the shroud used for the entire body which is neither decorated nor ornamented. The corpse of a yékamuf, however, is specially treated; at least the face is painted and the customary feather ornament is wound around the forehead.

A few allusions and specific statements by old people leave no doubt that formerly cremation was more common and perhaps even the exclusive custom. This is confirmed by several travelers and missionaries (44). Bridges (MM:III, 119;1869), for example, states in so many words and without any qualification: "The dead are generally burnt to ashes" /cited in English/. It may be that this custom predominated chiefly in individual districts, for quite early Bridges (VP:XI, 259;1864) asserts that in the Wulaia region cremation was "the usual way of disposing of their dead" /cited in English/. It is not correct, however, to say that cremation is restricted to the yékamus (45). Nevertheless a few

44. Only the following will be mentioned: Bove (e):159, Bridges (a):206, (c):332, and (h):209, Despard (b):698, Hyades (f):585, (p):332, and (q):378, Outes (g):56, Spegazzini (a):168, and Spencer:74. Not a single one of these men definitely asserts that he personally witnessed a cremation.

45. Despard (b):698 was the only one to surmise this and gives the following reason: "Possibly to make sure that they may never return to trouble survivors, since in their life-time these practioners have been ever active in mischief" /cited in English/. In this instance he (VP:VI, 129;1859) relied altogether on the uncertain accounts of J. Button.

older reports admit that both types of interment were simultaneously known and used, for example, Stirling (VSA:XI, 198;1864) and Despard (b):696. At first Bridges (s):206 says: "Adult persons both male and female when they die are burned shortly after by the nearest male relatives, but sometimes (especially the females) are buried. Little children are generally buried when they die" /cited in English/. Later he writes: "Usually they bury their dead, but often they are burned." I know of no other place where it is said that they differentiated between adults on the basis of sex for cremation; in fact, local conditions were decisive for both sexes alike. Outes (g):56 made a certain qualification which in this general form is surely unjustified. He says: "If the death came about as the result of a fight or murder, the corpse is generally not burned, but is abandoned" /translated from Spanish/. Finally Hyades (f):385 tried to find out "in what situation they preferred cremation. They often told me that their practice was always to burn the bones of interred natives after they had been buried a certain time, but surely cremation is sometimes swifter..." /translated from French/. These words even indicate interment twice, for which there is absolutely no certain proof. Most of my aged /1106/ informants had experienced actual cremations. Under the influence of missionaries and European settlers this custom quickly had to give way to burial, which has been done exclusively for the last few decades. During the years when Bove (s):110 was traversing the south the following was still applicable: "Formerly the dead were burned, but nowadays this rarely occurs." According to my investigations, cremation was not the exclusive custom in olden times, but it was universal and predominant.

Not one of the authors mentioned above has described the procedure of burning a corpse. I, too, must rely on the accounts of my Indians who gave me the following description. The corpse, which is wrapped in a large piece of leather and tightly

764 bound with cord, is dragged out of the hut by a few men from among the close relatives. They take it to the nearest thicket or into the nearby woods. Here they lay it on a low bushy shrub with spreading branches. Smoldering sticks are pushed into the shrub and dry logs leaned against it. They fan it rapidly with leafy twigs, and in a few minutes the flames leap up. Usually after a short time the burned bush collapses. Then the burning corpse is covered with greater quantities of wood. The men alone do this first part, while the girls and women are obliged to fetch firewood incessantly and to keep the fire burning brightly until all the bones have been destroyed beyond recognition. Coarse sand or earth from the forest floor is dragged to the place with sticks or oars and scattered over the remaining small heap of ashes of the extinguished pyre. Finally the spot is covered with brush and fallen branches. After a few months it no longer is discernible. While this is going on, other people from the neighboring huts stand around the fire, watch the procedure, weep loudly, and sing their tálauwaia. A cremation does not take place on the open beach because the traces of it could not be quickly and completely eradicated. The corpse was laid upon a strong, thick shrub because igniting it is much easier than kindling a fire on the ever-damp forest floor.

766 Even in regions where cremation was preferred over burial, the body of a child was customarily buried in the ground. I was told: One man alone took this corpse and carried it into the forest where he quickly made a shallow hole in the ground and covered the body with earth and brush. This work was easy and not troublesome; the grave only required scratching away a bit of loose forest earth with a stick. Bridges (MM:III, 119;1869) also emphasizes that, in contrast to the burning of adult bodies, "young children are frequently buried" /cited in English/.

767 At all such cremations it was an absolute rule that the mourners left the spot only after the large bones of the corpse /1197/ had crumbled to fine dust in the strong heat and the scene of the fire had been made unrecognizable. They continued their weeping in the huts until far into the night. It is noteworthy, and contrary to the general conception of the Yamana, that every man and woman who helped in any way at the cremation received a gift [931] from the relatives of the deceased. This was by no means something that had belonged to the deceased, as a memento, for

764 [431] example; rather, the relatives themselves gave something that must be regarded as recompense for work performed and as a token of the gratitude of the survivors for this service of love. The strong incentive that led our Fuegians to burn the corpse of every adult was the fear that animals, especially rats, otters, dogs, and foxes, would devour it or gnaw at it (46). The thought of the disgusting habits of those animals made them shudder, and they wanted to make sure that the bodies would not be desecrated. Other reasons mentioned by one traveler or another are not valid. Hyades (p):332, for example, writes: "Sometimes [the dead] are burned, especially when death has taken place far from the habitual residence of the family" /translated from French/.

764 114 The following reports must also be clarified. On March 9, 1864, Stirling (VSA:XI, 198;1864) landed with his company on Isla Button. He sums up in the following words what he observed there: "Here is the funeral pyre on which the body of one of Macoallan's brothers was recently burned. Here the wigwam, or framework of branches, where for a day the body lay in state. The body of James Button [who had died shortly before] has not yet been burned: it is merely interred. The return of his brother from Keppel Island has been waited for, and now the remains will be submitted to the flames. This information is given to us in a subdued voice by Ookokko [who took part in this round trip]" /cited in English/. Hyades (c):142 generalizes this assertion (47).

> 47. He says: "The Fuegians do not have a funeral rite; they inter the body near their dwelling at a shallow depth and later burn the bones" /translated from French/.

One might deduce from these words that after a temporary burial the body is taken out of the grave and burned. This surmise is completely erroneous and neither Stirling nor Hyades was reliably informed. The simple fact is that any human bones which have in any way become exposed after burial are consigned to the fire for complete decomposition. Spencer:74 may well appear as a witness for the cremation of bodies, but he is mistaken in his reasoning: "Old woman says that in olden times bodies were burned, which agrees with remnants of large fires met with in deeper parts of old middens, three and four and five feet down, where also are no shells, or very few, and only calcined light-coloured earth" /cited in English/. The ashes in the lowest layers of the shell mounds are known to be remnants of hut fires which, of course, only later were /1108/ built on a layer of mussel shells (p.356). This does not contradict the fact that some corpses were buried in shell mounds.

Besides the burning of the bodies of adults in ancient times, burial in the ground was also customary, at least for children and possibly also now and then for adults. Fitz-Roy (a):181 credits all the water nomads of the Fireland Archipelago with it (48) and > 48. He asserts: "When a person dies, his family wrap the body in skins, and carry it a long way into the woods; there they place it upon broken boughs, or pieces of solid wood, and then pile a great quantity of branches over the corpse" /cited in English/.

there is also no lack of witnesses for it from more recent times. Lovisato (b):148 certainly deserves assent when he says that "the burial of corpses in that tribe dates from the time of the Ushuaia Mission" /translated from Italian/, in contrast to cremation as a "custom also practiced today by some, but very rarely, and doggedly combatted by the missionaries" /translated from Italian/. Actually, with the coming of Europeans, cremation, which formerly was almost universal, gave way to burial in the ground exclusively. It is inaccurate to maintain that the Indians traveled to certain places solely for this purpose. According to Bridges (a):206, to whom Lovisato (b):147 refers, "small islands are preferred for burying-places, as there are no foxes to disturb the dead...Sometimes also the dead are buried at the foot of cliffs among the rocks, 764 in places safe from foxes" /cited in English/. The Yamana would 114 not take so much trouble; they customarily bury a corpse not far from the hut.

764 Soon after death the body is wrapped in pieces of leather or in strong scraps of leather and bound with long leather strips. Only occasionally is it placed on short poles which are also enclosed in the wrapping, the body being stretched out in this case. Several men who offer their services are occupied with all this for about an hour, while the rest of the people present sigh and weep. Then they lift up the body, each one putting his arm over it and pressing it against his hip, and carry it to the place agreed upon. According to my personal observation, four men arrange themselves around the corpse, two on either side. A few decades ago they chose a large shell mound. It is easy to dig a rather large hole in it with poles and oars, and the hole can be quickly and easily covered again. In recent times our Indians prefer to bury the corpse in a sandbank lying off the shore or in a low hill of coarse gravel. It is regularly laid in position on its back (48), which is easy to arrange and maintain, and then covered with earth and gravel or with the mixture of sand and mussel shells. Now and then they insert a few short branches. They put a great many large stones over it to prevent dogs or predatory animals from getting at the body. If an animal should nevertheless succeed in doing so, /1109/ it is immediately killed, for the Yamana have a great aversion to seeing a corpse uncovered. Finally the spot is made to look exactly like the surroundings so as to be unrecognizable (50). Anyone

48. Only Spencer:62 maintains that the corpse is "always buried lying on back with head towards west" /cited in English/. There is no proof for this.

50. Hyades (g):33 has described the procedure of a burial somewhat more elaborately (cf. also Anuario Hidrográfico de la Marina de Chile, Vol. XI, p. 804; Santiago, 1889). It is briefly mentioned by Lavisato (b):147, Despard (b):630, Bridges (a):206, (b):208, and Spegazzini (a):188.

765 who knows about it avoids it out of anxious fear. Other people, not the nearest relatives, accompany or assist the men who bury the corpse. When they have finished their work, they quietly and unobtrusively rejoin those who have gathered in a hut and are loudly mourning.

766 As has been said, as soon as death occurs, immediate preparations for burial are made unless one must await the coming dawn because of the darkness of the night. In exceptional cases the body is interred in a small cave nearby or in the cavity of a rock if there is earth or gravel available to cover it. Even in our day the corpse has been destroyed in the hut fire. If, for instance, a married couple were all alone in some spot and the husband died, and other people, although notified by the customary triple smoke signal, could not get there quickly because of high waves, the surviving wife would be obliged to make the best of it. Without any special preparation of the corpse, she would drag it into the hut fire and pile brush and firewood on top of it. Soon the flames would leap so high that the hut itself would catch fire. The woman would keep the fire going until the corpse was completely destroyed. The same thing was done if the path into the forest was blocked or the customary burial in the ground was in any way prevented. The concern of the survivors is always to do away with the corpse without delay, and even a person by himself is able to do that.

767 768 Among the Yamana, just as among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 102), it has been customary from ancient times to destroy all the possessions of the deceased, by consigning them to the flames, throwing them into the sea, or placing the individual pieces in the grave with the corpse. Bridges (y):201 confirms that the deceased's "property is either cast into the sea or burned" /tried in English/, and Bove (z):159 adds: "In the grave of a man, they bury pieces of harpoons, spears, slings, etc., and with a woman, nets and fishing gear." These things are in no way meant as actual burial accessories; the survivors are guided solely by the desire to destroy in one way or another everything that belonged to the deceased. That is why it is a matter of course for them "to burn the hut of the deceased, which was his last abode, and to leave the area for some time," to repeat Bove's (z):159 words.

/1110/ Directly after the burial, as soon as their own things have been brought to safety, the widower or the widow usually sets fire to the hut, "setting fire to the grass and bushes of the neighbourhood" /cited in English/ (Bridges [i] :1). The meaning of this is that the survivors want to "do all they can to blot out all remembrance of the departed" /cited in English/, according to Bridges (VSA XI, 259,1954). There should be nothing to remind them of the great loss they suffered when that beloved person was taken away from them. This is especially true of parents and children, as well as of spouses. Many a person behaves like one demented and, in his excitement, does not even shy from sacrificing indispensable objects of his own. The individual articles need not be burned, since everything is indiscriminately destroyed. The surviving spouse even destroys the canoe if there is a prospect of fleeing from this place of death in another vessel. The canoe is regarded as the personal field of activity of the wife, and it would constantly remind the surviving husband of her. A mother is particularly ruthless with all the little things used by her deceased child. She furiously burns articles of clothing, toys, little baskets, and other things into the fire. She, too, feels as though she must leave the hut when she sees the empty places where her child ate, slept, and played. For a long time the parents are haunted by the bitterest sorrow. If a father whose daughter has been snatched away by death is lucky in hunting, he carefully examines his spoils. He abandons female birds and sea lions because they remind him of his daughter. A hunter who mourns a dead son acts similarly: he takes only the female animals of those he has killed and throws the males into the sea. Our Yamana have a specific name for the animals that a grieving man puts aside in memory of his deceased child: čiyellijara, which is perhaps related to čiyelli čiyelle in SD:129. The dog is the sole exception. Out of pity, and also because he is particularly valuable, they do not want to kill him. Hence he is given to the older son, brother, or a relative of the deceased.

Anyone who has helped at a burial and in the destruction of the possessions of the deceased is rewarded with gifts from the nearest relatives who dispense them voluntarily (p. 1050). Bridges (ib:256) has already pointed out that "liberal presents are made to those who assist at the burning or the burial" /cited in English/.

768 Hyades (p):335 and (q):379 interprets this custom erroneously: "The heir divides among the friends of the deceased what belonged to the latter, as though the nearest relatives did not wish to draw any kind of profit from the death of one of them" /translated from French/. The idea of bequeathing the possessions of a deceased person to others is unfamiliar to our Fuegians. Rather, they emphasize that only the owner personally has a right to them, and therefore the belongings of anyone who has departed this life must be destroyed. BD:127 gives čiyellīara, /1111/ "to give away things specially those left by the dead, as a sign of sorrow for the dead, as near relatives were expected to do to those who were not connected by kin with the dead" /cited in English/. This statement, which in part is inaccurate, is valid only to the extent I have just indicated; I refer to the meaning of čiyellīara, which I obtained from present-day Yamana.

766 All the Indians are especially brisk in dealing with the corpse of a yākamuł; almost without exception it is burned. His tools and utensils are placed upon the fire from the start, and while the flames are consuming everything, the people present also toss in all kinds of things that they happen to have at hand, such as small baskets, ornaments, tools, and so forth. They want to show their esteem for the yākamuł and also that they are ruthlessly depriving themselves of even their own indispensable utensils and implements.

3. Minor Manifestations of Sorrow

152 Since our Fuegians do not know anything about the fate of souls after death and regard the separation from them as a state that will last forever, each death causes them untold sorrow. This is so sincere and so deeply felt that in this respect they surpass many Europeans. Not everyone who has traveled through those regions has had an opportunity to convince himself of this, since our Indians conceal their grief from strangers. I was a witness to it several times and can also rely on corresponding reports of missionaries. Bove (e):188, who does not even mention that he personally observed a funeral, nevertheless, and perhaps for that very reason, speaks of their "indifference toward the dead. The cries they utter, the way

152 they beat themselves, the destruction of the hut in which the deceased breathed his last are reflections of custom more than true expressions of grief." Nevertheless, he admits that "there really are persons who feel the loss very deeply." All doubt is removed by the conduct of parents whose child has been torn from them by death. Now and then they actually behave as though they had taken leave of their senses. According to Hyades (g):20 the "loss of children is in general deeply felt and often the French [of the Mission Scientifique] saw the features of the savages cloud over and the women even burst into weeping and lamentation if there happened to be a reference to such a death." Spegazzini's (a): 168 observation alone shows what every Fuegian mother goes through when she must part from the lifeless body of her child (51).

51. He writes: "I have seen a young woman whose child had died take the corpse and go to the woods where the little body, cleaned and curiously painted, after having been pressed to her bosom several times, was wrapped in fox skins and enclosed in a framework of twigs, which she immediately buried under the leaves of a tree. Upon leaving she cast a look at the place where her little one was, one of those looks that would require a whole book to be explained and whose meaning could be appreciated only by a mother similarly stricken" /translated from Spanish/. Before that Fitz-Roy (a):179 had learned: "Matthews sometimes heard a great howling, or lamentation, about sun-rise in the morning; and upon asking Jemmy Button what occasioned this outcry, he could obtain no satisfactory answer; the boy only saying, 'people very sad, cry very much.' Upon one occasion when some canoes were alongside the 'Beagle,' a sudden howl from one of the Fuegians aroused several others who were near, and at the opposite side of the vessel, when a general howl of lamentation took place, which was ended by a low growling noise. By this, as well as by pulling their hair, and beating their breasts, while tears streamed down their faces, they evinced their sorrow for the loss of some friends who had perished, some days before the 'Beagle' 's arrival, by the upsetting of a loaded canoe" /Aired in English/.

15a Persons in particular /1111/ lose control of themselves and make loud and bitter accusations against Wesenindjwa, insult him, and swear revenge against him (p. 888). Sorrow breaks through uncontrolled among these compelled children of nature. The first utterance always exceeds all bounds, but the grief continues to be deeply felt for months and years and occasionally flares up in its initial violence. "The mourning lasts long, sometimes for two years, but it gradually becomes less, till the memory of the dead passes from the mind" /Aired in English/ (Bridges [a] :246).

While the dying person is still struggling with death, his nearest relatives are already weeping and howling. The strongest outbursts of their grief begins after life has departed. Loud, shrill cries are uttered at short intervals, and it seems as though each one is intended to surpass the other. Mixed in with them are uncontrolled howling and groaning by other persons. A loud and indescribable confusion of voices fills the little hut. The longer it lasts, the more neighbors harass there, and some stays away. Everyone squats on the ground, and sometimes they sit pressed so closely together that they can scarcely move. Once I even saw them remove the hut fire because of lack of room. Everyone present wants to be as close to the body as possible, at least to be inside the hut. Long hours are filled with whimpering and sighing, howling and lamenting. While this is going on, a few men begin wrapping the corpse in pieces of bandage. While it is being dragged out of the hut, the howling reaches its loudest and wildest pitch. The behavior of the persons present clearly shows their feeling that the deceased is now departing forever. They writhe with pain, throw themselves on the ground and get up again, wave their arms about wildly and full of despair, and clench one another as though they would tear each other apart. This continues

TAP 150 for hours with tireless persistence, although the loud lamentations increase and diminish. Meanwhile the corpse has been buried. If it is buried, the howling and crying does not by any means cease while this is going on.

No matter how the corpse has been removed, it is only under /1112/ the compulsion of complete exhaustion that the neighbors who are not close to the deceased inconspicuously leave. After the hut of the dead person has been destroyed by fire, his nearer relatives crowd in elsewhere. Here they continue their lamentation for many more hours, headless of the night which has perhaps long since fallen. This stimulates the neighbors to resume their role of laments. For at least 10 hours after the soul's departure there is never an interval of complete quiet; the graves or hand tunnels of widows continue without pause. Even on the second and third day those who are nearest to the deceased barely interrupt their howling now and then for brief pauses, and the other people often fall in with them for two or three hours. All this depends on the disposition of the individual and on a number of incalculable motives. Almost all the adults become quite perceptibly exhausted. As though crushed, as though overwhelmed by grief, everyone remains in his hut almost without interruption. Now and then a person goes to those who have been directly affected by the misfortune, remains near them at least two hours, and weeps with them, as is demanded by sympathetic concern, according to the ideas of our Tungiaan. Out of the same consideration everyone must remain mild and quiet, even at a considerable distance from the mourning family. Even children may not talk loudly or laugh.

TAS 150 For the first few days after a death has occurred all is very quiet in the entire camp. It was simply impossible for me to get people in front of the phonograph and the camera during this brief period. They rejected all my urging, which they interpreted as a violation of their innermost feelings, with the decisive words: "We are now in mourning!" Then they told me, rarely and clearly, that they were simply unavailable for other matters.

TAS 200 The custom of announcing a death without delay by means of signal fires has been discussed (p.[illegible]). These thick clouds of smoke are sent up close together, which are chiefly meant to call other families to come quickly and help the family that has been [illegible] 202 [illegible] [illegible] by death and is sometimes in a difficult position. The duty to give unselfish aid which burns silently in everyone's soul, especially at the sight of the universally recognized strike signal, compulsively drives them to the scene of misfortune. The consumers themselves appreciate it very much if every tribal member uses answer their summons.

After the initial, very lively outburst have somewhat abated, the painful event drives all present away from the scene of the misfortune with uncanny force. Within four days or the outside, after the but of the deceased has been burned, the scenario is changed. Usually each of the families [illegible] which have experienced the death departs in a separate direction. So each family wishes to be by itself if possible so that the others will not constantly remind them of the event. The ethnometer particular mentioned this conduct which is common to both the Tamata and the Sulu bans (Vol. 1, 969) (32). Hyndes (pp.[illegible]) also informs > 32. There is one exception only, which Bridges (Vol. III, 33-1963) furnished on November 10, 1864. In Wulaia the younger child of the well-known Ukalita died, and he immediately left this region. "For it is an unwritten act that the Fuegians will not, sometimes for a long time, return to the place where their relatives have died" /Freed in English/.

[illegible] this: "In general the bar in which a native died is burnd, and the place where it stood is abandoned for a long time by the friends of the deceased" /translated from French/. They, of course, way away from this place for a certain time, ad meanwhile it is abandoned by the blind forces of nature. If the grave or the burial place has become open-approachable as a result of plant growth or other circumstances, no one feels any reminiscence to settling down there.

[illegible] 55 [illegible] The [illegible] of never mentioning the name of he deceased is in accord with the effort they make not to be reminded in any way of the deceased. There are several witnesses for this. The first is Fitz Roy (pp.[illegible]) who was refer directly to Jemmy Button: "He would not talk of a dead person, saying, with a grave shake

of the head, 'no good, no good talk; my country never omen: "The Fueguians do not even like to mention their deceased friends"; likewise Bridges (MM:III,119;1869): the name of those who have died "is not mentioned for years, and they seek to utterly forget them" /cited in English/. That is not all; according to Bridges (VSA:XI,150;1884), "the name of the dead is sacred for a long time after, and it is a great provocation to mention the name of the dead" /cited in English/ (53). In case a survivor has a name 53. Elsewhere he (a):196 reports: "The name of the dead is not mentioned to the mourners, as it is considered very offensive, and would endanger a person's life" /cited in English/. When, in March, 1884, Stirling (VSA:XI,103;1884) spent some time in the Wulaia region, he was asked "not to allude to the deceased by name; for the Fueguians, like the Patagonians and other Indians, bury in silence the names of the departed" /cited in English/. Further confirmation is found in Hyades (g):30 and (g):273, Lovisato (b):148, Spencer:101, and others.

which is identical with that of the deceased, he must give it up (54). For example, he will exchange the name taken from 54. Not only the neighboring Selk'nam (Vol. I, 365), but also other tribes of North and South America follow this custom. We give here an example from the more recent times. H. Baldus, "Erbfolge der Häuptlinge bei den Tuxem" /Hereditary Succession of Chiefs among the Tuxem/ (Ethnologischer Anzeiger, Vol. IV, pp. 38-42, Stuttgart, 1936), reports of these Indians in the southern Matto Grosso: "If one of the parents dies, all the children of the family are given other names, so that the surviving parent is not reminded of the past by their former names and thereby saddened."

his birthplace, according to the common custom, for the name of the place where he experienced his first youth initiation, or, in changing the name, they may take into consideration a striking physical peculiarity.

The nearest relatives of a deceased person are designated by a special term for some /1115/ time after his death, which is to let people know that they are in mourning. RD-104 gives [illegible], "a name given a boy instead of his usual name in respect to the recent dead, when both have the same name" /cited in English/; also, [illegible], "a name given the surviving female who bore the same usual name as a person lately dead" /cited in English/; and, finally, [illegible], "a term given to a place instead of its proper name in respect to the dead who was named after it" /cited in English/. These terms are still in use today and were explained to me with these same meanings. I was also given the word [illegible]. It refers to one who bears the same name as one who has deceased. It is not given in RD. After some time, when the changed name (55) has become common, > 55. Spencer-90, 100 cites particular details. "'Kauk' is a berry now called 'Kraun.' Berry /berry?/ used to be called 'kauk,' but most of this name died, so changed name of berry.... 'Lappa,' mound, was name of man who died, now called 'Cachuing.' 'Tawalla' is name of man who died, so changed to 'Gnak'" /cited in English/.

this temporary designation is also dropped because it is no longer necessary (56).

> 56. The custom trait of not giving children proper names until late in life must be mentioned. With the prevailing high infant mortality, frequent mention of the name would constantly remind the parents of their loss. Since, as Bridges (x):276 realized, "it is considered evil to name the dead, if the child had no name the parents are not vexed by hearing it named" /cited in English/.

Now and then, of course, mention is made of a dead person, and the Tonaca resort to circumlocutions which they easily invent and comprehend. For instance, if parents use an expression such as "my first child" or "my younger daughter," the people present, who are well aware of the number of children these parents have, clearly understand. Spagnoli (p).168 also speaks of this custom (17). Fred Lawrence assured me that within a period of a few years he was twice given another name by the natives. Now one and then another person who died had the same name he did. It must be pointed out here how difficult research becomes as a result of the Tonaca custom of not speaking of deceased persons. I was told that a certain Filañiñone from the Williams Islands murdered five men who had lived there in the manner of the Salitaria. He alone knew about their way of life and briefly reported it to his countrymen. The latter, however, refused to repeat this information and excused themselves by saying: "We do not speak about the deceased, respect he does demands this (18)."

> 17. In view of all this it is very strange that Cooper.145 could maintain: "The Tolgan prayer /prayed?/ to the deceased" /cited in English/. The Tonaca do, of course, often remember their dead and remove them on the occasion of a general funeral ceremony, but without mentioning their names.

> 18. Dyeden (p).50 also mentioned this great disadvantage: "They avoid speaking of their dead ancestors as much as possible and it is particularly difficult to get them to mention their names, which, of course, makes historical accounts almost impossible."

765 Since our Fangwe are very dependent on everything visual,
302 actual outward signs of mourning are so low important for them. /1116/ Body painting is of primary importance. It is absolutely demanded -- and no one would be guilty of negligence in this respect -- that anyone who learns of the death must paint himself in some way. A person chooses the particular pattern he wears, but he must paint himself. This is the way one shows his participation in the event and his sympathy with those chiefly affected, and it is universally regarded as of primary importance. Even before death has set in, everyone present reaches for a small piece of charcoal, crushes it between his hands, and rubs the powder over his whole body. As soon as the dull emery from the lot of the dying person announces that he has expired, everyone in the neighboring huts immediately rubs his face with charcoal dust in the same manner. If a canoe approaches the coast and its occupants wear the decoration of mourning, the people on shore do not await its arrival and the message, but paint themselves without delay and, thus prepared, hasten toward the new arrivals from whom they hear the news. Everyone who receives news of a death from whatever source must immediately paint himself in some way.

The nearest relatives of the deceased always apply only the dry charcoal powder all over their bodies. They rub it into their faces several times a day, usually at times when their sorrow wells up more acutely. In their excitement they are not particular about distributing the color evenly. Irregular stripes and large spots cover their faces and bodies, and they look frightfully ugly. This appeals to them. For many days they must paint themselves anew each morning, most after they awaken and before they eat anything. They also immediately commence their song of mourning, which they accompany with loud weeping. This occupies the period roughly between four and six o'clock. Some people regularly begin their day in this manner for many months after the death of their relative, and this incessant manifestation of mourning has a distressing effect on all the people in the neighboring huts. During the day, of course, they also maintain the customary body painting for the deceased.

There are, however, some mourners who after about three weeks begin to take some pains with their facial painting and do it more carefully. Their favorite pattern is nonsymmetrical. They rub half the face with red pigment, the other half with black, the color having first been mixed with blubber. With the nails of the four fingers they scratch thin lines into this even layer from the eyelids across the cheeks to the edge of the jaw bone. These lines are supposed to indicate the paths of the many tears, as though they had washed the color away.

It is the general practice, then, for the nearest relatives of the deceased, as well as all the friends and neighbors, to rub dry charcoal dust all over the body /1117/ during the days immediately following death. A few women are satisfied to paint only their heads and the upper part of their bodies. Some of the men go further, however, and draw a white, arched line a hand's breadth wide from one shoulder to the other; others add to this pattern by drawing a similar vertical line from the throat to the navel. All this applies to the nearest relatives, who regularly follow the above style, whereas other people are free to choose any kind of pattern. On their faces they usually apply white or red dots, crosshatching, and lines in all kinds of arrangements on the black background (59). This type of body painting is used 59. This practice can be illustrated by a small group of mourners whom Aspinall (Mid:XXII, 191:1885) observed on May 31, 1885. "When we arrived they were all painted, and, on asking the cause, we found that on the morning of our arrival a canoe had upset and two children were drowned. The nearest relatives had their faces quite black, the chief friends had streaks of red radiating from the eyes over the cheeks, while one woman, to tell the cause of death, had two lines of white drawn from ear to ear across the bridge of the nose, with white spots between of graduated sizes from the nose to the ears" /cited in English/.

when the death was caused by illness or old age; in itself it means a natural death (60).

60. This is probably the reason that other observers quite generally call black the color of mourning. Hyades (g):39, for example, writes: "They also wear outward signs of mourning, black body painting."

In addition, particular drawings are used to indicate any kind of violent death. If a person has fallen from a cliff or from a tree, one first of all rubs his face with fine powdered charcoal and over that paints three vertical white lines, namely, from the bridge of the nose to the tip and on down from the mouth to the chin, and on both sides of the face from the outer corners of the eyes over the cheek bones and down to the edges of the jaw. These marks are separated by a white cross-stripe over the eyes and nose to complete the pattern. There is another somewhat more complicated design. First, a black background is put over the whole face. Over it, on one side of the face beginning at the eye, three white vertical lines are drawn to the edge of the jaw and a fourth stripe from the bridge of the nose to the tip of the chin. The other half of the face remains uniformly black or has three white cross-stripes from the corner of the mouth, the nostril, and the outer edge of the eye. The white lines, which symbolize the cliff or the tree, are sometimes also applied on a black background. Now and then the three cross-stripes are made with a mixture of white lime and black powdered charcoal stirred up with blubber. This last procedure is almost regularly used by the messengers who spread the news of the accident. Others recognize from afar the substance of their report.

/1118/ A considerable number of Yamana die by drowning. In order to announce this type of death the people mix white and black pigments and rub the mixture over the lower part of the face down to the mouth. This gray mixture resembles the slimy sediment on the sea floor with which the mouth of a drowned person is filled. In addition, they put a strip of skin with white down [301] feathers around their foreheads, which indicates the foam-crested waves in which the unfortunate one was drowned. The painted area which extends down to the mouth and not beyond is meant to show that a great deal of water entered the mouth (61). Sometimes

61. Bridges (MM:X, 80;1875) mentions that this type of accident is characterized by a special painting, but he does not describe it in detail: "By and by a company of Eastern arrived, they brought sad news; a canoe had been lost, with a large number of persons on board, among whom was the uncle and brother of this young fellow. He was very much troubled, yet mourned and grieved quietly. All those who came, and were in any way related to any of the lost party, had their faces painted in imitation of the waves of the sea, and all here, similarly circumstanced, did the same. This is their way of mourning and noted events" /cited in English/.

As "a sign of mourning for a drowned child," Aspinall:270 saw among the people of Wollaston "red lines on the faces of the men, as well as a dark cross-band with light dots on the faces of the women." This was merely common painting, not typical of this accident. Lovisato (b): 147 referred to specific kinds of painting for the various causes of death and probably based his statement on Bridges (i): 14, who clearly says: "There were regular systems of painting by which the nature of the death of the departed was indicated. Thus, for death by drowning the pattern was black bands with white edges, if by violence it was black or red with white spots, if natural a plain black" /cited in English/.

they also paint the upper half of the face a uniform black and add white cross-stripes close together or rows of dots. These horizontal lines are meant to indicate that the victim sank deeper and deeper which caused the rising water level to make

765 successive marks above the mouth.
302 Now and then a murder is committed. The friends and relatives of the unfortunate one call attention to it by means of several vertical red lines on the face, which radiate out from the level of the eyes. They set out to find the culprit and gather helpers to expiate the crime. They want to make it visible from afar that this is their intention. The straight red lines indicate the paths marked by the flowing blood. If this occasions combat (p. 901), the relatives and friends uniformly paint their entire bodies black, while the opponents paint themselves red. Each of these two groups paints the same color on their weapons and clubs.

Our Yamana do not by any means strictly adhere to these particular decorations. They often give in to momentary whims. One afternoon at a common funeral rite I saw that all the people present had followed the request of an old man /1119/ and painted half the face a uniform black while the other half was covered with fine vertical red lines, the former indicating an ordinary death a few weeks before, the latter as a reminder of a murder long ago. Actually, it is incumbent on the nearest relatives to apply the painting that indicates the specific cause of death, but just as they may disregard this and choose another type, so also may the friends and people less close to them adopt the latter. I was also told of the rule that the nearest relatives of the deceased must rub their faces and the upper part of their bodies to the navel with a uniform layer of dry charcoal dust, and that the neighbors and friends cover their entire bodies with vertical black lines set close together, with rows of white dots running over them and beside them. Actually, however, this ancient pattern is found only occasionally nowadays, and people limit it to the face alone. In more recent times, however, almost everyone as a rule wraps the strip of skin with down feathers around his forehead. A corpse is never painted, as has already been mentioned; only the corpse of a yékamuf is thus distinguished, as will be explained later.

Whereas the paintings described above have been preserved to this day, the tonsure of mourning, which was a general custom in former times has been abolished. Long ago Bridges (b):209 mentioned that "they were obliged to cut the hair on the crown of their

765 heads as a sign of mourning" /translated from Spanish/. On the 302 day when a death occurred, the women and children, not so often the men, had the hair on the top of their heads shaved with a mussel shell. Only a wide wreath of hair was left around the head. Thus, "for some time the hair on the crown of their head was shorn like a tonsure," as Hyades (g):20 and (p):330 expresses himself. The head was shaved only once; after that the hair was allowed to grown in freely. A man who wore this tonsure was called kēpikun, a woman, kēpikipa. BD:175 also gives this last word exactly as it is given here, but the first one somewhat differently. The Selk'nam (Vol. 1, 556) have followed this custom more faithfully. Since Europeans have permanently settled in those regions, our Indians do not want to be conspicuous with a large tonsure and content themselves with cutting the hair all around their heads at the level of the ear lobes. They have recently given up even this symbol of mourning. The Yamana repeatedly assured me that formerly everyone took pains with the proper large tonsure of mourning. In recent times they all tie the strip of skin with down-feathers, apawūra, around their heads instead.

765 Finally, a person who has been particularly affected by a death inflicts superficial wounds upon himself as a special expression of his sorrow. He takes sharp splinters of a mussel shell or a piece of slate and scratches first his arms and legs and then his chest until blood flows. /1120/ Bridges (MM:III, 119;1869), along with Hyades (q):379, Lovisato (b):147, and Spencer:104, asserts: "It is a common practice for the kindred to wound and cut themselves" /cited in English/. Nowadays among our Fueglans it is usually only the mother who inflicts such wounds upon herself when her child dies. Among the Selk'nam (Vol. 1, 556) many more people do this.

The hours immediately following the death of a relative or friend, during which the corpse is burned or buried, are filled with the shrill crying and pitiful howling of those present. After their feelings have been somewhat assuaged, more moderate songs of mourning replace the outcries. Other observers have made only fleeting references to them, for example, Hyades (q):379: "When the Fueglans learn of the death of a relative or friend, they immediately show their sorrow with great vehemence through tears 765 and lamentations" /translated from French/. Bridges (MM:III, 119,1869) speaks of "long-continued mourning and incantation for the dead" /cited in English/. Earlier, Despard (VP:VIII, 179, 1861) reported: "Afternoon, Oolukko enlarged upon the many deaths that happen in 'my uncle country,' and then described some of the concomitants. Men come, many come, sing much. Hah yang how yi ya say. Hawa bye-gya swaticca loopen wuta wenewan...Cut face with finger nail, make blood rub over face, cut hair head top, put on red, make body here red, here black, white round legs, all same tie stocking. Cry much, water run down face, make lines in black, red. Our men cry very much" /cited in English/ (62).

> 62. Shortly before, in Beagle Channel, Despard (VP:VI, 111,1859) observed something similar: "We noticed one lady, with a face deepened to a fine black by charcoal, and were informed she was in mourning. Afterwards a wailing and a monotonous dirge proceeded from her ucer [hut], being her funeral wail for two men and a boy belonging to her family, who have recently died, somewhere along the Beagle Channel" /cited in English/.

765 152 As I know from my own experience, the nearest relatives of the deceased avoid all distracting occupations during the first three or four days, and they remain almost constantly in the dwelling. This is the period of strictest mourning, which they spend in incessant lamentation and scarcely take any nourishment. Crouched by the fire, they weep and howl incessantly. With sad faces and mournful voices they repeat in a very simple rhythm a most monotonous melody with meaningless words, such as awáj awáj or ówaici and others. When their agitation is great, their singing is louder and stronger; when they are exhausted, it subsides and becomes a monotonous murmur. Usually they move the upper part of the body gently back and forth or sideways with the rhythm. They roll their eyes, distort their faces, tear their hair, scratch slight wounds on their faces with their finger nails, and even throw

765 152 themselves flat on the ground and for a time behave as though they were mad. This need not surprise one, for after their continuous exertion they finally lose all self-control and mental power. It is possible that /1131/ this strange behavior has caused a person in strict mourning to be called hannúšun, or hannuškipa. BD:265 explains this as: "A man, woman like a hámuł, i.e., insane, senseless" /cited in English/.

The people from the neighboring huts join the strict mourners several times a day, not all at once, but irregularly and freely in individual groups. The latter are still vigorous, and they fall in with the singing of those present and stimulate them anew; hence the singing does not stop day or night. Even if all the families have left the scene of death after two to four days, the mourners soon begin their weeping again at the place where they erect their hut. They stimulate the new neighbors here to take part in their lamentation. At first they devote a great many hours to it, and fewer later on, but they continue it even after two and three years, although then only at longer intervals (63).

> 63. Hyades (q):379 agrees: "This great sorrow soon subsides; nevertheless the women nurse their grief for several months, repeating the scenes of tears and lamentations almost every day" /translated from French/.

It is customary to interject the well-known, ancient formulas of lament and the reproaches against Watauinčiwa into the singing (p.769). This is done not only by the nearest relatives, but also by friends and neighbors who happen to take part in this song of mourning. Everyone, of course, appears with one of the customary body paintings of mourning. It is the absolute duty of every adult Tamana to accompany for a few hours every day those mourners who are relieving their souls of grief through loud whimpering and groaning. This goes on day and night and arouses the sympathy of everyone in the neighboring huts.

If someone dies during a čiéxaus or kína and the participants hear of it, they, too, devote several days and many hours to the customary song of mourning. As Nelly Lawrence asserted, the western Tamana customarily inserted a ceremony of mourning

769 resembling a yamalaĻemóina into each čiĻéxau celebration, even if no one had died meanwhile. During this ceremony they vividly remembered in particular those persons who in former years had taken a very active part in the affair. The other groups now and then imitated this custom. While it was going on, the participants, each to himself, thought about the deceased person whose loss was most painful to them, and they painted themselves to indicate the manner of his death. A true Yamana can never quite forget his dead, even though their names are no longer mentioned.

765 It has already been mentioned that for a few days the nearest relatives of a deceased person take almost no nourishment.
262 Their neighbors and friends generally follow their example, especially if a murder is being mourned. Formerly even children were made to fast, and everywhere there was strict quiet. In order to carry out all this undisturbed, /1122/ the mourners sometimes retired into the nearby woods and stayed there for a few days and nights, weeping and moaning beside an open fire. After that they returned to their dwellings. The women who told me this were unstinting in their admiration for the hardiness of their countrymen of former times and frankly confessed that they themselves lacked the strength and perseverance for such feats.

767 Although everyone willingly participates in a song of mourning, there is a type of wailing woman who may on occasion assist someone. A person will invite these women if he himself has no near relatives, for with the loss that death has inflicted upon him he feels his isolation all the more painfully. Shame also plays a certain role in the case of a person who clearly feels that the death he mourns is a punishment for wrongdoing and who is made conscious of it by others. During the first few days nature quite impetuously demands her rights and the mourner expresses his grief without restraint; later he is sometimes overcome by consciousness of his guilt. According to ancient custom, the lamenting, groaning, weeping, and singing must continue for several weeks. Sometimes distant relatives or friends chosen at random are given this duty. On occasion, as so-called arnēmutu tálawaja, they render an outstanding performance. Men also may do this, and they act on special invitation; indeed they are enlisted, so to speak, and receive some reward for their efforts. These so-called weeping women simply repeat the customary

767 monotonous melodies, and if they are tired they content themselves with humming a barely audible, continuous hăĭ hăĭ... on the same pitch. It is these weeping women in particular who again and again refer to Wataginĕ̄ĵwa and who ceaselessly repeat one or another of the ancient formulas of mourning. BD:653 gives yinĕ̄ĵa and yinĕ̄kĭpa with the meaning "mourner" /cited in English/; arăĭmuta tăĭagwaja has the special meaning "weeping women."

765 533 An attentive observer will note that the Yamana vividly and often recall their dead and that, as Bridges (c):322 tersely expressed himself, "mourning was strictly observed." Individual persons often gather together to sing songs of mourning, even when there has been no immediate death. The most common term for this is tăĭagwaja, or tăĭĭagwaja, which emphasizes the private, everyday, inconspicuous nature of the performance. Only a few persons join in a tăĭagwaja, namely, the relatives and their intimate friends. There are no special invitations, and no involved preparations are necessary. The simple painting of mourning and participation in the singing suffice for all. Thus a person who is seized with grief for his beloved dead initiates /1123/ a tăĭagwaja, and he can count on an immediate response from those close to him. BD:398 gives tellaaja, "being mourners or in mourning for the dead" /cited in English/. If tăĭagwaja also means a person who is mourning, it is clear that, like a deep groan, it is meant to point to the grieving person when it is repeated in the cries of lamentation addressed to Wataginĕ̄ĵwa. Usually it stands at the end of a prayer and a request, and it could be translated as: woe is me, I am in mourning, how sad I am, this is the reason for my sorrow, and so forth (p. 989). Now and then lōĭma takes the place of tăĭagwaja. Strictly speaking, the former is a song by means of which one gets in touch with any kind of spirit. A person who mourns the dead recalls their souls to his own memory, as it were; he feels that they are near, devotes all his attention to them, and once more is with them. An association with them such as people enjoy in everyday life, however, cannot take place. Hence the pain of separation from these soul-spirits gains the upper hand again, and that is what the grieving person, full of despair, puts into his lōĭma cry.

769 A certain group of travelers has notoriously emphasized that our Fuegians are not afraid of corpses. Hyades (g):30 maintains: "They seem not to have the slightest fear of death and of corpses"; he refers to a man who "opened the grave of his recently deceased wife for the French." He may be speaking here of the same matter that he (i):618 mentions elsewhere: "I still have only one skeleton. It is that of a woman about thirty years old, which I bought from her husband seven or eight days after her death" /translated from French/. One should not generalize from the behavior of an individual Indian. Shortly thereafter another Yamana with his two wives came to the mission in Ushuaia where Hyades happened to be staying and where he had established a small hospital. The Fuegian, despite a severe illness, refused to let himself be cared for there; "the reason for his refusal, not concealed, was the fear that he would suffer the same fate as the exhumed woman" /translated from French/. Lovisato (b):149, too, expresses his surprise that a certain "Fred did not show any aversion to selling the skeleton of his father" /translated from Italian/. Nevertheless, there was no lack of resistance, as Bove honestly admits in (b):107 and in (MM:XVII, 262;1883): "At first my request for human skeletons met with some remonstrance from the Fuegians, but Ococco, understanding what my object was in making a collection, successfully arranged this matter. Some of them sold me offhand the bones of their fathers" /cited in English/. According to my inquiries, Bove exhumed the skeletons only from the cemetery of the mission station at Ushuaia. Since, as is known, all the Indians who had lost a relative in death purposely avoided this station, it is probably understandable that, under pressure or for ample remuneration, this or that Fuegian who had no interest in the graves there helped Bove. The isolated behavior of a few, /1124/ however, does not disprove the fact that the Yamana show a decided timidity with regard to human remains and that those which are accidentally exposed by nature's blind forces are immediately destroyed by fire (64).

64. In Bove (e):159 one can read: "The ease with which Bove obtained skeletons is incompatible with the veneration for the dead which Fitz-Roy, as well as the missionaries, praise them for. One of the men accompanying Bove even sold the skeleton of his own father to which he addressed the following speech: 'Farewell, precious father! You who in life saw only our snow and our storm, now that you are dead are going far away. Farewell! May your journey be happy!'"

Today we shake our heads at the boldness with which such fantastic descriptions could be set forth a few decades ago. The Lawrence brothers to whom I showed the account absolutely declared it to be a bold invention. Finally one must keep in mind that Bove would never have accumulated his considerable collection of skeletons and skulls if it had not been furnished him from the mission cemetery. He does not maintain that the scattered, scarcely recognizable individual graves outside were ever pointed out and opened for him.

It is well known that they wipe out every trace indicating the site of a grave (p. 1052).

765 A touching example of the sincerity of their grief for a de-
150 ceased person exists from olden times. On November 27, 1866, Despard met a one-eyed man in Beagle Channel and inquired about the cause of his misfortune. The man answered that because of a deceased person dear to him he had wept so much that one of his eyes ran out. "Man die, here ashore, be very sorry, cry very much, eye ran away in water all over cheek; yes, sir!" /cited in English./ Our Fuegians never forget the loved ones whom death has taken from them.

765 It is well known that the tilagwaia gives the Yamana a very 533 welcome opportunity to unburden their souls of all that oppresses them. While the main body of those present carries the customary melody in its monotonous uniformity, this or that person interrupts with a more or less long discourse, speaking of things which at the moment happen to affect his feeling and his mood. He is usually quite excited by it, as is shown by his lively, agitated expression. As a rule he speaks of sad memories and threatening fears. The words of one encourage another, and thus such interruptions follow one another in short intervals. In the following we shall give the valuable texts of two tálaywaja discourses, which were obtained in a somewhat unusual way. I had already recorded with the phonograph about 30 songs which are repeated on various occasions, but my effort to get a tálaywaja song had always failed. The people had coolly rejected my request with the remark: "How could we sing tálaywaja now, since no one has died!" When Fred Lawrence heard that I still lacked this piece, he asked his wife Sally to help me to get it soon. She declared herself willing to do so. After a few days, on March 20, 1937, she mentioned the names of two Indian women, Gertie and Peine, who wanted to perform the tálaywaja song that day. /1125/ They would expect a considerable reward, however. Making a quick decision, I agreed. Moreover, Fred Lawrence held out the prospect of a lovely present for them. The two women arrived about 11 o'clock in the large laundryroom of the work house on the farm in Punta Santolino where there was nothing to disturb us. I put the phonograph ready for the recording, but the women put me off: "Not yet, we are still not at all in the mood!" A considerable time passed in patient waiting. The two Fuegian women squatted on the ground, motionless and quiet, in deepest concentration and lost in their own thoughts. Finally around three o'clock they said: "Now tálaywaja can begin!" From their attitude and their remarks it was clear that they were very agitated and completely dominated by their thoughts of mourning. Coldiron was attentively ready to translate the individual sentences which broke out with strong feeling and violent emotion.

At first both of them began with a monotonous melody. After about ten minutes Gertie continued it alone, and Peine interjected with much emotion: "Ah, how pitiful is our state, to sing tálaywaja because these two [Gusinde and Koppers] are leaving us. They come from a people that is very numerous, but there are only a few of us. The few that are left of our people resemble a few little birds who by chance escaped the hunter. Watayinéjwa has taken away the good ones; he has left only the ugly and unattractive ones for the last days of the Yamana people. We, the good-for-nothing, the sick, have remained here to this day. We are kept alive by him, we who are weak, who are few in number. He deprived me of my children, indeed of my whole family. And the two sons I have left will probably also soon have to tread the same path (65) that the others trod earlier. My [distant] cousin [Nelly Lawrence] has also lost several relatives, but at least she still has a brother [Calderon] who is blessed with a large troop of children. But I am all alone and only that one distant relative [Nelly Lawrence] is still with me. This relationship is through another man and is very distant. Ah, woe is me, Hidahuan, you make me suffer a great deal, you have punished me severely! How numerous the people in the west [where Peine's home is] once were; just two or three of us remain. He has kept alive only a single one of my relatives from there, and in the end he will take her away, too."

After a brief pause Peine joined Gertie in the singing. Then Gertie spoke with great emotion: "These two [Gusinde and Koppers] have come here and they urge us to sing tálauwaja. Although we have not repeated this song for a long time, nevertheless the two desire to hear it. Hitherto Wataxinéwa has /1126/ forced us to sing tálauwaja on account of a death, now these two urge us. The Whites have generally assumed that tálauwaja is a pleasure for us. No, for us it is a sad song. If I were a man, I would suffer under the hard work which our men have to do in the forest, on the sea, and everywhere. But as a woman I am usually busy in the hut. If all my relatives should die, I would summon the courage to suffer like a man. I would also work and suffer as they do in the forest, on the sea, and everywhere. I would over-exert myself so that I, too, would eventually have to succumb. There are only a few women left among my relatives, the men of my kingroup have been taken away by 'the one-up-there.' I cannot measure up to the women of former times among our people. They sang and spoke very well and beautifully, much better and more beautifully than we can today. All those lovely words [from ancient tradition] have been lost to us. Why, nowadays we are often forced to speak English and Spanish. At the same time we are forgetting our own beautiful old Yamana words. Our tongue is no longer as sure as was that of our ancestors. Ah, how pitiful is our state! And what must we not bear! How few of us are left! In the other regions where the Whites live, people are numerous. If someone dies there, it does not matter; there are still many left. But with us things are very different. If a single one of us dies, it means more than if a thousand die among the Europeans who are very numerous. What a sad state my old blind father and my mother are in. On the day they die I shall run into the forest and lose myself there [purposely]. I shall neither eat nor drink and shall die of sorrow. If I were a man, then I would storm out [anywhere] and kill all the animals out there, but bring nothing home. I would hack everything to pieces. I would carry on just like 'that-one-up-there' who also destroys and shatters everything, as though he needed it for food (66). Then, for once, he, too, would be made to feel what it is like for one [defenseless people] in such a situation. Then, however, he would have a legitimate reason for punishing me." For a long time after this the two women maintained a thoughtful silence.

66. Gertie here uses a figure of speech which recurs in some of the cries of lamentation to the Supreme Being and which was explained in detail on p. 999.

The tilagwaja utterances expose the very depths of the soul and reveal the secret recesses of the heart; they reflect all the humanity of the Yamana. They show their nature and all their innate characteristics most clearly and transparently in the way they mourn their dead.

4. The General Mourning Ceremony

965 Considering that the whole Tamana tribe is spread out over a wide area and that, moreover, it is split up into many tiny family groups, one is justified in wondering how a general /1137/ ceremony with many people participating can take place (67). It is not only the consciousness of their homogeneity and the conviction that the departure of an adult results in a noticeable weakening of the group as a whole that draw them together, but also want to relieve their oppressed hearts of their personal sorrow and woe, as well as their grief for their loved ones. The so-called yamalaíemólna serves this purpose very well. In contrast to the ólagwaja which is intended for a small, more private circle, so to speak, it signifies a large public ceremony, in which many families participate when they have the opportunity to do so. They speak of ólagwaja when only a single person in his hut or in the solitude of the forest repeats a song of mourning, but the yamalaíemólna presupposes a certain amount of preparation and numerous participants.

This term appears early and first of all in the work of the missionary Despard (8:746, who writes: "Murder is punished by the yamma-shoo-moyna, or blood avenger" /cited in English/. In BD:640 this yamala ílmaolna occurs again. In both places the meaning is restricted to "blood revenge," but actually it is more comprehensive. To go back to its original meaning, yámala, according to BD:640, signifies "immense, terrible, tremendous, awful" /cited in English/. The word lemólna, or lumólna, was translated for me as: "Painful stabbing, deep pains in the chest." The meaning "to stab" must actually be contained in the root of the word, which is shown, for example, in ílmaolna ír[1], which according to BD:160, refers only to arrow and lance, to spear and dagger.

Any death can be the occasion for a yamalaémiqua which unites many people, but a murder always induces it within the shortest possible time. In individual cases, however, the Yaména do not follow a definite rule, but make it contingent on whether enough members of the tribe assemble. An example may explain this. In March, 1923, several men had conducted the medicine-man school on Navarino Island. The following night, on March 24, 1923, the wife of old Thomas finally died of a long illness. I was startled out of my sleep by loud cries and lamentation from all the huts. It was not until dawn that I went to the place where the dead woman lay, surrounded by many people who were weeping and grieving in genuine sorrow. I purposely presented myself as a sympathetic, but altogether silent onlooker, and they were all appreciative that I was not in the least disturbing. A deeply felt mood of sorrow lay oppressively on the small Indian settlement. I was reverently silent and very reserved so that the people should not be influenced in any way and could express their feelings without reserve, /1138/ for I was, of course, the only White among these Fuegians. I carefully observed each one and the group as a whole. I gained the impression that the mood and the emotions of everyone grew more animated from hour to hour. Toward eleven o'clock Santiago happened to pass me. Heedlessly and with a tearful voice he said to me: "We are all terribly sad, so we shall soon begin the yamalaémiqua!" And that is what happened. The fact that a considerable number of families were already gathered together proved favorable and probably decisive. On another occasion they would have had to wait and call together the individual families. Conditions are right for the yamalaémiqua if enough people are assembled and the requisite mood has developed either through the discussions of the old people or in view of an impending death.

It was incalculably valuable for me to have personally experienced the large funeral ceremony at the time on Navarino Island (p. 190 /untranslated/). The woman was buried around noon in exactly the way our Fuegians had learned from Europeans. After that they gathered in a spacious little house while I retired by myself to the house of Santiago. In the other hut the singing and wailing which had long been familiar to me soon began, and many people were taking part, as I could gather from the vessels of vessels which reached me. This ceremony had been going on for about an hour when a man came to me and asked me in a pleasing tone whether I would go over to them. Persistently he made it clear to me that everything I should see and hear there would not please me personally because all the people were in an extremely sad mood, but that they would nevertheless appreciate it greatly if I consoled with them and showed that I shared their sorrow. The good old man had no idea how eagerly I had been waiting for an invitation, for how could I have offended to miss an opportunity of seeing these Pawnees open up completely and reveal their innermost feelings in front of everyone. I followed him without delay to the assembly of mourners. Truly, what I experienced far exceeded my expectations, and here I became fully acquainted with the innermost attitudes of these Indians. Without fear of men and without the slightest shame they loudly expressed their thoughts and feelings. They spoke of their Supreme Being with a matter-of-factness that seemed to come from daily habit and that surprised me, treating him as though he were one of them. At the same time, without any effort on my part and like a gift of grace, a goodly number of the ancient lessons and prayer formulas dropped into my lap. I was already familiar with some of them, but here I saw how the Indians see them in a state of utmost anguish and spiritual agitation. I was astonished at the very seriousness with which men as well as women absolutely represented the Supreme Being. Some of them seemed to me like naughty pupils who have been punished /1119/ and who, aware of their own helplessness, mildly discuss it with their teacher. All seemed to have freed themselves of any remains.

As may be seen from what has been said, there are no definite regulations for the participants in the ramalowaqua. For obvious reasons, the nearest and more distant relatives, friends, and neighbors gather with the family who is mourning a recently deceased person. Everyone wants to comfort the mourners and to accompany them in their daily ilkawaja. Word of the death soon spreads, and no one hesitates to seek out the survivors. Everyone says to himself: "Anyone who is in mourning expects others to condole with him. Some day, I, too, shall be in mourning and then I shall want to have many comfort

765 me with their support!" If many people happen to be together, a tilagwaja turn into a yamalalembina as a matter of course. As has been said, a special request goes out from the relatives of a murdered person because they are obliged to exact blood revenge and must solicit helpers. The final impetus for a general funeral rite is given by a few old people when they say that the situation and the mood of the people are appropriate for a general ceremony. Whoever happens to be on the spot takes part; no one would be excluded even if he came from a distant region. Sometimes families who are in the vicinity are notified, and they hasten there without delay.

765 302 If the people have quickly reached a decision in this simple and non-obligatory manner, they immediately begin the preparations. Actually, these involve nothing more than body painting which must be richer and more beautiful than for the inconspicuous tilagwaja. Everyone chooses a pattern according to his own taste and draws the stripes and dashes, rows of dots and lines in different colors and in various patterns of distribution on face, torso, and arms. Usually they develop the basic forms familiar to them from the tilagwaja, transforming them into richer and more elaborate combinations.

The desire for colorful variety and a rich diversity of forms cannot be curbed even in the painting for mourning. At each yamalalembina I saw patterns that ranged from very simple to complex; a few are reproduced in Figure 89. The man (a) displays only three vertical black lines. The woman (b) has her whole face uniformly smeared with red and has put vertical black lines over it. The man (c) also has black lines on a red background. The woman (d) has wide black lines drawn upon the red background, the former being outlined by broken white lines. The man (e) also displays a red background; on each half of the face he has five vertical lines and one such line on the bridge of his nose as well as between the inner corners of the eyes. Finally the woman (f) has five thin red lines radiating out from the lower eyelid; the rest of the painting, that is, the entire lower part of the face, is black. Other /1130/ no less elaborate patterns are shown in Figure 86 on page 799. All the patterns, however, are derived from a few basic forms.

765 382 Almost all participants prefer the design which indicates the cause of death of the one who is especially mourned. Actually the visitors exert a good deal of effort and care to show how honestly and sincerely they are participating in the event. /Fig. 89 appears here./ Definite pressure is put upon those present when a murder has been committed; they express this in their facial painting, for everything serves the purpose of intimidating the culprit and his circle of kinsmen. In this case they prefer the following design: one side of the face is uniformly black; on the other side are alternating vertical rows of red and white dots placed close together.

765 309 825 The people are busy for some time in preparing their facial painting; they also wind the hapakēl around their foreheads. This decoration, also called hapaxēl, is a rather large triangular piece

765 of skin with white down-feathers taken from 301 the male Molinas goose (Chloephaga hybrida [825] /Kelp goose/). The people obtain this forehead decoration when these geese are nesting; during this time /1131/ they are lean and the thin skin does not have the abundant fat that is present at other times. /Fig. 90 appears here./ A hapakēl is like the kōčel of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 215) in size and shape.
In recent times not all the adults make an effort to obtain this ornament which is actually seldom used. Instead, at a general funeral ceremony, they use the narrow band of skin with down, also called hapaxēl, which they always have available and frequently use.

765 The club is part of the equipment of those who take part in the so-called fight of 293 the yamalašemōina. It is justifiably regarded as an ornamental club. No one would be permitted to come with a plain stick that he has just picked up or one used to kill a sea lion. This club is used for no other purpose.
It is carefully carved out of a flawless small trunk, is about 160 to 190 centimeters long, has an angular or rounded surface and gently tapers from one end to the other (Fig. 90).
It is regularly painted white, or red if one is commemorating a murder. Actually the women should also provide themselves with a club, but sometimes they do not have it and make do with an ordinary paddle which they paint. At the dances in the hut everyone uses the short dance-staff carried during the čiēxaus ceremony, for it obviously helps to emphasize the rhythmic movements of the body.

765 The long-continued singing and 533 lamenting, sighing, and groaning are

765 essential to the yamalašemōina in connection with the Īōima.
533 The actual mourners spend their time this way in any case.
152 Whenever neighbors and friends enter the hut with their freshly applied painting, they sit down near these mourners and follow their song. The polyphonic group sings in a medley of voices; each one chooses pitch and rhythm, melody, and tone color as he sees fit; he stops and begins anew as it pleases him. Each person's performance, however, is serious and sad, his facial expression shows great mental anguish, and his whole conduct indicates how much he is suffering. Throughout, everyone in a howling voice constantly repeats the same sounds in a monotonous melody, exactly as at the tālauwaja. The whole company devotes several hours to this collective demonstration of grief; they do not allow even brief general pauses.

765 Each person present occasionally interrupts his groaning and 781 fills in an interval or two with exclamations. These are chiefly 152 words addressed to the Supreme Being. One must remember that on these occasions everyone does not think merely of the recently deceased person -- who perhaps is even of secondary importance to him -- but of those loved ones whom he himself /1132/ lost through a recent death or an earlier one. The memory of them once more stirs him to the depths and makes him sharply feel anew his great loss. His own sorrow tortures him. That is why once again, as on earlier occasions, he confronts Watauinēiwa to argue and remonstrate with him, to accuse him and cast aspersion upon him. He angrily hurls heavenward one after another of the ancient cries of lament, although he is well aware of his helplessness against Abājla up there behind the clouds. His immeasurable pain, so he believes, gives him the right to the ruthless, coarse invectives against that brutal Wēlapatux who can be approached in no other way. These excited conversations with Watauinēiwa, as I was emphatically assured, form an important part of the yamalašemōina. "Again and again each person must address 'the One-up-there' and must constantly repeat the old sayings!" I was told this several times with emphatic conviction. Thus I had the impression that the individual words were nothing more than a normal outcry and a quarrelsome discussion with the Supreme Being. Through all kinds of adaptations

765 the expression may be used with reference to the recently de-
781 ceased person, to the speaker himself, to his own deceased rela-
152 tives and friends, to the Yamana people as a whole. With angry vehemence Gertie repeatedly impressed upon me: "Each one of us must incessantly and emphatically come to terms with Watauinéiwa on this occasion!" Thus reproaches and words of abuse continually alternated with the old cries of lament. Everyone present regarded this as justifiable for every speaker and approvingly confirmed his words.

Until that time I had never had on opportunity to observe how vehemently the expression of their deeply rooted faith in their god breaks out from the depths of their soul, and with what unrestrained force it seeks expression. Truly their religious faith is firmly anchored in their convictions and in their hearts! Here it became plain that all the adults are dominated by it. I shall now mention a touching feature of their childlike religious sense. In their greatest agitation they feel justified in freely hurling the bitterest reproaches against Watauinéiwa. After the yamalašemōina is over, however, and everyone has again sought the quiet of his own hut and by late evening has regained his mental balance, he feels deep within himself something like qualms of conscience. He is overcome with the feeling that he has offended the Supreme Being with his raging and scolding and that he has erred greatly with respect to the veneration due the deity. Ruefully he humbles himself, silently he thinks about the events of the day and his momentary position. A repentant and yet confident prayer of atonement softly slips from his trembling lips: "Hidábuan, you know it, today I was extremely angry with you! But the sorrow for my beloved dead was so violent that I lost control of myself. Don't be angry with me any longer, /1133/ Hidábuan!" Solaced and with his soul fully at ease, the Fuegian lies down to sleep; the supreme emotion which for hours shook his innermost being is past.

765 I shall add here a few words which I noted during the 152 yamalašemōina. Often several persons were saying different things at the same time and I could not follow them.

Santiago: "This morning that woman died. Each of us is in a wretched state, no one feels well. I once suffered the same fate as that widower who now has no wife. I personally felt what it is like to lose one's relatives. One loses all desire to live!"

Halupens: "It is certainly just as you [Santiago] say; everyone who loses the person dearest to him feels [the sorrow] most acutely. The others feel it less, they are only accompanying that person! -- We must strive to understand each other well so that we shall not wrong one another. For one day Watauinĕ̄wa will take us too [from the earth]. If we have lived in discord with someone and he dies, we will be sorry [for the way we behaved]. So let us live on the best terms with one another! After a quarrel everyone must quickly become reconciled with the other and make his peace with him."

Walter: "I, too, am thinking of the many whom I have lost. Today I feel somewhat relieved [at the thought] that it is not I who have lost his relative. But at the time when I lost my own children I was unutterably sad. Others probably thought it is not such a painful thing, but I spent whole days and nights in the forest and suffered terribly. -- How often Watauinĕ̄wa has punished me! I wonder why he did it? Now we [I and my wife] have only two children left. It is possible that he will soon take another child from me. Why will that happen? I wonder if he will again punish me soon? I do not know. -- At that time I was really unutterably sad, more than other people can believe. Again and again that happened to me (68). Here on this occasion all who belong to the family of the deceased will properly understand how much I suffered at that time. In the same way I now understand what those relatives of the deceased woman are suffering and why they so loudly lament."

68. He is referring to his sad fate that nine of his eleven children have died.

Mary: "I have little peace now, for during the time when we must again bury one of our people we come straight out with everything that our heart dictates."

Clara: "When I was still a girl, we did not conduct ourselves the way girls do nowadays. We did not leave our parents, but faithfully remained with them in the hut. But today girls often look to [the behavior of] the Whites; they have discovered many things among them which they imitate. That is why they even run /1134/ away from their own parents; they do not give other countrymen any peace [because of their offensive behavior] and cause their own parents the greatest embarrassment. It is shameful for us, it is a disgrace for us (69)!"

69. She recalls that recently three girls left the camp alone in the late afternoon without their parents' knowledge. Cf. p. 488 .

Santiago: "I did you [Halupens] no harm."

Halupens: "That is correct, and I did not want to reproach you for anything."

Santiago: "Good, then we agree."

Halupens: "If it weren't for the Whites [who prevent us], we would have declared war on those people and killed them. But this way [the way things are today] we do not dare."

Santiago: "Truly, that is the real reason. At present our hands are tied [as far as free action is concerned]" (70).

70. Santiago is referring to a murder which Halupens' brother committed in his day.

Luisa: "Whenever we were in mourning in the old days, we caught many animals and killed them, tore them all to pieces or crushed them, and then strewed all the pieces on the ground or threw them in the water. We did that because we were angry with Watauinéiwa, for we wanted to cause him great harm. My parents-in-law were very prominent in that."

Halupens: "I had no idea that today I would be in deep mourning. Watauinéiwa has caused it. I, personally, have, after all, done no one any harm; I did not kill anyone. I did, of course, kill a few birds and sea lions to keep me from hunger and to stay alive. But I never killed a human being. Therefore Watauinéiwa has no reason whatever to hurt me so badly that today I am in mourning because he let that woman die. I did nothing except hunt a few of his animals which he made in Yáiaasága; I consumed them because I was hungry!"

765 152 Santiago: "Today Watauinéiwa has brought great harm to us all. We are all without exception in deep mourning. It would have been better if today Watauinéiwa had allowed a whale to be stranded. Then we would have gone there tomorrow and would have cut off large pieces for ourselves. Instead he has let that woman die and the widower is now mourning bitterly!"

Evidently all the participants at this yamalaŝemōina often repeated the prayer formulas and lamentations listed above (p. 989), although most of them understand only the general drift and the basic meaning. I was present while the corpse was being wrapped, and old Asikansis happened to pass the hut. He stopped for a few moments and, pointing to the dead woman, murmured to himself: "Watauinéiwa has caused that, yes 'the one-up-there' has done this!" Then he continued on his way. Similar expressions were repeated by all those present.

765 769 152 It must be pointed out that although this general funeral rite is stimulated by recent death and occasioned chiefly by it, /1135/ nevertheless every participant remembers all the dead whom he personally mourns. He speaks of them loudly and openly, always without mentioning their names, distinguishing them as "my father," "my daughter," and so forth. He mentions details of their lives, certain traits of character, and the cause of death. In this way he thoroughly relieves his tortured soul of the misery of oppressive thoughts about his dead.

765 152 The gathering of many mourners, which lasts for hours, is regularly terminated with a sort of mock battle. All during the yamalaŝemōina one or another of the old men informally and yet decisively exerts his influence, like a kind of tiāmuna. They are above all anxious to direct the attention of the participants to Watauinéiwa, and they characterize him as the one who remains responsible for the death of this and every other person. They are familiar with the traditional prayer formulas and laments and often repeat them. In this way they also impress them upon the memory of the younger people who learn their meaning. The old people, however, never explain the meaning of the words in detail; the formulas simply issue from a grief-filled soul and are neither mentioned nor discussed in everyday life. As soon as the old people feel that the favorable moment has arrived, they call

765 152 for the mock combat. The participants get up, reach for their clubs or paddles, and leave the hut. Sobbing and weeping loudly, they arrange themselves in two groups in an open place outside in no particular order. If the yamalaŝemōina commemorates a recent murder, however, a more definite division is made, and the party of the victim and that of the murderer face each other. Each of the adults is equipped with a club; women who lack a club use their paddles (p. 1084). These objects have previously been painted.

While the two groups are slowly approaching each other, they sob loudly and speak of the deceased for whom the ceremony is being held. They mention his good characteristics and qualities in words of warm appreciation and sincere grief. These utterances cease as soon as the two groups meet. The mock battle immediately begins, with an individual from one side rushing at anyone in the other group and attacking him. The two large groups thus split up into many fighting pairs. Each pair continues to duel for some time. They do not intend to injure one another; hence a blow is checked before it falls. Nevertheless one person or another may receive quite a blow if a pair becomes excited or if two opponents who have many a former account to settle should happen to meet.

765 152 578 /1136/ A more important feature of this sham battle is the utterance of mutual reproaches, making the other person responsible for the death, as though he were to blame for the grief which depresses all the people. A person who is met with reproaches of this kind from his opponent defends himself just as vehemently and heaps the accusations back on the other. If one says, "You caused that one to die, it is your fault that we are all sad now!" then the other replies, "Quite the contrary, you are to blame for everything!" Or one will maintain, "Why didn't you pay more attention to that one [who has just died] and help him?" Whereupon his opponent will defend himself, "You're the one who should have helped him, then he would not have been taken from us!" Another will shout, "You did not give that one any of your booty and that is why he starved!" The retort is: "I always gave him plenty of our booty. If you had done the same he would have been spared us!" Elsewhere one hears: "Why did you not

765 come to his aid with your canoe when he was drowning?" The 152 opponent replies: "I was much farther away from him than you, 578 I was on the Wollasten Islands. It was far easier for you to help him because you were near him." Alluding to the murder, one man says: "How could you be so carefree! You should have known that this murderer had murderous intentions!" The answer: "You are guiltier. For if you had an inkling of it it was up to you to inform everybody and that one [the murdered one] would have been spared!" The verbal exchange continues for a long time. It often leads to attacks on personal conduct, to reminders of former quarrels and differences of opinion. Many become excited, and the combatants seriously attack each other. For some of them this opportunity is very welcome because a long-suppressed desire for revenge can be gratified without punishment. There is great confusion during the battle and sometimes a certain amount of brutality, depending on how much tempers are aroused, for the opponents facing each other change about several times, or three or four persons will pounce upon a single one who is then in a serious predicament. After about an hour the combat is declared over when a few influential old people return to the assembly hut. The rest of the people follow.

765 Inside, the customary song of mourning is resumed and 533 continues for a time, its duration depending on the hour of the 535 day and the state of mind of those present. One person or another will get up and dance through the hut, following the simple rhythm of the song with his body movements and the gentle swing of the short dance-staff. Finally the yamalaĸemōina is concluded, following the clear, definite signal by one of the leading old people that all the participants should lay down their clubs, paddles, and dance staffs with an audible tap on the ground. While the singing was going on, /1137/ all the people were holding these things in their hands. After that each one spends long minutes in thoughtful concentration, and only then does he silently creep out. He goes to his dwelling and quietly resumes his ordinary tasks.

765 This affair regularly lasts eight hours and longer. Only the adults take part. In order to prevent any disturbance or distraction by their own or by strange children, none of the children

If a yamalaŝemōjna is to be held anywhere or if it has already been held, the news about it spreads over a wide area. Everyone wants to participate in it. Occasionally a few families are late in joining the mourners. The latter, of course, are always in the mood for this ceremony and, stimulated by them, the new arrivals actually initiate it without delay. If a universally beloved and influential person is being mourned, one yamalaŝemōjna follows another at short intervals, perhaps throughout the whole year. There is probably never a cikuan celebration that does not have a regular yamalaŝemōjna on a particular day; the same is true of a lengthy kina festival. The participants, however, then remain in the large assembly hut and the customary sham battle is kept within limits.

765 628 The law of blood vengeance (p.808) is in force among our Fuegians and imposes an obligation upon the relatives and friends of the murdered person. They band together and attack the murderer along with his followers. The combat between these two groups is called yamalaŝemōjna yŝruna mōja and is obligatory after a murder. It is not impossible, although there is no definite proof, that the customary sham battle which has long been held after every ordinary death or in memory of all the dead at the public yamalaŝemōjna is derived from that first struggle after a murder, and that, in the course of time, this has become part of every general ceremony of mourning. The characteristics of the sham battle, especially the reproaches and accusations of the opposing pair, lead one to this assumption.

765 626 The general mourning ceremony always unites several families, and since it occurs often, an individual family takes part in it at least three times a year. Its extraordinary subjective value is obvious. Each yamalaŝemōjna irresistibly forces the individual to deep inner self-reflection and gravely reminds him of death. All those persons who have already concluded their life on earth come alive once more in his memory; their virtues and shortcomings are discussed and the transgression to which an untimely death is attributed is quite frankly noted. All this causes the individual conscience to be stirred to the depths with self-accusations. Furthermore, it is no less effective that the conduct of the individual is loudly censured during the combat by one or another opponent who is permitted this opportunity for /1138/ ruthlessly setting forth his accusations. No one may take offense at being publicly accused. All kinds of things are disclosed in this way and reach the ears of the public: events long past; the quarrels and misdeeds of a murderer and all the members of his family are lengthily and inconsiderately dragged out into the open; the cruel behavior of a husband toward his deceased wife is loudly held up to him and his relatives for the hundredth time; the proved or suspected extra-marital relations of a dissolute woman are thrown in her face without the least restraint. Everyone who feels dislike for another or who has quarreled with him singles him out during the sham battle and gives him a piece of his mind. Disagreements between whole groups of families are also revealed and characterized in detail. As one can see, the loud reproaches of the sham battle are acts of undisguised and public conscience-searching of the other party by one who is far from offering palliation! The vivid warning which comes from the near and impending death also shakes up every participant and impels him anew to lead a blameless, orderly life, to make an effort to get along with others and to be on the best of terms with the members of his family, to be helpful to everyone, and in general to cultivate the virtues of a true, proper Yamana. Thus personal conduct and public order are inestimably improved by each yamalalemona. It is probably with the help of this institution that the general morality of the Yamana has been kept on a surprisingly consistent high level. Even though the motive which impels many a person to censure his opponent publicly may be neither noble nor fine, at any rate the outspoken accusation is not without effect.

The Yamana will not and cannot give up their general ceremonies of mourning as long as they persist in their ancient vague conception of the life of the human soul after death. The separation from each person who is snatched away by death is for them an everlasting farewell. Nelly Lawrence often and definitely assured me in so many words: "The missionaries constantly urged us to give up the long and disturbing gatherings after the death of one of our people. They advised us: 'Don't weep so much, for we shall all see one another again after death!' But 115 no one believed them. How could it be true that we shall all meet again later? After all, the body disintegrates. So there will never be a reunion!" Each time she told me something about her people's doctrine of the soul, this noble woman spoke with a passion which sounded like hopelessness. The monotonous, lugubrious melody of mourning of the tálaɣwaja and the yamalaíemóina will not be silenced until the earth covers the last Yamana on the distant Cape Horn Archipelago.

/1139/ C. Cosmogony and Mythology

113 The world of religious ideas with which the doctrine of the soul is subjectively connected proves to be rich and comprehensive among our Yamana, but their world of mythological personalities is more vast and alive. These two broad spheres of ideas are sharply differentiated and distinctly separate from each other; each exists by itself, so to speak. Just as the figures in the myths and legends have not been closely connected with the figure of the Supreme Being at any point in our description above, so, too, the latter appears to be entirely separate from the former; moreover, Wataɣinéiwa is just as far removed from the actual spirits and medicine men. Every attentive observer can easily separate the ideas of these two disparate spheres of imaginative conception, just as the Yamana do.

113 182 In former times every figure described in their myths and legends was very familiar to our Fuegians; the individual representatives of the animal world and the celestial bodies, as well as of the objects of everyday use, often awakened the familiar combinations of ideas which were associated with those figures. Formerly favorite stories were told over and over again during the long hours of comfortable fellowship in the evening around the hut fire. Unfortunately, for the last few decades the former close ethnic unity has been disrupted and the remnants of the once large group are scattered over the broad areas of their homeland in detached fragments. The surviving families, no longer very numerous, are rarely in touch with one another, and when they do meet their exchange of opinions is limited to certain details of daily life. In view of this, it is not strange that

773 the former general acquaintance with the rich mythological ma-
182 terial has been lost and that the younger generation devotes more attention to all the things that came with European culture. There are only a few old people who have still preserved most of it to the present day. Why they cannot transmit this precious heritage, as was so easily possible in earlier times when the European newcomers were not yet disturbingly active, need not be specifically pointed out. Many a young person frankly regrets that the old people hold back their lovely stories even when they find willing ears in a sizable gathering of fellow-tribesmen. At present, however, all is in the process of disintegration, and the old people suffer very much under the collapse of all the institutions and customs; for that very reason they are no longer available for things which already, so to speak, belong far in the past.

On rare occasions one or another of them will once more 538 offer to tell a story as in former times. /1140/ He himself takes the initiative; it would be a breach of respect if a younger person openly or with slightly veiled hints were to ask for an old myth. It is almost always an accidental circumstance that awakens remembrance of a mythological subject, and it usually happens that while someone is speaking of his experiences, his words, as though a self-contained unit, drift over into the other realm of thought. This adequately suggests the peculiar way in which the Yamana recite an old myth. Actually, the storyteller never tells the entire myth from beginning to end in the progressive continuity of a meaningful construction. Rather, the general habit is to select some part of it and add to it a personal event, an independent achievement, a unique experience. To begin with the storyteller does not care whether his own report ties up meaningfully, if one may use this word, with some part of the myth. The Yamana has a lively fancy which will not let itself be forced into rules of ordered logic. If one judges the recitation of an old Indian from this standpoint, he will be surprised to find, for example, that the thread is broken at an inappropriate point and that a short section of an entirely different nature is inserted without any justification whatever, perhaps even absurdly. An account built up this way, with a combination of elements which obviously disturb the sense, does not bother the

538 audience in the least. It is enough to be entertained in lively fashion, and they direct their whole attention only to what is being offered at the moment.

Inasmuch as everyone present is all attention -- common decency demands this of our Fueglans -- a particular statement will sometimes move another old person to such an extent that he will interject his own thoughts into a brief pause by the storyteller. Occasionally his account then goes on at such length that no one is concerned any longer with the first man's story. Thus it may happen that even large sections of a particular myth which was started remain incomplete.

One must not overlook the fact that personal experiences and actual occurrences, if they are described by someone in lively discourse, are far more joyously received and animatedly discussed than the material of a myth which is, after all, familiar. Deep in his heart the Yamana wants to shine in front of others; he wants to count for a great deal among his kind. Hence he makes an effort to offer his own account as effectively as possible to his audience, to give it brilliant form by his choice of expressions, to spice it with surprising additions. Sometimes one has the impression that someone is beginning some small part of a legend with the conscious intent of using it as a pretext for recounting a personal experience, which takes incomparably more time, /1141/ in order to avoid the suspicion among his listeners that he is obtrusive or greedy for recognition and fame. If one put together the individual pieces of an evening of storytelling in any of the Yamana huts, he would come up with a strange conglomeration.

One must realize that the content and form of the material presented take their particular slant, that is, their actual individual coloring, from the personal qualifications of the storyteller. This is clearly shown in the undisguised preference of the people for one storyteller over another. If they see that he is in a good frame of mind, the happily excited neighbors are drawn to him and their eyes light up expectantly. They listen to his words for hours with untold enjoyment. Afterward individual persons will exchange their impressions and their opinions about a whole evening's recital and about the ability of the storytellers. They were quite frank about naming for me the men whom they like to hear

538 much more than others. The differences between one storyteller and another lies in the manner of portrayal, the choice of words, the heartfelt participation in the content of the story. It is, of

539 course, inevitable that now and then some good old soul will re-

537 late a long chapter out of his life or repeat an experience to the assembled neighbors although he has almost no gift for story-telling and is more boring than entertaining. We Europeans call it a sign of senility when some old man tells something for the hundredth time that everyone knows by heart or exaggerates the importance of minor details for which others cannot work up any interest. Just such things happen among our Fuegians and are no less correctly judged by younger persons than they are among us; but their extreme veneration of old people obliges them to listen attentively and to bear it manfully, no matter how much self-control they are obliged to exert. There are specific admonitions to the young along these lines, and everyone observes this obligation.

538 The general remarks that I have set down here are for the most part applicable almost literally to the practices and conditions prevailing among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 568).

I personally recall with great pleasure and satisfaction many a gay gathering on one evening or another when I joined the Fuegians in a smoke-filled hut. The faintly flickering fire would blaze up now and then and show the attentiveness written on the faces of all present. Enthusiastically we listened to the animated words of the storyteller, completely lost in the kingdom of myth, unmindful of the storm that was vigorously shaking the loose posts of the little hut, heedless of /1141/ the hour far beyond midnight. When finally the company broke up, everyone crept out of the storyteller's hut refreshed and enriched with new thoughts and was swallowed up by the night. If stars happened to [p.] be shining down from heaven, a knowing old man would insist on pointing his finger at this or that star, repeating its name, and characterizing its personality. Their brilliance illuminated the short distance to each Yamana's hut, and in his dreams the figures from the world of legend would stand before his paltry bed. Now and then a day ends in this way, which makes every Fuegian happy.

124 The material in the following pages probably constitutes 113 the entire treasure of myths that has been at the disposal of our Fueglans since ancient times. In gathering it, I was remarkably favored by fortune on my second journey (p. 17 /untranslated/). Although it is not customary among our Fueglans for a woman in a mixed gathering to relate long episodes from her own experiences or from a myth, nevertheless some Fueglan women faithfully preserve much legendary material in their memories, and very willingly offer it at an occasional gathering of female friends and neighbors. It seems to me that vainglory and the desire to shine in front of others by relating one's own deeds and remarkable experiences is far less developed in women than in men and that it is therefore easier for a woman storyteller, without much digression, to adhere logically to the main point of the myth. For most of the stories current among the Yamana I am indebted to the mentally alert Julia, the wife of old Alfredo, who is unanimously regarded by her countrymen as the one best informed about them. I learned from her for days (p. 178 /untranslated/). Further material that I gathered on my third and fourth journey was made up of supplementary explanations and unimportant details. Many a myth was also repeated to me by other persons. Thus I believe that I have gathered all the mythological material that the Yamana have preserved from hoary antiquity down to the present day.

a. The Origin of the World

113 The mentality and the way of thinking of our Fueglans
15) have been only cursorily described above. Nevertheless, from what has been said, no European will expect much from them in the way of a clear conception of the origin of the world or a well-ordered picture of the universe. Actually they have only individual short trains of thought which can be either consciously combined nor linked together without rape. What may have happened at the beginning of everything visible is much too distant to merit special attention by our Fueglans, who are creatures of the moment, so to speak, for whom the given

113 reality of each day is of decisive importance. /1143/ More-
153 over, those remote events are completed episodes and accomplished facts. The Yamana clearly and definitely separate them from everything that Yoālox introduced and from what the principal persons of the individual legends undertook. The Fuegian is reminded of their achievements almost daily without any effort on his part. Important inventions and significant regulations are attributed to the younger Yoālox and some of his brothers and sisters, but they were not predominantly active in the formation of the universe. The Yamana also say that the earth was destroyed; after that orderly conditions again developed.

As was just mentioned, the individual short narratives do
113 not form a continuous, well-ordered whole. It is quite likely that in recent times small connective pieces have been lost. I personally, however, consider it probable that the quite large gaps have existed since ancient times. I base my conclusion chiefly on statements to this effect by a few old people. I am also guided by my experience among the Selk'nam who up to the present time have preserved an imaginative conception of the origin of the universe in its final form, which is more or less complete, as well as rich in content. If the Selk'nam succeeded in preserving their ancient tales as complete, coherent units, why should the Yamana, who did not allow themselves to be robbed of many another heritage, have lost important connective portions? The fragmentary pieces that the Yamana do possess, however, will be valuable for a comparative study of myths if they can be related to some extent to the legends of other peoples.

1. Heaven and Earth

The Selk'nam are superior to the Yamana insofar as they recognize in the person of Kenós the creator of the visible world, who functions under the direction of the Supreme Being (Vol. 1, 570) and who is therefore on a par with the redeemer as he appears in other mythologies. Our Fuegians regard their homeland as an accomplished, given phenomenon; they do not ask and do not

113 say how it originated. To this extent Bridges (b):236 is right: "The natives preserve no tradition about their past history, nor do they know where they came from" /translated from Spanish/. I repeatedly noted, however, that the lack of clarity and the ignorance about the early beginnings of their forefathers were by no means accepted indifferently by a few men who seemed to be more meditative. They more or less perceptibly feel the lack of this knowledge, and they actually concern themselves with such problems in their reflections. They are impelled solely by the general logical demand for an adequate explanation of the tangible reality that presents itself to them. They do not, however, express their own conclusions. They are prevented from doing so by their respect for the /1144/ ancient body of thought handed down to them; they would regard analyzing it or supplementing it on the basis of their own meditations as extremely improper. Hence, amplification or reconstruction of the mythological conceptions could not be achieved, and they have been full of gaps from ancient times, even though they were the object of reflection by many persons.

In the following I am offering the few individual conceptions still held by one or another old Yamana. They tell each other these bits which are limited but significant in content. Bridges (b):206 wants to deny this, unjustifiably, when he maintains: "They have no tradition about their origin. For them the world has always been what it is and will continue to be the same" /translated from Spanish/. Unfortunately, these details do not supplement each other to form a complete picture. They are only fragments which I was able to gather on various occasions. I arranged them in the order presented here according to their content.

G. The First Settlers

The events in the so-called myth of the upheaval are sometimes vividly contemplated in the minds of our Yamana. It must seem surprising that they associate the first appearance of actual people with that strange legendary material. The myth describes a great migration from the northern part of Isla Grande

175 southward to the north shore of Beagle Channel and thence westward to the region of Tyanéiga where these wanderers settled down forever (Gusinde [16] :207). Quite apart from this long story, I was told:

"In very remote times many families came from the east and wandered to this region where we Tamata have since lived. They settled down right here. Immediately they began building their canoes, making weapons and all kinds of implements to hunt otter, sea lions, and birds, to gather mussels and crabs. Since then the Tamata have remained here."

It should be noted that these people were said to have come on foot and that they did not begin building their bark canoes until they were here in the present-day Tamata territory. My informants naturally assumed that the Tyalon family also arrived in this region in connection with that large group. The Tyalon brothers themselves showed the other men how to make the various implements and how to handle the weapons. At the same time the sun-man, Lôm, arrived with his family which includes his brother Aklyuio, the rainbow, whose wife is Ishnaga, the moon-woman. In January, 1920, I was assured by my aged informants that in this group of migrating families Tyalon-shenaiga /1165/ made her superior influence felt and that she played a decisive role. She enjoyed a very privileged position and commanded the other women who, in turn, dominated their own husbands. Two years later when the long myth of the origin of the Kina observance was told, this Tyalon-shenaiga was no longer mentioned. The real significance of this woman lies in her close relationship to her two brothers, the above-mentioned Tyalon. The latter also were not mentioned in the myth of the origin of Kina.

These groups of roving families who settled in the present home of the Tamata are not regarded as actual human beings, but are thought of as personalities of a unique nature and being. They are regarded as the inkalinaga who were the first to establish all kinds of things in this place, but who afterwards either climbed up to the canopy of heaven or changed themselves into animals. They form a separate small circle of significant or superior personalities who exist completely apart from those figures presented in all the actual myths. These first men are given sole credit not 113 only for being the first to write in this region, but also for every a special achievement which has become significant and decisive for the actual human beings who followed. The Sahtaoin (Vol. I, 206) make a similar distinction and definite separation of the two very different groups.

β. The Chief Sun-Man

113 Dj One Penglaen make a very definite distinction between the once mighty and violent Tlowsilku, the old sun-man, and his son Likn, the son of the day. Both, in the very gap, came to this country long ago together with that large company of free settlers. These two personalities differ from one another in every respects. The following story is told about the old sun-man, Tlowsilku or Tlowsilku.

"At that time among the families who first arrived here, there lived a man who had a very bad character. He was not only unfriendly toward everyone, but quite openly hostile, and his sole thought was always to hurt everybody else. Everyone despised him. As a result, he became even more furious and tried even harder to inflict harm on everybody. He was extraordinarily powerful and had great power at his disposal. Once in high dudgeon he had everything burned up that lay within his domain. At that time he was much closer to the earth than he is today. At the same time he caused all the water of the sea to boil, for he persuaded a great heat wave to descend and all the lands burned up. After that the commonest caps were empty and bare and have remained so to this very day. All this happened because in his separate anger he sent the great heat.

"From the start Tlowsilku was very repulsive to everybody, but after that /1146/ they obviously hated him. They not only hated and abhorred him, but all his nearest relatives as well. His whole family was avoided and despised by all the people, for every member of that family behaved unkindly and was bent on hurting other people. Only Likn, son of old Tlowsilku, was a a conspicuous exception. He proved to be extremely benevolent toward all the rest of the people. He was in excellent humor and was skilled in many things. He was kind toward everyone and always ready to help.

*The widows (71) then hallowed a long time in secret.

71. One must realize that at that time the women were said to rule the men and that everywhere they alone laid down the law. That is why they alone gathered for consultations and reached decisions which were binding for everyone, especially for the men. For the present compare Gwetsalo (July 30).

Finally they decided to resolve themselves and Throwaway. One day they made a surprise attack on him and tried to strangle him. Since he was very strong, however, he succeeded in extricating himself. He immediately hastened up to the canopy of heaven where he stands to this day as a bright star, but he forfeited his former power. Today one no longer sees him. It was not until after the great upheaval on the time of the women that they also climbed up to the canopy of heaven to join his father Throwaway.

The Tsimsyan repeatedly assured me that he has lost his former power, that he is probably standing somewhere in the heavens but that he is invisible. He is also mentioned in another connection. The Tsimsyan tell the following. "A long time ago all the ahlaat of the [at that time so-called] human beings who died here went far away to Sunset (72). There there ahlaat formed a people of their own. All of them, young and old, enjoyed the game of ball, hilcoo. Once mighty Throwaway quite suddenly appeared in the east and set fire to the whole region. After a time he tried to take away the great heat, but he did not succeed. That is why the ahlaat left that region. Afterward, when Throwaway himself also left that region, it did cool off.

72. The Tsimsyan use this designation for a far distant region which they are unable to describe more specifically.

At that same time the whole world burned up, and afterward everything cooled off again."

I find it impossible to link this brief story meaningfully with the other events of that first period, chiefly because it mentions the souls which were supposed to have assembled after death. Aside from that, however, old Tāruwalēm is clearly depicted as having once been an extremely mighty sun whose strength surpassed by far that of the actual day star. The Yamana point out that Lēm could not set fire to the whole earth in the way that his father did. They do not mention any other connections between these two personalities.

/1147/ 7. The Younger Sun-Man

The relationship between old Tāruwalēm and Lēm is that of father and son. In contrast to the father, the son is described as very benevolent and friendly toward human beings. This is tangibly expressed in the beneficial warmth that the day star provides. The Yamana have more to say about Lēm (73).

> 73. A first modest reference is found in Despard (b):698: "The Firelander supposes the sun and moon, male and female, to be very old indeed, and that some old man, who knew their maker, had died without leaving information upon this subject. Hence the ignorance of the present generation" /cited in English/.

"Lēm was an excellent man and had great influence upon all men. They willingly yielded to him, for he was friendly and benevolent toward everyone. He was so handsome and had such a fine figure that all the women wanted to stare at him constantly. But they all guarded against revealing this desire or even looking at him with open eyes, so that they would not be ridiculed by others. Lēm was quite charming. All the women were in love with him, and all the men regarded him highly.

773 "His wife was also very beautiful. No one knows her name.
825 Lēm had several beautiful daughters, namely, tákaša (Larus 821 belcheri), wémarʼkīpa (Larus glaucodes), the sea duck wīyen (Anas cristata), the gull kiwégu (Larus dominicanus), the Magellanic goose kimoa (Chloephaga picta /upland goose/), the duck wīpatux (Querquedula cyanoptera), as well as the she-fox čilawājakīpa (Canis magellanicus) and the rat wēsána. The last two secretly dragged off the meat that their father brought home from the hunt; they stole it from him regularly. They are doing it [stealing] to this day. Lēm also had other daughters, as well as several sons. One of them is Yēxalēm who constantly follows his father.

773 "Lēm was diligent and hard-working, good and always merry, 821 friendly toward everyone. He was on the best of terms with all the men. He set a fine example of an active, good-natured human being for everyone. In this respect [that is, in his whole character] nothing has changed to this day. Back in the time of the great upheaval in Yājaašága he helped the men considerably in gaining control of the kīna of the women. After that upheaval was over, he went up to the canopy of heaven. From there he is still proving himself benevolent and willing to help human beings; he bestows ample warmth and light upon everyone. All men are obviously proud of him, for he uncovered the kīna secret of the women and thus freed the men from their dependence upon the women.

"Actually there is still another world. That is why Lēm leaves the region of the Yamana every evening and betakes himself there. In that other world he also shines and bestows abundant warmth. The next morning he comes back to us once more. In this way he helps the people both here and there."

The portrayal as such shows clearly enough how gratefully /1148/ the Yamana regard the day star. Obviously this favorable attitude goes back to the feeling of well-being which sunshine induces in the Yamana, who are often shaken by frosty winds and severe weather. The planet Venus was pointed out to me as Yēxalēm, son of Lēm, for "this son invariably follows close behind his father, but is not as strong as the latter." This refers to the considerably weaker luminosity of Venus as compared to the

773 821 day star. Concerning "that other world" for which Lēm also kindly shines, the Yamana are referring quite generally to the territory of those peoples whom they assume live beyond their own territory. In more recent times they are thinking especially of the Whites whose home, as they are constantly assured, is far away from the Fuegian archipelago (74).

[171] 74. There are a number of points of similarity between this description and the Selk'nam story of the old sun-man and his son, the day star. The only special point to be noted is that the latter was also decisively active in revealing the Kloketen secret of the women (Vol. I, 600).

δ. The Rainbow

821 With weather conditions as they are in the Cape Horn region, the rainbow is anything but a rare phenomenon. Nevertheless, it always delights our Yamana. One can clearly see that they love to look at it and that it gives them a great deal of satisfaction. They are refreshed and gratified by its radiant colors. On many occasions I observed how adults and children, even in pouring rain, crawled out of their hut, stood outside, and, wide-eyed, enjoyed the intense glow of the rainbow (75).

75. Cojazzi:105 writes: "The rainbow is regarded as the harbinger of the wrath above [of the malignant god], and the women and girls shudder at the sight of it, but the men curse it and spit at it" /translated from Italian/. This report is altogether erroneous and contrary to my own observations.

773 821 At the same time I was told in a wholly matter-of-fact tone: "This Akáinix is the brother of Lēm and likewise an imposing, very handsome man. How could it be otherwise, since both belong to the same family. Of all men Akáinix knew how to paint himself best; even today he shows himself in unattainably 773 821 brilliant colors. Beautiful Hānuxa is his wife."

The combination Akāinix wātuwa is her complete name, little used in everyday speech. BD:265 writes hannūka, but also gives hannūkaiāgū, "moonlight" /cited in English/. This is the story of the rainbow.

"Old Akāinix was a magnificent figure. He knew how to paint himself much more beautifully than all the other men, for he belonged to a privileged family. The imposing Lēm is his brother; Hānuxēakuxīpa is his wife. She is also extraordinarily beautiful, for she is a woman. /1149/ Akāinix also has a number of sisters, all of whom are very grand, clever, and cunning. He himself also proved to all the people that he was a capable yékamuš.

"Once the sisters were again playing kīna in Yāiaašāga. Old Akāinix was permitted to enter the large kīna hut, for he knew all about that secret ceremony of the women. That is why he was admitted. One day his sisters amused themselves by trying to play dead. They decided to hold their breath and not to move for a long time, in imitation of a dead person. They wanted to fool their relatives and frighten them for fun.

"For some time they had been busy with these attempts and exerted themselves to the utmost, but no matter how hard they tried, they could not succeed. One day the girls were again trying these experiments when old Akāinix approached the kīna hut. He was the oldest among all his brothers and sisters. When his youngest sister saw him coming, she immediately told the others and said: 'It will be wise to stop our attempts and experiments immediately; our brother is close by and might see what we are doing.' But Akāinix was already standing inside the kīna hut. He asked his sisters: 'What are you doing here?' They all replied: 'Nothing special! As usual, we are devoting ourselves to our tasks and our songs in this hut.' Akāinix replied: 'What you are saying is not true at all. I know very well what you have just been up to; each of you tried to appear completely motionless, as though dead, without breathing for a long time. But you did not succeed as I know very well. Now then, I myself shall show you how to do this properly!' These girls, of course, wanted to dupe all their relatives living in the south and purposely frighten them in order to

TT3 amuse themselves. They were the only ones who had come here 821 from the south and they were taking part in the kīna in order to hide their real purpose. Akā́ᵢnix saw through all that and that is why he offered to help his sisters.

"So Akā́ᵢnix lay down on the ground and stretched out full length; he became completely still, soon stopped breathing, and remained motionless, just like a dead person. His sisters watched all this and conceded: 'Truly, our brother can do that very well, he is lying there just like a dead man'' Akā́ᵢnix was, after all, a capable yēkamuš.

"The kīna celebration was over and all the people left the great hut. Each family again turned homeward. Akā́ᵢnix and his sisters also climbed into their canoe. They set out in a southerly direction where their relatives lived. They had to travel several days, for the distance was great. Just before they approached the huts where their relatives were living, they stopped briefly. Akā́ᵢnix stayed behind here; he lay down on the ground, stretched out full length, and pretended he was dead. His wife, Hānuxēᵢakuxīpa, and all his daughters painted /1150/ their entire bodies black, as is done in deep mourning. Thus [prepared] they entered the hut of their relatives. Dismayed, the latter asked immediately: 'Where is Akā́ᵢnix? Why do you come with the painting of mourning?' The girls replied very sadly: 'Our brother just died, not far from here. We left him lying out there, quite near this hut. That is why we put on the painting of mourning!' After these words by the sad girls, a few men immediately got up and went to the place where Akā́ᵢnix lay. They soon brought him back and laid him in their hut. Akā́ᵢnix himself continued to pretend that he was dead. In view of this, the other people prepared for a yamalašemōᵢna. All the relatives gathered, wept loudly, and sang for several days.

"Meanwhile a few amorous men approached the wife of Akā́ᵢnix and his sisters. They began flirting, since these women were exceedingly beautiful. The men fondled them and slept with them. Akā́ᵢnix lay there completely motionless, but he observed very closely what happened. While all this was going on, several days passed. Finally the men became obtrusive and wanted the girls as their wives. They had flirted with them long

773 enough. The wife and sisters of Akā́inix had yielded to everything, for they knew that Akā́inix was not dead and would take 821 full revenge. Those men behaved more and more as though the women already belonged to them as wives.

"Now one day those amorous men set out on the hunt; there was no more meat in the huts. They planned to hunt for cormorants on the nearby cliffs. Their [female] relatives, kímoa and ílnux, šékuš and wípatux, stayed behind with the wife and sisters of Akā́inix.

"When the men were far enough from the hut, Akā́inix got up without being seen and hastened after them. He set out in another direction, however. He reached the cliffs before the men arrived to hunt cormorants. Akā́inix created a commotion among the many birds and frightened them. They flew up in swarms, circled around for some time, and then flew far out over the sea. He hid himself nearby. From afar the men saw how all the birds flew up from the cliffs. They said: 'Doubtless there is a man running around there somewhere, for all the cormorants are rising up, circling in the air, flying up and down, and finally drifting far out to sea. Who could that man be?' Meanwhile they came to the place, but the cormorants were hovering far out over the waves.

"Quite unexpectedly Akā́inix stepped out of his hiding-place and stood before the men. They were terribly startled when they suddenly found themselves face to face with Akā́inix. Immediately they realized what would now happen to them. Akā́inix spoke to them: 'You came here /1151/ to hunt cormorants? All the animals flew away. Only down there not far from the shore are there still a great many standing close together. Don't be afraid to step into the water, it is shallow!' The men obeyed at once, as though they had lost all capacity to think; they were so frightened that they had no idea what they were doing. So they pushed ahead far into the water in order to get quite close to the cormorants. As soon as they were in so far that they could move only with some effort, Akā́inix skillfully used his powerful sling and killed all the men. Thus he avenged himself, his wife, and his sisters.

"Without delay he hastened back to the hut. He did not reveal that he had killed all those men. After a while their 773 821 relatives asked: 'Why are our men gone such a long time? Did you perhaps see them out there near that cliff?' Akā́inix answered: "Certainly I saw them. They stepped into the sea in order to reach the cormorants who were swimming far out. Have patience, they will probably soon return!' The women again waited a long time, but the men did not return. After a while they became convinced that Akā́inix himself had murdered all the men. They were overcome with anger and seized with rage. They began to suspect Akā́inix openly and attacked him angrily. This aroused him and he began defending himself violently. Soon there was a terrific struggle between Akā́inix and the men who were present. He was hard pressed because his opponents were numerous. They held him fast, but did not succeed in killing him. For some time they choked him and tried to break his neck, but they did not succeed despite the greatest effort, for he was a mighty yékamuš. They only managed to bend his neck and his long back so far that since then he cannot quite raise himself up straight. Yā́j, the son of Akā́inix, also took part in this struggle and defended his father. The men, therefore, choked him just as they did his father and they also bent his spine. Since then Akā́inix and his son Yā́j (76) have remained deeply bowed and curved to this day (77). The relatives of those amorous men whom Akā́inix murdered, however, also carried off something from that struggle. They soiled themselves with ímí while they were choking Akā́inix, for he was a yékamuš and therefore painted red all over, as is customary for a yékamuš who has died. To this day these birds (78) carry the stain of red color on their feathers."

78. They were not mentioned by name or described in any other way. -- The story assumes conditions after the great upheaval.

773 /1152/ This story was told me by Alfredo while I was sitting all alone with him and there were no women around. In one place in the story the kīna secret is mentioned, and they strictly keep this from the women. Later the same story, somewhat shortened, was repeated to me by old Mary. She omitted the brief reference to the kīna celebration. The Yamana designation Akā́inix obviously corresponds to Akā́inix of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 609), but the latter do not have a separate story about the rainbow. BD:15 gives akainix, "the rainbow" /cited in English/.

ε. The Moon-Woman

773 821 The Yamana usually use the name Hā́nuxa for this mythological person, less often the longer and more specific form Hānuxēakuxīpa. She is regarded as the wife of Akā́inix and as outstandingly beautiful and shapely. Neither women nor men speak of her in friendly terms, least of all the men. Once upon a time the moon-woman had a great influence on all women, and through them on all men as well. Everyone was obliged to yield to her commands and instructions. Her position of power was felt especially with regard to the kīna secrets of the women. Although at that time Yā́lox-tā́rnuxīpa had precedence, Hā́nuxa always had an influential part in the kīna. She was a malevolent, vicious woman and obviously hostile to all men. To this very day her hatred toward men has not diminished.

My informants did not agree about her children. Old Whaits told me briefly in 1919: "Hā́nuxa had three sons altogether, who soon died, one after the other (79). Today they stand up there

79. He was referring not to actual death but to a departure from the previous form of existence on this earth and subsequent life on the visible canopy of heaven.

near the lunar orb. None of the present-day Yamana knows her name." Since old Whaits was blind he could not show me the stars he spoke of. The next year I learned from Maśemikens: "Hā́nuxa had only one son who, like his mother, was outstandingly

773 handsome and shapely. He died very young. In her grief over
821 this great loss Hánuxa made numerous small cuts on her face so that much blood flowed. That is why to this day one sometimes sees her colored red all over, a sign of her sorrow (80). That son of hers became a star, no one knows his name."

80. Two well-known expressions of mourning are mentioned here, namely, surface cuts in the skin and body painting. The former meant more to the earlier generations than to the Yamana of today.

To my surprise and contrary to the majority of old people, Whaits was of the opinion that Hánuxa caused the great flood. He said: "When Hánuxa is colored red all over, /1153/ she makes it plain that she is once again very angry with human beings (81) and again threatens a great flood. That is why all the Yamana become terribly frightened when they see this sign." Others gave the reason previously mentioned for this phenomenon and emphatically declared that the old man was mistaken. They did say, however, that the great flood had actually come in connection with the general upheaval in Yájaašága and that the moon-woman played a decisive part in it.

81. This is the exact view of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 601).

Men and women agree that the phases of the moon are the course of her pregnancy: "At first, when Hánuxa is very lean and thin [beginning moon] she conceives a daughter. This child slowly develops in her belly and finally becomes quite big [full moon]. Then the child is born. After that the moon-woman's girth decreases, she becomes constantly leaner, sickly, and weak [waning moon]. Finally she dies and is no longer visible, but then the newborn daughter slowly grows. She, too, conceives, and everything is repeated again, just as in the case of her mother."

Two women explained the phases of the moon somewhat differently to me: "Slowly, like any child, Hánuxa grows very 821 ally she becomes a full-bodied, adult woman. Then she conceives a daughter whom she carries under her heart [full moon]. After that her strength constantly decreases, and she becomes weaker and weaker [waning moon], in fact so weak finally that she nears the end of her life. Then she gives life to her daughter. Since she is giving birth, she makes herself inaccessible and avoids the glances of human beings. Soon she herself dies, but her daughter begins to live and to grow; she develops exactly like her mother. Sometimes this moon-child Hámuxa-xéolan comes down to earth. No one sees it except the yékamus. They can also hear it when it cries and weeps in its own peculiar way." According to this interpretation the appearance of the new moon is a progressive succession of generations and each moon's change is the development of a mother (82).

773 slowly. She is still young and therefore small and thin. Gradu-

[171] 82. The Selk'nam (Vol. I, 601) have more to say about the moon-woman. Some of their views deviate, others coincide in significant details with what I learned from the Yamana.

The Yamana do not have anything further to say about the children of the parental pair, Akánix, the rainbow, and Hánuxéakuxípa, the moon-woman, or about their forefathers. They simply say that this couple came here along with the other families during the first immigration from the east.

5. The Deluge

773 Several times reference has been made to a general flood, about which every adult is well informed. This is probably the reason that the reports of several missionaries /1154/ contain casual references to this belief. In Outes (g):54 one reads: "They believe in a period of great tides, and when the waters covered a good part of the country, a box happened to come floating by and stopped on the summit of a high mountain. This box

113 contained a pair of Fuegians, small ones, completely like those of today, who procreated very large men, and later, these giants procreated little people, like the present-day Fuegians. Then a dispute broke out between the big people and the little people, the latter killing and destroying the former and thus remaining the single race that we know today. It is seen, then, that these tribes...have a conception of a deluge" /translated from Spanish/. Aside from the mere mention of a universal deluge, I can only be strongly suspicious of this whole account, for I did not come across similar ideas there. Bridges (a):211 expresses himself more reliably: "They have a tradition of the flood...Their tradition of the deluge is very whimsical and indistinct. The sun was submerged in the sea, the waters rose tumultuously, and all lands were submerged, save a lofty mountain where a few individuals had taken shelter" /cited in English/. According to Martial:213, the Yamana explain that universal flood: "by the fall of the sun into the sea; there it has remained and has left, as a sign of its passage on earth, only a small lake which one can still see near Ushuaia. This is sufficiently verified in their eyes by the presence of whalebones found in this lake which is actually about ten meters above sea level. The preservation of the human species was assured by the escape of one man and one woman who with their canoe found refuge on a high mountain" /translated from French/. The important thing in this description is that the deluge is linked with the general upheaval, even though this connection is not very clear. Even Spears:76 has this to report: "They had a tradition that in by-gone years a great flood raised the waters to the level of certain lines on the mountains, to which they point the traveller" /cited in English/. It is true, certain marks on a few mountain peaks, which our Yamana regard as traces of that universal flood, constantly remind them of the old myth, and they mention it to everyone to whom they point out these mountains. I myself experienced this several times and was thus made familiar with the basic ideas of that story.

Old Whaits, in 1919, was the first who told me: "The moon-woman Hanuxa caused the great flood. This was at the time of the general upheaval in Yáiaasága. Hánuxa was filled with 113 hatred toward human beings, most of all toward the men who had gained control of the kīna of the women. At that time everybody drowned with the exception of those few who were able to escape to the five mountain peaks to which the water did not rise. Scarcely had the great flood subsided when those few people came down from the mountain peaks to the /1155/ shores of our channels, and our country became populated anew." Concerning this description more reliable informants would not concede that the great flood was caused by the moon-woman.

Nevertheless, another version noted by Cojazzi:105 clearly speaks in favor of it: "A Yahgan tribe near Ushuaia narrated that the moon once fell into the sea, causing the water to rise so high that only the top of a mountain stood out, on which the swifter men and animals saved themselves. When the moon later returned to the sky, the water receded and then the men and animals, descending from the mountain, found in the lagoon below a dead whale which they ate" /translated from Italian/. Still another version is related to this one: "This legend is told somewhat differently by the other Yahgan west of Harbertón. Some men and animals did not save themselves on top of a mountain, 'but on Cable Island which, detached from the bottom of the sea, floated like a big boat (83) until, when the moon returned to the sky, it became rooted again to the bottom of the sea" /translated from Italian/.

83. Here a motif is repeated which was mentioned earlier in Outes (g):54 (see p. 1113.

In January, 1920, I heard the following version from Alfredo, Charlin, and Richard in the presence of a few young men: "The very touchy Lɛxuwakīpa (84) was offended by human beings. In revenge she caused a great deal of snow to fall. A huge mass of ice finally covered the whole earth. When this

84. This refers to the strong, rust-colored spectacled ibis, Theristicus melanopis.

773 began to melt, there was so much water that the earth became completely flooded. That woman planned to destroy the whole world and all the people. The ice came just at the time of the universal upheaval in Yájaalága, when the men were carrying on their battle with the women and gained control of the kína. -- In this connection see Lexuwakípa wátuwa on page 1232 /untranslated/.

"After the ice period the whole earth became flooded. The tremendous amount of water rose constantly and quickly. Everybody hastened to the canoes and sat down in them; they all wanted to save themselves. The water rose higher and higher; it even reached the mountain tops and covered one after the other. Finally there were only five peaks that rose above the great flood. The tremendous inundation came extraordinarily quickly and there were high waves so that the people could not provide themselves with food. Many of them did not even reach their canoes and almost all the human beings drowned in the huge flood. The distress everywhere was indescribable. There was no hope for the ones who could not flee in their canoes in time and hold out in some protected spot.

773 "The fortunate people were those who in their canoes
823 reached one of the five mountain tops which rose up out of the water. There they found safety. Those mountain peaks are [1] Úsiáka in what is now Packsaddle Bay on the Hardy Peninsula. High up one can still see broad bands which indicate how high the great flood reached. [2] Wémarʲwaja opposite O'Brien Island, where one sees a /1156/ cut reaching all around the rock. It was made when many canoes were tied up there, but almost all nevertheless perished. [3] Auwáratulêra in a hidden corner of Estero Ponsonby. At this place there is still a thick pole to which several canoes were fastened at that time. This pole has turned to stone, for it has been there a very long time. [4] Wêlalánux on Gable Island. There the high peak formerly rose still higher. It has become considerably lower because strong waves are constantly pounding it. [5] Pjatulêra, two steep eminences on either side of the mouth of the Rio Douglas. Today they are no longer as high as at the time when the great flood covered all the land.

773 "After the mighty flood had reached its highest level so that the above-mentioned five peaks were barely visible, the water remained at this level for two whole days. After that it quickly receded and drained off. Only a few families had succeeded in saving themselves; almost all the Yamana were drowned. After the great flood had drained off, those few people began building their huts again on the shore. From that time on the men dictate to the women."

773 776 After I had heard this story, I happened to talk to Alfredo the next day about the same subject, and I asked him pointedly: "Who sent those huge amounts of water? Does Lexuwakipa really have so much power?" The old man answered definitely and with conviction: "Actually it was mighty Wataginéiwa who permitted the mighty flood to come; Lexuwakipa persuaded him to do this. She wanted to destroy the whole world. At any rate she succeeded with Wataginéiwa so that the great flood descended."

It should be noted that on this occasion I was unable to find out anything more about the figure of Wataginéiwa. There was noticeable timidity in the mention of this name, as though my informant had let it slip out unconsciously and against his will. He refused to disclose anything further despite repeated requests. Later I was able to account perfectly for this strange behavior, but at that time, under the influence of the startled faces when the name Wataginéiwa was mentioned, I lost my head to a certain extent. I could not understand why Alfredo refused to give me further explanations. Finally I began to think that the story of the deluge had been given to the Yamana by the missionaries and that their uncertainty in Biblical matters in my presence had caused the embarrassment that I read in all their faces. I carefully noted this explanation in my diary. Later my doubts on this subject disappeared. A specific argument for the authenticity of the myth of the deluge is that neither Alfredo nor Maĕemikens had any contact worth mentioning with any mission station. Two years later, in 1922, Maĕemikens confirmed the entire content of this legend of the flood as I have just given it. /1157/ He did not, however, specifically speak of the direct influence of Wataginéiwa in the general deluge, although he conceded it indirectly.

173 The Yamana have not preserved a continent text of the myth of the deluge, although nothing has been changed in the basic idea. Fred Lawrence also realized that there was some uncertainty, and he once told me that since childhood he had observed that this myth was never told continently and with the same words by the various individuals. There were always small deviations. He himself, therefore, has never been clear about whether the general conflagration when the old sun-man was nearer the earth and let everything burn up and the great flood coincided approximately in point of time. Refer to the Selk'nam for comparison (Vol. I, 410). They, too, have a myth of a deluge which has a corresponding basic idea, but which is not clear in some parts.

η. Origin of These Personalities

The myths state quite clearly that the first settlers of the present-day Yamana region immigrated as adults. They do not say anything, however, about their origin, that is, their point of departure and how they came into being. The actual process of giving birth was first introduced by Yoltox and since then there have been real human beings, but the Yamana have no clear idea how those first heroes or pre-humans originated. This makes the distinction between the two groups all the more definite.

One day when I asked knowledgeable Maremikem how those personalities of former times had happened to come into the world, he paused to think seriously for some time and then replied: "This is not the first time that I have been faced with that question. As a young man I was admitted to the kina; there I was told [in the myth of the upheaval] how all the animals originated. Since then I have now and then asked myself, as well as others, especially the famous yékamof and experienced old men, about how those people originated [who afterwards transformed themselves into animals] and why they came here, but no one knew the answer. So I am not clear about it to this day, although I have thought about it for a long time and have often sought an answer to this question. At that time Tkowalkin 113 burned up the whole world and all the animals. But how everything became orderly again after that, how the country came alive again with plants and animals, who it was that finally extinguished the great fire -- all this we do not know. In former years I often asked the most experienced Tamans about it, but no one was able to help me."

On another occasion, in March, 1953, among a group of old /1198/ men, I again touched on the subject of how, in their opinion, the heaven and the first animals originated. I actually challenged them by saying: "You tell the story that Wataunéjwa made all the animals (bif) in Yiasiége. Very well, but how did human beings come into being at that time?" The answer was: "We don't know that exactly. Wotogindjwa, of course, existed a very long time ago, for heaven was already there above the earth where the clouds are. That is where Wotognéjwa always stayed. Back in the days when Lîm and Ilîmuga and Akîinix were still wandering down here on earth, they were exactly like us today. But Wotogindjwa existed before them, because heaven was already there as we see it now. At that time the sky was much closer to the earth than it is nowadays.

113 "At that time the women ruled, they gave orders to the B3 men. But we do not know how children came into being in those days; since women played the leading role, they would not lie under the men [ad copulam perficiendam /to facilitate coitus/]. So we do not know how children originated. Since the great upheaval, the women are dominated by the men. At that time the great seal tîyâ'wa (Arctocephalus australis) discovered the place [on the body] where the îlinde sexualis is, and this he made known to the men. He said: "Vir incubus immittat membrum suum mulieri succubae /man, lying on top, puts his member in woman lying underneath/!" Since that time the men dictate to the women, they lie on top of them; this gives them great pleasure and in this way children come into existence. Even today the Tamans do the same thing. We do not know how Lîm and Ilîmuga and all the rest who now appear up there as stars originated. Long before that Wotogindjwa, as well as the canopy of heaven, was there.

113 "During that great upheaval in which the men rose up against the women who had brought the kîna game down here from 113 the north, Lēm with all the rest of his family rose up to heaven where they are still standing. At that time a woman tried to see if she could transform herself and turn into Hapčélla. She tried for a long time and finally succeeded. Since then she stays under the earth. We cannot explain how she managed to do this. After that this woman produced many other Hapčélla, and always when she slept with a man. She herself chose the man with whom she wanted to sleep, aroused him [libidine sexuali], and thus a child came into being."

This story clearly emphasizes a difference between those personalities who appeared as the first settlers of the Cape Horn region and the actual Yamana who followed them. The Fuegians do not know how the former originated. After the seat of libido sexualis and the union of the sexes per copulam was discovered, conception and birth take place, children originate, and they are the actual human beings who are separate from the earlier heroic personalities and who represent a later people of this region.

/1159/ 2. The Culture-Bearers

The picture of the world that the above-mentioned myths describe is limited. The Yamana are far more concerned with the details of how their own way of life and their material possessions came about. The extraordinarily significant inventions and important rules for community life which form the basis of the uniqueness of these Fuegians are traced back to the Yoálox family, the members of which must be recognized as culture-bearers in the fullest sense of the word. The youngest member of this family is outstanding and more influential than his brothers and sisters.

In general the Yamana are proud of the Yoálox family because it achieved great things and brought so much. The younger Yoálox is not a popular personality; he is purposely mentioned only rarely among adults. The young people become acquainted with him only when they mature. The uwíala in the čiéxat are told about this family in detail. For example, the adults will say: "Yoálox told us how we Yamana should conduct ourselves!" They are referring to the traditional habits of life and the moral precepts.

113 With these words they wish to show how influential he is himself and how significant everything is that he introduced. He is clearly identified as the bearer of the decrees that Wanagilaqwa himself issued to the Tamana. This intermediary position, however, has no effect in practical life. Girls learn about him on the occasion of their menarche (p.575). The complete set of Tqalioq stories is repeated in the kina.

In view of this it is not strange that earlier travelers did not hear a word about these mythological personalities. Spencer:181 was the only one to whom very brief hints were given: "Tqalhik, a Tahgan, was a woman who invented arrow-heads. Two brothers and a sister. Brothers used to kill seal with pointed stick. Sister thought and invented arrow-head. Sister one day put arrow-head at end of spear. When she died, Tqalhik went up to heaven, and is now a star" /cited in English/. During long conversations with the oldest men, I learned the following which I have arranged freely in my own fashion. Women avoid speaking of him out of marked aversion.

C. The Tqalioq Family

The Tamana all agree that the two Tqalioq brothers are quite superior personalities, extraordinarily intelligent and skillful in every respect, endowed with rich gifts of invention and full of the urge to do things. This is far more true of the younger Tqalioq who excels his older brother in every respect. "Their older sister, Tqalioq-tlenqiqa, was actually the cleverest person of all. She had great influence on her two brothers and stood by them in everything, for she was highly gifted and very skillful, extraordinarily capable in all things. There are two more sisters (p.1144), but no /1160/ one remembers their names or what they did." The mother of them all (p.#51) is likewise mentioned, but not the father.

On a number of occasions I was emphatically assured that the members of the Tqalioq family "are the first human beings." A first settlement has been mentioned above (p.1100). It consisted of creatures which became men and animals. If in this

773 connection the expression "first human beings" is again mentioned, it is merely to show that the Yaliny were present before the age of actual human beings. These Yaliny are not regarded as human beings in the strict sense of the word, but they are not associated with the personalities grouped around Lihn. It seems almost as though the preceding age had come to a close, and the Yaliny for their part inaugurate with their appearance a new type of existence as preparation for the actual, true human beings.

Then the story goes on. "The Yaliny family took long journeys throughout the wide world before they finally came here where the Tonsta live today. Here, then, they began all kinds of work. When soon the [actual] human beings appeared who were born here [on the spot], the Yaliny taught them how they should arrange everything, what attitude they should have toward one another, and how they should converse with one another. The Yaliny also showed people all kinds of implements, utensils, weapons, and tools and taught them to handle all these things successfully. They were, after all, very capable men, that is why they invented the various weapons and tools which we use nowadays in hunting and fishing, in gathering, and in killing animals. They also showed how animals are to be cracked in the water and on land, the great whales and sea lions, the otters and foxes, the crazy birds, the shellfish and crustaceans, how to skin them and make the skin serviceable, how to use and acquire the bones. All this the Yaliny invented and transmitted to human beings. Yaliny-Grandpa was the cleverest, and the younger brother, in turn, far surpassed the older one. Thus prove that a younger brother is often more capable and cleverer than his older brother."

All the Tonsta are in complete agreement about the description of the ancient set forth here. The stories that follow are more or less well known to every adult Tonsta.

β. The Invention of Fire

773 It is said. Once the older Yaliny collected many small 774 stones and assisted himself by hitting them against one another. Among them there was also a good spark (p. 77). When he hit

773 this against another stone, a small spark shot out. Surprised at 1b this, he hit them stones together several times and each time /1181/ sparks shot out. Hastily he seized a handful of down-feathers. He placed them on the ground. Once more he began striking a spark from the Spirit. He placed himself in such a way as to hit the stone from a certain direction so that the spark leaped into the down-feathers. They began to glow, caught fire, and soon a small flame leaped up. They Talking quickly brought bark and wood and put it all on top. Then a big fire started. It gave a most comfortable warmth. It felt good to Talking to sit beside the fire during the day and to sleep beside it at night. The fire also proved useful for many other things. It helped roast the bears, dry the skins, and heat pieces of bark and sticks to straighten them out.

Highly pleased, the elder Talking cried out. "The fire is exceedingly beneficial and does many things. Let us keep it burning constantly, so that it will never go out. Once lighted, may it go on burning by itself so that human beings will have no trouble using it. They should not have to make an effort to rekindle it every time (in every case of need) or keep on feeding it with wood!" The younger Talking heard these words, and they put him to a bed humpy. He did not at all like what his brother was planning. He immediately replied. "I am not in favor of what you wish. It is much better if people have to exert themselves. Everyone should make an honest effort for the fire and should tend it carefully. May everyone have to rekindle the fire anew if he has let it go out. Human beings should work!" Immediately he reached for a long stick, poked around in the embers with it, and scattered the smoldering logs. Then the whole fire went out. Since then every fire without exception will go out if it is not constantly and carefully tended. Thus everyone is forced to work.

Talking taught human beings how they must light their fire with the Spirit, how they must fan it and keep it going. Since then a person whose fire goes out must relight it with a great deal of effort. Talking wanted to force all human beings to guard the fire with increased vigilance. Failing this, a person will have it and will find himself forced to rekindle a new fire with great effort and keep it going.

8. Hunting Birds

73 The Yamana tell: The two Tyalong went hunting whenever they lacked meat for food. They always killed birds with their slings. The elder Tyalong found all this too much trouble and he always felt that it was a great chore. One day he said to his brother: "I would like it better if we killed birds merely with a glance; a bird that is given a penetrating look shall immediately fall dead. Let it be that: anyone who needs the meat of a bird shall cast a sharp eye on it and therewith kill it! In this way everyone can /1102/ effortlessly obtain his heavy and carry it home!" The elder Tyalong immediately tried it. A few birds happened to be flying overhead. He fixed them with his eye and at the same time willed them to fall to the ground dead. Sure enough, that is what happened; all these birds immediately dropped dead in front of him. The elder Tyalong was pleased beyond measure and said: "From now on it shall always be thus and we shall also teach human beings how to do this: anyone who stares at a bird in order to make it fall dead shall always be successful! In this way we shall save ourselves a lot of bother and trouble, the numerous journeys, and many dangers." The younger Tyalong heard these words. He very much disliked his elder brother's plan and opposed it angrily. He replied: "It is much more beneficial for people to make weapons and implements and we set out to hunt with them. They should exert themselves and are running when they creep up on birds and surprise them in order to kill them and seize them. It shall be that all must work and make an effort!"

The elder Tyalong was very much put out by his younger brother's words; he did not reply. On the following day he tried again to kill a few birds with a mere glance. A whole flock just happened to be flying above him. Immediately he stared hard at the animals and willed them to fall dead, but they kept on flying, unharmed. Disappointed and displeased the elder Tyalong looked after them. From that time on every human being must see running and effort if he wants to catch birds. Very often the prey escapes the awkward hunter.

δ. Hunting the Sea Lion

773 It is told: Once the elder Yoálox received a beautifully made harpoon from his elder sister. It proved very serviceable. This weapon never missed its mark. He always obtained booty with it and each time he carried it back in his hand.

One day he again returned home from the hunt, loaded down with a huge sea lion. Although he had killed it with the first blow, he broke his harpoon in doing so and lost it. So the elder Yoálox said to his younger brother: "How convenient it would be if I had a harpoon that I would never lose and that would never break! This is the way it ought to be: at the first thrust the sea lion ought to fall over dead and the weapon immediately return to the hand of the hunter. In this way we should save ourselves and human beings a great deal of trouble and bother. Then we would not have to exert any particular effort to make the harpoon carefully. Everyone would safely and easily obtain fat and meat from the sea lion; otherwise it requires a great deal of effort and cunning to kill a sea lion." The younger Yoálox had heard all this. He very decidedly opposed the proposition /1163/ of his elder brother and angrily replied: "It must never be as you say! It is good for human beings to work and exert themselves. It is very useful that everyone makes his own weapons; he would lose this [this benefit] if we let every man have a harpoon of the kind you propose. There is also some gain when a clumsy, careless hunter breaks his harpoon and forfeits it. May his prey escape if an awkward, bungling man hurls his harpoon badly. Everyone should, after all, make an effort and exert himself!"

The elder Yoálox could not object to these words. This explains why, to this day, the harpoon of a clumsy hunter breaks and is lost if he has not learned to hurl it properly and aim it well, or it remains superficially attached to the back of the sea lion and the animal swims away with it if the hunter has not hurled it powerfully enough. A person who has forfeited his harpoon in this way must simply take the trouble to make a new one.

Later Yoálox-tárnuxípa gave the elder of the two Yoálox other weapons and implements: the firm leather thong made from sea-lion hide, úkeła; the sharp knife made from the shell

113 of an edible mussel; the strong bone wedge, ĭla, with a stone as a hammer (p.111); the strong sling, šăfina (p. 172); the long snare-rod, akămuš (p. 179); and the joined lengths of the snare-line, ŭfka, for catching birds (p. 178), as well as the rest of the implements. He was greatly pleased with all these things, for whenever he used them, success was his. Hence he longed for nothing more than that all these tools should neither break nor wear out, that they should neither slip out of their owner's hand nor become lost in any other way. His purpose was to save people the trouble of having to make all their implements anew.

These fine plans of the elder Yoăloх were very definitely opposed by his brother. The younger Yoăloх aimed to make people work. The weapons of every stiff and awkward hunter should break and he should lose them so that he would learn to become skillful. All tools should wear out so that everyone would be forced to make new ones. In this way everyone would be busy. The younger Yoăloх followed this plan. Thus to this day no one is spared the trouble of putting effort and attention into all his implements, of always making new ones, and of handling them carefully. He will always be dependent on his tools in his daily occupations; he can under no circumstances do without them.

E. The Invention of the Arrowhead

It is told: Both Yoăloх were very adroit craftsmen. They had, after all, taken long journeys throughout the world and thus had become acquainted with many things. /1164/ They were also the first to come here to the territory of the Yamana. Hence they were obliged to make and design the first weapons and tools in such a way that the true Yamana could use them successfully. Their sister, however, the capable Yoăloх-tărmuxĭpa, surpassed her two able brothers in many respects by her clever judgment and far-sighted attitude. She had considerable influence on everyone. She gave instructions to all the other women who willingly yielded to her. The women, in turn, ordered their husbands about in such a way that they complied with their wishes in every respect. The sister of the two Yoăloх was really extraordinarily intelligent; she 113 surpassed everyone in wise insight, cunning, and talent. Whenever it seemed proper, she would help her two brothers and all the women in their work. At such times they were always very successful and their enterprises brought rich gains.

One day the two Yoálox brothers were working on a yěkuš. Although they were skillful craftsmen and had worked hard all day, the arrowhead did not seem to come out right. They had given it sharp edges that would cut well, but they were unable to fasten the point securely to the shaft. Securing the point to the shaft was obviously most important, for only then would the arrowhead be at all useful. The two Yoálox had rounded the lower edge of the arrowhead; therefore, the cords fastening it could not be secured properly and the arrowhead did not sit firmly in the narrow notch at the upper end of the shaft. Such an arrowhead was useless. They worked hard and tried over and over again, this way and that, to see how the arrowhead could be securely inserted in the shaft. They had already made quite a number of points and tried them out, but they were not satisfied with any of them, for each one fell out very easily because it was rounded. Dissatisfied, they gathered together the many arrowheads in a small basket and hung it up in their hut.

One day the two Yoálox had again gone hunting to get meat for food. When they were far from their hut, Yoálox-tárnuxīpa took down the little basket with the many arrowheads. It had not escaped her notice that her two brothers had toiled without any success whatever. She emptied the basket on the ground in front of her and picked up one arrowhead after another, working them over and perfecting them so that they could be used. At the bottom she fashioned a piece shaped like a stopper by making shallow notches on either side so that the lashing could not slide off. She corrected each of the arrowheads in this way, put them all back in the little basket, and hung it up again in the same place. In the evening her two brothers returned home, but she did not tell them that she had perfected the many arrowheads.

/1165/ Depressed and ill-humored the two Yoálox wanted to resume their work on the arrowheads the next day and see whether they could be securely lashed to the shaft and used. They

113 took down the little basket and emptied the many arrowheads on the ground in front of them. Completely surprised, they realized that the arrowheads had been worked over, for each one had a clearly defined stopper-shaped base. With amazement they looked at this change. Immediately they experimented with them; they placed an arrowhead in the notch on the upper end of the shaft and lashed the base with fine tendons. The point now actually fitted securely on the shaft and did not fall out. Now the arrow was serviceable. Then the elder Yoálox cried: "Who do you suppose worked over these arrowheads and made them serviceable?" The younger Yoálox replied: "Only our sister could have done that; after all, she is much more capable and skillful than we are. She succeeds in everything. She is the only one who could have improved these arrowheads and made them useful!" The elder Yoálox agreed with his brother: "Certainly, it is as you say, our sister surpasses us in cleverness and skill. From now on we shall give her all our tools so that she will help us [in making and perfecting them] !" For a long time the two Yoálox were very pleased over these effective arrowheads.

ζ. The Invention of the Harpoon Point

It is told: A short time after that the two Yaólox began long harpoon points from the bones of the whale. The bones of the whale are longer and harder than those of other marine animals, and so they penetrate deeper and more effectively into their prey. They put such a point on a long shaft and lashed it with a narrow leather band. They immediately went hunting in order to try out the weapon.

When a sea lion came near, they hurled this harpoon at it, but the animal was not killed, only superficially wounded. It quickly escaped by diving under the water, then soon came up again and disappeared far from shore. The superficial wound had not hurt it in the least. The two Yoálox did not succeed in killing a single sea lion with their harpoon. Several times they went out to hunt, but every animal hit by their harpoon was only slightly wounded and escaped without any trouble. Each time the two Yoálox returned home disappointed and without booty. They had 113 already lost ever so many harpoons, for if a sea lion was hit the harpoon remained loosely lodged near the surface of its body and it would swim away with it. On such hunts all their efforts remained unsuccessful; the harpoons proved unsuitable.

Annoyed at their many unsuccessful efforts, /1166/ the two Yoálox one day decided to question their elder sister. They said to her: "Why do you suppose it is that our harpoon hits the sea lion and the point enters its body, but it wounds the animal only slightly? We cannot succeed in killing it and so we ca[illegible]ver lay hands on it. For many days [illegible]ow we have returned home without booty'" The intelligent, understanding Yoálox-tárnuxípa replied: "Bring me one of your harpoon points, I should like to examine it carefully." They immediately fetched a bone point and showed it to her. She took it and examined it carefully. This piece tapered to a fine point and had a suitable base at the other end for the lashing, just like the arrowhead that Yoálox-tárnuxípa had improved. Hence the harpoon point was securely held in the notch at the end of the upper shaft and firmly lashed. The two sides of the long bone point, however, were smooth from top to bottom. Then Yoálox-tárnuxípa cut a large, pointed tooth in one side. When she succeeded in doing that, she looked at the bone point with the utmost satisfaction. Immediately she untied her modesty-apron, mašakána (p. 60), and cut off a long strip of leather. She knotted one end of this around the base of the point, then ran the leather strip along the side of the shaft, and tied it securely below, rolling up the long, free part (Fig. 35). Then she showed her brothers how to handle this harpoon: the right hand grasps the harpoon in approximately the center of the shaft and the left hand holds the long, free part of the leather strip loosely. Yoálox-tárnuxípa demonstrated to her brothers how to grasp this harpoon. Then she said to them: "Now try it!"

The two Yoálox thanked their sister because she had improved their harpoon and showed them how to use it. They left the hut immediately; they wanted to experiment with the harpoon and hunt sea lions. Scarcely had they reached the shore when a mighty animal swam by. The younger Yoálox grasped the harpoon exactly as his sister had shown him; when he hurled it, he held the free end of the thong securely in his left hand. Sure enough, the bone

113 harpoon point penetrated deeply into the back of the sea lion. Instantly it escaped under the surface of the water. It did not go far, however, for the long strap soon became taut and the tooth in the harpoon point tore the wound deeper the harder the sea lion tugged. The shaft had already become detached from the point, but the lower end of it was still held by the leather thong and floated on the surface of the water. The shaft showed Yoálox where the sea lion was. The animal was no longer tugging so hard on the long line, for the deep wound hurt very much and each tug was painful. Slowly the younger Yoálox now drew in line; as it became shorter, the sea lion was drawn nearer to the shore (85). When it was finally lying on land, /1167/ the elder Yoálox killed it with a club. With this harpoon they had thus safely and easily caught the first sea lion, which gave them a great deal of fat.

The two Yoálox were almost beside themselves with satisfaction at this success. They spent the whole day hunting sea lions. They collected an undreamed-of amount of booty. It was not until evening that they decided to return to their hut. This time they puffed and panted under the weight of the great amount of meat. Overjoyed, they told their sister about their great success and explained how they had quickly caught each animal and why none had escaped this time.

After that the two Yoálox abandoned all their crafts, for it gave them untold joy to hunt the sea lion with this harpoon. Later they taught all the men how to use the great harpoon. Since then the Yamana use this harpoon with the long leather thong whenever they go to hunt sea lions.

η. How Blubber Was Obtained

113 The Yamana tell: The elder Yoálox loved the fat of sea lion and the blubber of whale; they tasted very good to him and he was mad about them. He was anxiously concerned about always having an ample supply of blubber on hand. One day he considered a plan whereby all the water in all the channels, brooks, and lagoons should be transformed into whale blubber and seal fat. This huge mass was to keep uniformly fresh, never spoil or lose its good flavor, and never be used up. He said to himself: "If this could be arranged, people would always have fresh blubber on hand, they could save themselves dangerous journeys and laborious hunts, they would never have to do without this tasty morsel, and life would be much more pleasant!"

He then proposed these plans to his younger brother and tried to win him over, but the latter would not hear of it and refused his brother, saying: "It must never be as you plan. People must constantly be forced to work. Therefore men should go out to hunt. When they have killed whales and seals, the women will prepare the fat; then everybody will partake abundantly of the tasty blubber which will be particularly good after their tiring work. Human beings should not enjoy things without preliminary effort!"

Thus once again the elder Yoálox was obliged to abandon his plan and yield to the decision of his younger brother. Soon afterward the elder Yoálox took a long journey on foot; he grew very hungry and tired. He sat down on a stone and wanted to rest, /1168/ but the earth was swampy and water soon oozed up around his feet. Since he was hungry, the thought occurred to him: "How agreeable it would be if all the water that rises up wherever I or some other person sets foot should immediately turn to blubber. Then everyone would have plenty with which to appease his hunger!" This wish, too, he soon proposed to his younger brother. The latter, however, was annoyed and replied: "It must never be that way! May people suffer hunger if they do not work!" This again made the elder Yoálox sad, and he never realized his wish. This is the reason why, from that time on, hunting for the men and concern by all people about sustenance have been 713 inescapable laws. The attitude of the younger Yoálox on numerous occasions clearly shows that younger children are often wiser and more understanding, but also more obstinate, than their older brothers and sisters.

θ. The Beginning of Libido sexualis

The men tell among themselves: One day the younger Yoálox felt great lust, and he tried all kinds of ways of satisfying it. For this purpose he fashioned a human body. In it he put eye sockets and immisit membrum suum magnum /inserted his large member/, but he was not satisfied. Then he made two openings below the nose, but here, too, he felt no pleasure. Then he opened the ear cavities on either side, but he did not find satisfaction in these places. Thereupon he opened a wide mouth, but here, too, he found no satisfaction. He tried to satisfy his lust in other places, namely, the armpits, the breasts, the navel, but he could not find pleasure anywhere. Finally he made an opening between the legs, and here at last he obtained full satisfaction.

Later he taught this to the men. Since then they, too, have known how to satisfy their lust.

ι. The Beginning of Body Painting

It is told: In the beginning the two Yoálox lived only with their sister; neither of them had a wife. After a time they no longer liked being alone all day and sleeping alone at night. Finally they confessed to Yoálox-tárnuxipa: "As you can see, we are all alone here. We do not like living this way any longer. Help us to get a wife soon!" Yoálox-tárnuxipa agreed and promised to help her two brothers.

Then these three considered what they could do. The two brothers had excellent weapons and were very skilled. Hence they always brought home ample booty from hunting /1169/ and lived on the fat of the land. They had large supplies of meat in he always lacked meat because he had a great many wives. His wives had a great desire to visit the two Yoālox and to gaze at them. Once when Hulušēnuwa was again out of meat, he himself decked out each of his wives in extraordinarily fine fashion. He ordered each of them to decorate themselves still more and paint themselves with colors. Then he sent them one after another to the two Yoālox to obtain meat from them. Each of his wives had decorated herself with colors and designs according to her own taste. They were all different and all very beautiful.

713 their hut. By contrast, Hulušēnuwa (86) was always hard pressed;

> 86. This is the smaller species of the two Fuegian wrens, Troglodytes hornensis.

This introduced the custom of painting one's face and entire body; people make themselves beautiful in this way and take pleasure in doing so. Since the time when the small Hulušēnuwa requested his many wives to decorate themselves with colored designs, the Yamana realize that they are obliged to paint themselves on certain occasions (87). Thus it has become an unavoidable custom. The wives of Hulušēnuwa have to this day retained the beautiful body painting that they applied at that time. Whenever the men perform the kīna, they imitate the colors and designs in the fur and feathers of many animals by painting their own bodies in various ways (88).

> 88. One must realize, and this was specifically called to my attention in this connection, that all those wives, as well as the two Yoalox, are not considered true human beings. The former changed themselves into birds; the latter, along

773 with their sister, rose up to heaven where one can see them to this day as stars.

K. The Onset of the First Menstruation

773 841 Without delay (89) little Hulušénuwa first sent his wife

Tákašakīpa (90) to the Yoálox. She entered the hut of the two Yoálox and introduced herself. The two brothers looked closely at this woman for a long time. Then they said to their sister: "Give this woman lots of meat!" Yoálox-tárnuxīpa gave Tákašakīpa much meat and she was dismissed. The two brothers had arranged with their sister that they would look over every woman carefully to see whether she was beautiful and whether they liked her. Every woman that did not please them was to be given much meat by their sister and dismissed.

After a while Lášixkīpa arrived. The two Yoálox looked at her, but she did not please them. Yoálox-tárnuxīpa gave her much /1170/ meat and she was dismissed. Then little Hulušénuwa sent all the rest of his wives, one after the other: šékuš, kīmoa, lūrux, wāsénim, lēkakuta, wīpatux, malēpa, šánes, wémarᶻkīpa, kiwágu, dētēhūrux, čokóa (91), and many others, for he had many wives. No matter how beautiful they all were, one as

91. Only a few names are mentioned here in abbreviated form, without the "kipa" designating gender and without the more specific zoological designation, thus avoiding superfluous repetition.

773 841 much as the other, the two Yoálox did not care particularly for any of them. Their sister gave each of these women much meat and they hurried back to their hut. In this way the many wives of little Hulušénuwa presented themselves to the two Yoálox, one after the other. The brothers carefully looked at each woman, but they did not like any of them. There were constantly more women coming. Each one entered the hut of the Yoálox alone, but each of them soon was given a large portion of meat and was in this way dismissed.

Finally Mákuxīpa arrived as the last and the most beautiful wife of little Hulušénuwa. When she entered the hut of the two Yoálox she pleased them beyond measure and they could not take their eyes off her. They whispered to their sister: "Do not give this woman any meat! We want to keep her here in our hut and not let her go back to her husband. We like this beautiful woman very much indeed!" Yoálox-tárnuxīpa said to Mákuxīpa: "Just sit down here beside my brothers, they both like you very much!" So Mákuxīpa sat down without embarrassment, as Yoálox-tárnuxīpa had told her to, on the pallet of the two Yoálox. The latter soon began to fondle the beautiful woman. Later they persuaded Mákuxīpa to stay with them in the hut. The two Yoálox both frankly confessed to her how much they were in love with her. She liked that very much and said: "Very well, I shall stay with you!" Then the two Yoálox were extremely pleased that this beautiful woman wanted to stay with them. They immediately began satisfying their lust. They thanked their sister especially, because she had helped keep this beautiful woman here.

In his hut little Hulušénuwa waited for his Mákuxīpa, but she did not return home. After a long time he finally learned that the two Yoálox were keeping his wife with them in order to amuse themselves with her. This made him sad beyond measure and he said sorrowfully: "Woe is me! They have persuaded the most beautiful of my wives and stolen her from me. They sent home all the rest who are less beautiful, after giving them much meat. How I miss my beautiful Mákuxīpa!" Little Hulušénuwa constantly lamented in this fashion.

841

The two Yoálox continued to amuse themselves with Mákuxīpa. She, too, liked it very much in the hut of the two brothers. They took turns sleeping with her and were very glad that they no longer had to do without that (92).

92. This means frequent and free sexual intercourse for which they hitherto had had no opportunity. Thus their relationship to the woman is not to be interpreted as polyandry.

/1171/ One day, early in the morning, the elder Yoálox went to the forest to hunt animals and gather wood. His brother stayed behind, stretched out on his pallet, with beautiful Mákuxīpa lying at his side. Because the elder Yoálox was absent, they gave themselves up to their boundless lust. They spent all day on their bed and it did not occur to them to get up. The day passed all too quickly for them, and it was after dark when the elder Yoálox returned. He approached the hut cautiously and unobserved. Then he realized that those two were still caressing each other and rolling around on their bed. This aroused his curiosity. Then he listened closely; he wanted to hear what they were saying to each other. He heard Mákuxīpa whisper to the younger Yoálox: "Membrum tuum mihi summopere placet. Tantum est quantum repleat vaginam meam. Rubrum est sicut máku (93). Frater tuus membrum minutum habet, quod me non ita irritat. Ecce, multo magis membrum magnum tuum mihi placet quam fratris tui. Tecum tempus diuturnum concumbere malo." /"Your member is very pleasing to me. How much it fills my vagina. It is as red as máku. Your brother has a small member which thus does not arouse me. Indeed, your large member pleases me much more than that of your brother. I would rather have intercourse for a long time with you."/ These words delighted the younger Yoálox. His older brother who was standing outside the hut listened attentively and understood perfectly what those two were whispering to each other.

93. The reference /máku/ is to the scarlet blossom of Embothrium coccineum (Fig. 78 on p. 495).

After a while he finally entered the hut. He threw down the heavy logs he had brought and immediately sat down beside the fire, for the heavy rain had made him soaking wet. Now the younger Yoálox inconspicuously moved away a bit from Máikuxípa, but both of them were still lying on the pallet. The elder Yoálox had been warming himself by the fire for some time when he finally addressed the woman in a very ill-humored tone: "How can you lie here with my brother from early morning until now!" She answered carelessly: "Well, I liked being with him!" This explanation made him still more ill-humored, and irritated, he said harshly: "I know very well why you liked being with him so much that you lay together the whole day. What was it you just whispered to him?" Embarrassed, Máikuxípa replied: "What could I have whispered to him? We talked about unimportant things." Whereupon the elder Yoálox replied: "In any case you enjoyed yourself immensely with my brother. And I distinctly heard you say to him: 'Membrum tuum mihi summopere placet. Tantum est quantum repleat vaginam meam. Rubrum est sicut máku. Frater tuus membrum minutum habet, quod me non ita irritat. Ecce, multo magis membrum magnum tuum mihi placet quam fratris tui. Tecum tempus diuturnum concumbere malo!' Aren't these the words you just whispered to him! Very well, I'll show you, tamen membrum meum magnum atque tumidum esse /my member may nevertheless be large and tumid/!" He approached the pallet on which she lay and his brother moved far away. He began /1172/ to caress and embrace Máikuxípa. Postea mulieri incubuit et immisit membrum suum in vaginam ejus. Membrum suum ita intumuit, ut laceraret mulieris vaginam. Statim copia sanguinis sat magna effluxit. Yoálox eam interrogavit: "Desiderasne utrum membrum meum adhuc succrescat, necne? Satisfacta es?" /"After that, he lay on the woman and inserted his member in her vagina. His member swelled so that it lacerated the woman's vagina. Immediately a great amount of blood flowed out. Yoálox asked her: "Do you still wish that my member would grow? Is it satisfactory?"/ Máikuxípa did not say a word.

773 841 So the elder Yoálox got up from the bed and said to her: "Now you are tú̄ʍi! Therefore you may now take my younger brother as your husband! Before that I want to give you a few instructions so that not too much blood will flow and you do not become too weak!" Then he gave her all kinds of advice which from then on applied to her and to all women. He emphasized: "You must remain quiet and silent and avoid all chatter. If possible stay in your hut the whole time. Stay away from men, and if you should meet them, give them a wide berth. Refrain from all food and eat only what I permit. Be content with a very small amount of water. Work particularly diligently during this time [your first menstruation], help the other women, fetch a lot of drinking water and firewood for everyone. Faithfully observe each of these admonitions!" The elder Yoálox imposed many other things on Mákuxīpa. She adhered to them all strictly. That is why her condition improved; she soon felt relieved, and the flow of blood finally stopped. After a few days she also did not have to renew the facial painting that Yoálox had made for her (94). Meanwhile Yoálox-tárnuxīpa sat beside Mákuxīpa, cared for her and instructed her diligently, and was constantly helpful. She gave her other bits of advice which Mákuxīpa faithfully followed. Finally Yoálox-tárnuxīpa proposed to her brothers: "Let's give a big feast, for this woman is now tú̄ʍi!" Her brothers agreed; they provided large quantities of meat and consumed them happily. This was the first tú̄ʍikipa tátu (95).

94. These words refer to the special facial painting required during the menarche, which is shown in Fig. 79.

95. The details of this festive occasion were given on p. 579.

841 This is how the first menstruation, which the elder Yoálox brought about for Mákuxīpa, took place. Since then it happens to every woman and is repeated at the end of a moon (96). All

96. This expression is merely a designation of time; it by no means establishes any kind of causal relationship between menstruation and the moon.

the rules that the Yɔ́klog brothers and their sister gave Mɔ́ŋkuʒípa on this occasion are still valid today and are strictly binding for girls at the menarche. Since that time the vagina mulieris has had its present form, blood still flows during every menstrual period, and every woman finds relief if she observes the well-known regulations faithfully. Thus when a girl's first menstruation appears, she must tell her mother or /1173/ a close relative. Immediately several women take this girl under their special care. They prescribe what foods she may eat and permit her an amount scarcely worth mentioning. They let her have only a little water which the girl must sip through a short hollow bird bone (97) so that she will not get too much. The older women

97. The candidates in the youth initiation drink in the same manner (p.709).

keep this girl extremely active at all kinds of tasks. She must fetch firewood for everybody, carry much drinking water to each hut, and assist other women in all kinds of ways. The girl should stay in her hut during this period and may not leave it without a special reason. Outside she must keep her eyes cast down, not linger anywhere, and generally keep her eyes in check. She may not start a conversation with anyone, much less become involved in quarrels. All the women of the camp watch over the girl carefully and see to it that she is not annoyed by any man. For a month after the first menstruation no man may have intercourse with this girl nor molest her. The mɔ́ŋkiʒípa is obliged to observe these rules very conscientiously for about eight days. Then she gathers a great deal of meat and much fruit, whatever is in season. She prepares a large feast and invites everyone to it. This is the public mɔ́ŋkiʒípa ɛ́ʒu which every girl is obliged to arrange on the occasion of her menarche. During these days she always appears with the facial painting appropriate to this occasion. The women impress upon the girl that all these rules and recommendations come from the two Yo'llox and from Yo'llox-chmuxlpa. One who conscientiously adheres to them will not have any serious trouble during the monthly bleeding and in childbirth.

So the story goes. I learned that there was another view about the personality of Mi'kuxlpa. A few people said: She is actually the wife of Kho'lla (Polyborus thoro). He lost his wife, according to the account given in a separate story. The many women who presented themselves to the two Yo'llox actually did not belong to any particular man as his wives; they were unmarried and free. The reason they all came to see the two Yo'llox was because the latter's sister advised them to; her influence upon all women was great and that is why they all complied with her wish. Her purpose was to help her brothers find a wife. Because they liked Mi'kuxlpa, they kept this beautiful woman for themselves. Kho'lla was not considered because his wife had already run away from him earlier and returned to her father's hut. Later when all those women turned themselves into birds, Mi'kuxlpa did the same thing and since then she is called Hahahowakipa.

/1174/ To explain the name Mi'kuxlpa it should be remembered that the Yamana designate the body color of a child or adult that is most pleasing and beautiful to them by refering to the scarlet mi'ku blossom (Fig. 78).

A. The First Birth

The Yamana tell: After that the younger Yo'llox lived alone with Mi'kuxlpa, for she had become his wife. He slept with her and she became pregnant. Finally she gave birth to a son (98). Yo'llox was exceedingly pleased. He immediately

98. The particular aim of this story is to show that Yoalox first introduced conception and childbirth in the way that both events have taken place since then. Hence, before that children were not actually "born," > and there is no explanation anywhere of how they came into being. All persons of that first period are simply presented as adults. From then on, however, successive generations originate in the manner peculiar to human beings.

instructed his wife as to how she must conduct herself during the birth and shortly thereafter. To this day all Yamana women follow these directions.

113 That first child was a boy. He cried constantly and loudest of all at night. In fact, he never stopped crying; his father and mother had tried everything to make him stop, but in vain. Yóllox was extremely displeased; it was impossible for the mother to sit beside the child all the time because she had her work to do.

Finally, losing his temper, Yóllox ran out of the hut and left the boy alone. He built another hut for himself some distance away. Just as regularly as before, he went hunting and continued working on his weapons, but when he came from the woods or from the shore and approached the huts, he could hear his son screaming from far off. Then when he entered his hut next door, the boy would yell even louder. He continued to yell even when Yóllox made a lot of noise just to make him stop.

Thoroughly annoyed he one day again entered the hut in which his little son lay. With both hands he grasped the child under its armpits, lifted it up, stared sternly into its face, and shouted at it in a loud voice: "Listen now and stop screaming!" At that instant the little boy split in two. Thus Yóllox had two sons, and they did not cry. They were the first human beings (99).

> 99. These words mean: those two children are the first who came into the world through actual childbirth. In the strict sense, of course, this applies only to the one.

After a while Míkurīpa died. Since the younger Yóllox was constantly busy, he sometimes could not watch his two sons. So he looked around for a woman to take charge of his two boys. He

113 wou Ts̄ilawḵ̄ałkīpe (she-fox). /1175/ She immediately moved into the hut of Yałłoq and devoted herself to his two sons. Free of anxiety, Yałłoq could now undertake even long journeys.

The she-fox named the two boys Ḵ̄amanḵ̄ave. She was very crafty and clever. So she considered a plan to roast the two boys and consume them. At that time Yałłoq was far away; before he returned she could run away and hide in the forest. So she decided to carry out her plan. She told the two boys: "Go into the forest and gather a lot of dry wood; bring it to the hut, we shall kindle a big fire!" The two boys immediately hastened into the woods. But from the very beginning Ts̄ilawḵ̄ałkīpe had treated the two boys very badly and had made them work a great deal, so both of them were very indignant. They wanted to avenge themselves at last. Instead of gathering dry wood, they picked up green, wet wood and carried this to the hut. The she-fox then tried to light a huge fire with it, but she did not succeed. Angrily she scolded the two boys: "You have brought me green and wet wood; you can't kindle a big fire with that!" The next day she again sent the two boys into the woods to gather dry wood, but again they gathered only green, wet wood and dragged it to the hut. They had noticed that the she-fox was planning something bad, but in their distress they did not know what they could do, for their father was far away on the other side of the channel. They had long since grown tired of having to be with the cranky and ill-tempered Ts̄ilawḵ̄ałkīpe who pestered them every day with lots of work and besides that sent them into the forest for wood. Purposely they gathered only wet wood. This angered the she-fox each time, and she gave vent to her ill-humor in every conceivable way. The boys had to endure much hardship.

One day Ts̄ilawḵ̄ałkīpe lay on her pallet and slept very soundly. As quietly as they could, the two boys started a big fire (100), 100. A signal fire like the one actually used by the Tsimsians (p.972.) is meant here.

with which they wanted to summon a canoe. Sure enough, a man soon arrived on the beach. Hurriedly the two boys boarded his canoe and asked him to take them to the other shore. He did

73 so and the two boys got out on the opposite shore. They went on in the direction where they thought their father would be. Suddenly and unexpectedly they came to a wide river; they did not know how to cross it for it was very wide. Then they were seized with great fear that the dw-fox would come after them. Their father, Tylkus, however, had already seen them hurrying along from afar. He knew that they were now standing perplexed beside the wide river. He quickly made all the water in the river run off and his two sons reached the other shore without effort. They soon came to the spot where he was sitting. He asked them: "Why /117B/ are you following me, what has driven you here?" Amid tears the two sons then told their father how badly they were treated by Clawfoldlye, how hard they had to work, how they were sent into the forest every day to gather dry wood, and that they had but little to eat. Then they added: "Scarcely had we climbed into the canoe of that man and had just reached the middle of the channel when we looked back. There we saw Clawfoldlye pounce on the corpse of Mikmaqlye and start devouring it! Without doubt she was planning to devour us, too. That is why she sent us into the forest every day where we were supposed to gather short dry wood for a fire in which she wanted to roast us!"

All this made the younger Tylkus very angry. Full of rage, he quickly made a [illegible]. He hurled it at Clawfoldlye and she instantly fell dead. From that on the two boys stayed with their father; meanwhile they had grown up (101).

> 101. In this story there are several details which are repeated in the story the Sells have tell about the two nephews of Kwanyip (Vol. 1, 208).

Since that time, however, one sometimes sees a fox dig up human corpses and gnaw at them (102). It is a disgusting animal.

> 102. It has been repeatedly pointed out that, the Tsimsim have a definite abhorrence of the fox's habit of gnawing at human corpses. It is also clearly expressed in this story.

β.- The Sister of the Twelve Falls in Love

TB

The every goes. The two Falling brothers had two more sisters, but no one remembers their names. These girls took particular pleasure in bathing and playing in the waves. They spent almost every day happily in the waves.

One day these girls approached a large sea lion. They were not in the least frightened by it. In fact, from the start it acted unusually amusing and offered to play with them. The two sisters were very willing. they swamd themselves for a long time, and finally the sister are became completely enamored of the sea lion. Incomprehensibly the two edged away so that the younger sister should not observe their play. Then they caressed each other and played together for a long time under the surface of the water.

The two sisters bathed regularly at the same place. Each time they entered the water the big sea lion also arrived. Swimming under the surface it came close to the older sister. This greatly pleased her because she had fallen very much in love with the sea lion. The two incomprehensibly edged away from the other girl, they did not want her to notice how they grew themselves up to their pleasure.

They had been meeting for a long time for their love-making, when one day the younger sister asked her older sister. "What in the world is that big black thing that you are so anxiously covering with your body? //[illegible]/ I see it between your legs. What is it?" The older sister replied evasively. "What ideas you have! Whatever it is you mean can only be the shadow of my body. There is nothing else!" The younger sister was not content with this reply and pushed further: "It doesn't quite seem to me that that black thing is supposed to be your shadow. A shadow is never so black. It has to be something else!" Perplexed, the older sister replied: "I can't understand what you are imagining. If I assure you that it is my shadow, why won't you believe me?" But the younger sister would not be dissuaded and replied: "It is impossible that that black thing is your shadow! It would be very strange indeed if your shadow always appeared in the water and only under your body." Then the older sister repeated emphatically: "Trust my words. There is nothing here but my shadow."

113 The younger sister realized that further discussion would not lead anywhere, so she simply added: "I cannot believe that that black thing is the shadow of your body, no matter how often you tell me it is!" In spite of all this the two girls continued to go bathing almost every day and each time the elder sister met the little sea lion man.

The elder sister had now been pregnant for a long time. When her condition was far advanced, she finally discussed with the sea lion how she should manage. The sea lion forthwith put the pregnant woman on his back and swam to his cave. Here he made her a soft bed and brought a great deal of food. Soon she gave birth to a little boy.

The sea lion was greatly pleased with his son, but after a few days he was seized with great fear. He said to the girl: "If your brothers, the Tshigen find out about our illicit intercourse, when they learn that you have given birth to a boy and are staying in my cave, they will become extremely angry and will blame me alone! Then they will lie in wait for me and murder me. It seems to me that it would be best for you to return to your brothers. Tell them how much we like each other; tell them how well we get along and how lively our little son is. Ask them if I may live with them." The girl replied: "Very well, I shall go back to the hut of my brothers and tell them everything. I shall ask them if you may live with them." She immediately prepared to depart. The sea lion again took her on his back and they made good progress.

The two Tshigen had long since had a strong premonitions of what had happened and what their sister was doing. When the sea lion was near enough to the hut of the Tshigen, he sent his wife on alone. He himself remained behind with the little boy. The woman quickly reached the hut of her two brothers and they happened to be at home. She entered and said without embarrassment: "How are you, my brothers! My husband, the great sea lion, wants me to inquire whether he /1178/ may come here and live with you. He would like to be near you and I, too, would like it very much. But he would only come if you promise not to kill him! He is willing to help you in hunting and in all your work, and he will be a good brother-in-law to you!" Agreeing, the two Tshigen replied: "You say the sea lion is your husband.

773 Well then, he may come, we shall take him into our hut. We promise not to do him any harm; if he behaves well, we shall not kill him."

The woman was pleased that they gave their consent. She immediately hurried back to the place where she had left her husband with the little boy. When she reached the sea lion, she joyfully told him: "I talked to my brothers. They want me to tell you that since you are now my husband you may come and live with them. They will not do you any harm or kill you as long as you behave well." These words reassured the sea lion, and with his wife and child he immediately set out for the hut of the Yo̯ǎlox. The woman, carrying the child on her back, entered first. The sea lion also tried to enter, but he was too enormous and bulky to pass through the narrow entrance. The two Yo̯ǎlox first had to take a few poles out of the hut framework at the entrance, and then at last the sea lion squeezed inside. He was extraordinarily large. The two Yo̯ǎlox assigned to him and his wife the place opposite the entrance as their sleeping place. These two then made themselves at home there as though they were in their own hut.

Early the next day the sea lion got up and hurried out to sea to fish. Sure enough, he soon brought back large fish, mussels, and crabs in great quantities. This was plenty for his wife and for his two brothers-in-law. Now they never had a shortage of anything, for on his own initiative the sea lion willingly set out to sea again and again and dragged back great quantities of meat.

One day the Yo̯ǎlox brothers sent the two women who were living in their hut, the wife of the sea lion and Mǎkuxīpa, far away (103). Only the two Yo̯ǎlox and the sea lion stayed behind.

103. Chronologically, this incident would have to come before the story told on p. 1144.

Before the two women left the hut, the wife of the sea lion took particularly fond farewell. As she did so, the sea lion whispered to her: "In case you should hear me roaring loudly and painfully, come back quickly. It could be that your brothers intend to kill me. Then I would need your help. So come back quickly if I

113 roar loudly!" She assured her husband: "I shall pay careful attention! However, I am sure my brothers will not do you any harm."

For their part the two Yo̯ālox had secretly told Mā̄kuxīpa: /1179/ "When you have gone far away from here with our sister and you then hear the sea lion roaring loudly and painfully, reassure her and say to her: 'It seems that the three men in our hut are amusing themselves very much with games and pranks; they must be extremely merry and happy, that is why the sea lion is roaring so loud out of sheer exuberance!' In any case you must keep our sister there by all means and not let her come running back here to the hut. We are planning to murder the sea lion as soon as possible. That is why we are sending you two far away." Mā̄kuxīpa understood all this very well. So the two women left the hut and set out for the distant point where they were to accomplish their errand.

Soon afterward, the two Yo̯ālox resumed their daily work. They sat down in front of the hut and readied their big harpoons. The sea lion, too, left the hut to go fishing. He hurried down to the beach. It was a beautiful day and the sun was very hot. Soon the sea lion became tired and sleepy. He stretched out on a big stone on the shore and fell into a deep sleep. At once he began to snore and gradually his snoring became so loud that the two Yo̯ālox heard it, for they were sitting in front of their hut. Immediately one of the brothers encouraged the other: "Now is the time to kill the sea lion. He is surely sound asleep for he is snoring mightily. Let's attack him now without delay! Besides, we are out of blubber for greasing the big harpoon. We have always used the fat of snails, but seal blubber is much better. That sea lion is unusually fat, he will give considerable blubber and meat. It will certainly pay to attack him!" The other brother was very much in favor of this plan. Quickly they went back into the hut; they wanted to consult their mother as to whether they should kill the sea lion. They said to her: "Mother, we are tired of oiling our harpoons with the fat of snails. It seems to us much better to kill that fat sea lion and remove the abundant blubber he has; we could oil our harpoons with it from now on!" This proposal did not suit the mother at all, and she complained loudly:

113 "Alas, what you plan to do does not please me. The sea lion always brought me many fish, and big ones of the kind I like best. If you murder him, there will be no one to supply me with many tasty fish. Besides, this sea lion is really good and willing to help!" The two Yoálox became angry at their mother's words and replied: "Certainly, what you say is true, this sea lion is really good and willing to help, but after all he is only an animal and not a human being like us. If we murder him, we shall have his abundant meat and fat. What a huge amount it would be! You, too, shall eat a great deal of it, for his meat is tastier and more succulent than that of fish and mussels. You will surely like the taste of it. We shall /1180/ let you have plenty so that for a long time you will be well provided for." The mother finally gave in and said: "Very well! Do as you like; murder the sea lion, I shall not prevent it any longer."

Then the two Yoálox quickly fixed their harpoon shafts and fastened the sharp bone points to them with the long line (Fig. 35). Cautiously and silently they crept up to the sea lion who was still sleeping soundly and snoring mightily. Then they lifted their harpoons high and took aim, hurling them with all their might. They did this so skillfully that the weapons penetrated far into the huge body of the sea lion and wounded him almost to the heart. The sea lion woke up in pain and knew he was badly wounded and near death. Then, with all his remaining strength, he gave a loud roar, full of pain, just as he roars today when he collapses, mortally wounded. He roared so loudly and so long that the two women far away could hear him distinctly. "Alas," the wife of the sea lion lamented to Mákuxīpa, "do you hear how loudly and pitifully my husband is roaring? He is surely calling me to help him, for the two Yoálox are now murdering him. I shall quickly run to the hut and see if he needs me!" Mákuxīpa tried to hold her back and to reason with her: "How can you think such things? The two Yoálox are surely playing with the sea lion; all three of them are surely happy and in high spirits, that is why the sea lion is laughing so loudly. Don't worry and just stay here with me, later we'll go back to the hut together." But the wife of the sea lion would not go a step farther; instead she kept urging that they go home and the other one realized that she could not hold her back.

113 So the two women changed their course and turned toward the hut. On the way Mákuxīpa kept trying to hold back the other woman.

While the two women were covering the long distance home, the sea lion died there on the stone where the two Yoálox had mortally wounded him with their large harpoon. They immediately began cutting up the huge animal and laid a few pieces on a fire out there in order to roast them. Later they sat down and consumed these pieces and found them superb. They dragged other large pieces to the hut and put them on the fire there in order to roast them. They wanted to eat again soon, for this roasted meat tasted very good to them.

When they set out to kill the mighty animal, the two Yoálox had left its little son alone in the hut. As soon as the boy realized that he was alone in the hut he crept out; he sat down on the sand beside the hut and began to play. The two Yoálox now saw him. One of them immediately brought the boy some meat and he ate it with great relish, for this roast was perfectly fresh meat. Scarcely had he consumed the big piece when he demanded a second. Then the Yoálox gave him a piece of roasted fat and that, too, tasted very good to him.

/1181/ At that moment the two women returned. They first came across the boy who was sitting on the sand near the hut and comfortably eating a piece of perfectly fresh meat. When his mother saw the fresh meat in his hands, a dreadful foreboding made her tremble; she suddenly realized that the boy was eating the meat of his own father! She collapsed, grief-stricken. Soon she was seized with a terrible rage. She took a large sea urchin out of the little basket she was carrying and threw it at the head of the boy with all her might. The boy immediately turned into a fish, but the barbs of the sea urchin clung to his head. That is [825] the sūna (104).

104. A porcupine fish common in those waters. The Yamana do not eat it "because it was formerly a boy."

Full of sorrow and distress the wife of the sea lion entered the hut. She became terribly alarmed when she saw the many

113 pieces of meat hanging on short sticks to roast near the fire. All around the fire on the ground lay other parts of the dismembered sea lion, all cut up for roasting: the head, the flippers, the abdominal parts, the sides, the back. She gazed in horror on the dismembered body of her husband. She was overcome with boundless sorrow; in her despair she sat down and wept bitterly. No one spoke a word to her. Her two brothers, the Yoálox, remained outwardly quite calm and unobtrusive; they gave no sign that anything unusual had happened. They kept on cutting up the meat and watched the roast near the fire. Mákuxípa also remained very quiet.

Finally after some time the two Yoálox asked their sister: "Where is your little son? He was sitting outside in front of the door. Why doesn't he come in?" Excited and sad at the same time the woman replied: "When I came back I saw the little one sitting outside in front of the hut. To my horror I realized that he was eating the meat of his own father. Then I was seized with anger and lost control of myself. I took a sea urchin out of my little basket and hurled it at the boy's head; then he went into the water."

When the two Yoálox learned what had happened to the boy, they were very angry at their sister. Infuriated, they seized the pieces of meat of the sea lion which were lying all around the fire on the hearth. First they took the front part of the head with the snout and threw it at their sister's feet; mockingly they cried: "Here you have the mouth which spoke to you of love and covered you with kisses!" Then they seized the flippers, tossed them at their sister, and said insolently: "Take these flippers which embraced you and touched you lustfully." Then they threw the back at her feet and cried angrily: "Here you have the back, too, on which you sat and on which the sea lion carried you to his cave." /1182/ Finally the two Yoálox seized the large abdominal part of the sea lion, hurled it on the ground in front of their sister, and cried scornfully: "Now you shall also have the part with which the sea lion aroused and satisfied your lust!" The woman was speechless and beside herself with horror. She did not even dare look at the pieces of meat, much less touch them.

A long time passed. Every day this woman saw how good 773 the fresh roast of the sea lion tasted to her brothers and Mákuxīpa. Finally she, too, timidly reached for a little piece and tasted it. The meat tasted very good to her. Soon she helped herself to larger pieces. Gradually she grew calmer over her loss and little by little forgot her husband, the great sea lion. As time went on she ate the meat and fat of the sea lion with as much relish as her two brothers did.

ν. Dying Is Introduced

It is told: The mother of the two Yoálox finally grew old 773 and feeble; from day to day her strength failed. Weak and tired, 761 she remained in bed; finally she was unable to move. Since she had lost all her strength, the two Yoálox carried her outside the hut and laid her in a favorable place in the grass where the warm sun could shine on her.

The elder Yoálox sat beside his mother and looked at her steadily. Although he did not take his eyes off her, she did not utter a sound. It made him unspeakably sad to see his mother lying there completely motionless, but he did not disturb her profound sleep and confidently hoped that she would soon get up again.

Since the elder Yoálox did not take his fixed gaze from his sleeping mother for a long time, but kept looking at her intently, she finally began slowly to move again. Then she opened her eyes and moved slightly, and sleep departed from her. At first she moved scarcely at all, for she seemed to be recovering only very gradually and hardly perceptibly from the utter exhaustion of her infirmity. This was enough, however, for the elder Yoálox, and he became wild with joy. Quickly he ran into the hut; he wanted to tell his younger brother and said to him: "Listen and rejoice, our mother has awakened from her deep sleep. She began to move very slowly. I confidently hope that she will soon get up again!" These words annoyed the younger Yoálox very much and he opposed his brother, instantly replying: "This must not be! Our mother is now sleeping, for she is old 773 761 and quite feeble. Let her now sleep forever!" Whereupon this actually happened. Soon the mother hardly stirred and she did not get up again. When the elder Yoálox /1183/ again left the hut and reached the place where his mother was, he looked at her carefully. She lay there completely motionless. Again he fixed his gaze upon her for a long time, just as he had before, but this time she did not move. She lay there without stirring and without moving. Now she was truly dead.

This was the first death. Since then all human beings must die (105), for that is the way the younger Yoálox wanted it (106).

105. It is noteworthy that there are many points of agreement in this matter between the Selk'nam and our Yamana. Among the former it is the elder brother who was prevented by his younger brother from arising from his sleep of old age. This introduced dying in general (Vol. I, 588).

In Vol. I, 589, footnote 28, I pointed out that the Selk'nam like to use the expression "elder Kwanyip," instead of the real name. The Yamana have no real name for the "elder Yoalox."

106. As this story came to an end, there was much bitterness and grief written on the faces of the many people present at the thought that everyone sooner or later will die and will be unable to escape death. Without a word, they all left and silently crept back to their own huts. Every Yamana is at times very much depressed at the thought of dying.

On August 12, 1923, old Maŝemikens and his wife, both of whom came from the west, gave me a somewhat different version of this myth. He told the following story.

The two Yoálox were men of superior intelligence. When their mother had reached a great age, she finally lost all her strength. So she stayed in bed and was overcome by a very deep

773 761 sleep. After that she no longer moved. The two Yoálox wept bitterly, for they had lost their mother and were now left alone. They carried their mother out and buried her. The younger Yoálox, however, had little love for his mother; he did not weep nearly as much or as loudly as his elder brother. Their mother had been buried for some time when one day they heard her voice outside near the hut. Suddenly the elder Yoálox ceased his weeping and said: "I shall not weep any longer, for I hear the voice of my mother!" He hastened out of the hut and hoped to see his mother there. The younger Yoálox remained in the hut and furiously yelled at his mother: "How can you come back here? Go away at once and disappear from here forever!" Then the mother slowly withdrew and has never returned. The younger Yoálox simply said, as though he were displeased with himself: "Why did we not immediately (107) tell our mother that she must not come back!" Truly, from then on she remained away forever.

107. These words mean: why did we not at the proper moment beforehand prevent our mother from rising up out of her death-sleep.

§. The Yoalox Go Away

The Yamana say: "The two Yoálox brothers gave proper names to all objects and places, all plants and animals. They remained here on earth for a long time. When they grew old, they ascended to the canopy of heaven with Yoálox-tárnuxīpa and their other sisters. They are still there as stars."

/1184/ This concludes the stories about the Yoálox family which is associated with the Yamana. All the men and women are, on the whole, proud of the Yoálox brothers and sisters, for they are regarded as the best and the most capable members of the tribe. The men, above all, appreciate the two Yoálox brothers as the most skillful huntsmen, the best craftsmen, the most gifted persons. These heroes are not worshipped in any way

773 among the Yamana, despite all the admiration with which men and women speak of the two brothers and their elder sister.

773 Two stars of the first magnitude are pointed out as the 821 Yoālox brothers, namely, Sirius in the Greater Dog and Procyon in the Lesser Dog. The stars of secondary magnitude close to Sirius are the other members of the Yoālox family, all of whom ascended to the canopy of heaven back in those days. BD:12 gives only iūālux, "the name of a bright star" /cited in English/, and iūālux-dāranakakīpa [our tārnuxīpa], "the name of a bright star" /cited in English/.

From the stories themselves one cannot infer any connec-773 tion between the Yoālox family and Watauinēiwa; in fact, the 776 two seem to represent quite clearly and sharply distinct spheres of ideas. Several times I asked the Yamana point-blank whether the Yoālox brothers had perhaps been charged by Watauinēiwa to provide for the many well-known arrangements, as well as to instruct human beings in the prevailing rules and customs. They all heard this question with obvious astonishment, and from that I concluded that such a connection between the two lines of thought was not exactly familiar. It is true that from an earlier time I knew that the Yoālox are introduced to the uǰwāala in the čiēxaus (p.767) and to girls on the occasion of their menarche (p.575) as the intermediaries of the prevailing laws and habits of life sent to them by the Supreme Being. They are never mentioned at a funeral rite. In everyday life a person will only now and then speak of them. For example, it is said that Yoālox decreed that berries may not be picked prematurely, but must remain on the stalk until they are ripe (p.327). Accordingly, the intermediary role of the Yoālox is not to be interpreted as a special, definite, formal mission for Watauinēiwa, such as, for example, Temāukel gave the bringer of blessings, Kenōs (Vol. I, 572). The situation among the Yamana is somewhat different. Their way of life was actually decisively influenced by the Yoālox, but since, in the final analysis, every law and every custom is derived from Watauinēiwa, the activity of the Yoālox must also be regarded as his command in the broadest sense of the term. To a certain extent this is directly applicable to the regulations pertaining to girls at the menarche and /1185/ women at childbirth.

773 This circumstance, however, does not justify the view that there 776 is any close relationship between the Yoālox family and Wataąinēąwa.

I also inquired very definitely as to whether the Yoālox took part in the great upheaval in the kīna at Yāąaąšāąa. The most experienced old people replied: "By that time the Yoālox had surely already left the earth. The Yamana of earlier times never told us that the Yoālox participated in that great upheaval." In the myth about the origin of the kīna, also, they are not mentioned; hence there is no justification for connecting the Yoālox with the men's secret ceremony. However, as I was assured on one occasion in 1920, Yoālox-tārnuxīpa in her day had a great influence on all the women who came from the north to Beagle Channel (p. 1111). The Yoālox also are not associated with Lēm and his family. The only connection between the personalities mentioned is that they consecutively occupy a period that is separate from that of human beings (p. 1118), a period that can be justifiably designated as that of the heroes. Before the close of this period the younger Yoālox introduced actual childbirth (p. 1140), through which he was granted a son. This boy and his brother begin the succession of true human beings, the yāmana. The transition from the age of pre-human beings to that of human beings takes place without any disruption.

A survey of the status and activity of the two Yoālox brothers shows that apparently they are endowed with superior power and are the founders of the way of life of the Yamana people. They designed the way of life, arranged it, and guaranteed it for all time by means of rules and regulations of binding legal power. They are responsible for valuable inventions which make life bearable and work easier. Thus they are shown to be culture heroes in that strict sense which Ehrenreich (a):236 applied specifically to conditions among primitive peoples. Very 773 briefly it should be mentioned that there are a surprising number 776 of points of agreement between the Yoālox brothers and the 171 Kwānyip brothers and sisters of whom the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 581) tell. Among the latter, most of the details are much clearer and more definite, and there is more accuracy and completeness in the succession of ideas. There is a striking basic connection

773 between the unique and definite ideas that surround the figure of 776 the younger Yoálox among the Yamana and the figure of Kwányip
171 with her brothers and sisters among the Selk'nam. Unfortunately, space does not permit detailed comparisons (108).

108. Instead, see the separate essay by Gusinde (ii):687, as well as the general remarks in Ehrenreich (b):44 and Schmidt (d):1016.

In any case, it is noteworthy that in this so-called age of heroes the individual personalities, except for contemporaries, succeed one another at definitely distinguishable intervals and carry on the development. It has already been shown that the same is true among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 606). /Ed., Section b, "Myths and Legends," pp. 1186-1277, is omitted./

/1278/ D. Belief in Spirits and Superstitions

776 A special group of spirits, distinctly separate from the body of ideas surrounding Watauinéiwa and from the heroes and mythological figures, lives in the imaginations of our Fuegians. Far from having originated anything important or advantageous for the Yamana, they represent something like apparitions and demons to them. If an individual on his daily wanderings or canoe trips chances to meet these creatures, it usually does not fail to happen that he is at least threatened or endangered, sometimes even badly harmed and murdered. They are generally malevolent spirits, with the single exception of the good-natured Yefáčel. To the following description of this group of spirits a section on how the Yamana regard their dreams and on certain superstitious conceptions will be added.

a. The Groups of Spirits

In the preceding sections it has often been shown that the Yamana have the same accurate and comprehensive idea of an

776 actual spirit that is familiar elsewhere. Hence it is unnecessary to define the concept specifically. They use the word kéšpix́ primarily and directly for the nature of the human soul (p. 1033) and Watauineiwa (p.1068) and designate with it an independent, active, incorporeal being. Beyond these narrow limits, they use kéšpix́ also for those beings that their own imaginations, their superstition, have created, which appear in their dreams and fantasies as so-called apparitions. These beings, therefore, do not have actual existence or substantial reality. The Yamana distinguish several groups of such so-called spirits very distinctly, according to their nature, activity, and abode. Accordingly, one group has more importance than another. Their relationship and contacts with them are such that the Yamana fear and avoid these groups of spirits, for it is only as an exception that one of them is kind and friendly toward human beings. A Fuegian never worships or actually venerates them.

These general ideas are found in Bridges (k):237, and Cojazzi:106 repeats them verbatim: "They believed in the existence of spirits or souls that could become visible at night but were not tangible. These spirits were malevolent, and the natives associated them with sickness and death. They used the word cashpick [kéšpix́], soul, as qualifier...But the natives never worshipped or revered cushpik, hannush, or any other being" /translated from Spanish/. Elsewhere Bridges (e):332 and (i):15 adds: "Although the Yahgans had no religion, they had all kinds of superstitions. They believed in spirits who had the /1279/ form of human beings, but not their nature. They imagined that these creatures lived in caves in the woods and they believed that they hated and killed everyone who came too close to them...Persons from time to time believed they had seen these spirits and gave account of the apparition" /last sentence cited in English/. According to Bridges (h):209, there are several groups of spirits: "The Yahgans believed in apparitions, as well as in many supernatural beings, and in the existence of wild men in the woods" /translated from Spanish/. All these kéšpix́ however, are always distinctly different from living human beings and from the human soul after death because of their strange and peculiar nature (238).

238. This means, as Bridges (i):15 says:

"To call a person Cushpij was a great insult" /cited in English/. In (e):332 and (k):237 it is said: "'Cashpik' is a name which they also gave people who were ridiculous or who had a bad character, and this was a great insult." Likewise Hyades (q):255.

Therefore, kɛ̃ʔpix́ is a general concept, not the proper name of a definite individual person (239).

239. Despard (b):717 made this mistake: "Firelanders have a dread of a being called 'Cushpeec,' and are loth to hear his name mentioned. He seems to be a very lean man. When met with, he makes doleful cries..." /cited in English/. In this connection see the detailed description of this generic term above, p. 1033.

776 778 If the Yamana extends the meaning of the word kɛ̃ʔpix́ he includes those strange spirit-beings which arise from his imagination and fantasy, his belief and his dreams, and which do not truly live, as do Watauinéjwa and the human souls separated from the body. Each of the various groups forms its own peculiar society. In this connection the Yamana also extends the designation kɛ̃ʔpix́ to include a rare individual case which deviates from the human norm. BD:466 refers to this with the word fūkōʔpigōna, "to say a person is cushpik [kɛ̃ʔpix́] or like one, to accuse a person of acting the part of a cushpik, i.e., of speaking or acting without any regard to truth or propriety" /cited in English/. Actual consciousness, presence of mind, personal alertness are also called kɛ̃ʔpix́, that is, the definite kɛ̃ʔpix́ which lives in the human being, and there is then no sharp distinction between this condition and the human soul. An unusual notion or impulse or even coincidence also belongs in this category. Earlier, on page 488, I related an unimportant incident. The daughter of old Pedro Maʔemikens, who was about seven years old, following a

778 Puerto Mejillones and traveled far from the parental hut. Darkness overtook them at Puerto Piedra and they stayed there. Full of anxiety, the parents set out to look for the children, found them, and brought them back to camp early in the morning. No one scolded the children; not even their own parents reproached them. That same night the wife of old Thomas, who had been ill for a long time, died. Everyone explained the behavior of the children by saying: "The kĕlpix of that woman prompted the children to go so far away before nightfall. They are not to be blamed." That is why no one thought of /1280/ punishing the children. As has been described, the adults who take part in the singing in the čiexaus hut (p.796) regard it as natural to consider heightened emotion and inner agitation as expressions of the kĕlpix, in short, as kĕlpix.

[756] This fact is important in understanding the influence of the yĕkamuł. Even the power by means of which a yĕkamuł operates, either on the spot or at a great distance, is called his kĕlpix.

Finally, the action of the wild forces of nature is sometimes pointed out as the expression of malevolent kĕlpix. This has given rise to expressions such as are used, for example, by Krickeberg:322: "The Fuegian animates the majestic natural surroundings of his homeland with demons." In this connection Fitz-Roy's (a):179 partially correct conjecture is also pertinent: "The fact of their believing that the evil spirit torments them in this world, if they do wrong, by storms, hail, snow, etc., is one reason why I am inclined to think that they have no thought of a future retribution" /cited in English/ (240).

240. This alone is enough to refute what Darwin (f):I, 123 reported: "With justifiable pride Jemmy Button stoutly maintained that in his country there is no devil." Rosskoff:51 is more accurate in his judgment: "Ideas of the sun as a mighty creature endowed with will power, upon which man feels dependent, are implicit in what Missionary Phillips relates. One sultry day when he complained to a young Fuegian about the heat, the latter cried, alarmed: 'Do not say the sun to hot, immediately it will hide and the wind will blow cold.'"

Thus the conception of kilpix is very broad and contains many things which cannot be summed up in a terse formula. Hyades (q):255 discussed this word as "an untranslatable term referring to fantastic beings who live in deserted caves in the middle of dense forests" /translated from French/. The idea of kilpix must not be so limited, however, as will be adequately shown in the following discussion.

1. Cannibals

From the start it does not seem strange that the Yamana, too, in one way or another, believe in cannibals. This belief may have originated in their apprehensiveness and fear of the Halakwulup (p. 205 /untranslated/) who are directly adjacent to the western group. A particular incident may have brought this about in the first place. One thing is certain, that almost all the Yamana designate a group within the Halakwulup tribe, about which nothing is definitely known, as the asikan, which is the same as calling them cannibals. Sometimes they include all the Halakwulup in this belief. There are others among the Yamana who include only the group living farther north somewhere near Smith Channel, some of whom it is believed now and then appear in Beagle Channel. Occasionally someone will even suspect the western Yamana, the so-called Inanumala, of practicing this habit (241). It is said: These asikan have long canoes

241. Bridges (VSA:XI,289;1884) had already learned: "These natives say there is a tribe speaking their language, but with a peculiar accent, they call them 'Ishawa,' who are cannibals, but they > strenuously deny any such cannibalism among themselves" /cited in English/. Hyades (b): 1346 and (g):301, on the other hand, definitely asserts: "There are no traditions of anthropophagy" /translated from French/. If he means by this that the Yamana themselves do not practice cannibalism, he is perfectly right (p. 288 /untranslated/).

of solid /1281/ construction, which accommodate many men. Because all of them row, the canoe moves with extraordinary speed. The ashen invade Yamana territory only at night. Anyone they catch at that time is dragged off and devoured. They take advantage of the dark so that they will be successful and meet no resistance. During the day they stay within their boundaries or hide in a sheltered spot in the territory of the Yamana until night falls, for only under its protection do they carry out their surprise attacks. Not only the western group but all the Yamana live in constant dread of the ashen, precisely because they come up very swiftly and then depart again. They are also called wilapanya, "murderer" (cf. SD:618), because they murder and eat anyone who falls into their hands. A third designation, Hapanana-yémana, "the people in Hapanandi," is derived from a myth (p. 1162). It is also pronounced "Apanandi" (p. 363 /untranslated/).

Even the young Bridges (a):207 came across traces of this belief: "Cannibalism is unknown, but they have reports that it is practiced by some people far to the westward, whom they call Hapanandiandi" /cited in English/. Later he (b):237 wrote more explicitly: "They believe in the existence of certain murderers in the west, called ashen, attributing to them wondrous powers and a fiendish wickedness. They supposedly wander at night, traveling in fast and strongly built canoes, with the object of killing anyone they meet. It is said that they conceal themselves with trickery in such a way that they could never be found, but stories tell of this one and that one who, having seen them at night, succeeded in escaping from them" /translated from Spanish/ (p.45).

[45]. Likewise Bridges (b):16, Dahlmann

(h):204, Hyades (f):588 and (q):259, and so forth.

BD:30 gives the meaning of asàsii, "persons who go about in the dark of night to kill persons" /cited in English/. To this Hyades (g):39 adds: "Anyone who sees the Ualapatu is lost; one often hears their voice, which resembles that of the seal, but which the Fuegians can immediately distinguish. If they think they hear it, they are frightened out of their wits; they carefully barricade every opening of the hut and, weapon in hand and trembling, they await the morning. Then they immediately leave the campsite and flee to another island. Often the specter follows them even there and harasses them for several nights."

From direct observation Bridges (i):15 tells how the fear of these cannibals affects the Yamana: "The Asayu, or Ayamanuiaula, people of the West, were much feared. During the afternoon (January 1st, 1872) Sisoiange's wife was sleeping and awoke hearing a strange noise in the next room, she got up, but could see nothing. She was in a great fright and spread a report that an Asayu had come into the house" /cited in English/. /1282/ Hyades (f):588 and (q):254 also repeats in detail the view disclosed to him by three Yamana men in Orange Bay on April 3, 1883. According to them, the murderers penetrate Yamana territory with large boats. "If the men are asleep, the inhabitants of the west immediately enter the hut, cut off the heads of everyone, men and children (except perhaps the women), and then eat them, cooking them over the fire" /translated from French/.

186 773 Moreover, the Yamana tell a separate story about the cannibals, Hamanfulum wiuwa, as follows. Once a few people from the central group were camping in Hamanfulum (243). They had noticed that many other families had traveled westward. A rumor was going around: "There in Wiuwa (244) a whale is lying on western part of Yamana territory, particularly the north shore of Beagle Channel (p. 255 /unrevised/).

the beach." So these people said to themselves: "We shall go there too, in order to get a lot of meat and fat. Only tonight we shall may have and get a good rest!" The next morning they boarded their canoes. They traveled all day and went farther and farther, even during the night, for they wanted to reach the whale as soon as possible. There were ten families and a yékamsil. Because they traveled all night -- and these nights were very dark -- they could not see the coastline very clearly. Actually, they rowed past that whale! But they kept right on rowing farther and farther. They had reached Hoyamsil (245) long before.

and they finally entered a harbor. They were all very tired. They disembarked in order to find out the actual location of the whale that they had been seeking for so long.

Many people had made a big camp here, but these people were cannibals. It was their custom to devour everyone who came here from the east. To make it easier to murder everyone, they always let only one stranger enter a hut to spend the night, for a family could easily cope with one stranger and quickly murder him.

Now when the ten families disembarked here, they were divided up among ten different huts, and the yékamsil was sent into another hut. He entered this hut; an old woman was sitting near the fire making a little basket. When the yékamsil entered, the old woman's husband said to him: "Sit down here near the fire! You are probably very hungry!" Whereupon the yékamsil replied: "Yes, I am very hungry, for we traveled a long time and looked for the stranded whale without finding it. Where do you suppose the whale is?" Then the husband took a knife and reached for his wife's left breast. It was long and heavy and he cut it off. He immediately hung this piece over the fire to roast it. The /1283/ yékamsil saw this. Horrified, he said: "Are you by any chance roasting this piece for me?" The other man replied, "Yes, that is for you because you are very hungry!" Thereupon the ohkonsel said, quite indignantly: "I shall never eat human flesh! What do you take me for? We came to hear the whale that we were told was stranded here in the west. We do not eat human flesh!" Saying this, he left the hut and looked around outside until he found a piece of moss. He came back to the hut with it, placed it on the fire, and roasted it. Then he ate it.

There was a basket hanging in the hut, and two small children were sitting in it. When they saw the ohkonsel, they jumped up happily in their basket and sang: "ohkon hagkhoma, ohkon hagkhoma." This means: "Today we should like to eat this man." But the two adults replied, also very happily: "hawakhoma hagkhoma, hawakhoma hagkhoma" (1185).

> 1185. I was told that the word "hagkhoma" used here by the Haisla-speaking hut no meaning. The children wanted to say to the old people that they wanted to devour that man this very day, whereas the old people wanted to postpone the feast until the morrow. In order that the younger should not recognize what they had in mind, they merely emphasized the adverbs "today" and "tomorrow," in combination with a word without any meaning whatever. This was sufficient for the adults as well as the children, and they understood one another. Whether it is related to "hagkhoa" in 1183 I cannot determine. -- The term tomorrow was also the reason they were called "Hagkhoma-Tsawa" and their territory, "Hagkhoma" (p.194).

Then the ohkonsel had no inkling of what this was supposed to mean. He recognized the grave danger hanging over himself and his people! Because he was a great ohkonsel, he cased a piece of fat into the fire, smoothed. While it was burning, he caused a very deep sleep to come over all the people of this camp. Instantly all these people fell asleep and slept so soundly that no one stirred. The ellaneaf now ran quickly to his own people and told them that they all were in great danger. They all immediately seized their things and ran whatever they could that belonged to these cannibals, loaded everything into their canoes, and rowed off as fast as possible. They hastened toward the east to their homeland.

When they were already far away, a dog began barking loudly. He barked so vigorously that these people woke up again and immediately noticed that they had been robbed of all their things. They could just see the fleeing thieves in the far distance. They quickly made ready to pursue them. When the latter saw that the cannibals were coming after them, they were seized with great fear. They fled to ellaneaf (147). But the 147. This little inlet lies west of La Rencontre Bay, in the northwest branch.

Ingamanilli people noticed this and now buried a large kayak (1104) with the sling. It landed quite near the hiding-place of the fugitives. It here and gave off a loud report, like thunder. One can hear it to this day in that region (148). /1104/ The fugitives then caused a large part of the stolen goods out of their canoes to make them lighter and speedier for their escape. They rowed on again, always toward the east, past Lagaddy and Gennadiktan, until they reached Uladdy once more, where they had previously had their camp. But the Ingamanilli people continued to hail large stones after them.

To this day, therefore, one can see large stones lying about in this entire region, especially in ellaneaf, Lagaddy, and Gennadiktan. The Ingamanilli people hurled all of them at the (B 77) drawn, using their dings. All the things that they had stolen also turned into canoe and to this day he wondered about where the fugitives found them out of their canoes.

A variant of this story is always told to the chiefs at the end of their initiation. At that time it serves the special purpose of confirming the historical derivation of the Tahgan institution from the west and its transmission to the central region of the Tamana (p.[illegible]).

(B. The series portrayal shows clearly enough that the feared cannibals are merely phantoms created by the Tamana's terror of their western neighbors. Even Bridges (1):16 reached this view: "This Ayamanilli people are reported to be cannibals, but I do not believe the report, which is so like others we have proved to be false" /cited in English/. This much is certain, that the Halaiwadup possess actual plank-bows which they have had for several decades (245). It is obvious that these carry a larger number of men than the fragile bark canoes. Bridges (1):16 frankly admits that he finally saw the first vessel of this kind on February 16, 1883, near Stuart Island. It was manned by Halaiwadup and is generally called Hahdu-dam (cf. in BD: 180, Hahdu, "a pole, leg, trunk of a tree /cited in English/). He adds the following remark to this personal observation: "It is very desirable for the sake of the Eastern natives to clear up the matter about these hamai-anan wooden canoes which have been for ages a source of continual fear to the Eastern. These hamai-anan were supposed to be manned by cannibals who turned about in them by night in order to kill any natives they 186 might meet. They drew up their canoes by day and secreted themselves and never lit a fire for fear of detection" /cited in English/. In any case, the fact is that not a single Yamana saw those murderers by day and that the crew of one of their canoes never attacked our Yamana and overpowered them. Hence, those Wēlapatux are nothing more than fantasy images.

245. Besides the plank-bow, the Halaiwadup much more often make and use the dugout. Gustafson (1)/147 has already pointed out that they had these two articles. Our Tamana first became acquainted with the dugout among the Halaiwadup and took it over from them (p.[illegible]). The Tamana did not adopt the plank-bow because their region lacks suitable timber.

/1285/ 2. The Water Spirits

116 Everyone is much more frequently and more vitally concerned with certain water spirits than with cannibals. These spirits are called Lakūma. They prefer to inhabit certain places favorable to them, but they traverse any inlet whatever. This sea monster has already been described as dangerous in the Asōulaxīpa wātuwa /"Story of Asōulaxīpa," untranslated; see pp. 1261-1262 in the original text/. It threatens every canoe, lifts out the occupants, and sucks them down into the depths. Each Lakūma has the habit of flattening himself out on the surface of the water so that his back protrudes a little. He waits in this fashion until a canoe approaches. It is hard to recognize the Lakūma from a distance. People often say that outwardly he is like a whale; others compare him to the calamary hūka (Loligo subulata or squid) which is not uncommon in those regions; still others to the ray. He is also said to be large and very strong, "a great monster like a huge worm" /cited in English/, according to Spencer:80. If the occupants of a canoe have unwittingly come within reach of the monster, they rarely succeed in escaping disaster, and only if the Lakūma is sleeping or in a good mood.

He does not merely attack a canoe and its occupants. It is also within his power to cause high waves and threatening storms if he wants to endanger a vessel. That is why the Yamana avoid the regions presumably occupied by a Lakūma. Emilia told me: "When I was still a girl, my family planned to leave Wulaia and travel north. On the very morning we intended to leave, the yēkamus who later became my father-in-law had a dream and told us, full of anxiety: 'Be careful, or disaster will befall you!' In his dream he saw a mighty Lakūma suddenly tip over our boat as it 776 was leaving Yaiaaŝága and pull it down to the bottom with the utmost speed. It hit bottom so forcefully that it immediately bounded back to the surface. This downward and upward movement was so instantaneous that the water on both sides formed a solid wall and not a drop entered the canoe. When the yékamuŝ told us that, we set out in another direction." Since then Emilia avoids even mentioning the Lakúma because she is so afraid of him.

Nelly Lawrence related a personal experience. "I was still a girl when a woman from the east came to my native region [in the west]. Once I rowed out in a canoe with her. Suddenly this woman discovered a large Lakúma lying flat on the bottom of the sea. The people in the east eat the meat of the Lakúma, which is something we in the west would never do. The woman immediately reached for her crab fork sírsa (Fig. 62, p.258) and said: 'I'll spear that one, he will give us a tasty morsel!' I was terribly frightened when I saw the animal, but the woman pierced his head with her sírsa. The Lakúma acted extremely wild and swam off with the crab fork. The woman clung to the fork for a while and the whole /1286/ boat was dragged along with it. Finally the woman was obliged to let go of her sírsa and the Lakúma escaped." Bridges (a)P211 also mentioned the action of this spirit: "They believe in a sea monster they call Lucooma, who causes tides and whirlpools, and instances are known, when canoes having been in danger from a whirlpool or tide rip, of children and dogs being thrown overboard to appease the wrath of Lucooma" /cited in English/. The assertion that a child is sacrificed to the Lakúma in order to appease him was repeated by a certain Fenton from Punta Arenas who only once in his life, on a two-day journey, crossed Yamana territory, as well as by Furlong (cf. Cooper:153). Not a single Yamana could tell me personally of a definite instance of this kind; they all unanimously and positively denied that a child or a dog had ever been sacrificed to Lakúma. Fred Lawrence regarded it as absolutely impossible that the Yamana could have decided to do such a thing. It is true that out of considerations of safety, if there is grave danger, they may let a heavy piece of wood or a large sea lion fall into the water to lighten the boat (250). In doing so someone perhaps once thought of 176 Yamana believe in whirlwinds "produced by evil spirits, and to appease them, they throw some limbs and pieces of wood in the water" /translated from Spanish/. This statement probably rests on inaccurate observation; the Indians told me that such a custom was unknown to them.

250. Spegazzini (a):172 maintains that the

Lakúma, but this is neither a general rule nor a sign of veneration of Lakúma or a cult. The mere fact that in their accounts the Yamana do not even agree about the size and shape of the Lakúma clearly shows that the latter are only figments of the imagination, which are more vivid in one person than in another. Moreover, it is said that every yékamuš has favorable relations with the Lakúma, and whenever he starts singing they let him pass unharmed.

173 The Yamana tell the following Lakúma wátuwa. In ancient 176 times some people traveled to Kaluwéllawaja. Here there are many Lakúma, but these people did not know it. Soon the Lakúma approached and all the people lost their canoes. They barely escaped with their live[illegible] a beach where there was no wood whatever. For a long time they were without fire, and finally they had nothing left to eat. On the other side there was a nice spot with plenty of wood. Then one day a man saw something lying on the surface of the water. It was quite broad and flat. Soon additional objects of this kind gathered. He looked closely and saw that these were only Lakúma lying there, one beside the other. Finally there were so many that they extended from one shore to the other. They were lying completely motionless. One of the men said: "If we quickly step over all of them, we shall reach the other shore!" He did this, ran quickly, and reached the opposite beach. Immediately the other two men tried it, as well as the women and children. The latter went too slowly, however, /1287/ and all the Lakúma submerged, disappearing into the water, and took all those people with them (250/sic/). The

250. The same strange motif is repeated in another context (p.1177).

773 776 Lakúma seriously harm everyone who happens to come within their reach.

The one man was saved, however, and he was a great yékamuš. He then went to the other people, called them together, and told them everything. He said: "We must now make many yékus and kill those Lakúma down there!" Immediately the men undertook this work. Then they attacked the Lakúma and killed many of them. They were lying on the bottom. If one comes to this place today, he will see many flat stones on the bottom. They are the Lakúma who, holding themselves flat, slowly sank with all those people and still lie in the water at that place.

Moreover, there is the following story about the disobedient girl, tū̂ʔkīpa wátuwa, for which I am likewise indebted to old Whaits (251). A girl who is tū̂ʔi may not eat berries. Now there was once a tū̂ʔikīpa who felt a great desire to taste some berries. The girl ran away secretly, sat down in the woods, and ate many amáim. Actually the girl did not eat the berries and swallow them; she merely pressed them against her teeth and squeezed the juice out, throwing the solid parts away (252).

251. A shorter version was told to me earlier by a few women and given on page 571.

252. In this way the girl believed she could get around the literal meaning of the clear and distinct prohibition.

None of her family knew about it.

Soon afterward the family of the tū̂ʔikīpa was traveling across a wide inlet when a large Lakúma appeared on the surface and threatened them all. In their terror they immediately threw a lot of mussels, birds, and pieces of meat into the water, but the Lakúma did not release the canoe. The girl stayed hidden in the bottom of the canoe and did not look up at all. Then the people seized their dog and threw him overboard, but the Lakúma

773 was not satisfied with that either. In their despair the people 776 now took hold of a little girl and tossed her into the water; the girl sank very quickly. Nevertheless, the Lakúma still did not release the canoe. Finally the people seized the big girl, the tú̆ʷikīpa, and shoved her overboard. Lakúma seized her avidly and, quick as lightning, sank down into the depths with her. Soon the entrails [of that girl] rose up and floated on the surface. This made the people very sad. After a time the Lakúma reappeared on the surface and stretched out, making himself very flat. Then the people discovered on his back a great many mussels of such uncommon size that they had never before seen any like them (253). The men reached for them and /1288/ took a few off his back. Their shells were particularly sharp. In their rage the men quickly cut up the whole Lakúma with them, tore out his entrails, and dismembered him completely. The Lakúma was dead immediately and sank to the bottom of the sea. At the same instant the canoe began to move, although no one was using the oars, and in no time at all it reached the shore. The people breathed a sigh of relief. But the girl was lost, for she had tasted the berries as a tú̆ʷikīpa.

This story, which obviously has a pedagogic aim, is definitely regarded as a myth, wátuwa, not as an actual experience of a known family. I suspect that Bridges (a):211 heard something about it and interpreted the genuinely mythical material as an actual occurrence. In any case, it is certain that the Lakúma should be regarded as creations of the imagination and the fear of our exceedingly superstitious Fuegians.

3. The Forest Giants

773 Inasmuch as the figure of the giant and man-eater Čáskels 776 exists among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 593), it is not strange that

171 our Yamana tell about many giant-like spirits which make the 173 Cape Horn Archipelago unsafe. If one compares the mythologi-
176 cal material of the two tribes, it becomes clear that among the Selk'nam it is well organized and richer, but that there are also considerable differences. In any case, a comparison with the Yóĭi is recommended.

176 The giants are called Hánnuš. People say that there are a considerable number scattered through the country. Each one lives only in the forest, and he hides behind thick tree-trunks whenever a human being approaches. Each one also rules over a certain area where he lives all by himself; he regularly roams alone in all directions through it and only very rarely do several Hánnuš gather somewhere. Each one is at least twice as tall as an adult Yamana. He goes about stark naked, for his body hair is almost as thick as the wool of the guanaco.

If a Yamana wanders through a lonely forest all by himself or lies down to sleep in it, the Hánuš approaches him. Out of fear of meeting the giant, people therefore avoid penetrating far into the forest and usually stay close to the edge. Even from there they can hear the crashing of trees and the breaking of twigs wherever he sets foot. They also often hear a storm-like howling of the wind, which announces his approach. Thus warned, everyone who can hastens to safety. It is best for the person to get into his canoe and row out to the open channel where the Hánnuš cannot follow him. This giant prefers to surprise men and women who have fallen asleep; /1289/ he robs them and slays them. At night he also comes near the huts that have been erected at the edge of the forest, especially if they shelter only a few people, whom he murders. He watches particularly for lazy women who have come into the forest to gather wood or berries and instead have lain down and gone to sleep. Cautiously and softly he creeps up to them and makes them fall into a deep sleep. Then he lives with them and satisfies his desire. As for young women, he likes best to drag them to his quarters where they are at his mercy. Every Hánnuš is considered a lecherous fellow. He likes to give men a hard blow with his mighty club and leave them lying in the woods. He likes best of all to chase half-grown children, especially girls. When he 776 catches them, he drags them into the forest where he lives. His shelter is almost always a large cave deep in the forest in which on occasion this or that Hánnuš establishes himself. Here he keeps all the children he has caught; he paints their bodies uniformly red and often plays with them. Like himself, these children are stark naked. They must stay with him the rest of their lives. This Hánnuš folk is very numerous. In exceptional cases Hánnuš will let a child whom he does not like escape, especially during the first few days after he has caught it, so that it can return to its parents. All Hánnuš are male and they are always fully mature.

Some of my informants were of the opinion that the Hánnuš had formerly lived among ordinary human beings and that they had later retired to the forest. Since then they have been hostile to human beings, especially to men. The Hánnuš slays every man he can find for the sheer pleasure of murder. Naturally, the Yamana stay away from those places where they are more often aware of a Hánnuš; under no circumstances would they spend the night in the forest.

Bridges (a):211 referred to the Hánnuš: "These Indians believe in ghosts, in wild men of the woods, called Kanoosh /sic/... Some of them pretend to have seen and killed hanoosh, but they never prove their bravery by showing any part of the body, which is said to be very dreadful. They have many hanoosh tales. Ocoko supposes the hanooshes to be men who either in madness, or after a murder, have run away into the woods, and so became wild" /cited in English/. Later he (i):15 and (k):237 supplemented this somewhat; Cojazzi:106, Dabbene (b):203, and Hyades (q):256 rely on his authority (254).

254. Elsewhere Bridges (e):322 writes quite vaguely: The Yamana "believed in the existence of mad people in the woods, to which they attributed supernatural powers and the greatest hostility toward the human race. They were very much afraid of them and they never dared go great distances into the woods alone." This best fits the forest giants.

776 Still earlier Fitz-Roy (a):180 learned of these forest giants and reported a story that fits them, but he did not call them by their right name: /1290/ "A great black man is supposed to be always wandering about the woods and mountains, who is certain of knowing every word and every action; who cannot be escaped, and who influences the weather according to men's conduct. York related a curious story of his own brother who had committed a murder. 'In woods of my country,' said he, 'some men go about alone; very wild men -- have no belly (meaning probably that they were very thin), live by stealing from other men.' He then went on to say, that his brother had been getting birds out of a cliff, and, on coming down, hid them among some long rushes, and went away. Soon afterwards he returned, and, seeing feathers blown away by the wind from the spot, suspected what was going on; so taking a large stone in his hand, he crept stealthily towards the place, and there saw one of these wild men plucking a bird which he had got out of the cliff. Without saying a word, he dashed the stone at the wild man's head, and killed him on the spot. Afterwards York's brother was very sorry for what he had done, particularly when it began to blow very hard. York said, in telling the story, 'rain come down -- snow come down -- hail come down -- wind blow very much. Very bad to kill man. Big man in woods no like it, he very angry.' At the word 'blow,' York imitated the sound of a strong wind; and he told the whole story in a very low tone of voice, and with a mysterious manner; considering it an extremely serious affair" /cited in English/ (255).

255. Darwin (d):247 repeated some of this verbatim.

As may be gathered from this story, a Yamana will now and then tell about his personal encounter with Hánnus, of his struggle and combat with him (256). Nelly Lawrence repeated

256. Bridges (k):237 made the same observation: "Anecdotes about the exploits of the Hannushes pass from mouth to mouth and tell how one person or another met one of these beings, how he fought, conquered, and killed him, and other stories of the same kind" /translated from Spanish/.

the following to me on April 10, 1923: "My uncle was once staying on an island and was looking for trees in which cormorants were perched; he wanted to catch a few. He carefully noted the individual spots. In the evening he went back there and saw an unusually thick ball on a tree. He immediately threw his sling at it and the ball fell to the ground with a loud bang. Frightened, he hurried back to his hut; the night was dark. The next morning by daylight he and his brother [Nelly's father] went back to that spot. Very close to it there was a deep, inconspicuous cave. Here lay the disfigured body of a Hánnuš. To this day the large heavy bones of the Hánnuš are lying there; I saw them with my own eyes."

Somewhat later Nelly told me of another incident. "Many years ago my father hunted in the forest for bark for a new canoe. He was weary and sat down on a tree trunk and fell asleep. Softly a Hánnuš crept up and gave him a heavy blow on the head with his club. My father sank down and lay motionless. /1291/ Then the Hánnuš felt him all over and believed him to be dead. He laid my father on a grassy spot in the woods and covered him with brush. He left my father lying there and hastened away. Although my father was severely wounded, he carefully observed what the Hánnuš was doing and pretended to be dead. It was only after two days that he carefully got up and, unobserved, dragged himself back to his hut. On the beach his wife and we children had waited for him for a long time with anxious concern. We thought he had had an accident, for he was away three days. Then he told us what had happened. It was a long time before he recovered from that blow." Old Whaits told me in the presence of a few families: "I know a boy among my kinsmen who was very reckless and unafraid. Once, in the canoe with his family, he came to a place where there were a few Hánnuš. The boy did not know anything about it, so he walked all around freely and fearlessly. His mother warned him: 'Be careful and do not go too far away from us into the forest!' The boy paid

116 no attention to this warning, but ran farther and farther away and played, all unsuspecting, with his little harpoon. At twilight a Hánnuł surprised this boy and dragged him away with him."

There are even two actual myths which are devoted to 116 Hánnuł. The first one goes as follows. Once a Hánnuł fell in 113 love with Maxutuwěr'elakīpa. She was an extraordinarily beautiful woman, besides being sly and crafty. She herself would have nothing to do with Hánnuł and always repulsed him whenever he approached her and wanted to caress her. At first he was disappointed. Later it vexed him very much to have come so often in vain to the hut of Maxutuwěr'elakīpa. Finally he threatened to kill her if she did not give herself to him.

This woman lived on an island. It happened to be winter. When the Hánnuł threatened to return with many other Hánnuł to bring about her ruin, she began thinking seriously of defending herself. Quickly she erected a solid hut and covered it with strong pieces of bark. She left the entrance especially narrow and low. Opposite this entrance she left a little hole. She put brush in front of it and no one would have noticed it. She knew how to make fine, strong crab-forks, t'īrsa (Fig. 62), and she always had a supply of them.

One evening the Hánnuł again came to see this woman and brought with him a few companions. She was well prepared, however. When she saw the Hánnuł approaching her hut, which was covered with large pieces of bark, she quickly crawled through the narrow rear opening out into the open, and when Hánnuł entered, he did not find her. He turned to the entrance and looked out. While he was bending over and trying to squeeze through, the woman raised up slightly in her hiding place and forcefully thrust a crab fork into his seat. The Hánnuł cried out in pain and quickly squeezed out through the /1292/ narrow entrance. Another Hánnuł pushed into the hut; he wanted to see what had happened. But he did not find Maxutuwěr'elakīpa either. When he, too, bent over to crawl out, the woman, with a vigorous stab, drove a t'īrsa into his seat, also. He had to cry out, and instantly he forced himself out through the narrow opening. He dragged the t'īrsa with him, sticking in his seat. The other Hánnuł were astonished at this. Still a third ventured into the 113 find her. He stood at the entrance and from within called to the other Hánnuš: "I don't find the woman here!" As he bent over to slide out, Maxutuwěr'elakīpa from her hiding place thrust a crab fork into his seat also. He was hardly able to move because of the pain, for the sīrsa had penetrated very deeply. He squeezed out and dragged the sīrsa in his seat with him until another Hánnuš pulled it out. He yelled terribly. Then the other Hánnuš began to feel uneasy. They talked it over and decided: "It will be best if we all leave as quickly as possible!" They got up and hastened back into the depths of the forest.

The crafty Maxutuwěr'elakīpa over there on the island had long beforehand dragged all her things to another place on the beach. When the Hánnuš were far enough away, she crept out of her hiding place and hurried down to the shore. It was deep winter and the channel was frozen over. She walked on the thick coating of ice which did not break through. As she moved forward she broke off small pieces of ice behind her. Scarcely had she reached the center of the channel when the Hánnuš arrived at the top of the nearby hill. From there they saw Maxutuwěr'elakīpa. They were seized with rage and hurried down the hill to the shore; they wanted to murder that miserable woman who had hoodwinked them all. But Maxutuwěr'elakīpa called mockingly to the Hánnuš: "Come right along, I'll wait for you here!" Then the ones who were first ran out on the ice. They thought it was still that large, continuous piece of hard, immovable ice across which the woman had walked. But because she had cut up the solid sheet of ice into small floes, the first few Hánnuš sank immediately, for the small ice floes would not hold those large, heavy creatures. When the other Hánnuš on the shore saw the first ones drown, they stayed behind. They hurled threats at Maxutuwěr'elakīpa and turned back.

The actual purpose of this myth is to characterize the entire Hánnuš tribe as loutish and stupid. That is why they can be easily outwitted and fooled by a Yamana. Moreover, the Hánnuš are inferior creatures, as is shown in the following myth.

There was once a blind man who lived with his wife. Each of them slept /1293/ on a separate bed, with the fire between them.

116 One night a Hánnuš crept into this hut; he approached the woman
113 and forced her to sleep with him. When the Hánnuš left, the old man heard faint noises and asked his wife: "What is it that is rustling so strangely?" She replied: "Nothing is stirring here; don't become unnecessarily excited!" But after a while the old man realized that his wife was pregnant, and, indeed, she soon gave birth to a son. The blind man did not love this son at all; after all, he knew that it was not his child. And, indeed, this son was an unusual creature. After only a few days he was quite a bit larger, he could walk and climb, and he immediately worked diligently for his parents. He particularly helped the blind man because he thought he was his real father.

When this son went into the forest, he sometimes came across strange signs on the trees. He asked himself: "Where could these signs come from? My blind father surely did not put them there." One day when he again spoke these words, a Hánnuš looked out from behind a tree and said pleasantly: "I am the one who made these signs!" The little boy was silent because he was afraid of the Hánnuš. The latter continued: "So my own son is frightened of me?" The little boy wondered about this and ran back to the hut. The words of the Hannuš had offended him, so he asked his mother: "It can't be that I have two fathers, can it?" The blind father also heard his question. Full of anger, he now explained to the little one that his mother one night slept with a Hánnuš. The mother denied it and said: "That is not true. It was only in a dream that a Hánnuš once came to my bed!" In spite of that, the little one kept on working industriously for the blind old man, but he did not love the Hánnuš who was his real father.

One day the little boy was again busy in the woods. His father, the Hánnuš, approached him, took him in his arms, and carried him to the place where his large Hánnuš family dwelt in a spacious cave. Many Hánnuš were assembled here, but they were all very strange creatures. Some of them had four eyes, others only one; a few had no heads, others had their faces on their chests; some had but one leg, others but one arm, and still others were deformed in some other way. All of them without exception now came dashing up and gaped inquisitively at the 776 stranger. After a time old Hánnuĭ accompanied his son back to 773 place in the woods from where he had taken him. But the little boy was very ill at ease. Afterward he told the Yamana in minute detail what he had experienced with the Hánnuĭ folk. He continued to work industriously for the blind old man.

776 These two myths alone show clearly enough that the Hánnuĭ
538 spirits are not even remotely the objects of a cult or of religious veneration (257). The Yamana say that /1294/ a generation ago

257. Bridges (k):237 confirms this: "The natives never worshipped or revered cushpik, hannush, or any other being whatsoever" /translated from Spanish/.

the Hánnuĭ were seen for the last time here in their forests. Since then no one has seen a trace of them. On long winter evenings, if two or three families are living in the same hut or if a number of families are camping at the same place for some time, they love to tell stories of the Hánnuĭ and to repeat their own experiences with these creatures (p. 33). The stories are appropriate to the winter season, so to speak. In summertime the requisite mood is lacking. One evening, on my third expedition, the people spoke in great detail about everything they knew in connection with the Hánnuĭ. Blind Whaits was present. In the midst of the conversation he asked innocently: "Is winter so near at hand that you begin telling stories about the Hánnuĭ?"

The old men did not hide from me their regret that the young and middle-aged people no longer believe the stories and reports about Hánnuĭ and laugh at them as products of self-deception or imagination. They prove it by saying: "Sometimes we have worked for weeks deep in the forest (258) and never saw the least sign of a Hánnuĭ; much less were we molested by Hánnuĭ!" This is the opinion of the modern, enlightened generation of Yamana. The old people nevertheless cling steadfastly to their

258. This was work in sawmills for Europeans or on roads commissioned by the government.

776 538 belief and are ready now and then to recount with firm conviction their favorite stories. Much of what the imagination of the Yamana attributes to the Hámuš is to be found among the Selk'nam in their Yóši (Vol. I, 697).

4. The Guardian Spirits

776 Yamana ideas about the Yefíčel are nowhere near as extensive and definite as those about the Hámuš. The reason is probably that the yékamuš to a great extent claim these spirits for themselves. That is why the rest of the people are not aware that they, too, actually have such a guardian spirit assigned to them.

The older Yamana, who are somewhat more thoughtfully concerned with this belief, are agreed about the personality of these Yefíčel. Richard, as well as a few Indian women, described them to me as follows. The Yefíčel are very small figures "only the size of a thumb." They are conspicuous because they are bald; each of them has only three or four long hairs which stand upright in the region of the crown of its head. There is about an equal number of male and female Yefíčel. They wear no clothes, but go about stark naked. /1295/ Maženihem was alone in the opinion that the Yefíčel are exclusively male, and everyone very definitely denied it. There is a considerable number of Yefíčel, but only a yékamuš is able to see them in dreams.

As for the relationship of the Yefíčel to human beings and in particular their power, our Indians believe that each person has his own Yefíčel. It is the task of the yékamuš, as soon as possible after a child is born to "settle" a Yefíčel on him, that is, to assign him one. "Everyone must have his Yefíčel!" is repeatedly and emphatically declared. The yékamuš gives every person a Yefíčel of the corresponding sex; thus a boy gets a male Yefíčel. If, by mistake, a newborn child has not been given this guardian spirit, the omission must be remedied at the next opportunity, at any rate at the next Mana yékamuš, the gathering of medicine men. The first and most important task of the 776 Tefkfel is to protect the person entrusted to him from sickness and physical harm. Beyond that, he also protects the person from all kinds of danger. In view of this, one may regard the Tefkfel as "guardian spirits" of human beings. If a child falls ill, the parents believe the chief reason is that it has not yet been assigned a Tefkfel. Immediately a yfkamuf is requested to do this. A person who has a Tefkfel enjoys good health throughout his life, and that is why "everyone must have his Tefkfel!" When a human being dies, his Tefkfel leaves him and thereafter wanders about alone as an orphan, independent of the others. The Tamana have nothing to say about the above and way of life of these Tefkfel. The yfkamuf, however, add that the orphaned Tefkfel prefer the so-called "dangerous places." From there they continue to be on good terms with the yfkamuf and are forever helpful to them.

The relationship of every human being to his Tefkfel, my informants unanimously agreed, is like that of father and son or mother and daughter, in other words, extremely favorable and very intimate. The yfkamuf has an even closer association with his Tefacel. Although the yfkamuf assigns a Tefkfel to each person, he need not direct him thereafter. I was assured with great earnestness, however, that all Tefkfel must obey Wotagnikwa and his decrees just as willingly and subserviently as most human beings, for "the Tefkfel are dependent upon him, just like all yfmana [human beings]!" On this occasion someone ventured the statement: "Wotagnikwa also has his Tefkfel." The other people present very definitely showed by their expressions that they did not agree with this assumption, nor was anyone able to explain who might have assigned such a Tefkfel to Wotagnikwa. From certain previous statements it is easy to conclude why the complete name of these guardian spirits is Tefkfel yfkin, "little spirit." Many indians use the word Tepkfel instead.

Bridges mentioned these little guardian spirits several times 776 and /1196/ always only in connection with the yfkamuf. It is 776 true that the Tefkfel means much more to a medicine man than to an ordinary human being, for the spirit performs special services for him in the activities of his calling. In Bridges (2):313 it is said: The Tefkfel "is a doctor's son and appears to doctors in their dreams, with them many things" /cited in English/ (159).

> 159. And again on (p).159: "The yacamah claims to have dealings with beings called yapaichai, and they are the ones who give him the power to see and do fabulous things, especially to cure and to kill" /translated from Spanish/.

In BD-661 one reads: "Tuligan, a being of more than human power and capacity whom the yihamaf claimed as their inspiring power and instructor" /cited in English/. If, referring to this, Bridges believes that this designation also means "spirits of men, especially such as have been killed by violence" /cited in English/, I must reject this as inaccurate. A special relationship between a yihamaf and his Tuligan is universally recognized, and it will be discussed below. There it should merely be pointed out that there is a belief in church-sized guardian spirits, from whose large number every person is assigned his Tuligan for the rest of his life.

b. Forms of Superstition

Several groups of definite spirits have just been named and described. These are not independent beings which actually exist, but are present only in Tamaca belief. To this extent they must be regarded as objects of superstition. For various reasons they were treated separately. Not of all, because each group is an individual, definite phenomenon. This is one reason of the figures which appear in dreams and the many superstitious views which are linked with some definite circumstances.

1. Dreams

157

The fact that the Tamaca dreams & great deal must be traced back to their alertness in everyday life and to their very vivid imaginations. Almost every morning one of the adults in a family

787 but will relate his dream. It is not regarded as unusual for 154 someone who is suddenly awakened in the middle of the night by a vivid dream to wake up his family and tell them about it. A yékamuf may even call out to all the neighboring huts from his bed and announce to the people what he just experienced in a dream, although this is generally without any significance to outsiders. It will be explained below how much the yékamuf pursue their calling in dreams. The Tamana believe that the [B2] very frequent dream images come by themselves to ordinary people, and everyone is very much concerned about them /1297/ (260).

> 260. Hyades (q):253 says briefly: "Dreams are frequent, but in general no one seems to attribute any meaning or importance to them" /translated from French/. Only the first part of this statement is correct.

787 Everyone attributes more or less importance to a dream, depending on its content, the person's temperament, and given circumstances. There is no rule or any sort of criterion; the individual attaches more significance to one dream and less to another according to his own feeling and judgment. A person will be more vividly concerned and more excited by something that touches him directly or threatens him with grave consequences than by unimportant and insignificant everyday things. Everyone who hears about a dream accepts without contradiction the dreamer's interpretation of it. No one would ever dare minimize in any way or even reject the interpretation of a dream given by the one who experienced it and who evaluates it according to his own judgment. Anyone who is extremely disturbed about a dream turns to a yékamuf, who, for his part, will always confirm the seriousness of the whole matter and will usually prepare at once to ward off the harm threatened in the dream.

There is no doubt, therefore, that the Tamana believe implicitly in the dreams which agitate and alarm them (261).

> 261. Bridges (D):14 has reliably declared: "The Tahgans had great faith in dreams

181 and were consequently often troubled with anticipation of death without reason" /cited in English/.

This is chiefly the case when one's own life or that of his immediate family is in any way threatened. The Tarasco regards the dream figures, whether they be spirits from the groups named above, friendly and hostile acquaintances, souls of the dead, or even animals, as actual manifestations, as living creatures which present themselves on occasion, as [illegible]. Hence he treats their words, takes their warnings into consideration, fears their threats, and quietly reconciles himself to the trouble they announce. Our Indians are considerably strengthened in their confident belief in dreams by the fact that now and then some premonition contained by the dream is fulfilled or some foreboding comes true. They remember such so-called proofs of the reliability of dreams or of their faith in them throughout their lives and point them out over and over again on suitable occasions. Almost any Tarasco is able to point to such an experience, that is to say, to show the credibility of a dream. They attach the full force of truth especially to the dreams of the [illegible].

Bridges realized this: "Dreaming of a dwarf is much dreaded by these Indians, since they believe it surely foretelles ill -- either some sad disaster, or death caused by the dwarf dreamt of. Unopetowah told me that his mother, the day she died, told him that she had dreamt of a dwarf" /cited in English/ (VSA,XI,500,1884). Much earlier Fico-Ray (c)[illegible] described Sammy Bottom as /1698/ "a great believer in dreams" /cited in English/ and substantiated this as follows: "While at sea, on board the 'Beagle,' about the middle of the year 1833, he said one morning to Mr. Byron, whispered in his ear that his father was dead. Mr. Byron tried to laugh him out of the idea, but ineffectually. He fully believed that such was the case, and maintained his opinion up to the time of finding his relations in the Beagle Channel, when, I regret to say, he found that his father had died some months previously. He did not forget to remind Mr. Byron of their former conversation, and, with a significant shake of the head said, it was 'bad'. After that 181 crow he said no more about his father" /Aimé in English/.

The first belief in dreams, which I was able to observe directly in Molly Lawrence, is characteristic of all Tuvans. A few more examples follow. On July 26, 1933, Molly told me sadly that she had dreamed very bad things the night before: "A few families came here [to Purso Ravaline] from Mojilbaem [on Hovarlau Island] and told me that there was universal mourning over there. Today someone will surely come from there and tell us who has died. After this dream I woke up and did not go back to sleep again." She spoke with great firmness and could not shake off her depressed mood even when I tried to convince her that dreams are meaningless. It was true that for several days absolutely no visitors had arrived from Mojilbaem; we feared a sickness had broken out. To the surprise of everyone, Alexandra landed in Purso Ravaline toward noon of the same day and immediately told us: "Last night two women died over there among us, Anna, the wife of William, and Sara, the wife of Mahonchaem. Mahonchaem said she's seriously ill and will probably also succumb [to the sudden epidemic of grippe]!" After Alexandra had had a heart-to-heart talk with Molly for about an hour, she immediately came to me and told me in detail what she had just heard. "Do you see my dream of last night, which I told you about this morning, came true,"she said with sad earnestness; "I knew that something [some news] would have to come today! Whatever I dream always comes true, no matter how distressing! I am never mistaken in my dreams! How terrible this town is. Now we must fear that still more people will be taken away in this epidemic. The poor child of Mahonchaem has now lost its mother and if the father, too, dies, the girl will be orphaned (183). Now it is to be feared that soon > 183. This girl, Ova, about seven years old, is the only child of Sara who has just died and of old Pedro Mahonchaem who is now very ill.

the last of my countrymen will pass away. Then I shall be the only one left and soon feel the hard, tragic fate of my countrymen. I, myself, as the only one, will be born for a short time,

781 and with me the last survivor of the Tuscans will visit over the graves." Anyone would have been touched to see this woman in her anxious grief over her own people. /[illegible]/ The primary aim here, however, was to show that the Tuscans evidence a great measure of truth to their dreams.

On my fourth journey I interrupted my way to Bengle Chen-sol by a prolonged visit to the Iolli tuen (p. 10; /unconclusive/). When I returned to Pueno Ramolino, Dolly said to me one morning: "Last night I dreamed again, but it was nothing worth mentioning. Why is it that we sometimes have very good dreams in which we see the future? Yet, when we so often see in dreams it rarely true? — But I haven't told you about the two dreams I had while you were with the Iolli tuen." Dolly now told me: "In that time [in March, 1950] I dreamed that Mademoiselle came here to Pueno Ramolino for a short visit. While he lived in Iowa, will he said sadly: 'I feel as though we were seeing each other today for the last time. You are a good woman, willing to help, and I should like to come again soon, but I feel that we shall probably not see each other again!' That is what Mademoiselle said. Sure enough, he did not come to Pueno Ramolino after that and later [in August] he died." Dolly mentioned another incident: "One morning Mamacha came to me all excited. It was the day before her death. She told me: 'Last night I had very bad dreams. My brother Tom [brother of Dorcomed and brother of Alfredo] came to me and said: "Where is Alfredo?" I said: "He is staying in the south!" I, too, would be glad if he would come back soon and tell our white friend [Gonzalo] a few stories. The latter is now returning from the region of the Iolli tuen.' Tom: 'It may be a long time before he comes. But I must go soon.' Mamacha: 'Stay a while!' Tom: 'I can't, my hallpakiqua /[illegible]/ is waiting for me; he is in a great hurry and will not permit me to stay.' Mamacha: 'Oh, well, the hallpakiqua can wait.' Tom: 'He won't allow that. I must leave immediately with hallpakiqua. I came to tell you!' Mamacha: 'But I want to stay here for a bit!' Tom: 'But I must go again. hallpakiqua is in a hurry and will grant me no further delay!' ... When he had gone a certain distance, he waved his hand toward me, as though to say: 'We shall see each other soon!' He removed further and 787 farther and finally disappeared completely." ...All this Mancha told me and wept and sobbed as she did so. Then she took three little baskets which she had made the day before and handed them to me, saying: "Take these little baskets. If I should really die soon, I could not give you anything any more. I would rather you take these little baskets and keep them!" I took the little baskets. On the afternoon of the same day Mancha felt very ill; she was stricken with fever and the next morning she was dead. All this happened just as I told it to you!" Each word had the tone of utter conviction.

The hafqwkpine mentioned above is to be explained as follows. This /1306/ is the common name of the mighty blue whale, Balaenoptera schlegelii (p. 36 /unpublished/). This Tom, Mancha's brother, had died long before her conversation with Sally; he came to his sister Mancha in a dream. It is said of him: One day, as he was walking along the shore, a hafqwkpine emerged from the water and for some time kept staring at Tom. Tom died that same year; the hafqwkpine took along his ahqwtl. From that time on the two were [somehow] connected. Tom, accompanied by that hafqwkpine, appeared to his sister Mancha in a dream. On this occasion hafqwkpine took her ahqwtl along, just as he had previously taken the ahqwtl of Tom. That is why Mancha died soon after her dream in which, actually, hafqwkpine carried her off. This strange interpretation must be regarded, according to the principles of the medicine men, as an isolated case. Accordingly, it does not run counter to the general conception of the ahqwtl, the human soul after death.

It is the individual person himself who more or less ennobles his dream image, giving it greater or lesser significance. He likes to attribute reality to those images that give him a vision of the future. Conjectures and forebodings that first appeared as dreams and afterward came to pass in some way strengthen him anew in his belief and increase his confidence in dreams.

2. Superstitious Ideas

In the simple mental life of the Fuegians there is no lack of certain views and opinions which must be regarded as true

811 superstition in the strictest sense of the word. No one will find this surprising. An attempt to offer an explanation or a reason for the many notions and customs would be tantamount to robbing them of their superstitious character. They simply exist and one acts accordingly. I shall list here the considerable number of superstitious ideas by which our Yamana are governed in individual instances, including a few magical practices. The superstitions mentioned above in the section on the care of infants and children and in connection with the description of the material culture of the Yamana will not be repeated, and the belief in the various groups of spirits and individual fantasy images will not be discussed. A few earlier observers have noted that the Yamana are easily tempted to superstition (263).

821

263. Fitz-Roy (a):180 writes, and Darwin (f):I, 123 agrees: "The natives whom I carried to England often amused us by their superstitious ideas, which showed, nevertheless, that their ideas were not limited by the visible world. If any thing was said or done that was wrong, in their opinion it was certain to cause bad weather. Even shooting young birds, before they were able to fly, was thought a heinous offence. I remember York Minster saying one day to Mr. Bynoe, when he had shot some young ducks with the old bird: 'Oh, Mr. Bynoe, very bad to shoot little duck -- come wind -- come rain -- blow -- very much blow'" /cited in English/. Lovisato (b):149 expresses himself in more general terms: "They are superstitious; they fear the wind and perhaps regard the elements in general as vindictive agents" /translated from Italian/. Hyades (q):253 also writes in this vein and asserts (q):387 that the efforts of the Anglican missionaries did not change anything concerning the superstitions of the Yamana: "The superstitions are the same as in former times"

811 /translated from French/. Cooper:159, on the basis of the few data available to him at the time, surmised correctly: "Superstitions exist, but apparently in moderate number only" /cited in English/. Even now this judgment need not be changed.

/1301/

a Superstitions Related to the Animal Kingdom

825 The Fuegian is very dependent on the animals of his homeland. Hence it is not strange that they play a dominant role in his superstitious ideas.

825 If at night a dog howls miserably for any length of time,
787 its master interprets it as presaging all kinds of dire prospects for himself or for a proposed undertaking, such as a hunt, a journey, and important work. If all the dogs howl in the few huts that form a camp, an epidemic or at least serious illness among many persons is to be expected. If the howling of many dogs has lasted for some time, all the people come out of their huts and hurl everything at hand toward heaven, things such as stones and pieces of leather, tools and weapons, and preferably hot ashes and glowing logs. Meanwhile no one, with the exception of half-grown children, may stay in bed or rest. Everyone must be up and about until dawn. All night long everyone is very excited and behaves wildly. They wave their arms about in extreme agitation; they thrust their arms forward and upward with hands outspread and cry from constricted throats tetete... All this is supposed to ward off the menacing illness.

When people are sitting out in the open in front of their huts, it sometimes happens that a dog comes crawling up to a person, dragging himself along the ground, stretched out on all fours, and pushing himself forward on his belly. They interpret this to mean that the person himself or someone among his intimate family will soon die.

825 In contrast to the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 707), our Yamana are neither friendly to the fox nor kindly disposed toward it, because it preys on human carcasses. The following story is told. When

825 the first Argentinian ships came to Ushuaia [in the '80's], ravaging diseases broke out (p. 300 /untranslated/). Practically all the Indians settled there lay around on the beach and in their huts, unable to help themselves. Many of them died. Sickness spread to the north shore of Navarino Island, and there, too, the beach was soon strewn with corpses. The many sick people saw the foxes coming out of the forest and gnawing at the corpses, /1302/ but no one was able to ward them off and chase them away. A woman already near death had her little son beside her, but he could not help her. One of the foxes even dared to start devouring this woman, although she was still alive. The little son threw a knife at the fox, whereupon it stopped. She died soon afterward, and the boy immediately started three signal fires. Soon a canoe arrived and took him aboard. Scarcely had the canoe left the shore when the fox again came up to the corpse of the woman and started devouring it.

The Yamana find the apawáta, the bat, almost disgusting because of its resemblance to the rat, wēsána (p.323). If it flies past the huts the people feel sick; they all remain silent until it has flown off again. Everyone turns his eyes away in loathing. Bridges (1):7 also confirms this: "There is a small Bat, loathed by the natives on account of its compound nature" /cited in English/. (Cf. Vol. I, 707.)

The Yamana regard the whale along with the many ever-present fish accompanying it (p. 37 /untranslated/) as a large family. They are particularly alert for the restless, raging aśōula, the smaller whale (Pseudorca crassidens /the "false killer" whale/), and the ēpájačí (Orcinus orca /the killer whale/). Our Indians are afraid of both. Bridges (a):208 thinks differently: The whales are killed "by swordfish, which they consequently esteem sacred" /cited in English/. On October 9, 1871, Lewis reported a "small whale, which ran ashore in the inlet. I hastened out, and heard a continuous thumping on the water, which Lucca informed me was a swordfish; he also observed, that if the dog barked, he [the swordfish] would be frightened and take the whale away. At early dawn we descended, and found the whale, minus any appearance of having been molested by a swordfish" /cited in English/ (MM:IV, 34;1872).

825 Our Yamana are no less superstitious about birds. Some among the great numbers of them prove to be helpful. They announce things that are important to human beings and warn them. The sea duck deŝka (Tachyeres patachonicus) is at times even included in food taboos (p.503). The mighty condor weŝiyáu (Cathartes aura) is said to lead the dance of the birds. The condor can be dangerous to little children, which is why a mother may never leave her infant unattended. It is said that one day a small child at play crept out of the hut and down to the beach. The child's mother sat at her work in the hut and did not notice it. A condor flew down from above and seized the child with its strong talons, dragging it to the nearest mountain. After a while the mother stepped out of her hut and looked for the child. In vain she searched all the other huts, and no one could give her any information. Everybody helped her look, but they did not find the child. The next day they walked around the whole region, but without success. Nevertheless the mother and her relatives kept on searching. Finally, on the peak of the nearby /1303/ mountain they found the remains of the child, its head and a few bones. It happened that the face was not mutilated and the mother recognized her child. The condor had dragged it off and devoured it because it had been sitting unattended on the beach. The mother wept bitterly and returned to her hut.

825 821 787 If a hawk, yo'okalía (Milvago chimango), acts unusually happy and flies about gaily, good weather is on the way. Anyone who is obliged to take a long journey starts out early when he sees this sign; beautiful weather will accompany him. When yo'okalía screams complainingly at night, snow and cold weather are in the offing; both annoy the bird.

825 787 Quite generally the light-colored horned owl, sítu (Nyctalops accipitrinus), is very carefully watched. If it persistently and anxiously flies around one or more huts standing close together, its cry means that someone in the neighborhood has died. If it lands on a hut, even for a few moments, it indicates that one of the inmates will soon die. When this sítu on its nocturnal flights utters the prolonged, intermittent cry kît, kît, kît... which sounds as though drops of blood were splashing on the

825 ground, it is an omen of murder and a person from the immediate 787 vicinity will be the victim. If someone approaches a small group of men or lands near a few huts and notices a sítá circling around the huts during the day, he recognizes this as a definite warning that these people are hostile to him and have evil intentions, are perhaps even planning to murder him. Hence he quietly slips away that very night and goes far enough so that none of the men can follow him. If in the next few days a horned owl should again appear in his vicinity or circle around him, he concludes that the men are on his trail. Without delay he hurries off to his own home. He is safe in the circle of his relatives.

825 The Yamana must show due respect for the small finch
821 hésipul (Taenioptera pyrope). Anyone who annoys it and throws stones at it must be prepared for very bad weather. Out of vengefulness and an injured sense of honor, it causes bad storms and heavy rains.

825 A person who hears the cry of the gray night heron tíwux
787 (Nycticorax obscurus), rejoices, for this bird tells him that a canoe with friendly visitors will soon come. They usually arrive the very next day and from exactly the same direction that the call of this heron came from or the direction from which the bird flew when it came. Even today the tíwux is venerated everywhere.

825 The large petrels, especially the albatross, which rise up 821 over the waves far out on the high seas and describe large circles in the air, announce to the people that they must be prepared for rough seas and foul weather.

825 /1304/ It is a universal custom for a hunter who has bagged
777 a Molinas goose téku (Chloephaga hybrida /kelp goose/) to break both its legs immediately; otherwise he will have no future luck at hunting. If the hunter has a newborn child at home, he may not break the legs of this goose with his own hands if he wishes to keep his child from harm (p.509).

825 A solitary sea duck, déika (Tachyeres patachonicus), fly-
788 ing over a hut fills all the inmates with fear and trembling. They are afraid that this déika will take with it the kispif of the children present. They quickly throw large pieces of skin over each baby and cover them well. Others will repeatedly stretch their arms out in front of them, palms forward, at the same time

825 [788] uttering a loud, hissing s̄ sound. The purpose of the latter is to weaken the baleful effect of the sea duck and hold in the kēspiš of the children. Immediately after confinement the mother and her husband may not eat the meat of the dēška (p.503). The [262] parents are advised to abstain from it until their child enters the second year of life. From then on it is completely out of danger, whereas before that it might possibly die if its parents should often eat the meat of the sea duck.

When the rust-colored spectacled ibis, lēxuwa (Theristicus melanopis), flies over the heads of mature girls, they cross their arms and press them against their breasts to hide them. If they [824] did not do this, lēxuwa would pull their breasts far down; this is a beauty flaw of which they complain a great deal. This lēxuwa is also known as a sensitive woman who anxiously guards her honor.

I did not learn that the Yamana are superstitiously afraid of any kind of insects, but Bridges (a):212 writes: "Many insects are also much dreaded, from a belief that they enter the ear, and work their way into the body, and thus kill those they enter" /cited in English/. Dabbene (b):204 says the same thing. Unfortunately, these references are too general.

Sometimes an unusually large cap-shaped shell (Fissurella) clings to a rock along the coast, below the lowest water level. It is regarded as the mistress of that region. All the women who are gathering marine animals in its vicinity must remain silent and respectful. If they do not do this, the pāiakakīpa, as it is [823] called, causes strong eddies. The word pāiaka is not a proper name, but a general term (compare BD:370); here it has its special meaning. The little hole in the flat shell is "the eye with which pāiakakīpa sees everything that happens around it."

825 765 If a father has lost a son in death, he abandons the male animals that he kills or he throws them into the water. If a daughter has died, he does not touch the female animals that he catches. He does this for several weeks after the death of his child to express his grief over the loss and to avenge himself, as it were, on Watauinēiwa.

/1305/ β. Superstitions in Everyday Life

821 From careful, continuous observation the Yamana are familiar with their natural surroundings. Every unusual phenomenon attracts their attention more or less, and some have occasioned superstitious interpretations. They do not occupy themselves nearly as much or as thoroughly with the heavenly bodies as do the Selk'nam. If an eclipse of the sun or moon occurs, they all pick up some čiler /fine Berberis shavings/. Amid much shouting, men, women, and children rub their faces with it, as though they were washing and cleansing themselves. They shout and expect the sun or moon to become clean and shining once more. Since they themselves cannot reach that heavenly body, but it must nevertheless be cleaned, they rub their own faces continuously, for, to them, an eclipse of the sun or moon means an unclean, dirty face of that celestial body. They designate an eclipse of the sun (or moon) with lēm (or hānuxa) arugáta, meaning "sun or moon with a dirty, very disorderly, and unclean face" (compare ārugáta in BD:61). Similarly, they designate a star that conspicuously changes its color, or a shooting star and a comet with a visible tail, as apēnix ārugáta, "a star that is in disorder." If there is a ring around the moon and an opening in the ring at one point of the compass, they expect bad weather from this direction for the next few days. Children may not stare at a full moon for any length of time. The Yamana believe that while the child is gazing steadily at the moon it will see the moon's large mouth and invariably call out: "You, moon, open your mouth!" This would result in the child's soon becoming ill. The Yamana, too, see an entire face, with eyes and mouth, in the disk of the full moon.

Our Indians, of course, are also attentively concerned about the weather. If a number of people are traveling in their canoe and they eat something, they may not throw refuse and food remains into the water, for this would immediately cause high waves or storm. The remains are carefully burned in the canoe fire.

821 189 When a child is born, the Yamana notice whether there is good or bad weather. A child born in good weather has prospects of a happy life; above all he is capable of stopping bad weather.

821 789 If a few families are detained in an inlet because of storms and showers and are prevented from traveling on, they paint a club, a spear shaft, or an oar with red earth, accompany the "fair-weather child" to the beach, and give it the painted article, telling it to beat the sea with it and ask for favorable weather. If the child acts shy or ashamed, or if it is too young to do this, the father takes the child in his arms and sets it upright against his legs. He himself then recites the particular words /1306/ and administers the blows against the sea, making the child's arms help him a bit. It is absolutely necessary that the object used for beating be painted. The words addressed to the bad weather are to the effect that it should go away quickly, cease bothering people, and make way for good weather. A request is even sent up to Watauinéjwa that he change the weather situation as soon as possible, for after all he is responsible for unfavorable weather. For example, they say:

wéla	matauúgu	ĩkamána	yelaiígu
At once	to come to the beach	snowfall	good-weather

xéola,	sigája	kakúpa	áki.
child	set off	from here	you.

This is to say: "In order that you, bad weather, shall immediately go away from here, a privileged fair-weather child has come down to the beach and is beating you." Meanwhile the child stretches out its arms and reaches out into space as though it were grasping the clouds, tearing the fog asunder, and pushing back showers of rain. At the same time it utters forceful, hissing sounds. These efforts serve the purpose of quickly driving away the bad weather. The words used are clothed in a definite formula; an adult tells it to the child who repeats it several times while it beats the water.

821 A child born when the weather is unfavorable or when there are heavy storms arouses a slight uneasiness among people in the neighborhood as a result of this fact alone. They never forget this coincidence and in later years tell the child himself about it. Such a child must be reserved and moderate in its behavior when

821 the weather is calm and there is bright sunshine. The Fuegians generally hope that the good weather, which in any case is scarce, will last for a short time once it has set in, especially the warm quiet days. For this reason a "bad-weather child" must avoid noisy conduct along the beach, running gaily along the edge of the water, throwing stones into the sea, beating the waves with a stick or paddle, or dropping an object and letting it strike hard on the ground. To violate these rules would soon bring a change of weather. The adults do not fail to watch a "bad-weather child" carefully and to admonish it to behave cautiously. If a strong headwind and high waves make it im-
821 possible for a family to travel on, the wife will try a ceremony 789 of her own to remove these obstacles. She rubs one of her daughters who is not yet five years old from head to foot with ími, accompanies her down to the beach, pushes her into the water several times and ducks her repeatedly. The woman continues this procedure until her small daughter grows tired of it and begins to cry and scream. Only then does she release her daughter who, /1307/ yelling loudly, rushes out of the water to warm herself at the hut fire. The mother, however, stays on the beach a bit longer and addresses the following lament to the sea:

Yelajígu	xóqlan	sigíja	wéla	tumúru
Fair-weather	child	set off	immediately	have pity

snowfall.

In other words: "You, bad weather, have pity on that 'fair-weather child' and set off immediately, taking with you this abundant snowfall." With this act, especially the ducking, the mother pretends that her child is drowning in the sea because of the bad weather.

The winter of mid-1923 was unusually severe and brought with it a great deal of snow. I was staying on Navarino Island, and the Indians often complained to me about the burden of the large masses of snow. One day they again tried an ancient ceremony which serves to ward it off. Near the huts two men erected a snow figure resembling a human being. It was about 120 centimeters high, very clumsy and irregular, the kind of snowman that school children in Europe fashion without any care. The head, body, and arms were merely suggested on the figure and very inaccurately fashioned. The men made it in a few minutes. Meanwhile several children and a few adults had assembled in front of it. As soon as the two men declared their clumsy structure finished, everybody gathered in front of it at a distance of about five meters and pelted it with stones, logs, clubs, and spears, in a spirit of savage destruction, until the wobbly structure was completely torn apart and lay there as a chaotic pile of snow. The excited, wild behavior is supposed to make clear to "winter," who is believed to be embodied in this figure, how displeased, indeed embittered, everybody is with him and that he should take himself off as soon as possible. They anticipate prompt success with this ceremony which has been handed down by their forefathers, and they resort to it several times during the cold season (264).

> 264. As early as 1865 Bridges observed the same thing: "The Fuegians, to drive such unpleasant weather away, build a figure of the snow, in shape somewhat like a man, ana'ulow spoons ainto ai; ana'ulomulini ai-wolai paddles" /cited in English/ (VSA XII, 6,1865). -- The Selk'nam also try to change the weather by means of a certain magical custom, in which a so-called "bad-weather child" and a "fair-weather child" play the chief roles (Vol. I, 684).

Bridges reported another custom which is also of the type of genuine magic-by-analogy; I myself did not come across it. On a stormy day "all men were disguised with paint and charcoal. The men came along, many armed with clubs. One man, Lesgowloom, a vigorous, active young fellow, acted the champion and challenger, and stood prominently forward to meet the foremost and most excited of the opposite party. Like the man 921 789 who confronted him, he had a broad band of white from his chin downward, and his head was bound with the skin of a kelp gander with white down on it, and his hair was also whitened. He had a white stone in either hand. His antagonist, who came leaping along making much noise, was /1308/ armed with a club. He kept on demanding what facai [a term for seals, penguins, and other sea birds] would let him kill some one, as though he thirsted for blood. He held his club ready to use it, and they both spoke excitedly and loudly to each other. Presently Lasapowioom threw one of his stones a full yard behind his opponent's heels, and ran after its stone to pick it up again. Presently looking to where I heard much noise I saw two others, highly painted fellows, engaged in loud vociferations and earnest gestures, each with an arm round the other's neck, and bobbing their heads each to the other. The rest stood quietly looking on.... Lasapowioom acting the part he did, was according to custom, called uwuuu, or the arm of wind; the man who met him was called uuuuuuwuuu, or one who invited the storm to rage against him" /cited in English/ (MM:IX, 13;1875).

I cannot help thinking that the superstitious customs and ceremonies aimed at influencing the weather in favor of personal wishes and intentions have developed among the Yamana only to a limited extent simply because their Watayinéjwa is regarded as the actual ruler of the forces of nature. Hence everyone turns directly to him as the first and surest helper, using the ancient traditional prayer formulas (p.978).

262 In addition, there are a few similar superstitious customs which are clearly wise food taboos. They are supposed to promote self-control and check selfishness. A few such decrees have already been mentioned. Thus, for example, no one may pick Pumuryo berries until they are ripe. If anyone should ignore this, the "berries would go away" (p.327). Anyone who gathers ouilgo at the proper time may nibble a few, but anyone who eats many of them brings on bad weather by his lack of restraint in eating. It is easy to catch this disobedient person, and he is severely reproached in case there is a sudden change in the weather. The primary object of this taboo is probably to force each individual to bring all the berries he has gathered into camp

262 and let the others share them, instead of selfishly enjoying them 824 alone. People from another region who land on strange territory and find large quantities of amájm may neither pick them nor [821] eat them. If they do, they must be prepared for threatening weather when they continue their journey. Their taking the berries would portend ǽnačiwa, rain and destruction for them.

The "rain berry," palaxǽačis, Rubus geoides (p.279), may 262 be eaten only in fair weather. If someone has discovered a spot 824 where there are great numbers of these berries and he wants to 821 gather them, he must first obtain permission from the tǽuina who has the right to distribute them to adults and children. A person who picks the palaxǽačix without such permission or in /1309/rainy weather must be prepared for a sudden heavy storm with rain on the open sea, which will endanger his life, as atonement, hǽneči, for his disobedience. On March 16, 1923, there was an unusually heavy cloudburst with floods. Two days earlier a few girls had stolen off to a place that was well known for its many palaxǽačix -- it is about an hour's distance from Punta Remolino -- and picked these berries. In all seriousness Nelly told me on the evening of March 16th that the young Halakwulup, Julia, had gone to this place with a few other girls. Julia was unfamiliar with the taboo, and she had picked and eaten many of the berries.
The other girls followed her example. The heavy rain was a punishment for this.

It is not at all seldom that sudden bad weather breaks out 262 over the wide inlets open to the south. In this region it is cutomary not to eat certain game animals that have been caught on the same day, but to keep them until the following day. A person who does not conform to this must be prepared for a heavy loss in the immediate future. This custom is probably meant to teach people to provide for the next day, for all too often a family is unable to travel because of unfavorable natural forces, and they could suffer great hardship if they had not learned and were not compelled to economize with their already meager supply.

The Yamana very seldom eat during a canoe trip and, if 264 they do, always very little. Anyone who eats may not throw food
821 remains and refuse overboard, but should destroy them in the fire 484 which is always kept burning. It is said that Yǽkiu decreed this.

264 When one fails to observe this rule, his child will scream just as 821 incessantly as did the child of Yoflox (p. 1140). Moreover,
487 other people say that his canoe will run into bad weather.
Spencer:87 writes: "When crossing one of the Sounds, a man will paint broad transverse bands of black across the woman's face. This is supposed to ensure a fairweather crossing" /cited in English/. I did not learn anything about this from my informants, but I did hear that bad weather will set in immediately if someone pulls out tall reeds in a lagoon.

823 Moreover, the Yamana are still imprisoned in a realm of superstitious notions about so-called baleful places. These are first of all the places that the Lakíma like to inhabit. No one should venture there in his canoe or gather mussels there. Besides the Lakíma and the malevolent Hapčella, certain animals who are in contact with the yékamuř make a place dangerous for human beings. Friendly, well-meaning yékamuř warn people about these places, for they know from their dreams what the situation is and the danger a person can get into on that account. A person who unwittingly enters such a zone suddenly feels unwell; he becomes utterly weak and immediately falls asleep. /1310/ He is lost if a yékamuř is not called in time to free him from the pernicious influence of this baleful place. On March 21, 1923, Whaits told the following story. "In Lapatija there is a fatal spot where even the fish are not spared. Once several men had set a net there. It was quickly filled with fish and the men began hauling it in. When they were near the shore with the heavy net, a strong force pulled out all the fish and the men stared astonished at the empty net." Earlier Bridges reported: "A certain Steenlenjis had made up his mind to settle out at a beautiful place some three miles from Ushuaia. Accordingly he went there with his wife and family, and one or two friends. These built a wigwam and had plenty of wood and water close at hand. But late in the afternoon they heard a strange voice or cry, whether from owl, hawk, bird, beast, or evil spirit they knew not and were too much frightened to go and ascertain, saying xapicoush, xapicoush, which means bloody arrow head. They forthwith packed up and hastened back to Ushuaia from the fatal spot" /cited in English/ (MM:XIII, 80; 1878).

Finally there are a few superstitious ideas of a different nature. Nelly assured me: "If half-grown children run away from their parental hut, if someone wounds himself badly with his ax or if he falls or stumbles and hurts himself seriously, it means that some person in his vicinity is going to die. The persons who have hurt themselves are not to blame, nor are those children who have run away. Their kikpik prompts them, and they can do nothing about it. The parents of a small child will not explain this to him if he has run away; instead they await with terror the death that has been thus announced." Nelly gave me this explanation when I told her that one day, late in the afternoon, the small daughter of Mademikoss had run away with some other girls (p.[illegible]). She pointed out to me that the wife of Thomas died that very night.

BD:274 gives hunff as a bad omen for the hunt, "a supposed evil influence arising from unclean and unwashed persons after sexual uncleanness eating animals, as guanaco or otter caught by dogs which caused them (the dogs) to cease to be successful in further hunting" /cited in English/. I did not come across this view; it does not agree with many ideas that have been definitely proved.

Young Darwin (f):II, 327 reports: "When York Minster was brought back to his own country the natives told him that he should pluck out the few short hairs on his face. They also threatened a young missionary who had been left among them for a time that they would strip him naked and pluck out the hairs on his face and body, although he was by no means very hirsute." Hyades (g):356 refers to this and asserts: "The Fueginos throw into the fire /1321/ hairs that have been plucked out or that have fallen out. They certainly do not destroy them as a hygienic precaution" /translated from French/. Actually, everyone is anxiously concerned about destroying every hair by fire with his own hands. Like the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 713), the Yamana do this purposely for fear a yékamal might pick up a single hair and, by means of it, more easily cause a person some harm. Anyone who is certain that he has nothing to fear does not resist having a sample of his hair cut off; I succeeded in doing this.

There is a mountain massif in the west, whose highest peaks suggest the figure of a hunter carrying two wild geese on his back and accompanied on either side by a dog. This man turned to stone there, it is no longer known why, but anyone traveling near there is supposed to remain quiet. Spencer:EE writes: "Ken told me story of boiling lake high up on Home Island behind the tall snow peak on Dutton Peninsula seen from Rio Douglas. Too hot to hold hand in and very dangerous to go near" /Aimed in English/. It is not generally known that there are warm springs here and there in the Cape Horn Archipelago. Not far from Puerto Remolino, at a considerable altitude, I myself visited a mineral spring. The following statement by Spencer:EE is vague: "There is a special cave on Tobatulin Bay with a cave in which lives a dangerous spirit. No Tehgan dare stay there at night. George told Ken, who had done so, that he was lucky to have got out alive. Strange noises are always to be heard there at night time" /Aimed in English/. In the Yamana language there are several expressions which correspond exactly to our terms "lucky devil" and "unlucky fellow." According to Bridges (Ij:360, BD:42 given, for example, mawakina, "successful in hunting" /Aimed in English/, and the combinations that can be formed with it. The superstitious beliefs of the Yamana show their tendency to be afraid and their active imaginations. /Fig. 88 appears here./

/1332/ 8. The Kina Celebration

The great significance of the youth initiation for the permanence of the social order of our Fueguians is outwardly expressed by the fact that the young people of both sexes are, without exception, obliged to take part in it on two occasions. By and large, the kina is obviously a continuance of parental rearing beyond the narrow confines of the family hut, and it has the special goal of making young people useful members of society. The definiteness of this goal is convincingly proved by the fact that, upon the conclusion of their initiation, the individual candidates enter adulthood and have the right to marry and found a family (p.[illegible]). Lower on, the knowledge that they have obtained [illegible] about the entire heritage of ideas and conceptions of the tribe is supplemented and amplified for the young men exclusively in the secret ceremony of kina, which on principle is reserved for the male population. Here the primary aim is not a clearly-defined goal to be achieved through training -- although training is not altogether ignored -- but rather an introduction to a unique sphere of mythological ideas which the men regard as their exclusive property. They guard it anxiously from the inquisitiveness of their wives, and sometimes, in their consciousness of this possession, they make the female population as a whole keenly aware of their superior position and their arrogance. The explanation for all this is that the kina, based on prejudiced ideas, shows a more or less marked stringency. This one-sidedness makes the kina fundamentally different from the ciñaga. The latter is available to both sexes at puberty, the former only to mature men (266 /[illegible]/).

266. I discovered the same conditions among the Halakwulup. These Fueguians have a separate men's ceremony besides the actual youth initiation. For the time being compare Gusinde (pp.[illegible] and pp.[illegible]).

The Selk'nam in their Kloketen ceremony (Vol. I, 808) have an arrangement in which, if one can express it thus, the two Yamana institutions of the Ximage and the kina are, at least outwardly, combined. The basic character and the many details of the kina embrace precisely the kinds of ideas and the means of expressing them that may be summed up as constituting an actual men's ceremony. Everything that is included in such a ceremony is more pronounced in the kiléteen of the Selk'nam. This kiléteen proves to be a more original form, scarcely corrupted or weakened in any way, although it is at the same time an actual initiation of youth. In order to facilitate comparison of these secret ceremonies among the two neighboring tribes, I have arranged the following description with reference to the account of the kiléteen ceremony. The portrayal, which is not too voluminous, /1313/ has historical as well as factual value, because I was the first European to learn about the kina from personal observation and because it proved to be the last ceremony of its kind. It is a strange coincidence that I, as the first European, was permitted to experience and, through direct participation, to become intimately acquainted with the last kiléteen, which the Selk'nam held in 1923, and the last kina, which the Yamana celebrated in 1922 (287).

287. I reaped important benefits from having witnessed the Kina of the Yamana before seeing the more clearly defined and elaborate form of the men's ceremony of Kloketen among the Selk'nam. I have pointed this out in a number of places, compare at least Vol. I, 816, as well as Gusinde (p.970 and (p.277.

a. Information through Europeans

X 575 114

The Kina is a secret ceremony to which, on principle, only adult men are admitted. A Yamana will very seldom speak about it in everyday life. Even when men are among themselves, the word kina is scarcely ever mentioned. This circumstance alone is enough to explain why none of the English missionaries, the whites who have been settled there for a number of decades, or occasional visitors to that region become acquainted with the Kina of the natives. In these days the average Europeans who traveled among primitive peoples had far less appreciation for secret ceremonies than for many other arrangements which were easy to observe with the naked eye. These travelers generally rejected such things as products of a diseased imagination and as underdeveloped intellect, and they made no effort to understand them. Thus, there were reasons on both sides to explain why the Kina of the Tanaans, like the secret ceremonies of other primitive peoples, did not become known earlier to Europeans. During my third journey, as my informers, the Tanaans decided to hold such a celebration (p. 188 /unreviewed/). They had not held it for a long time and were therefore not quite sure about many of the details. Nevertheless, I have been able to ascertain the essential parts and to present the basic ideas of this complicated secret ceremony.

1. Earlier Accounts

The majority of the travelers who reported on our Tanaans were more or less completely dependent on the English missionaries, and almost exclusively on the Reverend Thomas Bridges, in their description of the many details of the culture of these Indians. Therefore, their accounts, like the little that this man set down about the Kina, are vague and contain only hints. Throughout, all the witnesses /1816/ have at best offered only short, obscure references. Their available citations are all the more useless because they do not make the underlying ideas of this ceremony comprehensible.

Here again, as has been shown with regard to many other important things in the heritage of the Tanaans, only Bridges among the missionaries furnished any details worth mentioning about the Kina celebration (1908). In 1888 he (p.104 hinted at it 188. Besides Bridges, the missionary Aspinall 270 very briefly mentions. "In order to maintain their rights and their > authority as lack of courtesy, the men resort to secret acts which are carried on in a large group from which women are excluded." Once, in passing, Lewis mentioned that he happened to have conducted a religious service on the Wellington Islands in 1888, "in a Tonnanese tale, i.e., playhouse, formerly called a 'house,' a large wigwam, erected not to live in, but in which to perform certain necessary rites with the youth, etc." /cited in English/ (pp.xxxi, 110,1889).

for the first time in the following words: "When boys and girls come to the years of virility, they undergo a kind of discipline and teaching...It is called Cosse. During the rites the father and son is at Cosse, which is from a few days to about two weeks, neither father nor son see any female. food was then by the women, though some men or other, daily. The ceremonies here conducted are to impose upon the women, to effect which the men make large conical masks of bark which completely cover the head, they also paint their bodies peculiarly, and when all is ready they rush out of the Cosse, and dance and jump about as quickly as they can in view of the women, who look upon them as beings from another world" /cited in English/. He (p.111) supplements these passages with the following: "There is a female, a woman who comes up out of the sea, into the Cosse, and does certain strange things. There is also a being who is supposed to come from above, and he also visits the Cosse during the time the discipline of the youths is being conducted" /cited in English/ (1889). In these references it should be kept in > 1889. The passage continues: "When the youths emerge thinner or heavier years, they are taken by their fathers or uncles to the Kwess, where they sit with their eyes fixed on the floor for a long time... The youths under training called Gadwanda.

> At the end of the day they come to the Kuma to sleep, and to have a very insufficient repast. No women enter or even go near to the Kuma, only men sleep there. Sometimes the youths are made to lie down with their faces downward, and Liwalompa, an evil cruel being, is summoned. The youth is very frightened, and does not turn his head in order to look at this dreadful being, who is supposed to come up out of the sea. He sings a great deal, and with his club beats the earth violently close by the frightened prostrate youth, who expects every recurring blow to fall upon him. At last Liwalompa goes away, and he is allowed to sit up again" /Aiwel in English/.

mind — as I have already emphasized on p.[illegible] — that Bridges commonly regards the so-called "trial of discipline and teaching" /Aiwel in English/ as the only communal ceremony of the Tamana. Actually, Tulagua and Ilau are two entirely different institutions.

These years have to mention "the wigwam called Kuma, and is wholly set apart for celebrating religious ceremonies and superstitious practices. It is in these places that the youths receive their severe training, which /1321/ is to introduce them to the privileges of man's estate, and every young fellow has to undergo it" /Aiwel in English/ (VV.III, 116.1909). Bridges (vy.100 and (fy.100 explains the ceremony and frequent meeting on this occasion as follows: The men "also performed half-dramatic, half-religious embodiments of various evil forces, but these performances, which in them were a source of excitement and amusement, took place only when a large number of them were assembled. The performers put on their masks in separate buildings which the women and children were not permitted to approach, and they were expected to show great fear of the dangs performed in front of them by the demons, during which he threatened them with all kinds of violence." The following in (fy.17 and (fy.200 belongs to this description: "The men would be occupied in the house, painting and variously disguising themselves with barbhats, and smearing themselves with blood, proceed by pricking the inside of their noses, to represent various characters. Some would appear as an evil being called Chinengo, others as another evil spirit known as Tenenwa, others again represented Uhoumenna, and others Leiacaiengo, a female demon. When all was ready, the women and children being waved outside their wigwams, these variously disguised men, unrecognizable even to their nearest relatives, would rush forth with club, spear or bow in hand, dancing and leaping about frantically, threatening the women with their weapons...In the hooma they would rest and, amidst roars of laughter, discuss the merits of the different actors. All dances and amusements were accompanied with singing or chanting for the variation of which they had special names, derived from birds and plants" /cited in English/. To supplement this, Bridges (b):330 adds: "The Tehgan have a number of dances of a semi-superstitious nature, and for each of them there are appropriate disguises, kind of performance, and style of special songs...The personages represented are all mythological beings who are supposed to have existed in other epochs; all are persons and have come from different places. One of them, for example, arrived on the water from the woods, another came out of the sea, some came from the clouds, and others came out of the ground" /translated from Spanish/. The names of many Kina spirits are mentioned in 3D. Altogether, therefore, Bridges gathered a considerable number of details about the Kina, although he lacked the understanding to go into them very far, to organize them, and to grasp their significance.

In comparison with what Bridges gathered through personal experience, the scant references from the pens of other travelers are negligible. The latter, without exception, depend on him. It is surprising to find in Martial:314 some ideas taken from the myth of the upheaval, in which there is a reference to the time when "women were in power" /translated from French/. Dabbene (b):302 does no more than to repeat this verbatim. Hahn (c):340 and (d):44 expressed himself more specifically: "The Tehgan celebrate a festival called Kina, commemorative of the revolt of the men /1924/ against the women who, before that, had the authority in the family and held the secrets of sorcery. They X575 114 masked themselves on this occasion, shouting and dancing as long as their strength permitted" /translated from French/. Hyades (q):377, for his part, refers to "an unpublished work" of the missionary Bridges. I cite this manuscript under (i) and have just quoted the pertinent sentences. The allusions offered by Spegazzini (a):170 are quite vague and scant. A sentence in Wieghardt:30 says even less on the subject. Finally, and most recently, Spencer:111 mentions the aim of this secret ceremony in the following brief words: "The initiation of the young men is supposed to prevent women from taking their dominion over men and making them again lead a dog's life" /cited in English/. Apparently he does not know the difference between the actual youth initiation and the men's ceremony.

2. My Personal Participation

X575 123 The vague references to the Kina celebration in widely scattered publications which were available up to the time of my journeys were not such as to give me any kind of guide, and even less so because čiéxaus and kina are almost always confused and deceptively linked. Instead, I obtained the first direct hint on my second journey from the Yamana themselves (p. 180 /untranslated/). On that occasion, when we had ended the čiéxaus, the people expressed their boundless joy over the undisturbed, smooth way in which the celebration had proceeded and also the tactful manner I had shown in taking part in it as an actual uswiala. In this connection they declared themselves willing, on a later occasion, to make it possible for me to participate a second time in the čiéxaus. This would earn me the right to enter the Kina (p. 658). At that time I already knew a good deal about the procedure of this celebration; I had also learned the basic ideas of the so-called myth of the upheaval and was thus able to anticipate with confidence a regular men's festival with its definite repudiation of the influence of the female world.

In that year, when I again took leave of the Yamana who were very affectionate toward me, I told them that I expected to come back the following summer, and, as a matter of fact,

we were together again in the summer of 1922. At that time it was my special goal to repeat the čiéxaus and immediately to follow it with the kīna (p. 186 /untranslated/). Both events came about, and so I learned about the men's festival from direct participation at that time. This festival was nowhere near what it had been back in the days when the Yamana were completely independent and not yet decimated. The reason for this was largely the inexperience of most of the participants concerning the actual program, for a good 20 years had gone by since the last ceremony of this kind, and for all the men of middle age the Kina of March, /1317/ 1922, was the first of their lives, exactly as it was for me. It is understandable that a good deal of uncertainty about the many details had a decidedly paralyzing effect on the few old people who felt responsible for the smooth running of the affair. Formerly an unaffected, unconstrained joy and satisfaction made the heart of every Yamana man beat faster when he had been able to play a real trick in this secret hut on the defenseless women, but this time it did not fully develop. The constant pressure I exerted to bring about this affair had a decisive effect, I must confess. The old people became more and more timid the nearer we came to the planned opening. I schemingly worked on a few young men and persuaded them that they, in turn, must try to influence the old men to let them, at long last, experience a Kina. Yielding to pressure from two sides, Pedro Maĭemikens was finally won over, and in Puerto Mejillones in March, 1922, the men's ceremony took place. It was truly the last of its kind for the few surviving Yamana. At that time it immediately followed the čiéxaus and was limited to an unusually short period. The details have been described in Gusinde (c):426 (p. 186 /untranslated/). Despite many obstacles, the nature and goal, the program and procedure of this intrinsically complex affair could be observed and established in all its details. On my fourth journey I was privileged to take part in the lōima-yékamuš. On this occasion I was given the complete version of the myth of the upheaval, which tells of the origin of the kīna and many other things (270). In the following pages I have set down in logical 270. The specific conditions and circumstances are described in Gusinde (n):968.

123 order the facts that I learned from personal experience and from the accounts of reliable Yamana about their men's festival.

b. Preparation for the Festival

X575 From whatever point of view one looks at kīna, it is far behind the čjéxaus in importance. Therefore it is not surprising to find that the entire program of this affair, from beginning to end, is by no means bound by the strict formalities of an ordered and rigid system comparable to those that hold together the richly varied čjéxaus. Nevertheless, in the orderly succession of individual events, the rules governing the kīna are adequate to achieve the goal concerning both the women in the camp and the young men who are getting their first introduction to it. There is much more scope here than in the čjéxaus for the free display of the personal talents of the leader and its effect on the prevailing mood of the men taking part.

/1318/ 1. Occasion and Duration

X575 From the point of view of character and aim, in other words, 885 for subjective reasons, the Kina is by no means as necessary for a given group within Yamana society as is the youth initiation. There is no really urgent reason why it should be held at one time rather than another. A person who has sat in the čjéxaus but twice as an uŭwjala is an adult through that alone; he can get married and establish his own independent household. The public is very watchful to see that every child of both sexes experiences the initiation (p.669) and even remains adamant toward a child who could not be made a čjéxaus uŭwjala and has meanwhile long since become an adult in years (p.669). The public, as well as man's kinsmen, however, are quite indifferent about whether or not he has experienced the Kina. Here the candidates do not receive an education in the strict sense of the word, and if a man temporarily has no knowledge of the men's secret or is deprived of it for some time, he does not thereby suffer any disadvantage worth mentioning.

Again, as is so often the case in the life of these Fuegians, there are circumstances which, quite unforeseen, furnish the occasion for a Kina celebration. Merely a sudden inclination and desire, whipped up to enthusiasm within a small group by this or that man, may bring about the decision. A few dilatory neighbors are soon won over; no one dares to oppose it. If, for example, many people have been assembled in the čiŕaxas for a few weeks and have grown tired of being together, new visitors bring a fresh spirit, and if the campsite has certain advantages which none of the assembled families wishes to forgo, they simply remain in the same place and, for a change, start the Kina. This affair also comes about quite naturally, however, if several families settle down beside a stranded whale and if they had from the start made up their minds, possibly because it is winter, to stay here as long as possible. If a considerable number of adults have been brought together by a yamalaĕemóina /general mourning ceremony/ and if they soon find out that the food supply at this place is surprisingly convenient, they quickly decide to remain, and a Kina festival offers them pleasant amusement. Thus there is no pressure or obligation concerning the men's secret ceremony which may take place here or there, this year or after an interval of several years. It is true that one or another external, purely accidental opportunity may be a stronger stimulus than another, but such opportunities never give the decisive impetus.

In consideration of all this, it becomes obvious that the duration of such a men's festival cannot be predetermined in any given case and is simply unpredictable. The /1319/ natural circumstances that bring about the gathering of men remain effective for a longer time on one occasion and for a shorter time on another. Here in the kina as in the čiŕaxas, the mood that prevails after a certain time tips the scales. Of course, the question of the food supply is a very grave factor. For instance, if many families had gathered around a stranded whale so that all the fat and meat were consumed in a short time and if the site does not offer an abundance of mussels and birds to insure food for the large assembly, then the families are obliged to scatter to the four winds, no matter how enthusiastic, happy, and amused they were by the Kina. I was assured that formerly

X575 small groups of men sometimes stayed as long as four months in the Great Hut, but ordinarily these performances lasted only a few weeks.

One must not attach too little importance to the following circumstances. The Yamana offer almost no resistance to their restless instinct for moving hither and yon; it is impossible for them by nature, so to speak, to remain settled anywhere for any length of time. When they have stayed in one place for a few weeks, certain sources of food in the vicinity become depleted to such an extent that they must exert themselves beyond their strength in hunting and gathering. Since they cannot endure this state of affairs, and indeed are not obliged to, they soon change their abode. Finally, the presence of many people and the large amounts of refuse from meals make a place so dirty after a certain time that everyone is driven away from the place, although the Yamana generally are almost entirely indifferent to such things. Moreover, one must remember that the Kina does not have a definite goal that must be achieved in one way or another. Every young man who is privileged to be there for the first time becomes sufficiently familiar with its basic ideas and its dominant aim after a few days. None of the organizers, therefore, would be able to predict or definitely to determine how many weeks or months the assembly will be together. At best, he will assume -- and probably rightly so -- that winter will keep it together longer than a fair summer.

2. The Participants

X575 562 The Kina of the Yamana, as an actual men's ceremony, is, on principle, reserved for men, but for some time now exceptions have been made and a trustworthy woman may also be admitted. The original, consistent rejection of any woman may be explained with reference to the so-called myth of origin. The men should and must prevent the female population from ever again gaining possession of this secret ceremony. It can no longer be determined just when a milder attitude /1320/ in favor of a few women gained ground and some of them were given the secrets, but the fact as such is clear proof that the basic misogynic idea of the Kina of the Yamana is not nearly as strict as that with which the Selk'nam exclude their women from the Kloketen (Vol. I, 827).

The sole condition imposed on a young man who is accepted as a candidate into the Kina hut has frequently been mentioned: he is obliged to have proved himself twice as an uŝwīala in the youth initiation. This legally valid principle has been applied without exception from ancient times, but the change in the living conditions of the Yamana, caused by European settlers, has obliged them to relax the strict demands in some cases so that for several decades now lads have been admitted to the Kina who attended the čiexaus only once as uŝwīala (271). Despite > 271. I was thoroughly aware of this condition. Hence I presented myself for the initiation a second time, because I wanted to experience it once more to become more familiar with the facts -- I was greatly hampered the first time (p. 179 /untranslated/) -- and wanted, so to speak, to force the friendly Indian group to conduct the men's ceremonies as they had promised (p. 184 /untranslated/).

their yielding on many points, even in most recent times our Fueguians have not deviated from this minimum demand. It will not come as a surprise when I say that the old, influential men know very accurately which boys had become acquainted with the Kina and which had not. Those who are permitted to enter the Great Hut of the Kina for the first time are called uŝwīala, just like the candidates in the čiexaus. In BD:419 one finds tāmōm "a lad who has not yet been subjected to the ceena discipline" /cited in English/.

Every young man who has once patiently taken part in the kina as an actual uŝwīala is now regarded as an adept. As such he has the right to be admitted to any subsequent men's celebration wherever it is held. In reality, every adult male Yamana has previously become familiar with it, although there is no obligation and no pressure was exercised. It is taken for

X 578 granted that every man is sufficiently familiar with the wealth of information that is reserved for the male population. The desire for fellowship and the fun they have at this strange performance are, in themselves, strong enough to make everyone hasten to the spot where a men's ceremony is being held, provided that the distance is not too great or that a man is not prevented from attending by illness. Even if it is only curiosity that impels this or that man to join a particular group that is holding this affair, he is inevitably drawn to the gathering-place. The length of time that each individual stays depends on his personal inclination. For this reason one cannot generalize about the number of participants or give a minimum number for any particular day. /1321/ Even at the place where a Kina celebration is held, individual families constantly come and go in an indefinite, unpredictable succession, which is naturally more active when the influx to this celebration as such is stronger. Personal wishes and tendencies also play a part in that one man will almost never be absent and will stay from beginning to end while another will find little pleasure in it and, having had enough after a few days, will again seek the open spaces.

X 575 555 Every group that has finally decided to hold a men's ceremony must find an experienced old man who is willing to assume the office of leader, which demands skill and thorough familiarity with the many details. In addition, considerable moral superiority over all the men taking part stands the leader in good stead. Finally, he must be very alert mentally in order to direct the motley assortment of many spirits and their appearances. Certainly not every older Yamana makes a useful kĭna tagĕguwa, as the leader is called. He also is responsible for providing the candidates with everything in the way of training and admonitions that ancient custom demands. It is the leader alone who determines the order of events and the program for each day. He does not have a proxy. If he were unable to act for any length of time or if, for any reason, he had to quit altogether, the assembly looks for another kĭna tagĕguwa or disbands. There is no definite rule about it, but actually, without exception, a yĕkamŭ takes over the office of Kina leader. The basic ideas in the Kina are compatible with the conceptual world of the medicine man. The very fact that the leader is a yĕkamŭ gives him a decided advantage.

X 575 It has just been pointed out that in exceptional cases a woman may be admitted to the men's secret celebration. The 562 group of older men grants this privilege only to a woman who has proved herself worthy of such confidence. The assumption is that the men need not fear that their Kina secret will be misused by the woman or that their superiority is endangered if they are betrayed. These privileged women are treated exactly like the male ulwala in the Great Hut; outside it they are all similarly pledged to strict silence. Long discussions among influential men precede the permision to introduce a woman into the Kina hut. Anyone who is given this great measure of confidence by the men feels honored. A woman is not permitted to ask for this distinction; it is always her own husband or a close relative who proposes it to the men assembled. If he obtains an affirmative answer, he tells the woman in strict confidence, /1322/ and she immediately makes preparations to enter the secret hut of the men. In the Kina of March, 1922, only Gertie was singled out and introduced. I was told that she was the only woman in her age group who was trustworthy.

X 575 The larger the number of participants, the more stimulating and varied the festival is. The rather long list of spirits can be more or less completely portrayed only if there are many men, each of whom throws himself into a definite role. Many a man is sufficiently ambitious to demonstrate his ability and to display his agility. He enjoys appearing first as one spirit and then as another. There are also some performances which can be put on only if several men participate. Thus, the more participants there are in a Kina festival, the easier is the choice among the players, and the more complex the individual pantomimes are.

3. The Campsite

If a good-sized group of families have decided to put on the Kina celebration, they soon notify their nearest neighbors by definite invitation. A man will almost never miss an opportunity to amuse himself in the company of his own sex by clownishly intimidating the women, and thus in a short time even a few families from a distant local group are assembled. Moreover, if a famous yekamaf has been obtained as the leader, he exercises his own power of attraction. Thus, many families wait for definite instructions, according to which they will remain where they are or travel to another place.

The leader, of course, has the decisive word; he uses his own judgment to determine when the proper moment has come for the move and when the more immediate preparations must begin. He perhaps delays the decision until the arrival of a good friend who is reliably informed about the whole procedure of the festival and who is often consulted. A few other experienced old men gather around this leader and influence and advise him without any kind of importunity. The kina taqkowa makes his arrangements with the good-natured agreement of the older men, and the younger men comply without opposition. This explains the unobtrusive beginning and the smooth course of the whole affair, and, above all, the genial, jolly mood of the participants during the whole period.

They do or do not move to a special place, depending on the external reasons that led to the decision to celebrate the Kina. It depends on the given locality in which the families have been camping. Certain conditions are demanded. The Kina hut must /1323/ stand on open land and on a slight rise so that the spirits appearing in front of the hut can easily be seen by the women and children who have remained behind in the dwellings. The open place itself must be as level as possible so that the men do not risk stumbling or falling while dancing. Of course, certain general conditions for a longer stay must also be fulfilled, namely, the availability of drinking water and firewood in the immediate vicinity, the convenience of getting food, and the complete lack of disturbance by strangers and curiosity-seekers. There are not many places on the Cape Horn Archipelago that meet these vital demands. A group of families prefers to meet at a place that has previously proved favorable for a Kina. The leader decides whether the people who happen to be settled at a certain place may stay there and simply move their huts a bit or whether a general move to a distant place is necessary. Everyone follows his instructions.

Not only must the Kina hut be erected on a favorable spot and on a slight rise in the ground, but the dwellings of the individual families must also be moved together in a certain arrangement and be set up in such a way that they are not within range of the wide entrance to the Kina hut. The dwellings are at least 15 meters away so that the conversation and activities of the men cannot be overheard or observed by the women and children. The elevation of the Kina hut permits the men to watch and follow every movement in the camp proper without undue effort and unobtrusively. Above all no intruder may approach their secret gathering-place (171). The closer the dwellings are to one another, the easier it is to survey them from the Kina hut. For that reason persons who are closely related are definitely urged to move into the so-called multiple-family hut (p. 31). Two to four families that live in the same room. This is not disturbing or uncomfortable for them because the men are almost always in the Kina hut.

The gathering-place of the men is like the stage of a theater, with the dwellings in front and at a certain distance, as though they were the auditorium for the women and children.

4. Building the Great Hut

B 515 345 Scarcely have the families settled in the place assigned to them when the building of the Great Hut commences, following the request and directions of the leader. Middle-aged men willingly offer their services. First of all the chosen site on a slight rise is cleared of cones, low bushes, and many a /1364/ tree stump. If necessary it is also leveled off somewhat. The women and children may watch this work from their dwellings. Even now or they may come no closer.

Almost every Kine hut has the shape of a more or less sloping cone, depending on the dimensions of the always circular groundplan. First the Tamone set up two strong trunks which mark off the wide entrance. Each of these has a short fork at the top, and the forks interlock. They are called mísalěk ďigwina. At the place where the tops of these two trunks meet there rests a third, usually longer trunk which extends more or less obliquely to the ground toward the rear, which is called bělun ďigwina (273).

> 273. Compare on p. 6[illegible] the term for the main post of the Green Hut for the youth initiation.

This results in the more or less sloping conical shape of the framework, depending on how much longer this third trunk is than the height of the other two posts. If the groundplan is small to begin with, the Kine hut has a very regular conical shape. These three main trunks are the supporting framework; hence they are inserted a few centimeters into the ground. The two large free areas on either side of the opening up to the long center post are filled in with more or less thick trunks set close together. The men put each one on the ground, giving due consideration to the circular groundplan, without digging it in, and they lean it against the free ends of all the posts, forming a cluster on top. Each of these by its own weight helps to support all of them together. It is unavoidable that small gaps remain between the individual trunks. In order to fill them, clumps of turf are piled [illegible] around the outside, from the ground upward and against the [illegible]framework, and pressed close together about a meter high. The area above this is covered with long pieces of leather stitched together and extending almost to the peak where the smoke from the hut fire can escape freely. With all this the Great Hut seems adequately closed: not a ray of light reveals to outsiders the doings of the men inside and not a current of air disturbs the quiet glow of the hut fire. Usually the wide entrance, ídna ďíya, is open to the east because bad storms most often come from the west. It is no longer possible to determine whether the idea that this sacred ceremony came from the Tumana territory from the east played any part in this arrangement. The entrance to the

Kloketen hut of the Selk'nam regularly faces east (Vol. I, 838).

In the interior of this Kina hut the actual resting places are now arranged in the following manner, unlike the Yámana hut. Clumps of turf are put around the central open space for the fire, and they are stamped down with the feet as evenly as possible. A layer of the long, broad-leafed grass /1325/ Ilka (Poa flabellata), which is used in the ordinary dwellings (cf. p.25), is often scattered on top, but it is permissible to use this grass only if the short, sharp-pointed pampas grass, mi'waska, cannot be obtained. The latter grows in bunches in open places, is very dry and hard, and scarcely 35 centimeters tall (274). A bunch of this grass can be pulled out only if one grasps it firmly and twists the roots. While the men are gathering many trunks and poles for the hut framework, the Kina leader directs the women and children to provide the necessary amount of grass; he tells them very definitely that they must bring in a great deal of mi'waska (275).

274. Species of Calamagrostis are referred to here, which also flourish on the rocky coasts between stones. Cf. Spegazzini (6):84.

275. It is very remarkable that similarly in the Kloketen hut of the Selk'nam only this short, hard pampas grass is used for the men's resting place (Vol. I, 838).

On top of this layer of grass each man spreads his piece of leather on the place where he will sit throughout the entire festival.

It is noteworthy that this conical Great Hut for the Kina festival is specially decorated on the inside. All around the interior a red band as wide as three fingers is painted at the level of a man's head. Above that a white band of equal width is applied, and above that, a black one. All three are separated from each other by two spaces each as wide as a finger. These three bands, which serve as decorative painting, are symbolically interpreted as suggesting a rocky seacoast. The red color recalls the irregular stones on the beach, which are more or less thickly

X 5B 363 overgrown with red algae (Rhodophyceae); the white indicates the foam of the waves tossed over these stones; and the black signifies the many mussels that cling to the rocky coast in clusters. As though the Kina spirits, appearing out of the sea, were climbing up the coast, so the men masked as spirits appear from the Great Hut before the eyes of the women and children (276).

276. In this respect the Kinkamen hut of the Selk'nam is quite different, for it has no decoration whatever in the interior (Vol. I, 330). On the other hand, the Great Hut for the men's festival of the Halakwulup is even more elaborately decorated than is that of the Tenenen. Compare Gusinde (Mj 364).

X 5B 365 Although the design described above for the hut of the Kina festival is followed throughout Tenenen territory, the elongated dome shape which is chosen everywhere for the [illegible] hut is also permissible in the extreme west. The entrance on each of the narrow sides is made with two long, rather strong poles and is much wider and higher than in a [illegible] hut. The reason for this is obvious: the men wearing tall masks must be able to dance in and out comfortably. In the bordering southern territory of the Halakwulup the two shapes for the Kina hut are likewise used side by side, although the conical form is preferred. Further north only the elongated dome shape is erected /1336/ (277).

277. In this connection compare Gusinde (op 268). There in the west, a different kind of environment allows the shape of the ordinary hut used for dwellings, in contrast to the huts in the eastern part of the Tenenen territory (p. 7). The use of this dome shape for the hut of the Kina festival, however, is also a result of cultural influence from the neighboring territory.

It has previously been mentioned that the immediate area around the Great Hut must be smooth and even. To the left of this hut, or rather to the left of the wide entrance, Kine Kyo -- as seen by the spectator -- a passage two meters wide and ten meters long is cleared of grass and stones and made absolutely level. This is where the dancers who again and again appear from the Great Hut before the eyes of the camp inmates present themselves. The hut entrance is always away from the camp and is usually near the edge of the forest, whereas the dwellings are usually between the Kine hut and the beach. While the work of building the hut and arranging the interior is going on, a few men must drag up a quantity of thick logs and tree stumps until a considerable pile of firewood is marked beside the Great Hut. The women cannot be summoned with this because they would come too close to the secret gathering-place of the men. It takes a great deal of firewood to maintain a bread hut five day and night.

The length of time spent in preparation depends in each case upon several circumstances. Decisive factors at any time are the number of male participants and the convenience of the chosen locality. Once the men have been seized with a desire for the Kine performance and joyfully anticipate it, they fall to with a will and, even without a specific request from their leader, make every effort so that the actual affair may begin as soon as possible. Inclement weather, however, now and then causes considerable delays in the more essential preparations.

c. Procedure of the Festival

The chief goal of the group of men at their Kine is to remind the female population more of their superiority and to make all the women definitely feel their greater power. Consequently they surround their activities with all kinds of mystery and make very sure that the purposes behind their deceptive performances are not discovered by the women. They particularly avoid any situation that might arouse a suspicion of intentional deception. This secret gathering and illusory performance of the men is based on an old myth and is supposed to renew and strengthen the women's erroneous belief that their men are intimately associated with certain spirits who are helping them keep the women in subjection. For centuries the men have strictly guarded their secret.

Throughout the whole course of the festival, all the women and children /1.007/ are secluded with relentless severity. While it is convenient for the men gathered in the Grove that to adhere to their daily program, the women left behind in the camp are strictly controlled in their freedom so that they will under no circumstances discover the Kina secret. During this time the men are habitually seen with all the women and children, but they do offer them enough stimulation and variety so that these days and weeks are not in any way a period of unmanaged agony. Every woman knows that forward behavior and impertinent curiosity would be severely punished.

The program of the Kina festival is carried out according to definite rules that have developed from a long past. The many kinds of masks and spirit appearances in dramatic make any one ceremony different from the other through great diversity in the production of many animated participation by the performers. Obviously, the personal talents of the leader and the number of daily participants provide reasons for many differences. The basic features, however, are always the same. No regional differences have developed in the various parts of the Tuvaana homeland, but in individual areas sometimes one and sometimes another spirit-appearance has been given prominence.

In the course of the following description many points of agreement between the kina of our Tuvaana and the kilkuny of the Delbiano will come to light. A brief reference to this similarity should be made now. It would lead too far afield, however, to point out each individual detail. There is also considerable resemblance between the two versions of the so-called origin myth.

After repeated urging, old Mulbendiano finally, in March, 1903, declared himself willing to undertake the leadership of the Kina festival. He was really the only trustworthy man who could reliably carry out the many duties and responsibilities connected with this post. A few of the older Tuvaana still remembered that the man's secret ceremony was once held here in Pearse Mulbiano, and they pitched on the place where the Green Hut had stood. Since this place was still advantageous, the Kina hut was once again erected on the same spot. The only difference was that the dimensions of the groundplan were smaller, namely, eight metres, which was adequate for the small number of participants. The size of the groundplan, of course, is always adapted to the number of men assembled for the secret festival.

3. The Beginning

When the construction of the Green Hut and the work on the Gamble was near completion, a few men incompletely and individually assemble the necessary articles in their own dwellings and take them to the Kina hut. These articles include a number of pieces of leather for the /1937 sleeping place, weapons and implements, and finally abundant quantities of pig-manure. Gradually all the men of the camp gather in hut secret hut and wait a bread line. When the first clouds of smoke appear, the women and children in the camp interpret this to mean that the festival has begun. Without a special summons and without noise or conspicuous movements, the men have assembled in the Kina hut, simply following their judgmatic chest in state of affairs and guided by their own consciousness that the preparations have ended.

The Tnimme do not have a special meeting arrangement for the men present in the secret hut. The leader alongside at the south part beside the entrance because from there he can easily survey the path marked out for the dances, which starts at the entrance. He can also conveniently map out whenever he wants to satisfy the camp. The experienced men chose their places on the spot of the moment without making any special demands, but sometimes friends or close relatives sit beside each other. In the back, that is, opposite the entrance, a few places are left open for the young men who are to be introduced for the first time as adults.

So men in the men hut chest and have given themselves up entirely to their own thoughts and received the rite of this performance, the leader begins with a talk. It is his duty to wit over the men who are suited for the role of a spirit and who must now commence rehearsing. It is no less important to select the lads who may be ulugiin on this occasion. The unanimous agreement of the influential old men decides this question. In former times a chap must have attended the Yalugen twice; nowadays there is more leniency in this respect, and the old men are satisfied if the youth has submitted to the initiation once. Actually, none of these lads is refused admission if he is halfway discrete and regarded as trustworthy. If suitable boys are present in the camp, the old men must agree to admit them. Unlike the Yalugen, however, the kine can take place even if ulugiin are lacking. Since in the past few decades a dependable Yalugen may also be invited into the secret hut, the men consult on this, too, at the beginning of the affair.

X575 2/2 Preparations are immediately begun for the appearance of the so-called spirits. This requires large amounts of pigment, which each man has severally brought along. Masks are also indispensable. A large piece of bark cut in the shape of a longitudinal triangle is used in making them. The free edges are tied together over the peak with whalebone; the lower edge, which rests on the shoulders of the wearer, forms a shallow arc. /Fig. 4 appears here./ /1929/ At the proper height small holes are cut out for the two eyes. This conical-shaped mask of bark is called kiyuk kiin (278) and is 50 to 60 centimeters high. If for any reason the required pieces of bark cannot be obtained, a piece of leather may be substituted for the mask. The latter is called ulaiiku and has the same shape and size as the bark mask, but the lower part is usually wider and the whole piece comes to a sharp point at the top. Compare ulaiiku to RD:115. Bridges (p.17 mentioned the masks and called them "masklets" /cited in English/. If the Kine celebration is prolonged, the bark masks must be repeatedly replaced, for in the heat of the fire they unavoidably dry out and shrink to such an extent that they can no longer be used. Consequently the leather masks are more valuable and durable. A few of these masks suffice for the varied program, since only the painting needs to be changed to portray the various spirits. These masks are carefully preserved and usually lie in the inner section of the Great Hut where they are handy for each man who wants to use them. A brief comment should be inserted here. Because of the special significance of the masks, children are not permitted to play with objects that resemble a mask or suggest one (p.[illegible]).

While the discussion and immediate preparations are going on in the Great Hut, the mental attitude and the outward behavior of the women in the camp undergo a very apparent change. They actually have a slightly uneasy feeling, as though they were threatened and alarmed; they run back and forth restlessly and excitedly, as though at their wit's end; they talk to one another, first in one hut and then in another. By and large the thought of the approaching Kina with its many spirit-appearances has a trying and oppressive effect on all the women; some of them scarcely dare leave their huts and appear outside. The frightened behavior of the women has an effect on the children who huddle together in the hut and anxiously watch their mothers. This state of affairs lasts until shortly before sundown.

The women and children who are quietly and expectantly waiting in their dwellings have no idea what the men are doing in the secret hut after the first masks appeared. Not a sound, not a sign from the leader reaches the camp for long hours. It is this uncertainty that makes the women and children so extremely tense. Meanwhile, however, the men in the Great Hut are not idle. They are preparing for the first appearance of the spirits. In March, 1933, the men present began their painting about five in the afternoon. Before that they had painted their completely naked bodies. /1.000/ Now they undress except for a small covering. To begin with they paint decorations with white diagonal stripes a handbreadth wide on limbs and torso. Toward six o'clock the leader comes out and stands beside the Kina hut, demanding in a loud voice that the women of the camp come out of their dwellings. They are to sit in a tight group approximately midway between the camp and the Kina hut. Then he goes back in. Immediately a fearful, threatening howl begins in the Great Hut; all the men howl and groan at the top of their lungs to indicate that the mighty Tĕnowa spirit has arrived in the Kina hut with intention of enslaving, torturing, malleweing, and assaulting everybody. The spirit does this personally as well as through various spirits which will soon appear before the eyes of all. Fear and terror are stamped on the faces of the women and children. The men howl and yell at intervals of several minutes, and each time the women tremble anew. Meanwhile it has grown dark.

Scarcely has the yelling of the men subsided when Mawmilkoma places himself in front of the Great Hut and rapidly waves his outstretched arm in the air horizontally, describing a half-circle. He makes a loud, drawn-out hissing sound which is to invoke the first spirit, known as Kĕnamĕkma. This spirit dances with mincing steps back and forth along the path on which the dances are performed. His arms are bent at right angles, and using both hands he carries a staff at eye level; his body has many red and black horizontal lines upon a white background. He glides along, dancing up and down the path several times, until the leader calls him back with a sign made with his arm. Instantly loud yelling and howling begin inside. Scarcely has it ceased when Mawmilkoma again places himself beside the Great Hut and loudly calls a warning to the women that they must all stay in their places and await the appearance of other spirits. At brief intervals the yelling of the men inside is repeated.

Again the leader steps outside and announces to the women in an anxious voice: "The feared Kalampĕlĕ has just come down and will present himself immediately!" Meanwhile the men have painted themselves with a few white diagonal stripes on their upper bodies and in the center a similar longitudinal stripe. Soon the entire assembly of men inside begins to sing hăj hăk, hăj hăk in a monotone and with a hammering rhythm. At first it is scarcely audible; then it grows louder and is slowly accelerated. Meanwhile six men arrange themselves close together in a row, each placing his arm over the shoulders and around the neck of each of his neighbors. Moving sideways in short steps this intertwined row goes straight out to the dance place. Here it halts for about two minutes, merely repeating hāj huǐu...constantly. At a sign from the leader this Kalampáǐa troupe withdraws, singing, and its rhythmic call slowly dies away. A few minutes later it reappears in /1331/ exactly the same way. While it is still outside repeating its uninterrupted hāj huǐu, a very loud yelling begins inside the Great Hut with a clearly distinguishable rhythmic pux, pux, which soon drowns out the call of the Kalampáǐa group. The latter now marches slowly back into the Kina hut. By way of explanation it must be added here that this row does not represent the Kalampáǐa spirit himself, but that the men are putting on this dance at his direction.

Scarcely has this group disappeared when all the men begin howling in an unusually alarming way. Since I am sitting among them, I can observe how Santiago rolls up a thick, dry sea lion skin and vigorously beats it against the smooth ground. Each beat is followed by a sudden outcry of the men, which is repeated several times. The whole procedure is supposed to fool the women and say to them: The Tāmuwa spirit present in this Kina hut in its malicious rage intend to strike down all the men. But they are defending themselves, so that with their united superior strength they will succeed this time in freeing themselves from this mighty spirit and in suppressing it. But every man is wounded in the bitter struggle. Two old women who are permitted to be in the Kina hut dash out, filled with terror. Previously they have poked their nostrils with a small pointed stick, and thick drops of blood are falling for all to see. They run toward the women and children still assembled in front of the Kina hut. The group clearly recognizes the situation and is alarmed by it. Indeed, they all get up and hasten to their dwellings where they shut themselves in and remain quiet. Someone summons the courage to ask the two old women compassionately: "Whatever has happened to you?" The two answer with feigned terror: "We had to struggle with Tāmuwa over there; it beat us until we bled, we had great difficulty in saving ourselves!" These words fill everygody with terror.

For half an hour the women and children are given a little respite in their dwellings. Now and then a few howling cries are

X 375 repeated in the Kina hut. The leader of the festival again steps out and shouts over to the camp: "The women must again assemble and come closer, soon the son of Kalampáła will come down from above and present himself before the eyes of all!" All the inmates of the camp immediately follow this summons and again squat down in the spot they quitted just about thirty minutes before. Meanwhile Santiago is being prepared for the proposed spirit-appearance. He already has wide horizontal and vertical [302] stripes all over his body. Now four white rings are painted on his arms and the spaces between filled with red. His legs are covered from top to bottom with white. The mask that is slipped over his head has several narrow horizontal red lines on a uniformly white background.

Again the men in the Great Hut utter their howling calls. The women and children anxiously await the event that has been announced. /1332/ Inside, meanwhile, Santiago has been practicing the dance peculiar to this spirit. Again Maľemikens steps out beside the Kina hut; this time he keeps his face covered with a piece of dark material. He utters a strong hō in a high-pitched voice several times in the direction of the group of attentive women. Then he turns about-face, with his back to the group, turns his head toward the hut entrance, stretches out his right arm, and makes a semicircle in the air with a vigorous jerk, at the same time hissing a loud and long drawn-out s sound. Santiago obeys this signal and comes dancing out, portraying the son of the Kalampáła spirit. With his legs far apart, he steps side- [535] wise along the dance course, tripping lightly, extending one foot and drawing the other after it. He moves back and forth several times; Maľemikens follows him with his glance and finally summons him back into the hut with the same arm movement. Here he is received with a loud, howling, long drawn-out hō hō... by all the people present. This soon changes to a rapid la la... and gradually dies away as a sustained, low gā gā... The women interpret the complete quiet that now prevails in the Kina hut as a sign that the "spirits" have withdrawn. Hence they, too, leave their places and silently hasten back to their dwellings. The men, for their part, wash off the painting and get dressed. Now they can take a rest, knowing that they have struck terror in the hearts of the women and children.

X575 302 Half an hour passes in pleasant conversation. Meanwhile Santiago has again been violently pricking the inside of his nose; the blood falls in thick drops. He smears it all over his face and chest; the sight of him will call forth ample terror and pity. Since Santiago himself offers it, a few of the other men collect some of his blood and rub it on their faces, thus saving themselves minor pain and the loss of their own blood. The men marked in this way show themselves to their families to indicate that they have been mistreated by the violent Tāmowa spirit. They wear these marks of terror until they are worn off. The men repeat this same deception several times during the Kina festival (279). Naturally, the deplorable countenances of the men do not fail to have an effect on the women children.

X575 In former times the participants in the Kina festival were obliged to remain in the Great Hut almost constantly; they ate and slept there. This time, in March, 1922, they are concerned only with demonstrating the more important features of this performance. They omit what is superfluous because they do not wish to exert themselves unduly. As a matter of convenience they do not eat in the Great Hut, /1333/ but each one hastens to his own family and lets his wife wait on him. Only two younger men stay behind to keep watch over everything. Since the men were having a very jolly time together earlier, they all want to get back to the secret hut soon after the meal. Here they comfortably talk over the success they can boast of in their crafty deception and gather courage for further tricks to be played on the women. To finish off the day they want to give them one more particularly bad fright. Malemikem, the wily leader, points out to the men that a Kalampáia mím would terrify the camp inmates to their very bones. Everybody agrees enthusiastically. A white line from the corners of the mouth to the ear lobes suffices as painting, for, after all, it is dark and they need not fear that a woman will look closely at the faces of the men. Kalampéla mám could be translated as "visit of Kalampéla." SD:348 gives mám, "to come as crabs do into shallower water when the winter is past, to come at any special season" /cited in English/. Actually the whole performance is a procession of men going over to the camp. The younger people are already trembling with curiosity and enthusiasm. Finally Maléemikens once more steps out beside the entrance to the Kina hut, looks down toward the camp, and shouts: "Have you gone to bed yet? -- I take it for granted that you are still up and about! -- So wait, something else is soon to happen!" During the next ten minutes the men confer and discuss the planned performance. Then Maléemikens cries out into the still night: "Kalampéla has just come down. I don't know what he has in mind. Possibly he will now visit your huts. Lie down [on the sleeping place] and cover yourself well. Beware of looking up or even moving if Kalampéla should step into your hut!" These instructions to the women are followed by a loud hō hō... by the men from the Kina hut. They take off their footgear, place themselves one behind the other, and creep in single file out of the hut. Each one is silent and his facial expression shows deep seriousness. A few women and children are gathered in Chris's dwelling. The men know this and the long line sets out for that hut. Carefully they creep inside. Sure enough, everyone in the hut is lying on the ground and is completely covered. The men make a closed circle around the fire; they have made sure that the women and children are well covered and do not stir. At a mute signal from the leader they all utter a loud sustained pē and at the same time stamp hard on the ground. For about two minutes the men stand absolutely motionless, then they again utter the loud pē. After another pause they start making short, rapid hō hō... calls, again stamp hard on the ground, and move out of the hut with short quick steps in the same formation with which they entered, straight toward the Kina hut. Scarcely are they safely there when their hitherto suppressed satisfaction over the very successful joke breaks out with complete abandon. For a long time they divert themselves with the /1334/ few and, to them, precious details and congratulate one another on the complete success of their prank. The younger men are almost beside themselves with joy; they discuss with great earnestness the appearance planned for the following day.

The first day ends with the appearance of the spirits described above. Malemilkum, who is looking in an extremely good mood, now starts to tell the enthusiastically attentive group of men a few personal experiences from earlier Kina festivals which are still fresh in his mind. From that he leads into the old myth which describes the origin of this secret performance. Until about eleven o'clock we sit happily together in the spacious Kina hut. Malemilkum now is obviously overcome with sleepiness and leaves; the rest of the participants soon follow. In former times all the men were obliged to spend the night in the secret hut. Today they go to the much more comfortable beds in their own dwellings.

Even in former times every Kina festival began in the manner just described. After the customary announcement by the leader, some "spirit" would step before the assembled women and children, and thereafter others of this kind would follow in no particular order. At the start there is never a definite, binding program; the mood of the moment or the happy thought of one of the participants decides the succession of events each day and almost every hour.

2. Introduction of the Candidates

Immediately at the start of the Kina festival the responsible adults, in an informal conversation among themselves, select the young lads who are to be admitted as uwgala. They must, of course, be sufficiently mature mentally, since, as a rule, they have already been through the Zakaxa twice. Whoever has been granted this privilege is pleased about the distinction no less than about learning the strange secrets which shall now be disclosed to him. The father or a close relative informs the young man that he may take part in the Kina this time as uwgala.

After he has been notified, he remains almost continually in his dwelling, for he will be called soon after the start of the festival, although he does not know exactly when. A certain formality must be observed. In March, 1922, this was done only when Gertie was introduced, at which time I became acquainted with it from personal observation. In former times, at any rate, it was required. After the performance has been going on for a day or two, the leader decides the hour when each uǐwǐala is to be fetched. A relative hastens over to the camp, finds the chosen lad in his dwelling, and blindfolds him with a wide strip of leather, whereupon he accompanies him to the Kina hut. Here, meanwhile, the fire has been removed and the hearth sprinkled with earth; /1335/ this has been done to make some room. With a few pieces of leather a sort of curtain is made beside the entrance, and behind it hide two painted men with masks over their heads. The uǐwǐala, led by a man, now steps in through the wide entrance and is led up to the opposite wall. A loud howling and yelling begin. Meanwhile the candidate and his guide sit down at the place designated, with their backs to the entrance. A few moments later the guide has his protégé lie down with his face to the ground so that he cannot see what is going on around him. After a while, when the yelling has subsided somewhat, all the men present get up; the two "spirits" step out of their hiding-place behind the curtain and jump on the ground beside the fire, at the same time uttering a loud cry of pax.

The uǐwǐala is still lying down, facing the inside wall. Behind his back, that is to say, in the center of the hut, the two spirits dance and leap. All the rest of the men can easily watch this because they form a tight circle around these dancers. The men yell and howl with brief interruptions during which the leader gives a few commands and speaks a few words of encouragement. Then he orders the uǐwǐala and his guide to get up. Scarcely has this happened when one spirit after the other leaps angrily at the uǐwǐala, as though they wanted to knock him over. Each of them comes so close to the youth that he is pushed back a little. It is a regular attack by the spirit which the uǐwǐala can feel plainly enough, but cannot see. The howling of all the men and the quick stamping on the ground produce a weird effect. This excited movement continues for a few minutes. Finally the guide removes the blindfold from the eyes of the uǐwǐala

575 who now sees the two "spirits" in front of him. Again he is terror-stricken. The leader calls to him: "Grab him by the head!" Resolutely the lad stretches out his hand and pulls the mask off the "spirit." Now he recognizes the man and winces in astonishment. He must immediately unmask the other "spirit" in the same way. This whole procedure has the effect of a revelation; he stands in front of the men who have been unmasked as though he had turned to stone. While this is going on, the tight circle of participants all around him yell and stamp with all their might. Now the ulwiala knows the nature of the spirits; further explanation is unnecessary.

The ulwiala must now sit down. As he does so, he can see that the two "spirits" take their places in the circle of men. Again his face is covered. Now all the men dance around the fire in wild haste and howl quite dreadfully (280). Suddenly they stop, jump once where they stand, utter a long-drawn out hô, /1336/ and the whole circle breaks up. Everyone sits down in his place; the two spirits sit in front of the ulwiala, and the guide next to him. Once again the ulwiala faces the wall and turns his back to the entrance. If two or three young men are introduced for the first time on the same occasion, the procedure described above is followed, except that one spirit dances in front of each ulwiala and the masks are pulled off by the ulwiala at the same moment, following a signal from the leader.

This unmasking is followed by a brief pause during which the frightened candidates calm down somewhat. The next few minutes are devoted entirely to their instruction. This is regularly given by the leader and actually consists only of an urgent admonition that the youths faithfully and conscientiously guard the Kina secret. The leader either has the candidates assemble in front of him, squatting in a semicircle at his feet, or he sits beside the uwíala if only one is present. Several times he repeats in all seriousness: "You are now here in the Great Hut. You know now what our performances mean. It is only men who portray such [so-called] spirit. They do not come down from above nor do they arise out of the earth. Each [spirit] that appears to the women and children outside this hut is always merely one of us men. Now you know our secret. But beware of revealing it to anyone outside. This is a matter that only we men may know. Take care and be on your guard; the old people will watch you closely to see whether you are silent!" In March, 1922, Gertie was introduced to the Kina. Old Maléemilhana squatted down on the ground beside her and spoke these words of urgent warning to her. He also added: "Everyone knows you as a good Tamana woman. You cling faithfully to what is customary among us; that is why men and women esteem you. You now know the secret of the men. What is your opinion now about this Hut? You have just grasped the masks of one and the other ["spirit"]; afterwards you recognized the two men. So it will not be necessary for me to enlighten you further. From the [illegible] you know that no one may tell what goes on in this secret hut. Anyone who does will be murdered. You know that in many a swamp in which tall reeds grow there is a foul odor. Do you know why? I shall tell you. Long ago a young woman learned the Kina secret and told it. She was led to the swamp and she sank. The same punishment will overtake you if you reveal anything. Other men will disclose many more things to you; I am an old man and must limit myself to little. Say nothing about it to any other women. Never misuse the confidence that we men are entrusting to you today!" While these admonitions were being given, there was deep seriousness on the faces of all /1337/ present; they listened without moving and without saying a word. Usually considerable time elapses before the men make the transition from this intense self-reflection to the jovial mood of their amusing hoaxes. The subsequent treatment of the uwíala will be described later.

3. The Origin Myth

The entire conceptual world of the Kina rests on an old legend which also establishes the misogynic trend of this secret ceremony. On that first evening, after the group of men has introduced the festival with a few spirit-appearances and has taken regalish delight in the initial terrorem, the leader in the ensuing conversation quite freely and naturally starts talking about the origin of the Kina. As I personally learned, back there in March, 1922, there are only a few principal ideas which he offers in condensed form. This suffices for the men who have long been familiar with the material. It is as though this were a justification of the secret gathering and the hostile attitude of the men toward the women, the former justifying their strange behavior before themselves, as it were.

Once the performance has begun, the introduction of the young lads chosen as ulla does not take long. Thus one evening, at the very beginning of the celebration, they are told the origin myth in its entirety and in its traditional form. This is the first time that these chaps hear it, and some formality is required. The leader, of course, is not always capable or talented enough to tell the story accurately and impressively. In any case, it is his duty to see to it that it is presented to the ulla properly. If he himself does not feel able to do this, he asks one of the elderly participants who has perhaps done it before on a previous occasion. It is largely due to this that the wording of the myth has remained the same throughout the centuries. It was not until my fourth journey that I heard it from Masemikens exactly as I have set it down here in the following pages (281). He repeated it to me in the presence of several men in connection with the medicine-man school. It has a lasting effect on every young man who hears it for the first time. I give it here in the most literal translation possible.

Up in the northern part of Isla Grande (282) and then beyond the first to perform Kina. At that time /1936/ the women had sole power; they gave orders to the men who were obedient, just as today the women obey the men. The men also set in back of the stern, the women in front at the bow of the canoe. All the work in the hut was performed by the men, with the women giving orders. They took care of the children, tended the fire, and cleaned the skins. That is the way it was always to be. For this reason the women dismantled this Great Hill and everything that goes on in it. They said to the men: "We seek Tŕónows! We are trying to see whether she will let herself be found, whether she will come out of the earth and enter the Great Hut!" The men regarded this as the truth. They had to follow whenever the women broke up camp somewhere.

But they did not find Tŕónows in that region. So they traveled to another place, first along the north shore of Isla Grande up to the northeast tip. Whenever they stopped they built the Kina hut and performed once more. From there they wandered along the eastern shore of Isla Grande to the south. Whenever they performed, they made a wide, flat pampas. Everywhere they looked for the mighty, evil Tŕónows. They continued southward until they came to the vicinity of Cabo San Pablo. From here on they no longer traveled along the coast; that is the reason why even today one sees only woodland and mountainous country south of this cape. Then the women set out in a southwesterly direction, crossed the mountains, and reached Beagle Channel on the southern coast of this Isla Grande, in the region of Puerto Harberton. From here they traveled westward. Wherever they erected their Kina Hut and performed Kina, as at Puerto Brown, the surface of the ground changed and the country became level and open. They went along the [northern] coast time. They stepped out of the Great Hut, only one woman or covered, painted all over, with a hilix [mask] on their heads.

Each time, a [illegible] would call to the men: "That is Sineyéka!", or again "That is Vasfoim-yéka!" And many other spirits came out. The men believed this. But actually the women had painted themselves, and since they covered their faces with the masks, some of the men recognized them.

Despite their performances and their search, which continued for a long time, they could not find Tánuwa and bring her out of the earth. So they decided not to travel farther, but to remain here in Yékuáiga. This place has a lovely pampas plain; they liked it very much and said: "We want to stay here! We shall now fool the men and call to them: "We found Tánuwa;
the just now came out of the earth and is with us in the Great Hut!"
Immediately they rolled up a few dried skins, beat the earth with them so that it shook, and yelled, roared, and howled as though they were terribly frightened. The men heard this, /1339/hastened into their huts, and hid, full of fear. They only whispered to each other quite softly: "Sure enough, our wives have now discovered Tánuwa! Before this they never yelled so loudly and persistently when the spirits appeared." When this terrible howling commenced and the earth shook, the men said to themselves, fully convinced: "That is surely Tánuwa coming out of the earth. So the women found her after all!" The women then continued their performances in Yéjaáiga. The men were held in fear and submission and continued to do all the work as the women ordered.

Lím, the sun-man, was an excellent hunter. Again and again he was sent to hunt. He brought home abundant game.
The many women in the Kina hut needed a great deal of meat.
One day he had again killed a large guanaco while hunting (285) and hoisted it on his back. As he was approaching the camp he passed a lagoon and heard the voices of two girls. Lêm grew curious and said to himself: "I wonder what these two are going here." He crept up softly, hidden by bushes. Then he saw that the girls were washing off painting that was characteristic of the "spirits" when they appeared. At the same time they were practicing imitations of the voice and manner of his two daughters (the daughters of Lêm) (286), for she played a prominent role in the Kina house. The girls said: "We want to practice hard so that we can perfectly imitate the daughter of Lêm. Then we shall help her sing and help her fool the men." They went on rehearsing and talking about the doings of the women in the Kina hut.

Suddenly Lêm leaped out of his hiding-place. He placed himself so close to the girls that they could not escape. He rebuked them and was extremely serious: "What are you doing here?" Frightened, they were silent. Then he commanded them: "You must tell me everything you are doing here, what you have talked about and what goes on in the Kina hut! I know quite a bit, because I have been eavesdropping." Then the girls blushed with shame and a cold sweat broke out on their foreheads. Finally they told Lêm everything and confessed: "It is the women themselves who paint themselves and put on masks; then they step out of the hut and show themselves to the men. There are no other spirits there. It is the women themselves who yell and howl; in this way they frighten the men. But Tênuwa does not do such things." The girls told him many other things. Then Lêm said: "Out of gratitude I shall give you a bit of advice. Stay here at the lagoon and do not go back to the camp or to the Kina hut, something bad is now going to happen!" So the girls stayed behind; later they turned into small fresh-water dwele /1941/ (197).

197. Back in January, 1939, old Wlaim told me this part of the myth in somewhat different form. The sun-man was an excellent hunter. Although he always brought abundant game back from the hunt, there was soon a shortage of meat again. So he had to go hunting constantly. Too soon, the meat was stolen by the women. One day when he turned toward the camp, laden with a heavy gamem, he passed a lagoon in which two girls were bathing. Undetected he crept up and listened to their conversation. Then he heard them say: "Lâm always brings much meat back from the hunt. Today he is out again and will surely not come home empty-handed. But the crafty women steal all his meat and take it to the Kina hut where they all consume it. Lâm knows nothing about this." Now when the sun-man suddenly stepped out of his hiding-place, the girls saw him. Frightened, they ducked down under water. But he called to them: "I've already seen you and recognized you, so come here!" Frightened, they approached. Lâm said to them: "What are you saying? I overheard you!" They stammered: "We only said: Lâm always brings home a lot of meat, here it is stolen and that is why he must hunt every day." Then Lâm demanded: "Since you know who steals my meat you must tell me who these [persons] are!" The girls, with fear and trembling, told him: "All the women gathered in the Kina hut steal the meat that you bring and consume it. That is why they stay in the Kina hut such a long time, whey they go on performing and frightening the men!"

[illegible]

The two girls who betrayed the secret remained behind in the lagoon on the advice of Lihu. They turned into ducks and are very timid.

Then Lihu angrily hoisted his gunnera on his shoulder once more and turned toward the camp. On the way he considered how he should avenge himself on the women. When he arrived in front of his hut, he threw down the gunnera and said angrily: "So that is why I provide plenty of game every day, so that my daughters can make fun of me and deceive all on me!" "They take our meat away from us as though it were for Tikanea, but they themselves consume it in the Kina hut!" All the women who were cooking near his hut listened astonished and asked themselves: "What has happened? What is Lihu talking about? Why is he so angry?"

Tikanea (288) happened to be sitting nearby and was working on a bamboo point. She heard the excited words of Lihu and said to herself: "Somebody must have told him about the women! Perhaps he overheard the girls who went to the lagoon to bathe." She blushed with shame, for she suspected that the deception by the women had been revealed. Then she considered: "How could I manage to make Lihu be quiet about it and say nothing so that the other men will not discover anything. This woman was sitting in the front of a hut where many men were lying covered up, but still awake. She alone was sitting up; she after all, did not have to crawl under the cover (289). So when Lika answered the hut, the women in a wonderful way tried to hush up everything and keep him from talking. She said to him: "We women have just given the men here a [illegible] terrible scare! We all came into the hut here and the men immediately crept under the covers, because they believed that we were Kalanguik." She said this to confuse Lika and divert him, so that he would not talk and the men would not find out anything.

He then ran back to the Kina hut and told the women: "Lika knows everything that is going on here!" All the women were very much upset by these words. They got up, yelled very loudly, painted themselves, put on their masks, and went back to the hut where all the men were assembled. They wanted to terrify them more than ever now. This time, however, a few of the men secretly peeked out from under the skins with which they were covered. They said to themselves: "This time we shall not let ourselves be frightened, but shall look closely to see whether these are really our wives who are coming here!" They kept their hands over their eyes, but sneakily peeked between their fingers. While the women were dancing and yelling with their masks close to the ears of the men, the men watched closely but restrained themselves. When the weary women departed after the long dance, the men uncovered themselves and said to one another: "That [person] was my daughter. -- That was your wife. -- That was my wife, I recognized her. So that was not Kalanguik, but our wives!"

Thus the fraud was exposed. Lika told the men to detail what he had seen and heard at the lagoon. Now the men wanted to make sure by means of further information. They considered what was to be done. They immediately sent off the swiftest one among them to run after the women. He ran behind them and slipped into the Great Hut. The women were sitting around the fire, and each woman had her mask leaning against the hut wall behind her. The little man clearly recognized the face of each woman. His name was Kalalalim; today he is a small bird (290).

[Bas]

290- This timid, swift bird is found in swampy places; its feathers are chocolate-brown, and it has a sweet voice. SO:152 also mentions it.

/[illegible] copy/

He slipped into the Great Hut and went around the circle behind the squatting women, tripping over all the cradle. He escaped on the side opposite the wide entrance. The women suspected that a swift-footed man must have run through the hut, for how else could all their cradle have fallen over? They gnashed their teeth and yelled loudly in shame and anger. Meanwhile little Kalalakina said the man: "I crept into the hut, quickly ran from one side to the other and tripped over all the cradle. But I did not see Tikaera. Only women are sitting there in the Great Hut!" The man listened to him.

Nevertheless, they thought that they should be even more certain. They wanted to know whether the women were really only sitting there with all that they had mentioned about Tikaera. /[illegible]/ So they sent out first one and then another of the men who could run quickly, first the smaller men, then the bigger men. Each of them crept in on one side, whirled through quickly, and escaped on the other side. The women soon noticed this and reached for their bows and arrows. They sent an arrow after every man who ran through the hut and knocked over their cradle. The arrow stuck fast and became a tail. The clumsy animals (which at that time were men) in particular were easy to hit with an arrow, that is why to this day they have a tail. The women threw a harpoon after the man, that is why to this day it has a broad tail. They hit the fox with the Bikfita shrub (291) which was lying there with all its leaves and little twigs. It stuck fast and so the fox's tail is bushy. Every man who ran through the Great Hut was driven off in this manner by the women.

Finally when there were no more swift-footed runners among the men, they stopped. Then they armed themselves with clubs and slings, harpoons and spears, bows and arrows, and set out against the Great Hut. The women were seized with terrible fear, but the men stormed ahead and there was a great battle. The men attacked the women furiously. Only two of them escaped unharmed; all the others were severely beaten and were changed into animals.

One can tell that all of them at that time suffered heavy blows. While this struggle was going on, Lîm poured that quantities of water on the Kina but in order to extinguish the fire, for the hut had started burning. He poured out a great deal of water. It became a huge wave. This wave surged far out to sea and took along the big marine animals, for there is no place for them [to move about] on the earth. To this day one can see this wave: there are the heavy breakers that dash against the high outlying rocks. Into this conflagration Lîm tossed a bucket, ulim, filled to the brim with water. It made a great hissing noise. This hissing also went out to sea and to this day one can hear it even through the mighty booming of the waves.

All the women were killed or transformed, a few escaped, and only the small children remained unharmed. Soon after this great struggle, Lîm, the sun-man, ascended to the firmament along with his brother Akîmix, the rainbow, and the latter's wife Tâmuxa, the moon-woman. From that time on the men perform in the Kina hut; they do this in the same manner as the women before them.

By way of supplement I shall now give the short version of the myth of the upheaval, which Mâmîmkem told on the evening of March 8, 1922, when the secret celebration had just begun. He explained: "We men long ago took the kina away from the women. High up in the northern part of /1343/ Isla Grande, in the region of Yajyîkan the women performed their first kina. Who can tell whether or not these were Selk'nam women? Perhaps at that time the Selk'nam were not yet as different from us Yamana here in this country as they quite obviously are today. On their journey down here from the north the women looked everywhere for Tâmuwa, but could not find her. In vain they tried at the various places where they erected their Great Hut. Finally they came to Yâlaasîga. They liked it here and decided to stay. Immediately they fooled all the men and pretended they had finally found Tâmuwa here. All of them made a lot of noise, yelled, leaped, and danced very excitedly. The men were supposed to believe that Tâmuwa was causing all this, but she did not do it. The things that Tâmuwa really brought about are the considerable slopes of stones, gravel, and rubble which one will soon want of Tthuain. It was Tthawa who lifted all this moss, shook it up, and moved it. If she herself had raged so wildly and struck out so violently as those women in the Kina hut, the whole region would have been demolished and destroyed. All the noise and fury were carried on by the women themselves; they made the men believe that Tthawa was giving vent to her fury in this dreadful way.

"One day when Lêm returned from the hunt he surreptitiously on two girls beside a lagoon. While he kept himself hidden in the tall reeds, the girls chatted: 'Let's practice some more.' At the same time they kept trilling their lo lo lo... Finally they said: 'Now we can do it just as well as the women in the Kina hut!' When they were ready to end their vocal practice, Lêm rose from his hiding-place and stepped up to them. In his anger he addressed them gruffly and reproachfully: 'So it is our own women who deceive us men with their singing! The ulamina (295)

295. A particular kind of Kina spirit. Concerning this designation BD:113 says: "Certain men or beings supposed to be the sons of a certain ilîapîna, who acted parts in the ceema drama" /cited in English/. Thus here, too, there is again a reference to the Kalampaua-appearance (p. 1228 and p. 1942), as in the other version of this myth.

also do not come down from above into the Kina hut! I shall inform all the men of this without delay!' The girls trembled with fear and dismay. But Lêm commanded them: 'Now tell me everything!' In their helplessness they revealed to him: 'Only our women are staying there in the Kina hut; they alone are the ones who put on everything. But the men are deceived and their false belief maintained.' Lêm was satisfied with this and assured the girls: 'All right, I shall save you two. Stay here at this lagoon and hide, then you will escape with your lives!' When Lêm reached the camp, he angrily tossed the guanaco on the ground and said distinctly: 'As far as the meat is concerned,

X 575 713 the women are fooling me and all the men!' These words startled Tēšur'kīpa. Filled with fear /1344/ she hastened to the Kina hut and told the women: 'Lēm must have learned something [about our deception]!' The women were seized with dread and noisily prepared a spirit performance [the Kalampása mátu]. But the men looked out from under their covers and distinctly recognized their women who were painted and masked.

X 575 713 825 "Soon the great struggle began there in Yáiaašāga. The men ousted the women from the Kina hut and in the process the women all turned into animals. The men threw a harpoon or a spear after each one. Thus one can still see that each animal has a tail (293). The man who was trying to hit čilawáiakīpa no longer had a spear handy, so he threw the next best thing after her, Winter's bark with its twigs and leaves, hence the bushy tail [of the fox]. The yékēslëf ran away without throwing off her mask and fled into the water; she is still wearing her mask (294).

294. This is the name for the squid (Loligo subulata). BD:646 probably also means this species, "a species of cuttle fish with a hard bill or horn" /cited in English/. The cephalopod referred to has a pair of wide, triangular fins on the pointed end of its elongated, cigar-shaped body. This formation is interpreted as a "mask" which it was supposed to have worn at that time.

The hafēim behaved in exactly the same way; to this day one can recognize the mask that she had over her head at that time (295). Likewise the tēpē'akīpa (296). The wémar'kīpa (Larus glaucodes) was hit by many arrows; this is shown by the many dark stripes and dots on the wing coverts. The small whale ašóula (Pseudorca crassidens) happened to be absent when the general fighting began. Later when he returned to this spot, he noticed that there were only a few people. He said: 'Something must have happened here. How I should have liked to help in this fight!' He seized a smoldering club -- it was still smoldering from the general conflagration -- and burned himself under his armpits and on other places of his body. These are the light spots that one can still see on him.

"The mighty spears and harpoons that our men hurled at that time still lie near that lagoon in Yáiaašága; they are covered by tall grass. They attract the attention of everyone who comes there. Scattered among them are mammoth stones; these, too, our men hurled at the women at that time. In the general fray all the women who had performed the Kina were turned into animals, into land animals, birds, and marine animals. At the same time Lēm left this earth. He took part in the Kina as a sort of servant to the women, for he had to provide them all with meat. Along with him his brother Akáinix and the latter's wife Hánuxa, as well as many others, ascended to the canopy of heaven. There they all became /1345/ stars. Since then the men rule in the Kina hut and no woman may approach unauthorized, much less enter the meeting."

These two versions of the old legend clearly set forth two main ideas. First, the Kina celebration was originally in the hands of the women. Second, the disclosure of the deception by the sun-man resulted in a general upheaval, as a result of which the men came into possession of this secret performance and all the persons who had taken part were transformed into animals, trees (pp. 791, 747), or stars. The legend explains that since then a new world order prevails and that at that time the world became populated with many kinds of animals. The story emphasizes the transformation of the people taking part, for it was a struggle between men and women for existence or nonexistence (297).

[171] 297. There is justification for a brief reference here to the surprisingly complete agreement between the basic ideas of the origin myth and those underlying the secret men's ceremonies of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 859), Yamana, and Halakwulup. All three are juxtaposed in Gusinde (q):261. Cf. the summary in Schmidt (d):995.

[173] Another familiar idea should be repeated here: Under the leadership of the women who performed the Kina, the families immigrated from the north to Beagle Channel, which at that time was unpopulated. They were the first settlers here. The Yamana refer to this as the basis for their legal claim to the region, and they have occupied it since then as the sole owners (p.855). The text of the two versions given above differs in details and in minor incidents. Naturally, all mature men who have personally experienced the Kina are acquainted with the basic ideas of this origin myth, and it is also familiar to a number of women, as will be further explained and shown below.

4. The Daily Program

X575 To this day the Yamana men feel justified in assembling in the Great Hut and celebrating the Kina, while excluding the women as a matter of principle. They definitely maintain that in former times the women, for their part, kept all the men in subjection by means of the same celebration. Hence, they say, their action is an absolutely fitting retaliation for all that was once carried on in exactly the same way by the group of women. The men regard the content of the origin myth in all seriousness as true and reliable; they base their vindication upon it. While the esteem that the men have for the women in everyday life is not basically altered and the social position of every woman is a worthy one in all respects, during the Kina celebration all these innate considerations and traditional customs are cast aside as though they had been completely eradicated from memory. Naturally, this causes an inner conflict which they do feel in one way or another.

/1346/ Nevertheless, during the secret ceremony all the men cling steadfastly to the goal which they strive for by means of it, namely, to force all the women into subjection and submission. The men once again want to make the women aware of their superior position and make them feel their greater power. The feeling of solidarity among all the men is amazingly absolute and effective on this occasion; they regard themselves as the guardians of the existing social order and feel responsible as such, hence also their inner unity and smooth co-operation as they strive for the goal of the Kina festival.

The mental attitude described here is characterized outwardly by the unwavering and decisive seriousness with which the tight group of men insists on the traditional daily program with its manifold details. Up to the present nothing has been changed in the basic essentials and none of the principal ideas has been weakened. This is not by any means to imply that the men regard their position as threatened; rather, they wish, in accordance with their natural inclination, to do justice to the demands of an obligation handed down from ancient times and, incidentally, for their personal advantage, to put on an air of importance. It must be conceded that they are very punctilious, as has been shown, in bringing forth the individual so-called spirits and in the duties imposed by the daily program. By and large, however, their secret gathering is still an enjoyable affair with an unrestrained exchange of ideas and free surrender to carefree loafing, particularly -- as in most cases -- when the Kina festival has been initiated in the immediate vicinity of a stranded whale. While the men luxuriate in comfort and ease behind the scenes, so to speak, all the women and children in the camp must put up with many an uncomfortable restriction of their personal liberty and their otherwise generally conceded freedom to roam about. The men do not feel that there is any injustice in this situation.

In order to make this description sufficiently complete, it is advisable to describe in detail how the men in the Great Hut and

X575 the women and children in the camp must conduct themselves during this celebration. This will be followed by a reference to the treatment of the uš̌wā́ala who participate for the first time. After that an account will be given of the things that go on during each day and a considerable part of the night.

a. Daily Program for the Men

Every Yamana man who has passed through the čiēxaus twice as an uš̌wā́ala thereby obtains the right to experience the kína on the next occasion. Taking this lawful formality for granted, it always depends on the /1347/ opinion of the influential old people whether a particular boy is admitted to the present festival or whether they will have him wait for the next occasion. In one way or another the boy must have proved himself absolutely reliable. For example, since a kína now and then directly follows a čiēxaus, an uš̌wā́ala of the latter would not have had an opportunity to test himself with regard to the principles he has just been taught. Thus the old people, wisely cautious, give him an opportunity to do so by letting him wait until the next kína.

Anyone who has once proved himself as an uš̌wā́ala in the Kina enjoys unrestricted freedom for the rest of his life to take part in every affair of this kind. Moreover, his presence is always desired, for the affair is more enjoyable and more varied when many participants are assembled. The greatest advantage, however, is gained by each man personally because he is offered a great deal of stimulation and his whole inner being is renewed and enriched; therefore, everyone of his own accord gladly hastens to a Kina festival. A fellow-tribesman has never been formally excluded. Anyone who has made himself unpopular because of his quarrelsome nature or who must fear revenge and just punishment from others avoids a gathering of men who would rise up against him in a body.

From among the circle of participants an experienced, mature man is selected without any definite formality to conduct the whole performance as leader. He is not chosen and named according to certain rules, such as prevail among the Selk'nam,

X515 for example (Vol. I, 829). The more or less accidental choice among the Yamana is, however, a better guarantee that a competent man will take over the direction of this affair. His arrangements and instructions, his commands and assignments are followed by every participant. This need not be specifically demonstrated in view of the innate submissiveness of our Yamana.

If one closely observes the personal attitudes of individuals among the sometimes considerable number of participants, it is easy to see that everyone as conveniently and deliberately as possible, surrenders himself to carefree idleness. Here the so-called struggle for existence does not touch him at all, and he lulls himself with the belief that now he need not bother about his family in the camp; genuine manly duties await him here in the Kina hut, which as such, however, are anything but strenuous. After all, the leader will see that everyone has plenty to eat. If the necessary food must now and then be brought from a distance, he assigns this duty exclusively to younger people who find pleasure in joint hunting expeditions. Similarly no one here lets himself be harassed by unavoidable tasks. Merely to pass the time, a man will sometimes busy himself with his tools or weapons, but he does not by any means work at it seriously or urgently. For /1348/ most of the day each man is left to himself; the appearances of individual spirits occur almost entirely during the period from sundown to midnight. Anyone who prefers to give himself up to undisturbed idleness simply wraps himself in his blankets at any hour of the day and stretches out on his sleeping-place. No one will molest him; in fact, many another will follow his example. During the period from sunrise until after the noon hour almost no one is active in the Great Hut. During the late hours of the night, however, when the spirit appearances are over and everyone present has taken part directly or indirectly, the whole company is very alive and jolly, the men describe their observations and experiences to one another, and they hardly know when to stop with their stories and jokes.

This unrestricted independence and the greatest possible comfort to which every participant surrenders himself are perfectly in accord with the program of the celebration, provided certain demands are fulfilled. First and foremost is the duty of

X575 making one or another spirit appear before the eyes of the inhabitants of the camp almost daily. This performance provides so much personal enjoyment and satisfaction to the one who plays the role of the spirit that the middle-aged men vie for it. They must practice the unusual dance movements for a considerable time, however. For this they choose the late hours of the night when they cannot be observed by the people in the camp. Even during the day some of the men engage in these exercises in the Great Hut when there are only a few persons present and there is plenty of room. They all find them an enjoyable pastime. Occasionally, however, as has just been said, the younger people must go on joint hunting expeditions. Thus, for every man the time spent in the Kina hut is refreshment for body and soul, a rest and a renewal of the whole person. They are all equally obliged to be very alert to see that no woman or child approaches the secret gathering, that they hear and see nothing that might give away the huge deception, but this certainly does not require the slightest exertion on the part of the men. The Great Hut may never be completely empty, not even for a few hours; at least one man must remain behind and guard it. Someone is always willing to do this.

Not even the seating is compulsory. Everyone likes to select a place beside a relative or intimate friend and thus from the start be assured of a good time. During the day everyone is free to sit here or there, to sit in front of the Great Hut, or to go over to the camp. Naturally, no one is forced to be present throughout the entire festival. Anyone who finds something not to his taste, who for personal reasons feels uncomfortable, or who is annoyed by the presence of an enemy will inconspicuously gather up his few belongings, /1349/ notify his wife and children in the camp, and again seek the open spaces. Not a single Kina participant will interfere with him in any way.

A general rule, however, requires the participants to spend the night in the Great Hut. Concern about guarding the Kina secret has probably given rise to this rule. It is too likely to happen that someone would not completely wash off his body painting, that someone, in his excitement, would become talkative and drop suspicious hints or would dream aloud and blurt out the secret. Of course, sleeping beside one another is

X575 somewhat difficult and uncomfortable because of the limited space, but to make up for it a man can rest undistrubed during the day. Actually, a few old men will take the liberty of spending the night in their dwelling; no one can stop them, and everyone grants them this slight comfort without envy. In March, 1922, all the participants, without exception, sought their family huts for the night. To me this is silent proof that much of the former seriousness of this obligation has been lost. There is another reason why the men should spend the night in the Great Hut. Formerly they tried to gather the women and children into community huts if possible. There was more room for many people if special sleeping places did not have to be reserved for the men. Keeping watch over the camp inhabitants was also easier when more persons were housed in a community hut.

The women are very much deceived about the manner in which the men in the Kina hut get their food. They are made to believe that the men do not eat anything at all in their secret hut. If a man wishes to satisfy his hunger, he goes to his own dwelling and has his wife wait on him. Of course, he pretends that he is excruciatingly hungry and fills up each time. Even though he is not hungry at all, he must nevertheless give the appearance of being hungry to confirm the belief of the women and children that every man is tortured and maltreated by the spirits, that he has over-exerted himself and is weak. Their pity is supposed to be aroused and their fear of the spirits intensified. Since the uǰwǯala may not leave the Great Hut, a relative or an acquaintance of his mother or wife gets his meals for him several times a day and carries them over to the Great Hut. This man who brings his meals always assures the woman that some spirit almost always seizes the meal and consumes it; hence the uǰwǯala is at a disadvantage. Impressed by these words, the woman sends a great deal of food to the Great Hut at frequent intervals, hoping that some portion of it will reach the right person. The fact is -- and this is strictly concealed from the women -- that secretly the men provide themselves with large quantities of food, gathered chiefly on joint hunting expeditions. /1350/ They first drag their booty to the vicinity of the Kina hut and then transfer it inside under cover of darkness. Here they immediately fall to and almost always feast in abundance. The men also consume a large part of what the women have prepared for the uśwźala, they let the latter have only a small amount. Every indication that there has been not only eating but lavish feasting in the Kina hut is carefully removed by the men. Nevertheless, not a day goes by when they do not, by word or gesture, arouse the sympathy of their wives, chiefly because of the alleged pangs of hunger that the spirits make them suffer.

The men are extraordinarily sly in playing their deceptive roles in front of the women, and they cover up their jolly doings in the Great Hut with amazing discretion. In order to prevent any possible carelessness, younger men are advised to avoid contact with their relatives in camp as much as possible and to appear there only for urgent reasons. Many a man actually stays away from his dwelling for the duration of the Kina. In front of the women the men invariably wear a serious expression to remind them of the tortures and the mistreatment by the many spirits to which each of them is exposed in the Great Hut. Hence there is a somber, oppressive mood in the dwellings, brought about by the concern of the women and children for their husbands, fathers, and relatives. The men consciously strive for this with their cleverly planned dissimulation and their sly deception, without hurting themselves in the least or exerting any effort.

β. Daily Program for the Candid[illegible]

The young lads who have endured the čźexus twice as uśwźala are introduced to the kźna for the purpose of making them familiar with the secrets reserved for the men only. At the very beginning they hear the so-called origin myth which tells them the meaning of the whole affair. Moreover, they may now view with open eyes all that goes on behind the scenes, as it were. Beyond this primary and principal goal, the uśwźala are also given training if necessary. In view of these two considerations, the kźna proves to be a continuation of the čźexus, just as the latter is a continuation of parental rearing in the small family group. The treatment given the uśwźala in the kźna coincides exactly with that experienced by all the uswala without exception in the čiexaus, although the teachings and exercises are much more extensive in the youth initiation (p.717). Here they are offered the complete cycle of stories woven around the Yoalox family. They heard some of them earlier in the čiexaus (p.767).

/1351/ The chosen candidates (p. 1214), without discrimination, are conducted to the Great Hut with the formality described above (p. 1233). Women and children are supposed to learn from direct observation which young man has been granted the privilege of participation. They are told that the spirits demanded this or that chap as uswala. Not to comply with such a request would put all the men in great danger. The man who accompanies the candidate to the Great Hut as a rule continues to act as a sort of sponsor. As such he chooses his place beside his protégé, observes and instructs him constantly, and takes charge /Fig. 96 appears here/ of his food and sleep. The two are not as closely united as are candidate and sponsor in the čiexaus, for the daily program and everything that goes on in the Kina are by no means as strictly observed and carried out as in the čiexaus. No duties are attached to the office of sponsor beyond the duration of this celebration. Usually a relative willingly offers to put himself at the disposal of the uswala; there is no need for a detailed discussion of the matter between the participants. The leader is satisfied when some man offers to be the sponsor in the case of each uswala selected; no particular aptitude is required for this service.

Like the uswala of the čiexaus, those of the kina are also externally marked by a painting which is restricted to the face. In olden times the face was evenly rubbed with white pigment, and a red stripe, the width of a finger, was painted all the way across the center of the forehead. Now, however, as has been the case for an indeterminable length of time, each candidate is given instead a forehead decoration resembling a diadem. It is made of a band of leather about 55 centimeters long and scarcely three centimeters wide, the ends of which taper slightly before they are knotted together (298). It is thickly smeared with white pigment

298. Each end of this leather band is split in the middle, and these little strips, which are about three centimeters long, are securely knotted together.

before it is loosely tied around the head (Fig. 96). The candidate is distinguished by it /1352/ as long as he crouches in his place. Now and then his sponsor paints a more complicated decoration on his face: thirteen fine red lines on a white background, which, beginning on the bridge of the nose or the lower eyelid, are evenly distributed and radiate downward. /Fig. 97 appears here./ A horizontal red line as wide as a finger connects the two inner corners of the eyes by way of the bridge of the nose and continues on either side from the outer corner of the eye to the ear (299).

299. This same decoration, with the exception of a slight difference on the number of lines, is worn by a participant in the youth initiation, as is shown in Fig. 85, b (p. 790).

X 575 293

Soon after the beginning of the ceremony the sponsor carves two little sticks for his protégé, about 20 centimeters long and about one and a half centimeters thick in the middle, with four edges, forming a long rectangle in cross section. One end is tapered more than the other. The tapered end points upward when the stick is held in the hand. During the instruction and the narration of the origin myth or the Yoźlox stories, the candidate holds one of these little sticks in each hand. He grasps it in his closed fist which rests on the ground. Afterwards he inserts the sticks into the hut wall where they are kept until used again. The sponsor often rubs them with dry imi powder (Fig. 97) (300).

If it has not been possible to fetch the selected candidates to the Great Hut on the first day, they are all brought there the second day after the start of the celebration. Here they immediately meet a "spirit," followed by the first important explanations (p. 1235). The candidates are usually given seats opposite the wide entrance. When they have recovered from their terrible fright and calmed down somewhat after the first spirit appearance, each of the sponsors shows his protégé the unnatural position of the body which he is more or less strictly obliged to maintain throughout the entire affair. A piece of leather is spread out over the litter of grass and the uwfala crouches on it with his legs under him, the upper part of his body bent slightly forward, his arms folded on his chest, and his eyes fixed on the ground. He is supposed to remain this way as motionless as possible /1353/ and, of course, absolutely silent, paying no attention to the others. He may neither laugh out loud nor manifest his satisfaction over the jolly doings of the men, neither lean against the hut wall nor relax in a slouch, neither scratch any part of his body nor repulse annoying insects. He must also endure,

X 515 516 785 without moving, the discomfort of a strong draft or smoke from the hut fire. It is only when the fire temporarily gives off too much heat that the sponsor builds a low protective screen of twigs and brush between the candidate and the fire. During the first few days the uŁwĒala observe these requirements with painstaking exactness, but after that neither the sponsor nor the leader prevents them from raising their eyes and looking directly at the various spirit appearances or even smiling when the men laugh about some successful deception. The initial strictness is considerably relaxed, and finally the individual makes himself quite comfortable. He is never given the complete freedom of movement which the other participants enjoy, however. After a few days an uŁwĒala may slip into a negligent posture and let his eyes roam about practically unrestrained, but in any case he must constantly remain crouched in his place.

X 515 785 While some of the men stretch out comfortably in their sleeping places during the day, the candidate must remain upright. The program itself curtails his sleep at night, for when the spirit appearances have ended and the men have ceased their subsequent conversation, midnight is usually already past. It is only after the rest of the men have wrapped themselves in their blankets and deep silence has descended on the Great Hut -- which is supposed to announce to the women outside that all the spirits have departed -- that each sponsor gives his protégé permission in so many words to go to sleep. The uŁwĒala may stretch out and make himself comfortable insofar as the limited space in the Great Hut permits, but as soon as the gray dawn appears in the eastern sky, he is again awakened by a call or an unmerciful nudge from his sponsor. Immediately the candidate sits up and takes the required position. He rubs his sleepy eyes with his hand and hastily arranges his hair. This completes his morning toilet. The constant curtailment of sleep makes the candidate weary and weak.

The short daily rations also contribute to this weakness. The uŁwĒala is never permitted free access to the meat which on some days is brought into the Great Hut in excess. The sponsor himself always gives it to him as he sees fit. As a rule he gives him /1354/ a larger piece of meat in the morning or about 20 mussels and at the same time as much water as the shell of a Voluta snail will hold. In the late afternoon, before the spirit scenes begin, he again gives his pendgl a few bites. If at one time or another during the day the candidate is again thirsty, he may ask for water and it is given to him, but he does not get more than the small quantities of meat mentioned. The men present repeatedly express their satisfaction over the fact that the ulwala is visibly wasting away and has become physically weak. They believe that in this condition he is more receptive to the teachings and the seriousness of the impression he receives will be more deeply engraved (301).

> 301. For the same purpose the candidates in the youth initiation become weak from hunger and are more receptive to the teachings (p. 709).

At the request of the leader the candidates are delegated to do the necessary work in the Great Hut. The boys are then always under the supervision of the sponsor or a group of younger men. Considerable piles of firewood are required, which must sometimes be brought from a distance. The necessary amounts of meat are procured on joint hunting expeditions. In all this the men see to it that the candidates exert themselves far beyond their strength and become exceedingly weary. Other chores are easier. Every morning and at night after the spirit appearances, they must sweep the Great Hut, rearrange the fire, carefully scrape off all the spattered color, and smooth out many pieces of skin. Besides these tasks, one man or another will call upon an ulwala for small personal services when he is devoting himself to manual work or fixing a weapon. Such tasks and the long walks are obviously advantageous and desirable for the candidates. The dull, nearly motionless crouching on the same spot exhausts them far more than a strenuous hunt with plenty of physical exercise. The following rule is conscientiously carried out as soon as the ulwala have been introduced. They may go in and out of the Great Hut only on the side that lies north of the fire. Everyone can easily conform to this duty since the broad entrance, as it known, opens toward the east (p. 1219). The Tomana can give no other reason for this rule than that the custom governed the women back in the days when the Kina was still in their hands. "In this Great Hut we men stick closely to everything that was once customary among the women!" This was the answer I received when I asked for the meaning and origin of this rule (302).

> 302. This custom could be interpreted as an indication that the Kina celebration originated in the northern regions, as the origin myth clearly states (p. 1237).

X595 868 /1365/ The leader now and then makes a candidate try out the exercises for the dances and spirit appearances and work at them, and some of the young men do this on their own. They are all willing, for each one likes to appear before the others in the role of a spirit. An experienced man will give directions and probably also perform, while the men in the audience give their opinions. Such rehearsals, of course, take place inside the Great Hut; under the cover of a dark night they also take place outside near the entrance. It is only after a young man or a candidate is able to perform the dance movements perfectly and very lithely that he is permitted to assume the role of a spirit in front of the women and children. Such exercises also show which man is more suitable for this or that role. Accordingly, he must then perfect himself in whichever role suits him. In this way the group of men makes sure that well-trained young people are able to portray the long list of spirits.

X595 867 In addition to the above-mentioned formalities pertaining to the personal appearance and posture of the candidate, there is, of course, also the explanation of the meaning of the celebration, which is given at the very beginning along with the myth of its origin. Beyond that, this or that uwala will also receive instruction and admonition in case a few of the men feel that he needs it. It is not at all rare for the old people to observe that an uwala dismissed from the Tatigan is not sufficiently serious about the teachings and principles he received there. The adults carefully note evidences of weakness and improper behavior on his part and they tell each other about it quite openly with a view to correcting the lad's mistakes at the next Kina festival. Naturally this is always only a matter of the individual personality of the uŠwźala in question and certain weaknesses of character. Usually a close relative takes it upon himself to impress the lad with exhortations and to correct whatever has given cause for worry and complaints. A Kina festival is truly the last opportunity at which a young man can be seriously influenced by the weight of authority enjoyed by an older fellow-tribesman. Here, after all, he is an uŠwźala, and as such he is at the mercy of the entire assembly, to be supervised and taught by them. Out of honest conviction and far-seeing concern for the public welfare, the old people are anxious to repress thoroughly those inclinations and tendencies among the young people which might develop into serious faults of character. That is why the man who takes care of the candidate and who is also related to him asks one or another of the participants to help him, not infrequently the leader himself. All of them, one today and another tomorrow, talk seriously to the uŠwźala insofar as his faults or his weaknesses of character demand it. They teach him in all kindness, solicitously warn him and do not hesitate to /1356/ predict that his faulty development will lead to a bad end. A person who takes an interest in an uŠwźala in this way feels that he is fully justified and obligated to do so. If it is shown years later that his efforts have been without success, this man justifies himself before the group and reminds them of all the things he did for the uŠwźala back in the Kina. Thus, even during the men's celebration at least a few young people are taught according to the general principles that they were given in the Ťźexaus. One is surprised at the general solicitude shown once again in the Kina for the rising generation, to make each one "a good and useful human being."

X-575 It has already been mentioned that in exceptional cases the Yamana also admit a woman to their men's celebration (p. 1216). They explain this strange lenience as follows. In former times a woman would occasionally approach the Great Hut out of curiosity. Instantly several men set upon her and dragged her away with them by force. As punishment they held her captive in the Great Hut for a few days. Although she was blindfolded and the men behaved very cautiously during the spirit performances, the nevertheless recognized their action as a crafty fraud. Hence the men had no alternative but to expose themselves before this woman and to enjoin her, on pain of death, to guard the secret. From that time on, this woman was permitted to come to the Kina hut on later occasions, for she was now amply informed about everything. Later some other inquisitive woman suffered the same punishment: a few men dragged her to the Great Hut by force where they let her sit at one side with her eyes blindfolded and made her go without food for a long time. Such inconsiderate treatment was intended also to warn the rest of the inmates of the camp. Clara and Flora also suffered this fate when they were still middle-aged women. The decisive reason, however, is probably the one mentioned to me in March, 1922, when Gertie was initiated: in the presence of at least one trustworthy woman the men want to drop the mask of their deception with which they have consciously duped all the women, and it seems almost as though they wished in this way to make amends to a certain extent for their undignified behavior. I myself observed the formality with which the two women mentioned above introduced Gertie into the men's group (p. 1233). After that they were obliged to conduct themselves in the Great Hut exactly like every young man who is present for the first time as uwĕala. Naturally none of these women is called upon to assume the role of a spirit, but they learn the complete origin myth. An outside observer can confidently infer from the fact that a woman is admitted at all to the men's secret gathering-place that the Yamana are not as serious as the Selk'nam about keeping their Kina secret strictly to themselves.

/1357/ The details given above show that the daily program with all its duties is quite strenuous for the uwĕala. It is intended that the young men should once again experience strict discipline and strenuous trials. The picture of a young man's mistakes and shortcomings which have already aroused misgivings in the group is held up before him as a final warning. Every Yamana who has become acquainted with the Kina thereby becomes a full-fledged man because he has now been entrusted with the secrets reserved for the male world. With this final tent the public has fulfilled its educational obligations with honest effort, for it has trained the young man thoroughly enough so that it can expect him to prove himself a good and useful member of the community.

Y. Daily Program of the Women

Basically the secret Kina performance is consciously and emphatically misogynous. The men try to deprive the women of any opportunity to recognize and expose this fraudulent game for what it is. As a matter of principle, therefore, women are excluded from taking part. The few who have earned the men's confidence and have obtained the privilege of entering the Kina hut are pledged to strict silence about everything that they experience there. Similarly dire punishment awaits every male uwala who dared divulge the Kina secret. It is neither difficult nor onerous to live up to this strict duty of silence. In everyday life no one talks about the Kina festival.

While it is going on, the men supervise the women and children very strictly. Their freedom of movement is considerably curtailed. From the start the men try to put several families together in community huts huddled close together, as are the individual huts. Since the Kina hut is erected on a slight rise, the camp can be easily and inconspicuously surveyed from this vantage point. Whenever the women wish to look for the indispensable firewood and to gather mumeh, they must make a wide arc around the Great Hut, so that under no circumstances will they cast glances inside the wide entrance. Any woman who comes too close knows from the start that the man will severely punish and mistreat her. In the late afternoon, before the spirit appearances begin, a man calls from the Great Hut to all the women and children, ordering them to creep immediately into their dwellings. In anxious haste young and old in the camp seek their own dwellings, hang something over the entrance, and, intimidated, remain almost motionless beside the fire. After some time another call from the Great Hut announces how the women and children are to conduct themselves further; if

X595 a few spirits appear on the scene, the women and children may /1928/ come halfway toward the Great Hut'in a tight group and from this point observe all the proceedings. They may until a man from the Kina hut again orders them back to the dwellings. During other spirit appearances they must remain in their sleeping-places and crawl under the covers. At any hour of the day, if the men are busy with complicated preparations for a major performance, the women must be content not to step out of their huts during this time. They all know that a few spies are watching closely to see that every woman and child complies with the loudly conveyed instructions. It need not be specifically pointed out that with such restrictions the men arbitrarily give vent to their arrogance toward the women (202).

> 202. If one compares this with the inconsiderate treatment of the Sela'tsem men toward their women during the Klokstan ceremony (Vol. I, 227, 230), he will find that the Tsimsin women are much luckier and are treated incomparably more gently.

In spite of all this, not only must the women continue to take care of their families and provide food, but the men also demand some chores of them in the service of the Kina hut. They are often requested by a loud announcement to gather firewood. Several women immediately leave into the forest, load themselves down with good-sized bundles, and place them approximately midway between the camp and the Kina hut. A few young men step out of the Kina hut and carry all the wood inside while the women leave back to their dwellings. Whenever the men run short of rations, one of them will step outside the Great Hut and shout down to the camp: "The spirits again need meat!" Several women, in any case all the younger ones, comply with this request without hesitation. Whatever they have gathered along the beach is put down a good distance from the Great Hut. While they silently move off, the men gather up all the morsels and take them away. Along with these occasional general requests there are also frequent personal wishes which every man addresses to his wife. She must often give him small quantities of white and red clay, secure meat for the Kina but beyond that used in her own dwelling, and perhaps even hand over a large piece of leather which the man appropriates and uses for a mask.

One can say that throughout the entire Kina celebration the women are under orders day after day, and in general they feel very much burdened. Their freedom is considerably curtailed and they realize that they are threatened by the very irritable and harsh behavior of the men. The latter also do not want anyone in the camp to mention the things that go on in the Great Hut or to talk about them in detail in a group. Everything that the women say is secretly overheard by individual men. If the latter /1359/ catch some suspicious statement, they immediately inform the secret gathering in the Kina hut, and they, in turn, instantly take a stand. Since the women know how much suspicion surrounds them, they do not say a word about what goes on during the Kina celebration and are obviously reserved. This is the very thing that the anxious, mistrustful men wish and work for. Again and again they insistently demand, even intercessorily, that the children be strictly supervised and held in check. Even though all the spirit appearances may offer the women considerable enjoyment, the Kina celebration as such is disagreeable to them and unwelcome. Their consent, however, is never requested when the men wish to assemble for these lessons. They breathe a sigh of relief when the festival is over.

5. The Spirit Appearances

Unavoidably the following description must be treated schematically, so to speak, in order to be complete. This procedure is justified by the fact that the preparation and the presentation of the spirit appearances are by and large quite uniform. Even though a long list of spirits is presented, most of them differ from each other only in slight peculiarities of body painting, but they are exactly alike in their movements. For this reason the Kina celebration becomes monotonous after a time. This becomes obvious and the men taking part, as well as the women in the camp, do not by any means conceal it.

a. Preparation and Presentation

X575 The men assembled in the Kina hut see to it that a few spirits are presented to the women every day. They choose the evening hours as a suitable time for this, when people stay at home anyway. The obscurity of the night is also supposed to contribute its share in covering the performer so well that he cannot be recognized by the audience in the camp. If the men are in a good mood, the spirit appearances go on until long after midnight. Rain and snow often interrupt and hinder the men's performance, but they will not let their gay mood be spoiled, and on another occasion they fully make up for what was impossible earlier. In any case they can prolong the entire affair at will.

Even though women may be admitted to the Great Hut, it is a matter of principle that only men may assume the role of spirit. It gives each of them great satisfaction to be able to appear before the others. Older men, however, are not so bent on doing it, and no one is permitted to step outside who has not learned the remarkable dance of the spirit to be portrayed. Again and again the younger men /1360/ rehearse, also merely for their own entertainment; the men present instruct and criticize them. Each one has a favorite role in which he feels most comfortable. This means that some spirits are presented to the women much oftener than others for which it is not easy to find a performer.

X575 535 It is strange that the Yamana content themselves with a single type of movement for the great majority of spirits to be portrayed. The performer draws the bark mask over his head and supports it on either side with the palms of his hands pressed against the region of the ears. He holds his bent arms at shoulder level. The movement itself is a sidewise stride. One leg is placed far to one side, the body is inclined in the same direction, and the other leg is slowly drawn in. It is a light, springy dance and at the same time a gentle skip and a lively stride up and down the long dance course. At the end of the course the performer, without stopping, merely changes direction and once more disappears into the Great Hut. In exceptional cases a

X575 spirit will sometimes stand motionless for a few minutes at the 535 end of the dance course. As a rule every spirit reappears after an interval of a few minutes, and this may be repeated from two to five times as he chooses or according to his effect on the audience if they are enjoying it.

X575 If the women and children are to be shown one of the many 302 spirits, the performer must, of course, appear with a particular painting. The men are content to use the customary colors, black, white, and red. It is not necessary to be painfully exact in the drawing because the spectators stand far away. Most often red or black lines and stripes, small circles and semicircles, dots and dashes are painted on a white background in a certain arrangement. Using his incisors a man will scrape off a layer from a lump of chalk the size of a fist, mix the fine powder with saliva by making chewing motions, and apply this mixture by rubbing it on with his hand or fingers. A person who has been smeared with it stands beside the fire so that the color will quickly dry. Red and white pigments are sometimes mixed with blubber, sometimes applied dry. The mask is painted with just as little care, and the drawings on it coincide roughly with those on the body of the performer. The latter does not do the painting himself. This is done by other men, and the leader likes to take part because he is usually the one who decides on the decoration. It is applied only to the front of the body, for only this is visible to the eyes of the women and children. After each appearance the men carefully wash off the colors. While the painting is be-

X575 ing done, the men constantly amuse themselves with all kinds of 522 jokes. Once when they were preparing for the Histuku performance and the large amount of white pigment applied to their bodies was dry, many of them could hardly be recognized. /1361/ Mašemikens, with a smirk, surveyed the group of men and asked jokingly: "Where in the world is the man who calls himself Thomas? I don't see him any more! He was here just a minute ago." Thomas understood the jest and replied: "I am big enough so that everybody ought to see me (304)!" The whole company laughed.

304. He was about a head taller than Mašemikens himself.

While the men were still busy with their painting, Mašemikens requested his wife Sara to get the women out of their dwellings and lead them to the middle of the field, for soon the spirits would appear. Sara may not have summoned the women sternly enough or the women themselves may not have taken her words seriously -- who knows? In any case, no one appeared. Annoyed, Mašemikens placed himself beside the Great Hut and hurled a few threatening words at the women in the camp. The rogue in him soon gained the upper hand, however; he was obliged to withdraw quickly and pour out his hearty laughter in front of the men in the Great Hut.

As has been said several times, the same type of performance by the individual spirits is repeated again and again. The leader or an older man selected by him stands beside the entrance of the Great Hut and looks out at the camp. If the women are not yet assembled, he calls them together. Then he immediately makes a brief announcement about the spirit that will soon appear; at least he mentions the spirit's name. For example, he will call out: "Kalampása has just announced himself. I don't know what draws him here to our hut. Now he is keeping us waiting again!" Or: "Kinamjáma is at present here among us. He is being very friendly, soon you [women] shall see him!" Once I heard: "Several spirits are coming up, they are acting very restless and impetuous. If only they would not annoy us so terribly!" Another cry: "Strange, at such a late hour a spirit is approaching our hut; he is coming down from above. Who could it be? We men would prefer to be left in peace. Sure enough, he is already arriving; it is Asepakájaka. He has a message for you [women] and says that he has come a great distance. Look closely at him." Finally, the following: "Just now two spirits have come down to our hut simultaneously. I don't recognize them yet. They seem to be in a good mood, however, and enjoying themselves here." After such an announcement or a similar one the leader turns about-face with his back to the women. He peers into the Great Hut and, with a sharp hissing sound accompanied by a sweeping gesture of the arm, be brings the spirit out. The latter has been waiting for such a sign as he sits among the group of men. He now moves back and forth along the dance

X575 course and soon disappears again. The leader follows him into the hut immediately, without any words or any kind of sign to the spectators. If this spirit or another one is supposed to appear again, the leader calls him out in the manner just described. A spirit never steps out of the Great Hut suddenly before the eyes of the women.

X575 756 /1362/ In exceptional cases a yĕkamuš will accompany some spirit along the dance course. Shortly before the end of the Kina celebration in 1922, Asikansis unexpectedly stepped into the Great Hut and announced that he had been requested in a dream to let Calderon portray the spirit of a particular fish. No one dared to contradict this old man who was already somewhat feeble mentally or to point out to him that the night was far advanced. So Calderon painted his whole body and the mask white, and over [302] this he drew several vertical red lines two fingers wide. Asikansis, who is a yĕkamuš, wore his feather diadem; his face and the upper part of his body were painted white, with a red horizontal line extending from below the nose to either ear lobe. The two men stood facing each other. Calderon, as is customary, supported his mask, while Asikansis stretched his two arms out sidewise at shoulder height. Then Asikansis indicated the rhythm with low sustained cries of hŏhŏng. First they danced inside the hut as though they were practicing; then they performed their short, leaps sideways along the dance course. They stepped out five times and moved back and forth, each time after a pause of a few minutes. Asikansis always turned his back to the camp and unavoidably hid Calderon a little. After both had ended their dance, Asikansis sat down by the fire and softly sang on for a long time, completely absorbed. Calderon washed off his painting.

X575 Just as the leader calls together the women and children at the beginning of the spirit appearances, so he also announces the end of the performance with a brief word. He says: "Now the last spirit has left this hut, not a single one is now sitting among the group of men. You, too, go back to your huts!" The men regularly announced the entrance of a spirit into the Kina hut with a warbling lalala..., which warned the women to be on their guard; now all is silent there, a sign that the spirits have all withdrawn.

β. The Individual Spirits

The various personalities which are presented as spirits comprise an astonishingly large number. They are not definite character types with pronounced characteristics, such as the Kloketen spirits, but rather are portrayed chiefly as spirits of well-known animals with slight indications of the characteristic coloring of the skin or feathers of these animals. The spirit is not recognizable by his peculiar behavior or characteristic dance, but the leader designates him loudly by name. The body painting of the dancer also suggests the natural outward appearance of whatever animal is portrayed.

Each spirit that is in any way mentioned in the Kina performance, even if it should not appear before the women, has a name. Usually this is nothing more than the customary designation for a particular animal species, /1363/ combined with the word yāka, "performance" (305). A few spirits also have their own proper names. These are the personalities to whom special power is ascribed here in the Kina, and their names indicate their distinctiveness or ranking. The long list that I became acquainted with follows.

At the top of the list is Lēxakīpa. According to the Yamana, she is the guardian spirit that rules over everything here in the Great Hut. She assumes importance solely during the Kina celebration, and otherwise she is not even mentioned, much less invoked. During the course of the celebration, however, she proves to be a helper and rescuer for all the participants. This female guardian spirit is favorably disposed toward the men and invariably benevolent. I was told: "Just as Watauinēiwa stands over everything in the čiēxaus [over the whole affair], observes [ruling] all the participants, and is kindly disposed toward everyone, so Lẽxakīpa stands in relation to the Kina hut. She regulates everything, guides all the participants, and protects everyone. Therefore everyone must yield to her. In the Kina we do not speak of Wataụinẽjwa, but of Lẽxakīpa. Our ancient tradition determines how each participant should behave during this celebration; this is our law, the way Wataụinẽjwa wants it. Anyone who acts contrary to these rules and divulges the secret is called to account by Wataụinẽjwa and is punished by an untimely death." Accordingly, the Supreme Being is the ultimate basis for the Kina arrangement, too, but without any direct connection with this celebration or with Lẽxakīpa. In answer to my question as to how this guardian spirit became connected with the Great Hut, I was told: "We do not know that. This festival was taken over by the men exactly as the women performed the kīna at Uŭwāja. We ourselves have added nothing new. So Lẽxakīpa must have been a guardian spirit of the Kina even at that time!" To the extent that Lẽxakīpa possesses supreme power, she towers above mighty Tānuwa and all the spirits. The Yamana do not say that these spirits are commanded by her or directly subservient to her. As a guardian spirit it is incumbent upon her to defend the men present against the illusory arbitrariness and torture of the other spirits, to heal the wounded men, and to restore to life those who have been killed. Such details are shouted over to the camp by the leader who each time places himself beside the Great Hut. He puts as much seriousness and conviction into his words as though real events were taking place, yet his explanations are nothing more than conscious attempts to dupe the women. Lẽxakīpa is never shown in any form to the others outside the Great Hut (306).

306. The same superior position that Lexakipa occupies in the Kina is accorded to Xalpen in the Kloketen of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 916).

One of the dangerous Kina spirits is Tānuwa who surpasses all the others in brutality /1364/ and is therefore feared the most. Only Lẽxakīpa is able to curtail his actions effectively. The men

X575 776 imitate his temporary sojourn in the Great Hut in noisy excitement. They call attention to him chiefly when they want to frighten and warn the uśwąąla. During an alleged appearance of Tąnuwa in the Great Hut, the faces of the candidates are covered, and they are all required to lie down so that the salutary dread induced by this spirit will penetrate deeply and last a long time. The men then communicate with one another only by signs. The anxiously trilled lalala...does not lead one to expect a good-natured spirit. The women outside soon recognize the various signs that mean Tąnuwa has arrived.

X575 To begin with, in order to intimidate the candidates, the leader pours a small amount of water on the embers of the hut fire to produce a soft sizzling. He asks distinctly for the benefit of the uśwąąla: "What's going on here?" Soon afterward a broad stream of water is poured on the embers. A cloud of steam with a quantity of ashes rises up with a loud sizzling, and the men set up an alarming roar. They get up hastily and dance around the fire in wild leaps while a single man beats on the ground a few times with a wad of dry leather. This noise suddenly ceases and complete silence follows. After about ten minutes old Thomas goes outside and stands in front of the hut entrance. He cries sorrowfully: "Attention! I do not know what has happened here and what we must be prepared for. Something is soon going to happen. Watch out!" Sure enough, soon all the men get up, leap back and forth and stamp on the ground, seize one another and struggle amid a frightful howling and bellowing cries of desperation. Some of them beat the ground with a ball of leather, while amidst all this shrill cries of alarm resound; the greatest effort is made to feign dreadful confusion. Then the noise gradually subsides and finally ceases altogether with faint gurgling sounds. At the same time the men lie down on their sides and remain motionless in an irregular heap. The air is filled with an impenetrable cloud of dust and ashes.

After many minutes Santiago gets up and asks in a loud voice so that the pupils in the Kina hut as well as the people in the camp can hear his words: "What a picture before me! All the men around me have been slain. Woe is me, I, too, feel weak because I have suffered a bad blow. This man and that one are dead, all of them lie there motionless. I go from one to the other, I feel them, shake them. No one moves, they are all dead; truly, all are dead!" After a brief pause he continues in a broken but audible voice: "Oh, woe is me, I, too, am about to die." His /1365/ words fade away like those of a dying man. At a mute sign from the leader two men start poking around violently in their noses so that blood flows. They let all the men have plenty of it and they rub it on their faces. Some of them cannot suppress a contented smirk at this crafty hoax which is not recognized as such by the blindfolded uśwā̆ala present or by the women outside in the camp.

Ten minutes pass, then a soft, light lalala... begins, performed by two men. It is supposed to announce the arrival of Lēxakīpa from the heavens. Then the men get up slowly, as though they were waking from a deep sleep. They stretch as though they were still suffering considerable pain. One of them complains pitifully: "Tā̆nuwa seized me unmercifully when I offered resistance. He beat me with a thick club. I tried to parry the blow, but he forced me down. I defended myself for a long time, but he quickly overcame me and threw me out of the hut, trampled on me, and mistreated me dreadfully. I have such pains I can scarcely move!" Another groans: "All my limbs ache, for Tā̆nuwa choked me dreadfully. I don't even dare lift my arms, I would have to cry out in pain!" A third man complains: "What can I say, I feel so crushed? Tā̆nuwa has broken all my bones. I am only slowly getting better!" With these words he indicates the healing and recovery that Lēxakīpa will bring about. Others among the men complain in similar fashion, but let a ray of hope for speedy recovery break through. Everyone says something in a weak voice, suitable to his "condition." That is enough, however, and the uśwā̆ala hear every word. After a few minutes the men break into a loud hohū, hohū... They pause for a few seconds and repeat this cry more forcefully. Soon after that they bawl out their hoihōhū... loud and long. This is meant to announce that in their great need Lēxakīpa has finally hastened to them and that, at her approach, Tā̆nuwa has fled from the Great Hut, that Lēxakīpa has brought all the men back to life and quickly healed them.

X 575 They finally all get up, arrange themselves in a row, one behind the other, and, in a stooped position and with short steps, they go over to the camp. In a monotone and with a well-defined rhythm they constantly repeat sakamakasá... They go close to the huts so that every woman can see their bleeding faces and their pitiful expressions. After completing the circuit of the huts they again disappear into the Great Hut. Then without making a sound but in very explicit pantomime they give full expression to their satisfaction over the successful prank. It is not until later that one of the men finally removes the blindfolds from the ušwā̄ala. The latter are still trembling in fear of Tā̄nuwa and believe that he and Lē̄xakīpa have actually appeared. Obviously the purpose is to frighten first the candidates and second the women with Tā̄nuwa, in order to fill everyone with fear and respect fot the Kina secret. /1366/ Thus a person who is in the Great Hut for the first time as an ušwā̄ala does not learn the true nature of Tā̄nuwa; this is revealed to him only when he participates later at another ceremony. This spirit is never portrayed in any kind of mask. BD:421 says of Tā̄nuwa, "a being personified in the ceena drama, was supposed to come up out of the earth, he was an old man and did not come forth and leap about but lay still in the ceena and beat the earth and brayed" /cited in English/.

[776] Čīníku, who is also a man-murdering spirit, is more malevolent than Tā̄nuwa. He comes down from heaven to attend a Čīníku-yā̄ka; the men announce his arrival with very frightened hóho calls. He likes best to murder the men and drag them away, just as a hunter kills sea lions and loads them up. This spirit is painted red all over, with a few white spots the size of the palm of one's hand. His head is covered with a loosely hanging piece of leather painted white. His son is decked out in the same way. He scarcely steps inside the circle of men when they set up a frightened howling and desperate screaming. One after another yells as though he were being murdered and then falls completely silent. Čīníku now rolls all these men to the hut entrance where they lie in a confused heap without moving; they have been "murdered" by him! He pushes the last few men farther away from the hut entrance. The women watch his fit of rage against

X575 them all from the vantage point of the camp. He has leaned several harpoons against one of the entrance posts so that they are visible from afar; the women are supposed to believe that Čīníku has murdered all the men with these weapons. Before-[824] hand a long, thin stalk of Macrocystis alga smeared with blood had been fastened to one of the harpoons. Now Čīníku himself steps out, looks at the man lying farthest to one side, and screams: "It seems to me this man is not yet dead. So I shall finish him off with the harpoon!" He reaches for the harpoon just mentioned and throws it at the man. He pretends to be using a lot of force, but he aims close by, hurls the weapon, and almost simultaneously runs after it in order to cover his deceptive action. He quickly unfastens the alga stalk and pulls it up in such a way that the spectators at a distance have the impression he is pulling the man's entrails out of his belly. Frightened and horrified, the women cry out, shouting to Čīníku: "Do you think you have a sea lion in front of you? You villainous murderer, how can you murder our husbands so brutally! Get away from here at last and release us!" Angrily Čīníku seizes the man and pretends that he wants to drag him into the Great Hut. At the same moment, as though by chance -- this had been prearranged without the women's knowledge -- a yékamuš steps out of one of the dwellings and conspicuously takes a few steps in the direction of the Great Hut. Čīníku notices him and hastily disappears inside. /1367/ The performer has now concluded his role; he sits down beside the fire and rests. The circle of men is pleased with the successful hoax.

After a very brief pause the so-called son of Čīníku appears before all the women, decked out exactly like his alleged father. The man chosen for this role is somewhat shorter than the one who portrayed the first Čīníku. He merely leaps back and forth along the dance course three times, then disappears. This happens because meanwhile the yékamuš has arrived at the Great Hut. He circles several times around the heap of men who are still lying there motionless, makes sweeping motions with his arms, and is very active until all the men have been brought back to life and get up again. They drag themselves into the Great Hut as though they had lost their strength. All the women, who up

[575] to now have been standing in front of their huts watching, hasten back in, overjoyed. Each one draws a white line, a handbreadth wide, from her neck to her navel and a red line, the width of a finger, from the corners of her mouth to her ear lobes. Inside the Great Hut the yékamuš paints his whole body red, and over this he paints a few large white dots and a white line the width of a hand from his neck to his navel. Again he steps out of the Great Hut and all the men he has brought back to life follow him. The women hasten toward them from the dwellings. In accordance with instructions from the yékamuš, the men crowd together and [535] the women form a ring around them. Immediately this ring around the men begins to move in a rhythm which the men accompany by stamping and rapidly and continuously repeating šikušúli in a monotone. The women enjoy themselves in this way for some time; they want to announce their happiness over the fact that their men have been given back to them. At a signal from the yékamuš the two groups disperse and separate (307).

[171] 307. This performance shows a great deal of similarity to the appearance of Kataix in the Kloketen; he, too, takes great pleasure in torturing and murdering the men (Vol. I, 960).

BD:135 gives činūgū, "painted all over with spots and bands of white, danced about naked and in frantic manner, and was supposed to come up through the earth and pretended to kill the man in the Ceena" /cited in English/.

The performance of Yamāalakemana is disquieting and exciting for the women. This spirit was and is a dangerous murderer. He is not visible to the women in the camp; instead he rages about among the men and the women can plainly hear it. There are no special preparations necessary for this performance. The leader simply stands beside the hut entrance once, and in a voice filled with fear, he calls over to the camp: "We are faced with something terrible; a dangerous spirit has just announced himself! Woe to us defenseless men!" The latter immediately commence a pitiful howling. The women show outward signs of pity and sympathy. Then for several seconds there is deep silence in the Great Hut. One of the men rolls up a large, stiff piece of leather; another cleans a spot on the ground that has been stamped down. /1368/ The first man lifts his arm in a wide sweep and strikes down hard. One of the participants cries agá in a terribly loud voice, as though he had been mortally wounded by this blow, and lets his voice slowly fade away as though he were dying. After a pause there is a second blow; again a man cries out and lets his cry trail off in the same way. This goes on until all the men, including the candidates, "have been killed by the spirit." The women know how many men are assembled in the Great Hut and pay careful attention to the number of death cries. None of the men disguises his voice in order that the members of his family will recognize him. During the next few minutes nothing stirs in the Great Hut, "for they are all dead." At a signal from the leader two or three men commence a joyous, rapid, high-pitched lalala...which is supposed to announce the approach of their deliverer Lẹ́xakīpa. A few minutes later all the men utter a loud, high-pitched, jubilant xā. This is to announce that they have been restored to life by Lẹ́xakīpa. Now, however, they also want to prove to the women what tortures they have suffered. One or two of them will poke around in his nose with a small pointed stick until blood flows. He not only smears this on his own face, but willingly gives some to other men. With these "proofs" of mistreatment by Yamā̀alakẹmana each appears before the members of his family, who look at him sympathetically and silently pity him. When after an hour or two the men have again assembled in their Kina hut, they are immensely pleased over their successful performance.

Similar to the spirit that has just been described is Kōyutulā̀ikīpa, a murderess. She visits the Great Hut twice at the most during the Kina festival and "murders" the men just as Yamā̀alakẹmana does. The leader announces her arrival in a loud voice. After this appearance, too, all the men show themselves to their families in the camp with blood on their faces.

X575 776 302 Besides Lẹ́xakīpa, who is superior to all the spirits, the Yamana also mention a few subordinate guardian spirits who are well disposed toward the assembled men and helpful to them in all kinds of situations. In the final analysis each spirit is more or less kindly disposed toward all those who have assembled in the Kina hut. Kínamiāma chiefly sees to it that no woman approaches the Great Hut or does any kind of damage. He is presented soon after the beginning of the festival. He can be recognized by the many red and black transverse lines, the width of two fingers and separated by spaces equally wide, which are drawn on a white background and run from the tip of the mask to the knees. All the spirits have their shanks and feet painted uniformly white, no matter what name or characteristics they have.

Tulē̃ᵃa-yā́ka. This good-natured guardian spirit also appears at the very beginning of the festival. On the right and left side he wears two vertical stripes a handbreadth wide upon a white background. Apparently this identification is connected with tulē̃ᵃatē̃čix, the name for the small Centrites niger.

/1369/ Tukā́čí-yā́ka is likewise a benign helper and protector of the men. The man who portrays him paints several vertical rows of red dots set close together on a white background all over his body.

Kīnaiagēllum. It is said of this spirit that he takes extraordinary pleasure in sitting with the men in the Kina hut. That is the only reason he comes down from heaven. The man who portrays him first rubs his body with red color; from his neck to his genitals there is a white stripe the width of three fingers, from which three transverse stripes originate. There are four white rings on either arm. BD:165 also briefly mentions kīnaiagōllum without giving any explanation.

Ulamiēaka, the performance of the forest spirit. This spirit is regarded as having an especially close connection with the Kina. He is portrayed with a red body painting upon which are drawn a few vertical white lines leading down from the shoulders. BD:88 says of ūlōmīna, "he was a man disguised by paint and a conical bark hat who acted the part of a lustful spirit in the presence of women whom he went to meet and speak to" /cited in English/.

Wongoalē̃aka, the performance of the sea spirit. He is shown with elaborate painting. On a white background many small red semicircles are drawn close together to represent fish scales. This spirit is shaped like a fish, is the "son" of a whale, and appears as such, usually accompanied by two men painted in the same way. The Yamana say that he is well disposed toward human beings. It is said that sometimes he emerges from the depths beside a canoe and shows himself to the occupants; his head and torso are as beautiful as those of a mature girl; in place of legs he has the hind parts of a large fish, and around his forehead there is a thick wreath of beech twigs. One can be sure of recognizing him by this sign. Once, adorned only with this wreath of twigs, he left the Great Hut and, in the company of two young men who were unpainted, he went over to the camp. His arrival had been announced to the women by loud cries. Because there was a shortage of red pigment, he was supposed to fetch new supplies. Sure enough, every woman placed a small bag of ĭmi outside her hut. The spirit passed along the huts, quietly and without saying a word, took each packet, gave it to his companions, and hastened back to the men's hut with the abundant presents (308).

308. This description reminds one of the performance of Haše in the Kloketen of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 926). He, too, visits the dwellings and gathers red pigment for the "spirits" in the Great Hut.

Mēʼarāka is likewise a spirit who is kindly disposed toward the assemblage of men. On a white background he wears several vertical black dots the size of the palm of a hand which are distributed over his whole torso.

Yagáruwa-yāka, the performance of the spirit of the high seas. The performer's body is painted white and has only three evenly distributed vertical red stripes the width of a hand.

Hāni-yāka, the performance of the northern sky. This spirit, too, is a helper of the /1370/ men in the Kina hut. He supports them, above all, in singing and constantly gives them new strength. The performer paints his whole body, as well as the mask, uniformly white, adding seven black transverse lines as wide as a finger to the mask. BD:270 says: "hāniaka, a play enacted in the ceena drama accompanied with painting, singing, and acting in supposed imitation of the N. wind" /cited in English/.

Asgpakālaka, the performance of the southern sky. The painting for this is elaborate. The mask and the body are rubbed with white pigment. In addition the mask has seven black transverse lines as wide as a finger; the torso and arms have eight of these lines, and the legs, six. In each of the areas thus formed a red transverse line is added.

X 575 776 302 825

Haływāpisa-yāka, the performance of the mighty blue whale (Balaenoptera intermedia). Powdered chalk mixed with blubber is rubbed on the body of the performer in vertical lines, the width of a finger, drawn close together and beginning at the peak of the mask. BD:269 writes "hāsūāpisa-iaka, a certain play in the ceena drama imitative of whales" /cited in English/.

Sauyānux-yāka, the performance of the short-beaked dolphin (Lagenorhynchus fitzroyi). The front part of the body and the center of the mask are covered with a vertical white stripe about 20 centimeters wide, on either side of which black color is applied.

Kixinteka-yāka, the performance of the gray gerfalcon (Circus cinereus). The performer paints his body and his mask white, and upon this background he distributes irregular black dots.

Akimagāja-yāka, the performance of the falcon (Ibycter australis). The dancer paints his body white and applies a red line the width of three fingers from the peak of the mask across his chest to the genitals and another line around his body at the height of his navel.

Kilaxīla-yāka, the performance of the buzzard (Buteo poliosomus). Dry īmi powder is first rubbed over the entire body, and a few black dots are applied over it with the tip of the index finger.

Lūrux-yāka, the performance of the gray-headed goose (Cloephaga poliocephala). The body of the performer from the armpits down is completely white, having been rubbed with powdered chalk. Above the armpits, and including the mask, it is rubbed with īmi powder and is light red.

Kīmga-yāka, the performance of the Magellan goose (Chloephaga picta). The entire body is painted red, and large white dots are painted on the chest (309).

309. The Molinas goose (Chloephaga hybrida

/help goose/), which is related to the two species above, is not portrayed. The Yamana say that it was already present at the time of the general upheaval, as it is to this day.

Alaiuł-yā́ka, the performance of the steamer duck (Tachyeres brachypterus). The entire body and the mask are painted with white pigment. The nose and mouth are painted on the mask with red pigment. A black line as wide as three fingers is painted in a shallow arc from one shoulder to the other across the chest. /1371/

Wémar-kipa-yā́ka, the performance of the small gull (Larus glaucodes). The performer paints his body and the mask white and applies short, fine, horizontal red lines all over it.

Tox̌wiśiwa-yā́ka, the performance of the diving petrel (Puffinus griseus /sooty shearwater/). It suffices to paint the entire body uniformly black, an exact imitation of the natural coloring of this bird.

Wilaułéaka, the performance of the brown gull-teaser wilaułła (Megalestris skua chilensis). To portray this spirit the men paint their bodies and masks white. They draw six evenly spaced rows of short red lines from the upper part to the ankles. The mask is painted differently. On a white background four red stripes two fingers wide are drawn from the peak of the mask to the lower edge, and white transverse lines the width of a thumb are put in each stripe at close intervals.

Gérāpu-yā́ka, the performance of the white albatross (Diomedea exulans, Fig. 88). For this performance mask and body are painted with powdered chalk mixed with water; the former, in the region of the nose, has a vertical red line as long as a finger. BD:246 writes "gérāpll čis, the initiatory rite of the ceena drama" /cited in English/. -- The gérāpu-lóima-yā́ka is peculiar. The men and the candidates paint their faces all white. A thin little stick which is slightly springy stretches from each corner of the mouth to the upper eyelid, so that the face is horribly distorted. They all squat close together at the low entrance, as though to barricade it. The uwāła are in the center of the group. Each of them holds a bow and a quiver in his hand. These articles must be specially made, but are not carefully worked because they are not meant for use in hunting. With his front teeth each man holds a yĕkuł, that is, an arrowhead or spear point; in his hands he holds an unfinished basket on which he is working. When the group is assembled in this manner, one of the men summons the women and children. They may come up to within a few steps and silently look over the group. Neither words nor looks are exchanged, the men steadfastly keeping their eyes on the ground. After a few minutes the women are sent back again. The Yamana of the south and west have the same performance, but with the following variation. The men and the candidates paint their faces white and draw a black line the width of a finger from the outer corner of each eye to the ears. They all have a yĕkuł between their teeth and in addition hold in their hands a drawn bow and an arrow which they aim at the women who are standing outside in front of the entrance. This pantomime also goes on in complete silence and lasts only a few minutes. No one was able to tell me its meaning.

Katāmux-yāka, the performance of the sea dove (Daption capensis). The performer paints his body and mask completely white and then adds many black dots with his index finger. This is precisely the way this marine bird is marked.

/1372/ Taperōla-yāka, the performance of the small diver (Podiceps calipareus). This bird, the size of a pigeon, has brownish-black feathers and a white tail. The person who portrays him as a spirit rubs a piece of dry charcoal all over his body, including his mask, and draws a white line, the width of a hand, from the navel to the genitals.

Yĕšex-yāka, the performance of the black cormorant (Phalacrocorax atriceps). The performer wears no mask. He rubs charcoal dust mixed with a little blubber all over his body. He paints his chest, the hairy part of his head, and his cheeks white and holds his arms as though he were supporting a mask. According to BD:274, hauwurł means "the black shag" /cited in English/ and this performance. Compare Figure 58 on page 233.

Wāsénim-yāka, the performance of the hooded cormorant (Phalacrocorax gaimardi). The person who portrays this spirit wears a mask that is painted white. He rubs his body with dry charcoal dust and draws a very wide white stripe from his neck to his genitals.

Ubwiler-yāka, the performance of the oyster catcher (Haematopus ater). A red line, the width of two fingers, runs from the peak of the mask down the center. The whole body is white, with a black arc the width of a hand running across the chest from one shoulder to the other. BD 117 also mentions this performance. Compare Figure 76 on page 825.

Sūrīa-yāka, the performance of the spectacled penguin (Spheniscus magellanicus). The performer paints his chest and belly white, the rest of his body, black. There is a wide black arc above each of the eye-holes of the white mask. BD 160 gives ussa-lama.

Hājmus-yāka, the performance of the robalo (Eleginus maclovinus). A few vertical white lines from the neck over the chest and belly, as well as a few vertical black lines beginning at the armpits, suffice to portray this spirit. BD 261 also mentions haimus-yaka.

Sūna-yāka, the performance of the porcupine fish. On the uniformly white mask a red transverse line, the width of a finger, is painted at the level of the mouth. Many red semicircles are placed close together all over the body of the performer to represent fish scales. This design is very effective (310).

> 310. It is well known that, according to the legend, the child whose father was a sea lion and whose mother was the sister of the Yoalox brothers turned into this fish (p. 1149).

Ilēčī-yāka, the performance of the herring (Clupea pectinata). The mask and the entire body are painted uniformly white. On either side of the body a black line as wide as a hand runs from the armpits to the ankles.

Imakaj-yāka, the performance of the sea trout (Atherinichthys). The dancer draws many vertical white lines as wide as a finger and as long as a thumb irregularly all over his body and his mask.

Kalampāia-yāka, the performance of the fish Kalampāia. This fish has a broad head and its body tapers evenly from the head to the tail fin. The performer characterizes this spirit by means of small red semicircles over his entire body which he first painted white. His white mask /1373/ has a red transverse line, the width of three fingers, in the region of the mouth. Now and then this spirit orders the men either to step out of the Great Hut in single file, or, in the so-called Kalomplia-mino, as individuals, to see how the women are conducting themselves in their dwellings. BD:178 also lists kilaplia-iaka.

Jepfiuf-yika, the performance of the little redfish. The performer must paint a great number of fine, vertical, finger-length red lines close together and on top of one another all over his body. The mask is white.

Hikufkalila-yika, the performance of the jellyfish (Medusa). This also requires fine, vertical red lines about three centimeters long all over the body and the mask, but not in so great a number as in the preceding performance.

Hika-yika, the performance of the small cuttlefish (octopus). The person who represents this spirit, sometimes also called Finiko, rubs dry imi powder on his body and hangs a square piece of leather similarly colored loosely over his head in place of the painted mask.

Yikilif-yika, the performance of the calamary (Loligo subulata). The dancer smears his whole body and the mask uniformly red. It is well known that Yikilifkiga escaped when the men starved the Kina hut. The painting just described is like the one that the were at that time and which she still displays on her diminutive figure (p. 1247).

Kinjuf-yika, the performance of the bluebottle fly. The person who presents this spirit to the women paints his body and mask black all over this irregularly distributes many white dots with his index finger. According to BD:165, kinjin also means wasp and bee.

In the east the so-called wengka-yika was performed. Several men step out of the Kina hut as a group without any kind of painting. Each one carries a stick that is pointed at the lower end and a meter long. At some distance from the Great Hut the men move close together, form a circle, and drive the stick into the ground several times. They poke around like this for a few minutes without looking up and without saying a word. Then they silently go back again. No one could tell me the meaning of this performance. BD:625 gives wiggus-gimata, "to dig, hollow" /cited in English/.

The Hamatsa performance has historical value, so to speak. While the men are preparing for it, the leader gives a signal and there begins an unvarying, constantly repeated hôpu, hôpu... on the same pitch and with sharp emphasis. The force and tempo of this call slowly increases in order to attract the attention of the women in the camp. Meanwhile the participants paint their bodies white. A red arc as wide as a finger is drawn across the forehead, with its ends pointing downward. Then, dancing loudly, the men arrange themselves one behind the other. They squat down so far that they support themselves with both fists and their buttocks almost touch the ground. They can move forward only in short steps. When the first men in this column are just visible, a few older /1974/ women hasten to the field and swab the men. The latter keep their squatting position, but form a closed circle. The women approach and walk along the outside of the circle. They gently slap each man with a piece of leather or with the hand, and the man immediately falls over as though he had been killed. The women hastily depart. Not until after about ten minutes, during which no one in the camp stirs, the men cautiously get up and, deeply bent over and one behind the other, go back to the Great Hut without a sound. They quietly wash off their painting and in an undertone converse very gaily, for, after all, they have not been killed and have not been murdered by the women. Hamatsa is the spirit of the far west, tsêxa (Corvus caurinus). At the time of the great struggle in Tlôqêlqu he moved in the same clumsy way he does today, and many women fell upon him in order to kill him. That is exactly what happens now in this performance (311).

311. This scene is almost exactly like the Hamatsa scene in the Kloketen of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 99). BD:302 also speaks of this performance "before the women and children as spectators" /cited in English/.

All the plays listed here, which I experienced personally, do not exhaust the long list. BD mentions many additional ones. For example, BD:170, hôlîlgwâka, the performance of the sea gull kiwlga (Larus dominicanus). BD:413, tlhalaiska, the performance of the loud tlhala (Larus belcheri /a gull/); BD:112, tlhalaiska, the performance of the whale ellgla (Pseudorca crassidens); finally, BD:383, haiyelga, BD:277, lamtlhaiska, the performance of the whale, BD:276; laiahklipa, add BD:247, ghanna, or "tlelhwa's son, one of opening scenes and characters in the kenna drama" /cited in English/. BD also mentions a few more performances. In any case, see the explanations of ellgl in BD:212.

In conclusion the so-called kina-tlagwlja, the death rite, should be specifically mentioned. Now and then it happens that in the course of this men's festival one of the participants or one of their relatives dies. Then one evening the participants assembled in the Great Hut put on an actual tlagwlja for only themselves. The men adorn themselves with the body painting customary for this occasion (p. 1081), depending on the degree of their relationship to the deceased. This is not enough, however. An influential yahamuf appoints a man, preferably the leader, to paint himself in a special way. In March, 1932, Malemikens, who was then the leader of the Kina, volunteered to do this himself. The entire body is painted white and over this are painted four black stripes the width of a hand, beginning in the center of each collar bone and in each armpit and extending to the knee. These stripes, but narrower, are continued on the white mask up to its point. The performer dances out of the Great Hut just like any one of the many other "spirits" and moves back and forth several times on the dance course. The people in the camp immediately recognize him /1375/ by his painting. On the evening of a tlagwlja the men remain very quiet and appear to be sad out of sincere sympathy. The Tamana have no proper name for the spirit portrayed in this manner. It would not be correct to call him the ellgla of the deceased person who is being mourned. The whole performance is meant to be reminiscent of his departure and of the sorrowful participation of the survivors.

The Tamana emphatically assured me that there is no portrayal in the Kina of the spirits of those animals that were already living here as actual animals at the time of the great upheaval.

particularly the many small birds. The specific painting with which every spirit appears adds a certain variety to the course of the Kina festival, but after a time the monotonous dance movements become noticeably boring to the women and also somewhat to the men. The arbitrary decision of the leader and the general mood of the participants determine the number of spirits and the sequence of their appearance on each evening. In view of this, one Kina festival is sometimes very different from another, and this provides a change.

d. End of the Festival

X575 Obviously it is the environment, especially the urgency of matters of subsistence, which forces the participants to terminate a Kina festival. Here, too, the decisive factor is that same play of forces that leads to the termination of a youth initiation (p.832). The most important of these would be lack of food, flooding of the campsite, insufficient firewood, the illness of a number of persons, or a death.

Even if these unforeseen and yet decisive circumstances were not taken into account, at practically every Kina the attention of the dancers and spectators begins to lag after only a few days. The men must stimulate and renew the interest of all the participants in the affair. If all their efforts fail, boredom is clearly written on the faces of all those present. From the start, the women do not welcome the Kina. For their part they certainly make no effort to prolong it. For a time, however, the men feel quite content in their closed group, especially if there are many of them and the individual members take an active part. Thus they are unaware of the threatening and unavoidable monotony of each passing day. The Yamana are much too restless by nature to /1376/ bear unvarying monotony for very long, and the many spirit appearances certainly do not offer enough

X575 variety to refresh them and arouse them to great enthusiasm. In the final analysis, of course, the deceptive performances of the masked men lack any urgent necessity. When their curiosity, which is sometimes extreme, and their fun in deceiving the women by supposed spirit appearances are satisfied, further performances do not hold enough enjoyment for them to counteract their slowly mounting boredom and the weariness caused by the same repetitions. In that case quite unimportant external reasons bring about the desire to terminate the Kina festival and there is not the slightest inner resistance on the part of any of the participants. I was assured that the men were usually content with two or three weeks, but they have stayed together a shorter or longer time according to whether they felt so disposed or were obliged to separate for some reason.

Each time, however, the leader discusses the matter with the older men, and if all more or less agree he chooses the same evening or the next evening for the so-called Makāinkīna, the formal closing scene. The younger men, of course, yield; the ušwāala are particularly pleased to be freed from their unnatural position. The purpose of this final ceremony is to drive away all melevolent spirits from the Kina hut and its vicinity. All the [302] men paint only their faces with a simple decoration, a white transverse line as wide as a finger, which starts below the septum of the nose and extends to each ear lobe. To this is added either a red line along the entire bridge of the nose or a varying number of fine red lines between the lower eyelid and the above-mentioned white transverse line. Each man winds his apawē̄ra around his forehead. Thus adorned, all the men form a closed circle around the hut fire. The leader or an influential yēkamuš [293] holds a stick -- similar to the dance staff used in the čiēxaus (p. 694) -- the upper third of which is painted white. He holds the stick vertically, like a baton, in his right hand with his arm outstretched. When he lifts it, all the men break into a wild hit hit... which they repeat for two or three minutes. Suddenly they cease and immediately add sharp, shrill š sounds which are followed by croaking cries of te te... in quick succession. Meanwhile each man again and again stretches out both his arms, his open palms forward, in unmistakable warding-off motions. After a time the cries revert to the initial hit hit... and continue in the manner described above, but much louder and more excited. The men go on like this for about half an hour and conclude with a very loud pū. Immediately each of them seizes a club which is at least a meter long, strikes the ground passionately with it, and at the same time stamps hard with both feet.

/1377/ This noise and stamping have not yet ceased when the whole group moves out of the Kina hut in one long row to the free space in front of it. The leader heads the row, followed by the yěkamuš, the older and younger men, and finally the uš̌wā̱ala. As they go out, each one seizes a club that is scarcely one and a half meters long. As soon as the first men in this row become visible, the loud hit hit... begins again, followed by the shrill ṣ sounds and the croaking te te... cries. All this goes on amid very excited warding-off motions, with each man swinging his club threateningly in the air. Remarkably enough, this raging and storming are at first very emphatically directed toward the north, signifying that all the malevolent spirits should if possible be forced back and driven in a northerly direction. Whereas up to this point the men stood next to each other facing north, they now, in conclusion, crowd together to form a closed circle. They hit the ground vigorously with their clubs and stamp hard with rapid movements of both feet. In due time the women and children also form a tight group in front of the camp, approximately opposite the men whom they accompany with loud cries and a wild beating-about with their arms. Their warding-off motions are also directed toward the north. The circle of men breaks up and forms a long row facing north. They all utter a very loud pū and accompany it with a vigorous outward thrust of both arms. The men do not stop to rest, but turn in the row in such a way that the leader, as an end man, slowly makes a half turn to the right on the same spot, which each man, to the very last in the row, follows exactly. Now this long row faces east. Again the cries and warding-off motions begin as before, this time toward the east. All this, too, ceases with heavy stamping after about twenty minutes. Then the men drop their clubs, bend their heads low, and utter a howling hū against the earth. At the same time they thrust their outstretched hands

X575 downward a few times as though they wanted to press all the spirits into the earth. This concludes their warding off of the spirits, and they return to the Great Hut in no particular order.

They enter singly, first the leader, then one after the other, and finally the uǰwāala. They all stand in the middle in a crowded circle. The wild hit hit...cries, the shrill ǰ ǰ... sounds, and finally the croaking te te...are repeated with a gesture that resembles blind fury, and this is concluded with a stamping on the ground amid the loudest hō hō...cries. As though in fits of frenzy, each man places both flattened hands against his head and, with light pressure, lets them slide down along the sides of his body. Once again he places both hands on his head and makes a loud crack by snapping his tensed fingers. /1378/ Immediately he shakes his head violently in a sideways motion and utters a sustained, shrill ǰ. Finally the men end their contortions with a madly furious brandishing of their arms, for "now the spirits have been driven away." Everyone, completely exhausted, washes off his body painting and rests for a few minutes. A normal conversation does not begin again. Each one looks around for his things, quickly gathers them together, and silently leaves. He goes straight to his dwelling in which he inconspicuously disappears. The Kina hut becomes empty in a few minutes. The leader is the last to leave; he has had the masks destroyed in the fire and every suspicious sign removed, so that nothing is left to reveal to the women and children the deceptive performances of the men.

After that no one visits the Kina hut. From then on it is exposed to the disintegrating influences of natural forces. A day or two after the Makāinkīna most of the families are already preparing to leave, and soon the whole camp breaks up. The return to the daily routine means a release and liberation from the oppressive bonds of the program of the men's festival for all the families. No one says a word about what has gone on during the preceding days and weeks; each family is again content in its familiar occupations and its complete detachment from others. There is not a single sign among these people to indicate that they have just performed and experienced a Kina celebration. Only the uǰwāala have gained something worth mentioning, since

X575 they are now full-fledged members of the men's group. From now on they will have free access to every Kina festival, and those details which up to now have remained unexplained or undisclosed will be presented openly before them on the next occasion.

In March, 1922, the Kina was held for the last time among the Yamana. The men who took part crowded it all into a few days, but nevertheless displayed the rich variety of this festival. Although up to that time it was not known in detail among Europeans, it was, thanks to a kind fate, rescued from total oblivion by this final repetition on my third journey.

e. Significance for Culture History

X575 196 The entire Kina arrangement must be briefly characterized with respect to its place in the general social order of the Yamana. On the whole, but also on account of many details, it strikes one as strange; its peculiar significance is unmistakably obvious. This is confirmed by the very word kína, for whose original meaning I did not find a satisfactory explanation. /1379/ In BD:165 it is equated with "flock, troop, herd" /cited in English/, as well as with "wigwam built apart and of logs always for superstitious purposes" /cited in English/, in fact, even with "to burn, flame up, kindle, to be burning up as a fire to catch" /cited in English/. One asks himself, how can the same word at one time mean "herd, troop, flock" and at another time, as a verb, "to burn, flame up..."? Even if one concedes that the fire is always burning in the Great Hut or that the meaning of "wigwam" /cited in English/ could be related to "grouped together" /cited in English/, nevertheless "hut, flock, burn" cannot be the same. A comparison of the other expressions relating to the Kina that are given in BD makes it easy to believe that Bridges consciously put the "superstitious purposes" /cited in English/ into the foreground. This judgment is correct insofar as the many Kina spirits actually do live in the belief and imagination of the Yamana. The Kina does originate in the realm of myth and fantasy, and its origin is told in the so-called myth of the upheaval (p. 1237).

X575 The narrative of this myth about the origin of the secret ceremony has been handed down as the conviction of the men from one generation to the next. The Yamana attach the same value to the events related in it as they do to the content of any one of their many myths, and they gather together to celebrate the Kina believing that they are obliged to do so. This obligation arises less from the fear that the women might once again reverse the present social order than from their respect for a traditional custom. It is only because the preceding generation now and then gathered in the Great Hut and acquainted the young men as ušwǯala with their secret doings that the present generation does likewise. A serious or even threatening obligation arising from the basic ideas of this deceptive affair has certainly never driven the men into the Kina hut.

The opinion of the women moves along the same line of unequivocal thinking characteristic of the Yamana. One need only ask how they themselves feel about the Kina in general and to what extent they are familiar with its basic ideas. The terse answer is that the women without doubt are more or less definitely informed about the deceptive performance of the men, but that at the same time they cling to their firm faith in the existence and activity of the spirits that are mentioned or that appear. In particular it cannot be determined which of the two opinions predominates in this or that person and whether there is any kind of common evaluation of the many different details, for the women never exchange detailed opinions among themselves. Many of them probably know that the spirits mentioned so often neither enter the Great Hut nor sit among the group of men gathered there, but they never talk about it specifically.

The following story is told among the women. Once a /1380/ woman spoke in a disdainfully mocking way about her husband because, as she said, he was ugly and crippled, his appearance was all wrong, and he had a bad gait. The man's relatives were annoyed at this and finally told the man about his wife's disapproving opinions. He quickly decided on revenge. He proposed to his relatives and friends that they prepare for a Kina, in the course of which he would intimidate and frighten his wife. Sure enough, many men soon assembled for the secret

X575 festival. The woman was very crafty, however; she soon noticed that this time the men were plotting against her. She did not hesitate to defend herself. In the dead of night she painted her whole body exactly the way she assumed that the men inside the Great Hut would be painted, and, unnoticed, she crept up on them. The men were sitting crowded around the fire, their heads bent very low in serious meditation. Very softly she slipped in on one side of the entrance, quickly crept along behind all the men and in passing drew a line on the back of each of them, and disappeared again on the other side of the exit. In the camp she told all the women that she had put an identical mark on the back of each man by means of which the women could see that only their husbands were sitting in the Kina hut, not spirits. Sure enough, when the men stepped out, each bore the line drawn on his back. Since then all the women have known the true state of affairs.

It must be admitted that probably all the women actually recognize their own husbands in their roles as individual spirits, but nevertheless their faith in these spirits is unshakable. A European observer can hardly explain how their knowledge and their faith can be reconciled. Since all the women and children are convinced that the men are in communication with the Kina spirits, they naturally acknowledge and obey all the instructions of the men as commands of the spirits. They are decisively guided in this judgment and attitude by the example of former generations, for the living generation regards every general view and custom handed down from the preceding one as immutable law. It is precisely for this reason that no woman would dare alter her conduct in any way during a Kina celebration (313).

> 313. The faith of the Selk'nam women in the Kloketen spirits is deeper and more certain (Vol. I, 901), but for them, too, the duty to conform to traditional rules of behavior is of decisive importance.

X575 756 In judging the basic ideas upon which this men's secret ceremony rests, it is important to keep in mind the active participation of the yékamuř. One of them, as a rule, takes over not only

X575 the leadership of the entire Kina, but also, nearly always, the 756 duty of calling each of the spirits out of the Great Hut with the customary arm movement. /1381/ In all the deliberations and decisions of the men the yékamuš have the decisive voice (314).

314. It is exactly the same in the Kolketen. -- A detailed comparison of the men's festivals among the Selk'nam and the Yamana may be omitted here, since this has already been done by Gusinde (q):291, with the secret ceremony of the Halakwulup also included. At first glance it is striking that among the Selk'nam the actual youth initiation and the characteristic celebration of the men are united in a single affair (Vol. 1, 1083).

They are regarded as closely associated with the spirits. It is only one of them, one who feels an urge to do so, who is permitted to perform the customary dance with one of the spirits outside the Great Hut. Again and again this or that yékamuš will approach a dancer or performer and give him renewed strength and firmness of limbs by means of his peculiar kind of magic massage. Among the Yamana there is no other sizeable group affair whose program, so to speak, is so entirely in the hands of the yékamuš as it is in the Kina.

X575 With all the curious peculiarities of the Kina, it must not be overlooked that candidates are almost always introduced and are subject to strict treatment. The chief purpose is to familiarize them with the origin myth; actual training is only secondary. Only those chaps who have shown serious defects of character or whose behavior leads one to fear bad consequences are subject to strict discipline and personal influence. Out of consideration for the general welfare, the older members of the tribe may not miss any opportunity to protect the individual and the group as a whole from harm and injury. The Kina festival is not required to fulfill the task of educating all the ušwáala.

Finally, if one regards the Kina in connection with the entire social order, it clearly seems to be a foreign body. Even if one is not inclined to attribute historical value to the origin myth, nevertheless the suggestion that the Kina is supposed to

X575 have been brought into the present homeland of the Yamana from the northernmost part of the Selk'nam territory demands some consideration. The prevailing form of household management with its division of labor within the family between husband and wife is so fortunate, sensible, and altogether natural that a reversal would obviously endanger the existence of the whole group. Not a single man seriously feels that there is any danger, for instance, of reversion to the original conditions described in the myth; nor would it enter a woman's head to reverse the state of affairs and shake off her truly not very oppressive subordination to the men, as it is vital to the permanence and well-being of the family. The activity of the men during their secret gathering does not even remotely indicate any urgently necessary resistance /1382/ against any kind of threat to their superior position on the part of the women. The women devote themselves to this performance with less seriousness and enthusiasm than do the men, and the attitude of both sexes cannot be compared to that which they display for the čiéxaus, for example. After all, this secret festival is not, as elsewhere, put on by a permanently active men's society, but every chap who has experienced the strict čiéxaus twice is lawfully admitted to it as often as it is held, first in the role of ušwąala, later as a full-fledged participant. For the men, all the restrictions of personal liberty imposed on the woman during the daily program and spirit appearances mean no more than an amusing farce at the women's expense, which they allow themselves after the long interval between one Kina and the next. Any serious hostility is completely foreign to them.

X575 776 Since, as has been said, the yékamuš have a prominent place in the Kina activities, there is no direct reference to the Supreme Being. This omission during such an elaborate affair is all the more striking since there are many even insignificant details in daily life which the Yamana link up with their Watąuinéjwa. Not a single one of the many so-called spirits is mentioned in any way outside this men's celebration; even less do they have any influence on the social life or the behavior of the individual, for they are merely those kéšpix which were in part portrayed by the women in former times or which belonged to the women who were at that time transformed into animals.

X 575 When the Kina is over, all their social life with its balanced harmony in the distribution of energy goes on as quietly and matter-of-factly as though no one knew anything about this performance, and no one feels that it is necessary to hold it again after a certain time.

There are several factors, therefore, that characterize the Kina as a foreign body in the total culture of the Yamana. It is true that they have made allowances for it now and then in their tribal life, but in such a way that the latter is not affected. The activity of the men in their secret gathering is not seriously meant as obvious hostility against the women, and besides it is at variance with the men's innermost nature. For this reason they justify their action by referring to the origin myth, although they do not remotely believe it possible that the women could rise up against the existing relations of the sexes. There are many indi-
[177] cations that the Yamana have derived their men's celebration from the Selk'nam. W. Schmidt (d):954 has pointed out an important feature of the Kina in a general evaluation of such performances when he says: "Probably nowhere else in the world is the character of this men's celebration as a reaction of the men against the matriarchal superiority of the women so clearly expressed in an absolutely classic way in the myth itself." Space is lacking for further comparisons.

/1383/ F. The Medicine-Man System

X 756 171 From the reports of missionaries and travelers it has long been known that the Yamana are not without persons who function basically in the same manner and for the same ends as the well-known medicine men among the North American Indians. In the Cape Horn region they are called yĕkamuš. Their field of activity is extensive; the individual and the people in general must reckon with the yĕkamuš and are dependent upon them. If one compares the medicine-man system of our Yamana with that of the neighboring Selk'nam (Vol. I, 717), he finds many points of agreement. The details need not be compared here. It will simply be pointed out that, by and large, the xon of the

X756 171 Selk'nam are believed to be far more powerful and more malevolent in their activities than are the full-fledged yékamuš of the Yamana. Whereas the body of thought of the medicine-man system among the Selk'nam is consistently worked out and elaborately developed, there are very often gaps in the train of ideas pertaining to the yékamuš. The Yamana, however, have a well organized medicine-man school which the Selk'nam have not achieved; it is well known that the primary goal of the latter's Pešére is not the training of young members of the calling (Vol. I, 787).

X756 It was often tiring to follow my informants in their involved lines of thought through the realm of yékamuš conceptions. [123] I was substantially helped by the extraordinary advantage of being permitted to attend the so-called lōima-yékamuš, a medicine-man school in the actual sense of the word. The many observations and explanations that I gathered on this subject in the course of my journeys follow in an arrangement for clarity. When I translate the designation yékamuš as "medicine man," I am by no means giving an exact and clear explanation or a definition. I am well aware that hitherto neither ethnology nor particularly ethnopsychology has attempted to draw a sharp line of distinction between the content of the terms: medicine man, sorcerer, witch doctor, magic priest, and shaman. The term "sorcerer" does not include a large part of the purely suggestive influence on ordinary people by the yékamuš, and neither "witch doctor" nor "shaman" indicates that the yékamuš is believed to have considerable influence upon natural forces. "Medicine man" is a term whose varied connotation is familiar from conditions in North America. Terms such as "doctor," "physician," and "healer" are either not very appropriate or wholly unsuitable for our purposes because each implies the conception of an activity directed against a physical ailment or against infirmities of the sick body. In contrast to this the yékamuš exerts his influence on the psychic life of the tribesmen, which is why he deserves far more to be called "physician of souls" (315) or "spiritual adviser." The following

315. An attempt to clarify these terms among the South American Indians according to definite principles was undertaken in Gusinde (kk):286. In the many references to the yekamus, the names constantly vary. Compare the source material assembled in Cooper: 159, as well as Bridges (i):18 and Outes (g):54.

account /1384/ justifies the translation of the word yékamuš which has been chosen here. Although for a number of decades the entire culture of the Yamana has yielded to steady, progressive deterioration, the medicine-man system continued to the time when I made my observations without surrendering its essential parts. I was still able to comprehend its characteristics fully. Even middle-aged men who, through much contact with Europeans, sometimes showed perfectly clear signs of something like "emancipation" from traditional views and customs remained firmly and unshakably firm about their conceptions of their yékamuš system.

a. Personality of the Medicine Man

The Yamana ascribe an extraordinary power to their yékamuš, a power which, under certain circumstances, is really used to the harm and detriment of a tribal member. Although the yékamuš work perhaps even more frequently to the advantage of their immediate neighborhood and render great services to many a person, nevertheless the attitude of the individual Fuegian toward the yékamuš is such as is dictated by respect and awe, mistrust and fear (316). More specifically, the people know little about the 316. The same situation exists among the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 718). This is mentioned only in passing, since detailed comparisons would be too long.

medicine men's method of operation or about their connection with the many spirits with whom they co-operate, to say nothing of the manner of their influence on natural forces which they purport to control. This supposition explains the feeling of

X756 uncertainty that everyone has in dealing with the yĕkamuš and the individual's fear which is sometimes extreme. The yĕkamuš are also said to be wholly different physically from the other members of the tribe, and this belief widens the gulf between them. In daily association the restraint of the people, inspired by their fear of the yĕkamuš, is almost never clearly recognizable, and the latter's activity is usually quite inconspicuous. Nevertheless, no one forgets that the medicine man, as a creature of a strange species, is to be carefully treated and most wisely avoided, because he has forces at his disposal and is equipped with capabilities which are denied the majority of Yamana and against which they are defenseless.

1. His Relation to the People

If one were to count all the natives of both sexes in the Cape Horn Archipelago who work in one way or another as yĕkamuš, either with their whole personality or /1385/ with less ability, even down to the ones who make bungling attempts, he would arrive at a considerable figure. A closer look reveals [887] that many an aged man more or less confidently regards himself as a medicine man (317), but this does not mean that each of them is fully accepted as such by the public and by his neighbors. The call to this office in younger years is an unavoidable condition. In BD:73 one finds the term ūaana, "a man who is not a

317. Bridges observed that "most of the older men are doctors, but very seldom a young man, unless he is particularly cunning and clever" /cited in English/ (VSA:XI, 258;1864). Later he (h):209 and (i):18 asserts more definitely: "Men over thirty or forty years of age usually entered the ranks of doctors or exorcists" /translated from Spanish/. Even a third time he (e):332 says briefly: "Almost every older man was a sorcerer." Cf. Hyades (q):256.

X756 yecamoosh" /cited in English/.

The yékamuš are not united in a group or society; rather, each one is independent and operates by himself. It is a general rule that each family group, that is, the combination of a few related families, has its own yékamuš. In this group, of course, he has a certain superiority. Such a distinction has no legal basis, but exists in fact. In this sense blood ties bind the yékamuš to his group for the time being. He profits by his greater age no less than by his rich experience and the many superior achievements which he has to his credit. His sphere of duty is extensive, and the family group with which he is connected expects all kinds of help from him. If he grants this willingly and successfully, his reputation steadily grows. Finally they all become so generally dependent upon him that he seems like a legally appointed person of authority (318), but it would be false to assume that the individual is to any extent hindered in his freedom of movement or in his independent way of life by the yékamuš. It is only occasionally that the medicine man acts in such a way that the tribal member who displeases him must give in or is forced in a direction contrary to his desires. In the main the yékamuš extends a great deal of help to his group and relatives in the exigencies and sorrows of everyday life. He, as well as those around him, sees this as the primary duty of his calling.

> 318. Fitz-Roy (a):211 accurately judged this state of affairs: "I never could distinctly ascertain whether the eldest man, or the doctor of a tribe had the most influence; but from what little I could learn, it appeared to me that the elder of a family or tribe had a sort of executive authority, while the doctor gave advice, not only in domestic affairs, but with respect to most transactions" /cited in English/.

X756 754 578 The benevolent influence of the yékamuš is cheerfully admitted, but beyond that he is definitely a cause of great

754 disturbances. This is chiefly true of one who is accused of hav-
578 ing caused the death of a beloved person or /1386/ a widespread sickness. For many people a yékamuš may cause almost constant fear and anxiety. They cannot even flee for safety because the yékamuš extend their influence over wide areas. The missionaries often complained about this. Burleigh, for example, wrote on October 29, 1893: "Death has removed from us one poor woman who gave us much trouble at Wollaston with her sorceries, and by causing the death of those she hated, and who went so far as to try her evil designs upon us because I reproved her and some others for their sins" /cited in English/ (MM:XXVIII, 57;1893). The anxiety of a family group may continue for a considerable time if several yékamuš fight each other in their own peculiar way.

X756 In spite of all this, the people place their entire confidence in the yékamuš at times of personal distress and general need. He must help them in case of serious illness, protect them against the threat of malevolent natural forces, lead an expedition of revenge, and defend each individual against all kinds of dangers which are part of everyday life. In general his activity is actually more beneficial and advantageous than harmful and detrimental to the individual and his group. For this reason a capable, helpful yékamuš is loved by his people; they appreciate and respect him, obey him and confide in him. If one yékamuš is more capable than another, there is even serious jealousy among the individual family groups. In general each family follows its guiding yékamuš, entrusts itself to his care, and defends him against others. From all this one can see how closely a yékamuš is associated with his immediate neighborhood.

X756 Although the natives themselves speak of women who act
462 as yékamuš, and many Europeans confirm this, such accounts must be qualified. Usually a woman does no more than accompany her husband in singing now and then, or silently and patiently sits beside him when he gives himself up to deepest concentration. I was often a witness to this. Old Emilia, who was married to middle-aged Manuel, and Sara, the wife of Mašemikens, were pointed out to me as yékamuš (319). Neither

319. Hyades (q):257 also writes: "Mr. Bridges adds that he happened to meet an old woman who is yakamouch" /translated from French/.

in former times nor today has a woman operated quite independently in this field or appeared in public with the feather ornament reserved for all full-fledged yékamuś. Some people, however, really believe that a woman whose attitude arouses suspicion is capable and evil enough to cause harm and sickness to come to her opponents, like the medicine men. The people suspect such a woman and call her a yékamuś only if she exerts such influences. She does not go beyond that. Thus her ability is nowhere near as extensive as that of a /1387/ full-fledged medicine man. In general these are isolated cases of aged women who are not well liked and are avoided by their neighbors on account of their unpleasant dispositions and disagreeable character. In view of this it is not strange that they are the very ones who are considered capable of working with secret powers and of maliciously inflicting some kind of harm on other people.

The Yamana without exception believe in the ability of their medicine men and are convinced of their power. This faith is most clearly demonstrated by everyone's attitude of awe and genuine fear toward the yékamuś, by the trust the individual shows when he approaches the yékamuś with his requests, and finally by the confidence with which the general public expects help from him for major and minor needs. In his extreme helplessness, many a Yamana has only the medicine man as a last resource. It is true that the people recognize greater or lesser ability in their yékamuś and they probably also deprecate the good reputation of one or another of them, making him out to be weak and incapable. Nevertheless everyone fears them, and a person must expect their revenge if they hear of his expressing disdainful opinions of them. Bridges repeatedly begged the Yamana: "Do not believe what your yékamuś say and do, for their deeds and their behavior are crafty deceptions! Do not believe the cunningly calculated nonsense that they use to trick you!" As a matter of fact, he expressed himself so scornfully about their effectiveness that it was bound to shock everyone, especially the medicine men. After biding their time, two of the insulted yékamuš decided to avenge the slander cast upon their calling, and said: "We shall have our revenge! Perhaps we shall succeed in inflicting real harm on that European (320)!"

320. They are here expressing doubt as to whether their ability can reach beyond their own countrymen and affect a European stranger.

Then each of them hurled a yékuš which supposedly hit Bridges and penetrated deep into his abdomen. From that time on Bridges was ill, and to the end of his life he complained of a severe abdominal ailment. All the Yamana are convinced that his illness was inflicted by those two yékamuš, named Kalasakun and Kalakein; they had met in Lapataia and from there they hurled their yékuš against Bridges who was living in Ushuaia. The people also told me: "The moment the two yékuš entered his belly he felt violent pain; he immediately realized the actual cause and cried: 'Ah, woe is me! I made fun of the yékamuš, that is why they have avenged themselves on me. Now I know that they have great power!' Although Bridges twice traveled far away [to Buenos Aires], he never got rid of that complaint. Those two yékamuš really wanted to make him feel their revenge for the rest of his life." This incident was repeated to me several times, /1388/ in order that I, too, should be convinced of the superior accomplishments and the successful operations of the yékamuš (321).

321. In February, 1878, Bridges (i):18 declared: "The natives, strange as it may seem, had great faith in these doctors' alleged powers and entertained some fear of them" /cited in English/. He himself is convincing counterevidence for the incorrectness of the following assertion: "But this state of things has long since passed away, there are no more doctors" /cited in English/. Bove (e): 158 depends altogether on Bridges' words when he declares: "In the Ushuaia Mission the Jakumusch are already so ashamed of their trade that they go out only at night and practice their trade without fanfare, without song and without any kind of noise." The medicine men of the Yamana are as extensively active today as formerly; I need say no more about this.

X756 My informants quite frankly expressed their conviction that the yĕkamuĭ, broadly speaking, were formerly cleverer and more skilled in their arts. Present-day medicine men do not deny such assertions; they admit their inferiority in comparison with their predecessors without getting excited about it and excuse themselves by saying that they personally did not have the services of the really great masters. When I asked the men why they lacked capable yĕkamuĭ at the present time, I received a characteristic answer: "It is because of the abundant and good [nourishing] food that the Europeans eat and that we, too, have now learned to prefer. It makes body and spirit heavy, our dreams are no longer so vivid. In former times the yĕkamuĭ did not take any nourishment until noon and were satisfied with two or three mussels a day when they wanted to heal a sick person or drive out an evil spirit or question their guardian spirits in a dream. They did not know about wine or tea or coffee, whereas now we often drink these things. Those capable yĕkamuĭ of former days were content with a few drops of water; at night they permitted themselves only a short period of rest and took this in a squatting position. The yĕkamuĭ of the present time have abandoned all that."

In order to illustrate the competence of the earlier yĕkamuĭ, Nelly Lawrence told me the following story which she had heard from her aunt Flora. Among Flora's relatives were two yĕkamuĭ who must be regarded as the most capable of all time. Once the people in the west were in great distress, for they were unable to hunt sea lions or gather mussels for a long time because of bad weather. The yikamuf were aware of this emergency. Therefore one of them gave himself up to sleep in order to be active in his dream. The next morning he said to his people: "Travel farther to the west and keep to the southern shore!" Immediately all the families packed up and set out for that place. The next night that yikamuf again had a dream and the next morning he said: "I saw [in the dream] two whales approaching us. They are sisters. Both of them are with young, each of them has an almost mature offspring in its belly. Out on the open sea an allgia [the small whale, /1389/ Pseudorca crassidens] approached them and angrily threatened them. The two sisters pleaded with him: 'Do not kill us! If you should kill us, the little ones in our belly will also die, and you would be bringing death to four living creatures at once!' But the allgia would not be moved and mercilessly killed the two whales. Soon they will come into view and be driven up to this beach." The people were extremely happy about what their yikamuf had told them. Sure enough, on that same evening the flood tide deposited two mighty whales there on the shallow coast. They were females. When their bellies were opened, the people found an offspring in each one. The people could not get over their amazement for a long time. -- When Nelly had concluded this story, she very clearly reaffirmed her own faith in the power of the yikamuf and several times expressed regret that nowadays not a single medicine man is capable of such accomplishments. As this story reports, a yikamuf who bestows such benefits upon his group obviously gains the high esteem and gratitude of everyone.

2. His Physical Nature

The yikamuf do not form an association or a separate social class any more than they live apart from the rest of their fellow-citizens. Nothing differentiates them from the latter in everyday life, neither special behavior nor any outward sign. Each of them, just like any other Tanana, must procure food, his hut and his material possessions in all respects resemble those of his neighbors (322). In a group of other men a medicine man

322. Spegazzini (x).169 is wrong when he is sometimes incomprehensibly given precedence, and the men willingly follow his decisions. The whole neighborhood expects him to be far more willing to help and more unselfish than other persons.

Whenever the yikamuf is working toward some goal in connection with his sexual calling, he puts on an ornament which he alone is permitted to wear. This outward token is intended to show that the guardian spirit associated with him has taken possession of him and he is now acting with this spirit and may not be disturbed in any way by anything around him. Naturally, everybody who sees that the yikamuf is busy at his calling behaves accordingly (32b). As Dempsey (b:717 briefly states, he > 32b. What Bridges (b:107 has said in this connection is wholly misleading: "In order to give the appearance of age, they were in the habit of rubbing their heads with ranwaps" /translated from Spanish/, namely, red earth.

wears as a "distinguishing mark: white down on the head, and pipe-clay lines across his face" /cited in English/. The feather ornament, ayawkpa, resembling a diadem, is characteristic. They use the finger-long, pale gray feathers on the underside of the body of the night heron (Nycticorax /1300/ obscurus), arranged close together in three woven strands of thin tendons. The yikamuf ties this ornament around his head like a headband, with the feathers pointing downward. When he removes his ayawkpa, he rolls it up and keeps it in a small leather pouch so that it will not be damaged. He prefers white pigment for painting his face and entire head. It is obviously an exaggeration when Bridges (c:300) reports that the medicine men "made their heads white with chalk every morning." This would differentiate them from all their countrymen, which is not their intention. Instead, it is the rule that they paint themselves only when they are working toward some goal of their calling. Hence they reach for their pigment even in the dead of night if they awaken after special dreams and give themselves up to serious meditation. Most often the yékamuf rube his face and hair with dry powdered lime. In former times he also applied it to the upper part of his body, that is, before he covered it with European clothing. Sometimes he contents himself with drawing a finger-thick white stripe under his nose from one ear lobe to the other. It is rare that he draws this line in red. Sometimes, of course, he forgoes any kind of painting, but even then he can be recognized clearly enough by his xpawéwa. Later on the painting of candidates in the medicine-man school will be described; this, too, shows clearly the preference of the yékamuf for white (304).

304. Earlier reports, for example, by Spegazzini (a):169, which mention another kind of outfit for the medicine man do not correspond to my experiences.

It is difficult to explain how the Yamana imagine the physical constitution of their medicine men. The latter have -- as I learned -- a phantom body which, to the eyes of ordinary Yamana, looks like the body of one of their own people. The skin of the yékamuf, above all, is supposed to be indescribably tender and thin, while the entire periphery of the body is supposed to exceed that of any other human being by far. According to measurements given to me, the diameter of a medicine man exceeds even 100 meters. Nevertheless, he looks like an ordinary Yamana to the eyes of the people around him. In the final analysis, it seems to me that this so-called periphery is best explained as the zone of influence of the yékamuf, for it is said: "the yékamuf knows everything that is present and that goes on within this periphery as definitely as though it were inside his body." This explanation is confirmed by the following. The Yamana also say: "If a yékamuf wounds himself or if his body changes in any way, our eyes are deceived. We see all this in the way in which such things happen to our own body.

X-756 but in reality it is not the same in the case of a yĕkamuš." No 826 one is able to give more specific explanations, and many Yamana /1391/ themselves undoubtedly do not have a clear conception of what it is that they always affirm in these same words. It [171] seems to me that a reference to the view of the Selk'nam about their medicine men is justified (Vol. I, 740). Many details that they attribute to their xon exactly fit the yĕkamuš of our Yamana, for example, the extreme sensitiveness of the skin that it is so easily injured. In the following lines there are a few more supplementary remarks about this strange conception of the Yamana concerning the physical being, or rather the physical make-up, of their yĕkamuš.

3. His Psychic Nature

X-756 In view of the preceding description it is not surprising that the Yamana are able to say little about the mental side and the psychic make-up of a medicine man. They do not try to penetrate this area, which is difficult of access, and content themselves with what they comprehend with their senses about the operations of the yĕkamuš. The latter is primarily dependent upon personal feelings and incomprehensible fantasy images, which he neither clearly reveals nor describes in plain words.
Thus one can only describe the manner in which the yĕkamuš operates as it presents itself to careful observation. The Selk'nam have a lucid body of ideas about their xon and their basic thoughts about their medicine-man system are well developed. In this respect the notions of what surrounds and constitutes the personality of the yĕkamuš are far inferior. This difference in scope as well as in the comprehension of the ideas and conceptions of the medicine-man system between the two Fuegian tribes is of decisive weight from a culture-history point of view.

A few basic facts about the manner of operation and the sphere of action of the yĕkamuš will at least permit a clear judgment. This is all the more important inasmuch as there is a widespread view that everything a medicine man does is only a refined type of deception and minutely calculated swindle.

X756 Let it be stated with all firmness that every yĕkamuš is an altogether normal, mentally healthy human being. Persons who are mentally inferior and in an advanced state of senility are not taken seriously even in everyday life; how, therefore, could they attain that pre-eminence which every capable medicine man enjoys? Rather, it can be taken as a general rule that the yĕkamuš is talented above the average, that he is more active and more capable than the men around him. His greater ability and richer mental gifts alone place him above his neighbors; his extensive and more profound knowledge gained from experience give him standing. These natural advantages give a medicine man's activity considerable importance.

X756 Naturally, there is a difference in their ability, depending on the talent and knowledge of the individual. The people 578 /1392/ know and name those few yĕkamuš who have performed 764 impossible things, and they are satisfied with the majority who have not gone beyond mediocrity. In view of the disposition of our Yamana, it is not surprising that the greater ability of one yĕkamuš has caused petty jealousies on the part of another group whose yĕkamuš is not as highly regarded. The one who feels insulted challenges his rival to one of the customary feats of strength. Basically they take place as follows. A yĕkamuš throws an object, for example, a yĕkuš, at his adversary. In case the yĕkamuš who is attacked does not recognize the approaching foreign body or cannot nullify its effect, he is wounded, weakens, and dies. If from the start the attacker does not succeed in hurling the yĕkuš far enough, so that it falls before reaching its goal or is caught by the medicine man who is attacked, then the attacker is regarded as the weaker one and loses the competition. All this takes place in the mental field of vision of the medicine men, which remains inaccessible to the ordinary Yamana. The latter learn only as much as the competing yĕkamuš themselves tell them and only as much as they choose to reveal.

X756 On March 19, 1923, the Yamana told me the following 773 ancient tale. Once upon a time there were two brothers who were capable yĕkamuš. For a long time they lived together peaceably, but one day they had a serious quarrel. All the

756 773 people who were together with these brothers in Agā́ia-wā́ja [a coastal strip in Seno Ponsonby] likewise split into two groups, each joining the yékamuš they preferred. Each of these two groups left that place. They both selected a long channel in the west. One group settled on the south shore, the other on the north shore. The hostility between the two brothers and the opposition of the two groups continued; each of the two yékamuš regarded himself as more capable than the other and each group praised the one whom they had joined. Finally the one said (325)

> 325. All this took place in a vision or in a dream state, and each of the two opponents was as well informed about it as though it were happening in everyday life. That is the peculiar way in which the medicine men operate.

to the other there in that long channel: "I shall now prove to you that I am stronger and can do more than you!" Immediately they both prepared themselves [for the test of strength]. One of them left his hut [in his dream], boarded his canoe, and rowed to the middle of the channel. Here he met his brother who had come from the opposite shore. Instantly he began the struggle with him and hurled a pointed yékuš into his heart. Then he returned to shore and proceeded to enter his hut. The other brother had also dreamed that he left his hut, boarded his canoe, and rowed to the middle of the channel. Here he met his brother who had come from the opposite shore. Instantly he began the struggle /1393/ with him and hurled a pointed yékuš into his heart. Then he returned to shore and proceeded to enter his hut. The next morning both of the yékamuš woke up. Each of them felt very weak and weary, each of them said to those around him: "I shall soon die, much blood is flowing from my mouth and my nose. Last night my brother mortally wounded me!" Sure enough, the yékamuš died even before the sun reached the zenith. Immediately his people lighted a signal fire and notified the group on the opposite shore that a lōima would soon be sung here. At exactly the same time the people on the other shore also lighted a signal fire and notified the group on the opposite shore

X756 773 also lighted a signal fire and notified the group on the opposite shore that a lōima would soon be sung here. From each of the two shores a canoe carrying messengers set out without delay to bring the news to the opposite shore. The two canoes met in the middle of the channel, and the people of one told the people of the other: "Our yēkamuš has just died, his brother killed him!" Soon all the people knew what had happened and that those two yēkamuš were equally capable.

X756 754 The power of the medicine man also reaches out beyond the boundaries of his own home; it overpowers Europeans, as was shown in the case of Bridges (p. 1304), and the neighboring Selk'nam according to Clara who told the following story in March, 1923. Once several Yamana were camping near Puerto Habertón. Not far from them a number of Selk'nam had erected their hut. When they saw the Yamana there, they stepped out and began making fun of them. The Yamana felt insulted, but did not dare attack the others. Finally a yēkamuš said: "I shall inflict harm upon them!" Without being observed he hurled a yēkuš against the last one of those Selk'nam who were retreating into the hut. The next morning when this man awoke he was blind in one eye. Later, when he started to walk a short distance, he fell over dead. That is how quickly the yēkuš of that medicine man took effect. -- All the people present confirmed this incident and were convinced that it was the plain truth.

X756 [828] Sufficient proof that the yēkamuš themselves believe in their ability has now been cited. They are convinced that their dreams and the things they undertake in the dream state have reality, that their influence on natural forces brings about the desired result. Whenever someone requests help from a friendly yēkamuš, the latter usually begins working at it without delay. If he should not attain the desired goal immediately, he will repeat his efforts a second and a third time. The whole neighborhood gratefully acknowledges each success and the fulfillment of each wish, above all the person who obtained the greatest benefit. Thus it would be utterly unjust and false to call the medicine man a deceiver and swindler (326). After all, he has

326. Bove (g):235 pronounces this unfair judgment without any qualifications. He real and obvious /1394/ results in which he personally, as well as those around him, believes. Of course this does not explain how he achieves the desired goal. No one cares about that, but each group is very proud of the superior achievements of its own yékamuš.

b. The Calling of the Medicine Man

When a yékamuš acts as such, it is not he personally who works and operates, but one or more of his guardian spirits acts for him to attain the goal he desires. The individual joins these guardian spirits for the first time when he is actually called to this office. A person who has not been won over and advanced by them in his younger years will never become a capable, full-fledged yékamuš. The call is a more or less definite summons for the chosen one by a spirit to devote himself to the work of a yékamuš. The individual and those close to him or a few medicine men decide whether there has been a real call and whether the individual thus chosen must immediately respond to it.

1. Personal Calling

X756

Our Yamana are very susceptible to stirrings and movements in their psychic life. Everything unusual agitates them very much, and they are extraordinarily easily captured by the many so-called spirits in which they believe. From the time they are children they learn about the method of operation of their yékamuš: they can observe it with their own eyes; they hear it talked about by adults; and they receive many explanations about it from the

X756 yēkamuš themselves. It is true that ordinary people do not understand the inner relationships in the work of the medicine men, much less their alleged connection with the oft-mentioned spirits, but they do have some notion of all this and that suffices to give them some understanding of the medicine-man system. Every Yamana knows more or less accurately the sphere in which the yēkamuš operate, what means they use, what external conditions are linked with success, and to what extent one yēkamuš differs from another in ability. These specific facts are common property, for the yēkamuš devote themselves to their task quite publicly and before the eyes of their close fellow-tribesmen. In this process, everyone who pays a certain amount of attention easily learns the observable techniques of a medicine man. If he supplements this with the explanations of the yēkamuš, he will finally become acquainted with the latter's entire body of thought. If a Yamana becomes firmly convinced of his own ability, /1395/ time will decide when he will begin to work as a yēkamuš. This brief sketch outlines the process of development of those persons who on their own initiative and later in life begin practicing the trade of medicine man within modest limits.

X756 787 Such individuals, however, do not have a calling in the strict sense of the word, and without this no one becomes a full-fledged yēkamuš. First of all I believe that one can speak of an indirect or intermediary calling. This expression has a threefold meaning. If the relatives of a young man or yēkamuš who are friends of his have discovered a talent in him for this office and if they feel that he is qualified to make contact easily with the čōwánni spirits by quickly putting himself into the dream state, then the people who have observed this tell the man of their conviction and advise him to become a medicine man. It can also happen that some yēkamuš is requested by spirits in a dream to introduce to his art a man they designate, so that he may later practice it. This yēkamuš assiduously trains the man designated, for he wants to show the spirits that he is obliging and he takes great pleasure in giving a pupil his start. Finally one must add here all those persons who on their own initiative devote themselves to the duties of yēkamuš. They do this because they have become personally convinced that they are capable of the same accomplishments that they have observed in full-fledged yēkamuš.

X756 787 One can least of all speak of a calling with regard to this last class of yékamuš, to which a few women also belong. The two groups first mentioned have a somewhat higher standing. Under no circumstances need a person expect any kind of harm or fear revenge from the spirits if he decides not to adopt the vocation of yékamuš despite the above-mentioned requests, for these are regarded merely as invitations and are not compulsory. It is true that if certain spirits seriously want a man for this service, they call him with unequivocal positiveness. Similarly, no one needs to answer a summons expressed through other influences or indefinite impressions. This was explained to me in March, 1923, by Crees on the basis of a personal experience. "Years ago I once passed through a dense forest alone. Suddenly I heard very beautiful singing, like the voice of a bird. I had never heard anything like it. I started to go in the direction of the voice. When I was quite near, the singing sounded even more beautiful, but I saw no one. Then I threw a spear in the direction of that voice. I did not see anyone, but the singing suddenly ceased. Shortly after that I felt very weak and unwell; I dragged myself along with effort and reached my hut. The yékamuš in the neighborhood immediately realized that something special must have happened to me, and they advised me to become a yékamuš. But I had no desire to do this and so the men did not urge me further. A year after that I had a dream. I saw an old man who seriously /1396/ warned me: 'Never become a yékamuš! On the day that you perform as one you will die!' I do not know who that old man was; I have heeded his warning." A person who takes on the tasks of a medicine man under such circumstances always plays a subordinate role.

In contrast to this there is the uncommon or direct, or immediate call, with which there is decided compulsion. It can come about in various ways. For instance, a young man will be walking through the forest looking for a small tree trunk for his harpoon shaft. He roams about for a long time, much longer than usual, looks hither and yon, but no sapling seems just right. He does not recognize himself in this behavior, he is surprised at himself, it is almost as though he were changed and under a spell. Suddenly he stands before a little tree that he likes extraordinarily well and exactly suits him. He immediately applies his ax, but it is only after many a heavy blow that he reaches the center. Instantly a considerable amount of water gushes out. He is startled and recognizes this sign. Without hesitation he turns his back on the little tree and hastens back to his hut. He briefly asks his wife and children not to touch him, talk to him, or disturb him, but to remain perfectly quiet. He lies down and is immediately fast asleep. Then he again sees his kēšpiš standing in front of that little tree in the forest, out of which abundant water is still flowing. Numerous other kēšpiš are standing about, some of whom he knows, but not most of them. He discovers some friendly yēkamuš among them. One or another of the yēkamuš points to the dreamer's own kēšpiš in the group and acts very friendly and well-meaning toward him. Gradually all the spirits sit down at that beautiful spot. Then they offer fine presents to the kēšpiš of the dreamer and give him things to eat and drink, for everything is there in great abundance. The kēšpiš of the dreamer is happy among them, everything is magnificent and quite in accord with his wishes, every detail is to his liking. The kēšpiš talk together for a long time; they discuss all kinds of things and enjoy themselves. Suddenly all the spirits get up, and each one hastily bids farewell to the kēšpiš of the dreamer. Soon the man wakes up and finds himself alone again in his hut. In an anxious voice he calls together his neighbors. They recognize his condition of spiritloss and the yēkamuš who are present begin the čōwánni song. The heart of this man is filled with sorrow, and he longs and yearns for those friendly spirits in whose company he but recently felt indescribably happy. Soon the čōwánni song brings back those friendly spirits, he again finds himself in their company and is quite happy. When the people stop their singing, the spirits go away again and the man finds himself back in everyday life. He has calmed down, for now he knows that the /1397/ spirits have accepted him in their society. The very next night he dreams again. His kēšpiš hastens back to that little tree in the woods, from which water is still gushing. That happy company also arrives there without delay and greets him warmly as a friend and associate. One or another of the spirits is particularly friendly, offers to help this kēšpiš, and tells him frankly that he must become a yēkamuš. The next morning this man wakes up. All his

X756 neighbors can see that he is feeling well; the memory of that 781 company of spirits is still alive in him. Without talking about it he gathers up his things, leaves his family, and sets out to go to that experienced yékamuš whose spirit he saw the night before. He stays with him for some time and is taught by him.

There is another call that comes in a similar manner. If X756 someone is walking dreamily through the forest, lost in thought 776 and unconscious of himself, so to speak, he may suddenly see a 781 large number of spirits in front of him. These are people of small stature but like human beings with respect to the shape of their bodies. Soon the man collapses and is overcome by a deep sleep. In his dream he now sees those little people much more distictly. He realizes that many spirits are sitting there around a fire, warming themselves and softly talking among themselves. They wave to the kēšpiš of the dreamer in friendly fashion, and one of them seems particularly favorably disposed. They all invite him to sit down with them beside the fire; he does so and feels content among them. After some time the man wakes up, and it is only with some effort that he rubs the sleep out of his eyes. The dream is very vivid to him and that kēšpiš who was particularly favorably disposed toward him becomes his guardian spirit. The latter will give him his song and that makes him a yékamuš. The type of spirit referred to is called hésteka-yékamuš. They like to stay in old tree trunks. They sometimes move the trunks in such a way that they bend extremely low, turn around, and shake and tremble violently. These hésteka-yékamuš live in old decayed tree trunks.

The direct call can also come from actual čōwánni spirits. A man will be roaming along the shore alone, as though sunk in a world of dreams, without definite thoughts. Suddenly he finds himself in a visionary state, known as asikāku; before him swarms a vast number of herring, whales, swordfish, vultures, cormorants, petrels, and other animals. They all speak flatteringly to him, are very gracious, and show great devotion to him; they act like the most friendly human beings. The man is completely out of his mind and does not know what is happening to him. His whole body is numb, and he sinks down and lies there motionless. His késpiš is communing with those čōwánni spirits and feels an

787 and disappear. Awakening from his deep dreams, the man 776 staggers home. He hardly knows what is going on around him. He lies down on his bed /1398/ and sinks back into his dream. Again the swarm of animals appears to him; they are all friendly to him and entice his kéšpiɣ. Soon the latter follows them far out to the high seas. One of the spirits is concerned about this kéšpiɣ and treats it with extravagant kindness; he will become the special guardian spirit of this man. All the other spirits are also at the man's disposal as friends and helpers. The immediate neighbors of this man, particularly the yékamuš, realize from his behavior what is going on. He is left alone and everybody waits patiently until he has shaken off his deep dream.

Sometimes a person is also called by Haučéllakīpa, the most powerful spirit in the lōima-yékamuš. The man chosen sinks into a deep dream quite suddenly. Haučéllakīpa appears to his kéšpiɣ in the form of a huge whale which is considerably larger than any representative of this species. The kéšpiɣ understands what this vision means; he can no longer escape and must become a yékamuš. The old masters are told by their own guardian spirits about every asikáku call. A person on whom such a vision is conferred loses complete control over himself for a few days; he does not eat or drink and stays away from everyone. He spends the time dreaming and his kéšpiɣ often returns to the group of spirits where he feels more and more at home. Soon one of those spirits puts himself at the disposal of this kéšpiɣ as his yefáčel and personal guardian spirit with overwhelming friendliness. The yefáčel finally gives this kéšpiɣ his song, and then the owner of the kéšpiɣ is a yékamuš. When, lost in the dream, he himself begins singing this song aloud, everyone around him knows what has happened to him. Every man who has received such a direct call goes to an experienced medicine man for a few months to be taught by him. When he returns to his family group, he puts himself at their disposal.

One can become a full-fledged yékamuš only by way of an asikáku. In one of the subsequent "visions" a special guardian spirit introduces himself to the dreaming person and remains attached to him from then on as his personal helper. He will not

X756 787 776 release him; hence the person must operate as a yĕkamuš. If he refuses, the yefáčel, more accurately known as yefáčel-xĕǫla or aõna-xĕǫla, soon takes severe revenge by letting the person die. Sometimes an alert yĕkamuš can prevent this grave outcome. Nelly Lawrence told me about her call; she did not obey it and on that account ran the risk of extreme mortal danger: "Once I was walking through the forest with my little daughter. Suddenly a strange, loud pãx sound came from a tree trunk. I looked back and saw in that decayed trunk a cunning aõna-xĕǫla waving to me in a very friendly way. I did not take it for an asikãku, but for an ordinary kĕspiť. I dragged myself along as though I were in a coma; I was seized by an uncanny fear, /1399/ and irresistible exhaustion made me drop on my bed. I dreamed, and once again that aõna-xĕǫla was standing before me. It smiled at me in a very friendly way and showered me with all kinds of gifts, with skins and little baskets, ornamental chains and yĕkuš; it even gave me a special song. After I awoke sluggishly that song kept running through my head for a long time. I was weak and sick for several days; I felt lifeless and deprived of energy. A yĕkamuš kĩpa addressed me: 'How weak you are now! Just a short time ago I saw you vigorous and healthy!' I did not tell her anything definite, but offered her a cup of tea. She took the cup and recoiled: 'Why do you offer me this disgusting animal?' I was taken aback and said: 'But I offered you a cup of tea!' The woman answered excitedly: 'No, that is a disgusting animal!' That aõna-xĕǫla had not released me since my dream; it followed my every step. Gradually I became convinced that I must practice as a yĕkamuš, for that is what this spirit was trying to make me do. But I could not decide to do it. That yĕkamuškĩpa was enlightened by her spirit as she held the cup of tea in her hands, and immediately she realized what had happened to me. 'You must become a yĕkamuš!' she said to me. This is what she saw: that aõna-xĕǫla had put a fur cloak around me and it was fastened around my neck with a leather thong. It was this cloak that was weighing me down so that I often fell to the ground! Full of anxiety for me, that woman hastened back to her hut. She soon went to sleep. In her dream she saw how that fur cloak was constricting my throat more and more so that in a few days I would have choked. Early in the morning she began

787 her song, full of anxiety. She called me to come there and 776 asked: 'Did you have an asikāku there in the woods and since then do you have the feeling that someone is choking you so that you sometimes fall down because you can't breathe?' I said: 'Yes, that's the way it is!' Then I had to get down on the ground in front of her. With both hands she grasped the fur cloak and the many gifts that had been showered on me by the aōna-xēola. She energetically threw all of them aside until I was finally rid of them. She also took the song and the asikāku away from me. Not until then did I feel relieved, and since then I have had no further difficulty. To this day I am grateful for the help of that yēkamuškīpa; she saved me from imminent death." The complete designation for a person who, through a vision, has received his calling to practice as a yēkamuš is, accordingly asikāku-yēkamuš.

2. The Medicine-Man School

X756 Although it is true that the yēkamuš of the Yamana are not joined together in a society, nevertheless everyone who is active in this domain is quite generally known. Occasionally yēkamuš who are on friendly terms with each other even join forces to effect a cure in common. An aged master, /1400/ of course, sees to it that a young man of his family is trained for this service, for a large family group is, after all, dependent on the activity of a yēkamuš and could not forgo it completely without harming itself. If, at a certain time, several yēkamuš feel the necessity of preparing this or that young candidate for their calling, they instigate a lōima-yēkamuš. The goal of a meeting thus designated is clearly implied in the term. It is, in other words, an actual school for prospective medicine men.

As though by chance I learned that the yēkamuš now and then meet in a special hut for the purpose of winning over younger successors to their calling (327). On my fourth journey I directed

327. At that time I knew nothing about the Pešere of the Selk'nam (Vol. I, 786), which, in part, serves the same ends as the medicine-man school of the Yamana.

X756 my efforts toward witnessing this noteworthy arrangement (Gusinde [n]:968). At first my Fuegian friends would not hear of this plan. They felt unsure of themselves because about 25 years had passed since the last occasion of this kind, which took place under the leadership of Ašikansis in Šowatōyawaia (Punta Pantalón on Navarino Island) and because the yēkamuš of the present time regard themselves as weak and less capable than their predecessors. Nevertheless, I was accorded the rare privilege of becoming acquainted with this observance, which is very significant in some respects, through personal participation (p. 190 /untranslated/). Since then it has not been repeated and thus it was really the last lōima-yēkamuš in the actual and strict sense.

a. Preparation

In case this or that group of medicine men firmly intends to initiate a lōima-yēkamuš soon, they come to an agreement in ordinary conversation as to the place where they wish to gather. They have no special requirements for the location, but it must be suitable for a sojourn of several families for some time. The conditions which must be met are like those required for the čiēxaus or kīna. Above all it must be a place where they need not fear major disturbances of any kind.

X756 As soon as several families have settled down in the place agreed upon, the erection of the special hut begins without delay.
34b The hut is called lōima tarnēkēx, sometimes more definitely lōima tārna ēkēx. It resembles the one for the kīna celebration; in other words, it is a spacious hut in the usual cone shape. The base is circular or lengthened to an oval shape, depending on whether it is erected for a few or many participants. The individual small trunks of this construction /1401/ are planted a few centimeters in the ground for greater stability and are placed close together. This framework is covered on the outside with pieces of leather. If not enough of them should be available, thick beech foliage is used as a covering. The maximum interior height is about three and a half meters. The interior is decorated with a white line the width of a hand, which runs all

X756 the way around about a meter above the ground. In some ex-346 ceptional cases, the interior up to about two meters from the ground may be painted uniformly white. The fire is kept burning constantly in the center of the hut, and a narrow passage is left free around it. Between it and the wall there is enough space for the participants to sit or lie down. This whole area is covered with a layer, eight centimeters thick, of branches with dense foliage from the evergreen beech (Nothofagus betuloides). On top of this is a layer of short, stiff pampas grass, mēčašuka (Calamagrostis), which is also used in the kīna hut for the same purpose. Firewood is piled up outside the hut, furnished by younger men who take part as spectators or visitors, that is, who are neither yēkamuš themselves nor intend to become such. In the seating arrangement the leader of this affair has the place to the left of the entrance; farther inside the yēkamuš and candidates alternate in such a way that one to three of the latter sit between two yēkamuš. Naturally the Great Hut is so situated that its broad entrance opens to the east and does not face the camp with its family dwellings.

X756 As has already been indicated, a very influential older medicine man fills the office of leader. He is called lōjmatučnuwa. He is usually responsible for the decisive stimulus that has instigated the affair; he makes the initial preparations and gathers together a few friendly colleagues to discuss the details of the program. He automatically becomes the leader, without being definitely or formally chosen, and everyone submits to his leadership without opposition. Only a man of superior knowledge and rich experience is considered for this post; he is held in high esteem by everyone because of his great ability and his incomparable achievements. This leader then gives detailed instructions to the participants, following the traditional program with which he must be familiar. Above all he sees to it that no disturbance or distraction of any kind interferes.

In accordance with the purpose of this occasion, a number of yēkamuš, of course, arrive as participants, for this is properly their own undertaking and they, obviously, are primarily concerned. They hasten to it from the surrounding vicinity, and sometimes a yēkamuš will come from a great distance in case he has some friendly connection with this gathering and wishes to

X756 display his superior achievements before it. The apprentices admitted young men who, on their own initiative, wish to devote themselves to the office of yékamuš, /1402/ who show talent and aptitude for it, and who are introduced by their relatives. Many a chap is under pressure if a yékamuš has been told in a dream that he has been directly called to this office by the spirits. Thus the lōima-yékamuš is a gathering of these chosen ones. Naturally persons who perform no services and simply want to satisfy their curiosity would not be permitted to remain. In the case of the so-called uśwāaléxamuš (derived from uśwāala yékamuš), they must have an earnest desire to learn the skills of the yékamuš in order to practice them themselves later on. Many a father brings his grown son, hoping that in this school he will feel the desire to become a yékamuš, but no one is put under serious pressure by relatives or friends.

The wife of a medicine man may come for a few hours every day. During this time she accompanies him in the customary songs, just as she often does outside of the Great Hut. At night she goes back to the camp. Her husband may not accom-
[834] pany her; during the entire affair, which lasts a few months, they cannot sleep together or have sexual intercourse. A few middle-aged men are requested by authoritative yékamuš to remain throughout or for a certain period in the lōima house. They are entrusted with the necessary work and services so that the yékamuš and all the apprentices may be left to themselves undisturbed and not be in the least distracted by manual work. These men who are the helpers, tend the hut fire, provide food, no matter how meager this may be, and are very alert to prevent any kind of disturbance of the lōima tarnékēr. The leader alone directs these helpers, although they may also assist the other participants in these ways. More than 15 persons at least assemble for a lōima-yékamuš. Besides that, a number of men are admitted on some evenings with the consent of the leader. They wish to convince themselves of the progress of the candidates and at intervals follow the proceedings with their own eyes. These visitors must be absolutely quiet; they may neither talk nor make a disturbance in any way. They sit motionless near the entrance and inconspicuously watch what goes on before them.

X756 Finally, one or two women who have been active as yékamuł to a limited extent come as participants to receive further instruction, so to speak, in the lóima-yékamuł. At the beginning the leader must assure them that they may participate. From the behavior of the three women who entered the lóima house for the first time on March 19, 1923, I realized the respect and timidity that every person feels toward it. It is regarded as a particularly feared place. At first these women remained in their dwellings for two to three hours in earnest concentration; then they stepped out and turned toward the lóima house. Each woman kept /1402/ her head bowed low and her eyes more closed than open. With actual trepidation she placed one foot in front of the other as slowly as though she were feeling the earth. She glided forward about 150 centimeters and then back about 80. She stood still for a few minutes, then started moving again. From time to time she raised her head timidly and, full of fear, turned her eyes toward the lóima house. Faint-hearted and trembling, she quickly looked away again as though she had seen something dreadful. It took this woman all of an hour and a quarter until she finally reached the entrance of the lóima hut. Here she was obliged to wait a few minutes; the leader addressed her from inside and bade her enter. Frightened, she came in very slowly and sat down at the place pointed out to her. Everyone who approaches the lóima house feels that he is being delivered up, without any defense, to the power of many spirits who will severely punish even slight disrespect. Trembling and completely intimidated, of course the ułwałaléxamuł also set out for the assembly hut. Among other women who have no particular desire to take up the vocation of yékamuł, curiosity does not conquer the fear of the spirits; they very definitely avoid the Great Hut. Several times I was told in all seriousness: "Anyone who approaches without deep respect and serious concentration incurs severe punishment from the spirits!"

Our Yamana regard the quiet winter months which are conducive to self-reflection as the most favorable time for a lóima-yékamuł. In any case the general desire for travel has abated then, and every family prefers to stay in the same place

X15b as long as possible. The outward peace which prevails in nature has a favorable effect on the psychic state of the yĕkamuĭ; they consciously take this into consideration. This affair continues for several months. Sometimes it is prolonged if, according to the opinion of the masters, the apprentices' progress is slow. It is strange, in view of the restless disposition of our Yamana, that the medicine men are able to remain in one place for several months in pursuit of their goal, although day after day they are forced to maintain a uniform attitude and strict control of their mental powers.

β. The Procedure

All fully qualified participants, the really active yĕkamuĭ and the apprentices, must remain in the lōima house uninterruptedly. They may not even leave it in order to work for any length of time in the family hut or to sleep there. All distractions cease during the entire period; the daily program itself serves to maintain serious concentration. The participants remain in their places all the time. Toward four o'clock, when it begins to grow dark, the general singing starts. It continues [805] without pause "until the two Yoālox have crossed their highest point on the heavens" /1404/ that is, until two or three o'clock. It is not until then that everyone may go to sleep. As soon as the dawn appears, everyone shakes off sleep and collects his thoughts, motionless, until after the sun has crossed the zenith. Then, on certain days, a few chores begin for the ulwāgalĕxamuĭ, which they perform silently. The purpose of these chores is to give them the physical exercise that nature requires, although they need sleep even more. They put the hut fire and their sleeping places in order or gather firewood in the forest and pile it up in front of the Great Hut; some of them, led by women, go down to the shore and look for mussels. About three hours are permitted for these occupations. After that everyone sits down in his place and, without moving, gives himself up to meditation. This program continues day after day without change, always with the greatest composure and strict silence.

X756 Our Yamana, as a matter of principle, forgo eating their 264 fill on some occasions, which are well known. They content 785 themselves with as little nourishment as possible in the ítima house. On this occasion the mussel is regarded as the most suitable food for insuring that the old people and the apprentices will reach their goal. They all eat but once a day, soon after getting up. The uwʃalékamuĭ are given three mussels at the most; all the other participants impose the same restriction upon themselves, and sometimes a person takes nothing all day. In individual cases the pupil is permitted to eat a fish instead of a mussel, but he may eat only the tail end; he destroys the front end, along with the head, in the fire. A little tumʃrapu powder (328) is sprinkled on each bite that the apprentice eats.

> 328. No one could tell me the reason for these strange rules.

All the food is cooked in the Great Hut itself, and the remnants are immediately destroyed in the fire. If the pupil is making obvious progress, the three mussels a day are cut down first to two, later even to one for the duration of the affair. This is done so that he will steadily and quickly perfect himself. He is given water which he sucks in limited quantities through the well-known ʃmbalim, a thin hollow bone (p. 909) made out of a large Mytilus shell, which is handed to him by a yékamuĭ. Every participant knows, and the apprentices are repeatedly told by the leader, that the less food and drink a person has, the more promptly his dreams will come to him, the more vivid his intercourse will be with the spirits, and the more capable the older yékamuĭ will be for his accomplishments. If a uwʃalékamuĭ should give in to the pangs of hunger and secretly eat something, for instance, when he is gathering wood in the forest, then it is said that the yeĭčel tell the yékamuĭ of this infraction. Thereupon one of them will call the chap to account: "We know that you have secretly eaten outside this ítima hut!" /1405/ Punishment does not follow, however, for the boy is sufficiently intimidated and accepts the rebuke without contradiction. He has learned his lesson forever.

X756 Body painting is prescribed for the actual participants, the 302 yékamuĭ and the uwʃalékamuĭ. All of them are completely naked

X756 302 during the entire time that they remain in the hut. To paint themselves, each one scrapes lime powder from a lump of lime or clay with his incisors and mixes it with saliva by chewing it. He spits this on the palm of his hand and rubs it over his whole body. Before the mixture dries another man helps him complete the design. This man puts his fingertips where together and with his nails scratches vertical grooves into the pigment from the forehead to the ankles, that is, down the whole length of the body. These grooves later give the impression of dark lines that have been drawn in the pigment. Some men do not bother to use more than one finger to scratch in several grooves. On some days the leader also reaches for lini powder, a signal that all the participants are likewise to paint themselves red and to put the many lines on this background. Some of the men merely rub the white or red powder into the hair; most of them smear a good deal of the sticky tumpfen on their heads. Everyone ties the ayawiya around his forehead, the feather ornament reserved exclusively for the yikamaf, not the strip of skin with down feathers known as kayarfi (p. 7/5). Everyone renews this body painting every day, usually in the afternoon when they all do it at once. The persons who are in the hut as helpers or spectators and all the women yikamaf must paint their faces and the upper part of their bodies white. They must also draw a finger-thick red line from the corners of the mouth to the ear lobes. No one may remain in the lipma house without being painted.

X756 785 516 Each actual participant is assigned a definite seat at the very beginning of the celebration. The seats are divided off on either side by a short stick. Everyone stretches his legs out in front of him; his upright torso is pressed so close to the hut framework that the back of his head touches it. Behind their necks they place a short, thick piece of soft, fungus-like wood known as halakkina, as though it were a pillow. The men press it against the hut wall and thus it remains in position. Everyone must remain seated, still and motionless. His arms fall loosely on either side of his body. In the long run this position is a great strain and becomes indescribable agony. A person is permitted, however, to draw his feet up to his rump in a squatting position; in exceptional cases he may also sit for a time with his legs crossed under him, at the same time holding his arms crossed over his chest. The impression that the circle of motionless, pelisse white figures made upon me was indescribably strange.

It has been mentioned several times that very little sleep is permitted for the gentlemen, and is taken during the four or five /1409/ hours before daybreak. As ancient custom recommends, the qualified yihamuf sleep in the sitting position described above. Some of them draw their legs up slightly and slide back a little so that the bent back touches the hut wall while the neck still holds up the piece of wood. A person who can no longer do this may lie on one side and stretch his legs a bit, but he absolutely must have the piece of wood under his neck. The yehfel live in the old town from which the [illegible] wood is taken; thus, the person who keeps the piece of wood behind his neck retains his yehfel-state even during sleep. The posture indicated induces many lively dreams during sleep. The sensitivity and irritability of the nerves are increased to the limit by the fact that, after the strain of the uncomfortable sitting position, even sleep at night is considerably curtailed; this is the goal sought by this means and by the limited diet and prolonged silence.

According to Tarzana belief, a full-fledged yihamuf merely seems to have the same type of body as the ordinary human being (p. 1308). The transformation of the body begins here in the [illegible]-yihamuf for those [illegible]yihamuf who have experienced a real call. First the entire face is affected. After the medicine-man school has continued for a few days each apprentice, according to instructions given by experienced yihamuf, begins the following process which he may not interrupt. He takes a ball of fine wood shavings from the lemon-yellow wood of [illegible] (it is known as [illegible]), dips it into the white [illegible] powder and rubs his cheeks with it. For about half an hour his hand moves slowly with scarcely perceptible pressure; then he stops for the same length of time and begins anew. Each apprentice carries on these exercises by himself; he does it for a shorter or longer time, but he must continue the process all day long. Its purpose is to make a new, softer, more delicate skin appear in place of his actual skin. When, after continuous painting and rubbing, the new skin finally becomes visible in about three weeks, the old masters interpret it as a sign that the ulwalékamuf in question really has a call for their vocation, and they show their joy in mutual mental visions. Now the apprentice must rub the cheek region with renewed diligence until, after another three or more weeks, this second delicate skin also disappears, and a third, still finer and more sensitive, appears. This skin is so soft and sensitive that it cannot be touched without causing penetrating pain. The ulwalékamuf who is the first among all the apprentices to develop this third, extremely fine skin arouses the greatest hopes and is regarded as the most successful pupil. As soon as this third, extremely sensitive skin is formed among the rest of the apprentices, the elders conclude the ólyma-yékamuf. Naturally, the experienced teachers recognize this alteration of the skin in /1407/ their mental visions and inform each other in brief words which are understandable to all the pupils. This is not a case of mechanically destroying the real skin of the face; rather, by a process of auto-suggestion, the ulwalékamuf believe in the alleged changes which the old teachers audibly discuss. They also say that this extraordinary sensitivity of the facial skin gradually disappears, but that the skin remains very delicate. In connection with the alteration in the skin of the face, the rest of the skin and the entire body are transformed into that phantom body which all yékamuf are supposed to have.

In the course of the ólyma-yékamuf the old masters repeatedly perform two kinds of movements for which they show great preference. They pass both cupped hands over the hot fire and capture, so to speak, a handful of warmth which they pour out, as it were, over the head of an apprentice. They do this at least three times in succession. They also catch warmth from the hot fire in only one cupped hand, with the arm outstretched, and move it along in such a way that their cupped hand rests on the mouth of an apprentice; they fairly pour warmth into him. It is said that these two movements remove a sort of impenetrable wall of fog from the eyes of the ulwalékamuf; from now on he can see the spirits without interference and nothing can hinder his singing.

781 a dream, as it is commonly said, which means a vivid imagina-
828 tion or auto-suggestion, a lively weaving of fantasies. It is maintained that the yékamuš loses his own personality and that it is replaced by his spirit, namely, the kēšpix or yefáčel-xéola that belongs to him. The latter carries out what the yékamuš is trying to do or wishes. The yékamuš is most closely united with his yefáčel "in the dream." Therefore, it is of decisive importance for him to be able to put himself quickly and effortlessly into the dream state. Every apprentice is supposed to acquire this art above all in the lóima-yékamuš. He observes the experienced masters present, who, after singing briefly, succeed in being completely absent mentally while sitting there; they have lost their own personalities. Either they slump over and remain motionless, as though sleeping, or they move the upper part of the body gently back and forth, singing softly, their heavy and half-closed eyes glazed and fixed on one point. The ušwāaléxamuš imitates all this; the old people watch him, but give no definite instructions. He himself does not say whether his power of imagination has increased and his fantasies are more vivid. It is not until later that ordinary people discover his skill, after the ušwāaléxamuš has begun to practice independently.

X756 Every yékamuš has the power of invoking his own guardian 781 spirit and any other spirit with his singing. During the asikáku the S33 yefáčel-xéola gives the man his /1408/ song. When the chosen one has adopted this song and made it his own, he has the key which gives him admission to the realm of the spirits, for the personal guardian spirit, above all, listens to this song and sooner or later puts himself at the disposal of his protégé. The Yamana now maintain that it is not really the yékamuš who sings, but his yefáčel. In other words, the yékamuš starts the song given him by the yefáčel, but in a short time the yefáčel takes it over and carries it on for a long time. Finally the yefáčel withdraws from the dream image of his yékamuš and the latter wakes up. These songs are very simple melodies on a single tone or melodies with an added interval of a third or fourth at the beginning or the end. The syllables hāiyang hāiyang hō are repeated to these melodies, or hōh yō yō, or finally hainím wagán harán and similar variations.

X756 787 533 A uśwałéxamuš has been familiar with these melodies from his youth. Here in the lōima-yékamuš he takes up a definite melody and continues it while his imagination is vividly at work. He is animated by the belief that he received this melody from his yefáčel-xéola. This explains its suggestive power over the ego whenever a yékamuš repeats it. Here in the lōima-yékamuš the candidate must learn how to put himself into the dream state after briefly singing, for it is in the realm of dreams that the spirits are at his disposal. Singing is not permitted outside the lōima hut, for this would lure the yefáčel out. Nevertheless, if a yefáčel should follow an apprentice who has gone into the forest and is gathering wood, and should move him to sing, then the apprentice must take up the song and his companions must accompany him softly. The practiced yékamuš are regularly stimulated to sing in their dream, and after they wake up they naturally continue singing as long as the stimulation lasts, that is, as long as their yefáčel is with them, in exceptional cases even beyond the noon hour.

X756 787 In the medicine-man school the apprentices are almost completely dependent upon their own observations and practice; they observe every little thing the old masters do, copy it as best they can, and make it their own. There is no detailed instruction in the lōima-yékamuš. Auto-suggestion makes every candidate aware of the extent to which his wishes have become reality. The old masters, for their part, know through their visions what the apprentice has attained and what may still be expected of him. They do not discuss this in so many words, but communicate among themselves in that dream realm in which they carry on all their activity.

In the above description only the apprentices in the lōima house have been considered. Many details about the conduct of the old masters could be given, but it may suffice to give a few basic characteristics. Although I have just said that everything the yékamuš see and do takes place in their visions, it is nevertheless true /1409/ that in the late evening hours they tell many things about their hallucinations in plain words and with very lively performances. Above all they describe the appearance of their own yefáčel, his behavior in the lōima house, and his leave-taking.

X756 They also describe their own kespix in the realm of the spirits and his being with them. All this takes place in the following manner. During the common singing one man will suddenly make his voice louder and louder, his whole body starts to tremble, his eyes are fixed on one point, and he moves toward it as he slides a bit closer to the hut fire. Suddenly he cries -- I repeat Mašemikens' words: "My yefáčel is already quite close!" He gets up, goes all around the fire, with the upper part of his body bent far over. He touches one man and then another and asks: "Who are you?" Each one answers: "Karendáulum mútu, I am a native of this region!" After Mašemikens has sat down in his place, he continues: "I see my yefáčel and other yefáčel going to Anjawája; they are gathering a few yefáčel there. They are preparing all kinds of things! Be on your guard and watch everything they are going to do!" After some brief singing and wailing, Mašemikens says: "Everybody has to paint himself again!" He reaches for čílēr[1] and tumarápu and rubs his cheeks with them. Meanwhile several yékamus stretch their cupped hands toward the warmth rising from the hut fire; they scoop it up, so to speak, and pour it over their bodies. Then Mašemikens, trembling all over, cries: "My yefáčel is here already, he is just stepping into this lójma house!" At the same time he slides toward the hut fire, for the yefáčel love warmth. Mašemikens cries: "My yefáčel is now with me! Are you all courageous and strong enough to sing along out loud? Many yefáčel are crowding into our lójma-hut!" Now loud wailing and a terrified yelling begin, present trembles with agitation, as though he were out of his mind, everyone lifts his eyes and stares absently into the distance. Into this commotion Thomas yells: "I am singing with all my might! My yefáčel is already here, too, and is listening to my song!" Whaits says loudly: "I cannot understand what the yefáčel are saying to one another. There are many of them here in the lójma house. We must all sing lustily!" Suddenly Emilia, like one demented, beats about with both arms. Mašemikens explains this in the following words: "Emilia has just caught hold of a yefáčel and pushed it into the fire. But it quickly escaped!" The singing continues excitedly. Mašemikens cries: "I see, the yefáčel are very angry! They are throwing stones at us with their

X156 slings because Emilia pushed a yefǎčel into the fire. Emilia did 181 this because that yefǎčel would not sing along with us." Soon afterward Emilia takes Santiago's hand and rubs the palm of his hand with hers, saying: I have caught the yěkuš that the yefǎčel hurled with his sling; it now belongs to you [Santiago], I'm giving it to you!" While everyone present goes on singing, she adds: "I have great power over Haučella. My first /1410/ husband was a capable yěkamuš; I learned a lot from him!" After a time the song becomes somewhat weaker, and Emilia cries anxiously: "Everybody here seems to be very discouraged! They are no longer making an effort and act as though they were dead. Please help me sing, my yefǎčel loves singing. It came from a great distance, from šęgetęx-tulēna [on the Wollaston Islands]. Are all the ušwāaléxamuš present?" There is a "Yes" from many voices. Emilia continues, her eyes still staring into the distance: "I see other yefǎčel there on Cape Horn. Some of them are constantly slipping on the smooth ice. But others are coming with lightning speed. They are already standing here. I must sit down in front of them!" A bit later Emilia squats in front of me, she excitedly draws her open hands over my body from the top of my head to my knees; then she presses her hands hard against my chest, and finally says, straight into my face: "Herewith I give you your own yefǎčel. It comes from the extreme south where there is all that ice. From now on it belongs to you!" Thomas cries loudly: "This yefǎčel is behaving in a very friendly way!" Loud singing follows and continues for ten minutes. Finally Maěmikens announces: "Now all the yefǎčel are leaving. Mine is sad because it must leave me, but the other yefǎčel demand it. They are already out on the high seas!" Quickly silence again falls on the lǒjma hut; only one person continues singing in a weak voice.

Similar performances go on evening after evening, and everyone present takes part. Words and gestures are expressions of the confused fantasies of each speaker, who is free to clothe his feelings in words. Now and then the yěkamuš also engage in their well-known feats of strength, namely, a contest held in the visions of usually two opponents. The rest of the yěkamuš carefully follow this struggle and let the people present know

X156 what they observe. The results of such tests of strength are, of 781 course, disappointment and displeasure among those whose yékamuš has been defeated, joy and satisfaction among those whose yékamuš has won. The old masters enjoy this very much, for the lōima-yékamuš gives them their best opportunity to prove their ability in front of others. Such feats of strength are relieved by loud singing and the interspersed cries of those present. At a sign from the leader, song and cries suddenly break off. Immediately everyone bends far forward and presses his hands flat against the ground, as though pressing it down. This is meant to hold back the many spirits here in the hut or in the immediate vicinity. Afterwards everyone again assumes the rigid posture and remains silently in his place. If someone leaves the lōima hut, the others seize his kēspix to hold it back so that it will continue to accompany all of them in their singing.

X156 The Haučéllakīpa have been mentioned several times.
781 These spirits are regarded as the rulers of the lōima-yékamuš.
776 There are many Haučélla, both male /1411/ and female, and they constitute an evil band. Each yékamuš has his Haučéllakīpa, just as he has his own yefāčel. When they say that Haučéllakīpa is the mistress and female ruler of the lōima-yékamuš, they mean that spirits of this type often make themselves felt inside the hut, carry on disputes among themselves with great fury, and let all the men feel their deep resentment. They arrive in the Great Hut every day; several Haučélla will even join together and threaten the circle of men with death. In their visions the yékamuš observe all the details, hence the constant fear and alertness of the yékamuš with respect to the Haučélla. Although each of them is at the service of her own yékamuš in everyday life, nevertheless here in the Great Hut she sometimes behaves like a violent foe. No one here is safe from her; she gives vent to her fury and keeps all the men in a state of panic. This is what the people mean when they refer to Haučéllakīpa as the ruler of the lōima-yékamuš. The greatest agitation and most threatening attitude of these spirits are shown when they force everyone present to repeat rapidly hēte, hēte, hēteteteēte in marked rhythm and on the same pitch. It is called the song of Haučéllakīpa. While it is going on, the men get up to offer resistance; they struggle with these spirits and either subdue them or are overcome by their superior power.

One evening, during the customary singing, Emilia was excited beyond all bounds. She cries: "A Haučéllakīpa has overcome Mašemikens! I shall kill her without delay!" Mašemikens has to squat in front of her on the ground. She sings and with her index finger scratches a line on the ground all around him. Then she yells loudly, clenches her fists, beats them against the ground, wails dreadfully, gnashes her teeth, places her mouth against the ground, and bites it furiously. While the other people apprehensively continue singing, Emilia sits up and makes a few quick motions with her outstretched hand as though she were cutting up some large object on the ground and were distributing the pieces in every direction. She heaps sand over that spot on the ground. Then she repeatedly throws her arms around Mašemikens and holds him tight, embracing him from the shoulders to his knees as though she were obliged to hold him together. Meanwhile she wails loudly. The whole performance means that Emilia has killed the Haučéllakīpa and thus freed Mašemikens. Now the jealousy of Mašemikens' wife comes out, for she cries: "For some time I have noticed that my husband was under the spell of that woman!" Emilia interrupts her: "One can show no mercy toward a Haučéllakīpa! One must quickly murder her, she is always most dangerous! A man to whom Haučéllakīpa attaches herself will not live long; he would soon be destroyed by her!" Angrily she beats her fists in the air and cries: "Now I see that my yefčel is perturbed because I murdered that Haučéllakīpa; /1412/ it is returning in order to release its blazing anger on us all. I shall tell it frankly that I, alone, was the murderess; then it will leave you unharmed!" As she continues singing, she makes motions as though she were hurling stones with a sling against that spirit. Finally she cries, happily excited: "I see that my yefčel is retreating once more!" At these words Mašemikens breathes a sigh of relief and confesses: "For a long time I have been completely discouraged, I was quite weak, I felt very oppressed. Now I am free again!" Thereupon the entire circle of participants calms down. Scenes such as these are repeated almost daily. Sometimes the men join forces and

756 advance on Haučélla (p. 1334). The women in the camp are 787 seized with fear whenever they hear the howling of the men, indicating that the latter are again obliged to struggle with Haučélla.

γ. The Conclusion

From the preceding description one can easily see the goal of the lōima-yékamuš, namely, maximum development of the power of imagination and auto-suggestion, stimulation and cultivation of the dream-fantasy, and increased ability to fuse external phenomena and everyday occurrences with individual fantasies. A yékamuš, by means of his singing, must be able to put himself quickly into the dream state in order to feel that the dream images and fantasies are living personalities; he must associate with them and deal with them, offer resistance to them, and give them orders as though they were human beings. It cannot be definitely determined to what extent an ušwāaléxamuš succeeds in this accomplishment; in all these things he is left to his own imagination. Whatever the old masters say on the subject is not regarded as a judgment that must be taken into account. They decide on special treatment only in the case of a candidate who is very slow in his progress. Mašemikens experienced this himself and described it to me. A capable yékamuš will make the unsuccessful apprentice stand up in front of him and will say to him: "I shall try to strangle you!" He seizes a stout leather strap, puts it around the boy's neck, and says: "Now watch out!" The yékamuš chokes the apprentice as hard as he can, until the boy falls over. Repeatedly he shouts at him: "Remember, this lōima house is a place for Haučélla!" Soon the apprentice sees many Haučélla sitting around the fire warming themselves. Then the apprentice's kešpix approaches these spirits, but he begins to feel uneasy in their company, and full of fear, he withdraws. Now the yékamuš removes the leather strap from the neck of the apprentice. After that the latter has no difficulty in quickly transporting himself to the realm of the kešpix; Mašemikens assured me of this from his own experience. Naturally, a yékamuš

X756 787 does not literally strangle the apprentice; rather, this act, too, takes place in a visionary state, and the yékamuš merely describes it in words that can be understood.

With the lōima-yékamuš the old masters strive to train a number of candidates /1413/ to make them sufficiently skilled in their calling. Hence the length of the training cannot be determined beforehand. Most of the yékamuš, though not all, remain together until they have achieved the desired results, that is to say, for the entire winter, perhaps even for five months. The daily monotony wears down the ušwáaléxamuš and puts their nerves in a state of extreme irritability. On such soil there is a luxuriant growth of those fantasies and hallucinations which are sought by auto-suggestion and striven for by the immediate circle. After the lōima-yékamuš is over, each apprentice attaches himself to the man who was his particular guardian during the affair. He takes further instruction from him alone, until he can independently begin to practice the art of the medicine man. The rest of the yékamuš also continue to observe each one who was trained in the lōima hut and follow his activities. They exchange opinions about whether or not unusual achievements may be expected of him.

When the goal of the old masters has been achieved, they discuss the conclusion of the affair with the leader. They soon agree, the visitors are notified, and everyone renews his body painting with particular care. The formal farewell from the lōima house consists of a čōwánni song, by means of which the spirits of the many different kinds of coastal and deep-sea animals are invoked. Thus on the last evening the people present intensify their singing at the given hour, put themselves into a state of spiritual excitement, and first of all invoke the kēšpix of those yékamuš who have died in that particular region, calling them into the lōima house. After a brief period of singing every participant thinks he feels their presence, and from then on the singing goes on, but faintly. Meanwhile everyone thinks about the čōwánni spirits. After a while the singing grows louder and stronger. At the same time everyone makes running movements along the ground with the fingers of both hands. These are supposed to show that his kēšpix is walking down to the beach with

756 787 the penguins, as far as the water line. From this point his kēšpiš begins a flight far out to sea in order to fetch the čōwánni spirits from the distance. This is immediately followed by arm movements which look as though the cupped hands were constantly shoveling water from below upwards, which means that the kēšpiš of the ílēščí (herring) are rising out of the depths of the sea and assembling. They are joined by the kēšpiš of whales and seals, marine and beach birds. Mašemikens cries: "Foam is appearing on the waves, it constantly increases! Soon the čōwánni spirits will turn toward our lōima hut!" Immediately Emilia clears the ground a bit in front of the entrance, "so that the canoes of the kēšpiš can easily glide in." As she does so, she calls: "Those čōwánni spirits have a great many vessels!" Now she gazes outside in a particular direction and moves her arms vigorously, "so that those spirits will quickly come." The singing of all the participants becomes more excited. Emilia cries enthusiastically: "The čōwánni spirits are quite close!" She stares at the ground in front of her /1414/ and cries joyfully: "All the canoes are now here where I am sitting! There are a great many. We must be alert or one of the canoes will hasten off with our kēšpiš!" Immediately Black sprinkles ími upon the many vessels, that is, on the spot in front of Emilia, because he, too, sees the many canoes in his mind. Emilia behaves most excitedly. She stares at the ground as though she were looking for something and declares: "These kēšpiš are bringing a lot of paddles, the men have a great many harpoons. I shall now distribute a few of these things!" She gesticulates as though she were taking hold of paddles or harpoons and rubs the hands of all the women and men, thereby handing these things over to them. Then all the women begin making rowing motions and all the men gesticulate as though they were hurling harpoons. In between there are shrill cries of hi hi hi...All this is done to please the kēšpiš who are present. Mašemikens repeatedly interrupts with cries of "Be on guard!" The singing grows fainter. Emilia looks around the circle as though mentally absent and says in a croaking voice, as though she were short of breath: "My own kēšpiš is now sitting in a canoe of the čōwánni spirits. I know many of them!" Once more the singing becomes animated, with all the people taking

Y756 787 part with full force; it is always the monotonous melody on the same pitch, without unison. It is only after some time that the voices grow weaker, and Emilia says loudly: "Now I shall send all the canoes back again!" While the faint singing goes on, all the people present get up and keep thrusting their arms forward parallel to each other, their hands stretched out and upright. These movements are accompanied by loud cries of kēkétz, which are supposed to push the čōwánni spirits out of the lōima house and far away. Then they vigorously stamp the ground with both feet in order to make the Haučélla spirits climb far down into the interior of the earth. Finally the song dies down. One person or another is still looking into the distance with tired eyes, as though he were following the departure of the čōwánni spirits.

With the agitated čōwánni song, which lasts about an hour, the people present have taken final leave of the spirits which appeared in the lōima hut. Each one gathers up his things and leaves the hut without any formality. The daily monotony in the family hut now starts again for everyone. The large lōima hut is abandoned to its fate. Soon the families are scattered in all directions.

Y756 773 Not only the lōima-yēkamuš, but the entire medicine-man system has been in the possession of the Yamana for a long time. They do not know anything definite about its origin; there is no myth that tells about it. Old Thomas gave me the opinion of authoritative persons: "The yēkamuš arrangement is very old. A long time ago the people who were the first to migrate into our region with the kīna also brought along the yēkamuš arrangement. They invented it, just as they invented the kīna. Then when the general upheaval occurred in Yāiaaišga /1415/ and the kīna was taken away from the women by the men, the great yēkamuš of that time changed themselves into stars and animals, Lēm and Akīnix, Alōula (Pseudorca crassidens), Yo'okalia (Milvago chimango), and many another capable yēkamuš. The few men [yēkamuš] and women who did not perish in that upheaval became the teachers of all the subsequent yēkamuš. There were some of these at all times." This reference to the origin of the yēkamuš system in the north points also to its connection with the kīna; this has been stressed in Gusinde (n):972. This explains the X756 773 designation ǒna-xéola which is the equivalent of yefǎčel-xéola. The lǒima-yékamuš is not linked up in any way with Watauinčiwa. I asked point-blank: "What is the attitude of Watauinčiwa when the yékamuš gather in the lǒima house?" My informants replied unanimously and without hesitation: "He simply looks on and lets them do as they please!" A lǒima-yékamuš gives the experienced masters great satisfaction, especially if they win over a few young men to their calling.

c. Activities of the Medicine Man

X756 781 533 Whenever a yékamuš wishes to act as such, he must put himself into a state of auto-suggestion. The people say he acts "in a dream." Now it may be that in his sleep an ordinary dream image excites him very much and awakens him. He continues to occupy himself, in a semi-conscious state, with the image thus received. In order not to lose it, he sings his monotonous melody while holding the upper part of his body bent forward and gently rocking back and forth. Briefly, what has happened is that his own yefǎčel or another spirit has made contact with the yékamuš; this contact continues for as long as he goes on singing, during which time there is an exchange of messages. More often the desire for contact with his yefǎčel comes from the yékamuš himself. In order to bring forth the yefǎčel, the yékamuš sits down on his pallet, fights off all distraction, fixes his thoughts upon his guardian spirit, and sings his own melody uninterruptedly while gently rocking the upper part of his body (329). After a

329. Bridges (e):332 and (k):237 reported: They "began singing many and long magic songs, if the senseless and monotonous noise and constant rocking back and forth of the body can be called such...": "Through spells, fasting, and rocking the body, they were able to induce a state of overexcitement and, when in this condition, claimed to possess extraordinary powers" /translated from Spanish/.

X756 time the singing suddenly becomes more lively. That is the 787 moment at which the yefáčel itself takes over the melody and 533 carries it on. At this point the medicine man's personal effectiveness is eliminated, and thereafter the yefáčel takes over. It recognizes the aims and intentions that the yékamuš is striving for and, for its part, makes an effort to /1416/ realize them. The yékamuš is aware of everything that the yefáčel does; he assesses the attitude and actions of the yefáčel and consults with it. When it leaves him, the singing stops and the yékamuš awakens from the absorption of his dream state.

With these brief words I have described the basic features of the co-operation between the yékamuš and his yefáčel or other spirits. No matter what the yekamuš plans and strives for, the force that carries it out is his yefáčel or another spirit. The people express this co-operation by saying: "The kěšpiš of the yékamuš gives way to the yefáčel; the latter acts by itself as long as the singing lasts." Thus the yekamuš who is trying to accomplish something starts on his own initiative to attract his yefáčel by singing. Sometimes it does not come although the yekamuš has been exerting himself for more than an hour by singing. Confronted with this lack of success, he stops singing and frankly tells the people around him: "Today my yefáčel has forsaken me!" Sometimes he makes a second attempt.

1. His Efforts for Fellow-Tribesmen

X756 Even if he starts singing in the middle of the night, the 302 medicine man never omits his simple outer trappings. They consist of the apáwēra which he ties around his forehead (p.1307) and a simple facial painting. For the latter he rubs his face and head with dry white powder or he draws a single finger-thick white or red line from one ear lobe to the other. He always carries these things within reach and his wife sees to it that he has pigments.

X756 From earlier communications and reports one can clearly infer that the activities incumbent on the yékamuš are varied. Despard (b):717 declared: "His business is to allay the storm;

X756 and as he must lead in funeral ceremonies, his qualifications must be to weep whenever he desires. His practice is to outshout, if possible, the roaring of the wind, and to stay the pitiless pelting of the storm by pelting mussel shells into it" /cited in English/. Bridges writes: "Doctors are believed to have great power in their dreams, even to eat persons, that is, to kill them" /cited in English/ (VSA:XI, 259;1864); he (h):209 and (a):213 also says: "They are said to possess supernatural powers to bring about good or bad weather, to cure the sick, etc." /translated from Spanish/. According to Burleigh, "the yékamuš practice a kind of witchcraft and profess to be able to see into the future and foretell events" /cited in English/ (MM:XXIII, 245;1889). This is really true.

Because of these multiple duties of the yékamuš they specialize, so to speak, each one generally devoting himself to a special area in which he achieves a certain mastery. Thus some yékamuš /1417/ are very well informed about the heavens and the sun, moon, and stars; others about clouds and the weather, rain and snow, frost and ice; still others about air currents, namely, winds and storms and the movement of the water, especially waves and eddies; other yékamuš are reliably informed about everything that moves in the forest, chiefly the habits of the guanacos and foxes, rats and owls; still others carefully observe the habits of whales, seals, and schools of fish in the water and flocks of birds along the coasts; finally, certain yékamuš are outstandingly capable in combating illness. Thus a Yamana who is in any kind of distress turns to a friend who is a "specialist" and requests from him counsel and enlightenment, help and support.

X756 787 Again it must be emphasized that every medicine man performs only "in the dream," that is to say, in a mental vision. He sings continually, as though lost in dreams, and whatever he sees in this awake visionary state has reality for him. He names and describes in audible words the details of his actions and those of his spirits, and on the basis of this the people around him follow his activity. Nothing that he shows or describes, grasps or gives away during his singing is actually present as such; the other people cannot perceive it with their senses or feel it with their hands. Only the yékamuš in his dream state deals with all the different things he mentions, yékuš and sling, weapons and tools, késpix of X756 787 human beings and animals, yefáčel, and Haučella as though everything were absolute reality. The people around him to whom he gives more or less explicit reports believe them and regard them as true. For example, if he cries, "I have caught this yékuš, hurled by a hostile yékamuš, with my right hand and and I am placing it on the ground in front of me," this means that the yékamuš performed this act in his vision, whether or not he moved his arms. All the people who hear his words accept them with the same credulity as that shown by a European who listens to his neighbor's report about his dream images. Our Yamana, however, regard everything that happens "in the dream" of their yékamuš as an actual event and believe in its direct effect or in the success proclaimed.

a. Healing the Sick

X756 753 755 The field in which the medicine men are most active and in which their help is demanded by their countrymen is that of healing the sick. In order to evaluate this correctly it must be kept in mind that the yékamuš does not combat actual physical suffering. If an ailment has appeared, it is quite possible that a hostile yékamus, an enemy of the person afflicted, has sent it, and the medicine man recognizes this situation "in the dream" or through a message of his yefáčel. /1418/ If this is truly the case -- the origin of such an ailment might be identified as magical -- then a stronger yékamus must release the afflicted person from it by neutralizing the sorcery of the hostile yékamuš. For example, if a person has stumbled and fallen or has an upset stomach, he applies a tested remedy which he himself knows or which a member of his family advises. Beyond that, however, in order to be on the safe side, he does not fail to go to a friendly yékamuš to be treated by him in his magical way. /Fig. 98 appears here./ An ordinary human being cannot tell whether his ailment derives solely from natural causes or whether a malevolent medicine man has a hand in it. Most ailments, especially those unfavorably affecting mental activity, are intentionally caused by a vengeful yékamuš in order to make the person ill or even to make him die.

755

The medicine man proceeds as follows. By means of his singing he puts himself "in the dream." Now he sees the kĕspiĭ of the other person; he seizes a yĕkuĭ and hurls it against the person, who is wounded in a more or less dangerous spot, just as the yĕkamuĭ intended. He immediately recognizes the effect of his yĕkuĭ, although the person who was hit becomes aware of what has happened to him only after some time. The malevolent yĕkamuĭ is pleased over his success, especially if he has performed this act at the special request of a fellow-tribesman. Sooner or later the other person feels sharp pains; perhaps he will have feelings of fear or, without any reason, will be filled with alarm. Since he cannot find any external reason and cannot explain his condition as due to obvious causes, he will reveal it to a friendly yĕkamuĭ. The latter puts himself in the dream state, discovers and observes how the kĕspiĭ of the person was treated, finds the impaled yĕkuĭ, pulls it out, examines it carefully, and recognizes in it the person who hurled it. Simply because he is strong enough, that is, stronger than the first yĕkamuĭ, he succeeds in freeing the wounded person of the yĕkuĭ and making him well. Otherwise, he is powerless to help and the person must die if the yĕkuĭ has not been removed in time in one way or another (330). Soon after he has awakened, no matter

330. This interpretation was indicated earlier, but in each case inaccurately, by Alvarez:147, Bridges (i):18, Cojazzi:106, Dabbene (b):192, and others. In one instance Bridges says more definitely: "Yecoosh, they suppose, is driven into their bodies by some ill-disposed doctor or other. This Yecoosh, which can only be seen by a doctor, and can only be held by him, the doctors pretend to suck out of the body of the sick person, who afterwards is supposed to recover his health quickly" /cited in English/ (VSA:XI, 258;1864).

how /1419/ his effort has turned out, he notifies the person of his condition and also identifies the yékamuŕ who wounded him. Moreover, he soon thereafter turns to that yékamuŕ, "in the dream" naturally, reproaches him for his destructive act, and rebukes him thoroughly: "Know that I am stronger than you! Beware of harming any of my relatives or friends! Look at this yékuŕ which you hurled against X [he gives the name] and of which I relieved him!" The other yékamuŕ realizes that he is exposed and does not contradict him. Sometimes the successful yékamuŕ shows the people around him the yékuŕ that he took out of the wounded person. Everyone who sees it -- naturally, only in their imagination, as presented by the yékamuŕ -- is amazed at its size and the ability of the medicine man. The people's admiration increases if the yékamuŕ has brought relief to a friend who was in great danger from a hostile yékamuŕ without being aware of his condition. Many medicine men spend considerable time in the broad realm of imagination and fantasy, and they are obviously the cause of all kinds of provocations by individuals or whole groups against one another.

[S78]

Usually the yékamuŕ applies his cure directly to the sick person. He has rubbed his own body with white pigment and tied his apawŕ's around his forehead. He sometimes also puts two or three of them around his torso. This external wrapping lends special solemnity to his activity. The sick person is lying on his pallet, and the yékamuŕ squats beside him. Usually members of the sick person's family are present. The medicine man begins his song, and in his awake vision he points with his finger to the part of the body where the yékuŕ is lodged. First he presses and massages the spot with his hands; then he puts his mouth to it and sucks as though he were drawing the yékuŕ up to the surface. Finally, at the moment of greatest agitation, while his whole body is trembling in a frightening manner, he gives a tremendous jerk and lifts up the extracted yĕkuš in his convulsively clenched fists. In another instance he will bend the upper part of his body far forward, press hard against his belly, and make strenuous vomiting motions, meaning that he is trying to get rid of the yĕkuš which he has sucked into his own body from the sick person (331). When

331. Bridges (i):18 describes the activity of the medicine men as follows: "They oftentimes handle the sick very roughly when in this wrought-up state, excited through much chanting and violent controtions they exorcised the pain and its cause from the body of the sufferer, pretending to do this by the hands and suction and to swallow the malady and its cause, which was supposed to be an arrow or spear pointed flint called yecoosh, of which the doctors always professed to have a supply in their stomachs" /cited in English/.

the yĕkuš or the stone or harpoon point /1420/ has been extracted in one way or another, the yĕkamuš shows it to the people present, as it lies on the palm of his hand. Then he brings his outstretched hand with the palm upward toward his mouth and with a short, vigorous puff blows the yĕkuš far away so that it is lost. After singing briefly the yĕkamuš gradually awakes and regains full consciousness. Everyone thanks him for his efforts. The person who has been treated also gets up and feels some kind of relief (332). We would interpret this sort of phenomenon as the effect of auto-suggestion.

In the case of superficial injuries or if someone has merely lost his footing, in the case of a slight mental indisposition or after unpleasant dreams, the Yamana goes to the yĕkamuš with

X756 755 whom he is on familiar terms. He immediately treats the petitioner with what I may call his "magical massage." Thereupon the latter departs in a state of relief. The yékamuf gently rubs the painful spot with the palms of both hands, or he massages the joints, or, in the case of an eye disease, he passes his open hands in circular motions in front of the face several times. After that he rubs both hands together, holds the palms upward, and with a vigorous puff that sounds like a shrill ft, he blows the "evil" far away. He makes the same movements over a person who has inadvertently stepped on a "harmful spot" (p. 1390) or over certain foods in order to render them harmless to eat (p.505).

X756 753 755 The common people, as well as the medicine men, make a very definite and clear distinction between an evil and disease caused by a yékamuf and one that is caused by Wataginéwa. Every yékamuf can make certain of this "in his dream" or by asking his yeffel, and he notifies the people around him. If a sufferer wretchedly groans ɛ̄, ɛ̄, it is obvious that Hayčélla has caused the evil and is crying out from the sick person. If, however, an illness is very violent from the start and develops so rapidly that the victim is soon at death's door, the people recognize this as the work of Wataginéwa. In each case, in order to reassure the people and above all, the sick person, the yékamuf will try his method of healing. He knows just as well as those around him that the malady has been inflicted on the person by Wataginéwa himself as a punishment and that it is areal illness which only he can take away, that the cause is neither a buried yékuf nor a Hayčélliakipa. Well aware that only Wataginéwa

X756 755 can help, the yékamuf tries his best and at the same time begs in the name of the sick person: "May the-one-up-there give you back your health!" If the medicine man realizes his helplessness in the case of /1421/ a certain disease, he, too, turns directly to that higher power which has caused the serious illness. Indeed, even more. Before the yékamuf begin his treatment in the case of a particularly serious illness, he prays to Wataginéwa and says: "Heal this man! But if you will not let him get well because you are justifiably angry with him, take the illness away from him for my sake! At least be kind to me, for it is very important to me to make this man well. Be good to me and give me enough strength to make him well! Give the sick man courage and give him back his health, for my sake!" Obviously the yikamuf is sincere when he addresses these words and other ancient prayer formulas to Wanyinkiwa so that the sick person will be quickly cured. The yikamuf, however, is also impelled by ambition, since he wants to prove his ability to the people by any means, he even calls on Wanyinkiwa for help and relies on his favorable relations with him. If a few members of the same family have died in quick succession, it may happen that a friendly yikamuf will say to the survivors: "That yikamuf [he designates him by name] has caused these deaths!" It is a universal belief that only Wanyinkiwa can cause a person to die. In the case just mentioned the people will complain to Wanyinkiwa, they will accuse him of being in collusion with that yikamuf and of acting with him. They will say, for instance: "Hinkiyin, why did you join that yikamuf and, with him, kill our relatives?" This is a cry from a heart tormented by grief and is similar to the well-known cries of mourning (p. 889).

B. General Animism

The individual Tonsna, as well as the independent family groups, will turn to a friendly yikamuf in all kinds of daily distress. Although I often heard, "Hinkiyin causes bad weather, Hinkiyin sends the heavy snow and the bad storm!" nevertheless the Tonsna also attribute to their yikamuf a definite influence on the weather (933). Who would not like to have calm, clear, > 933. Bridges (b.18 and (b).227 assumed in his day that the medicine men "had power to procure good weather and drive away bad" /cited in English/.

and warm weather down there in the Cape Horn Archipelago? In winter the families like to crowd their dwellings together so that a few yikamuf are together for a longer period. If on occasion heavy snowstorms continue and the people become sad, the yikamuf will promise them: "Be quiet and remain brave, tomorrow [or the day after tomorrow] favorable weather will set in!" The children, above all, become quiet, and the old people are full of expectation. Sure enough, on the day announced the snowmen at least shrink and perhaps there is even a cloudless sky. /1452/ Once on a rainy day I also heard: "Tomorrow ushpu [the constellation Orion, p. 1278 /unreviewed/] will appear!" On another winter's day a ulkamuf assured the people: "Tomorrow we shall see Yakiny-chenuyin again and that will usher in good weather!" Sure enough, each time the prognostication was fulfilled. The question is whether these ulkamuf were guided by knowledge derived from experience and careful observation? I cannot decide. In any case, the people ascribe the change of weather to the superior knowledge and ability of the ulkamuf. As is known, a number of medicine men gather together in the Ulamo-ulkamuf. Since they jointly exert their influence on the forces of nature, the people say that favorable weather prevails for the duration of that affair.

When there are persistent snows, the people are hindered in their freedom of movement and sometimes suffer great privation. Then the ulkamuf must save them by furnishing food. He lies down to sleep, starts his Ilwdani song, and thus invokes the Ilwdani spirits. The latter have whole swarms of hunting with them and these, of course, are accompanied by many other species of animals. They soon cover the beach near the people as dawns. In the same way the Ilwdani spirits drive many round crabs (Lithodes aequispina, Fig. 10 /in unreviewed portion/) up on the beach or cause many birds to light on nearby snows. The ulkamuf also was another helper. In his dream he calls an ahlula to him and describes to it the threatening situation of his family group. Thus prevailed upon, the ahlula returns to its region, and from there on the next day it lands a whale with its accompanying animals to the stricken group (p. 1260 /unreviewed/). As soon as the people see the many animals, they rejoice and thank their ulkamuf for this rescue. He finally releases the helpful spirits with his Ilwdani song, and they once more retire far out on the high seas. If the men plan a joint hunting expedition the following day, the ulkamuf assembles the day before and sent the Ilwdani song. This is supposed to assure them the help of these spirits on the following day and at the same time guarantee the L156 789 825 banners woven. While they sing, they stare into the distance, stretch out both arms, open their hands and clutch the air, draw their closed hands back to their bodies, open them, press them against the chest and, with gentle pressure, down to their knees. As they do so they repeat a skrill ư several times. With these movements they wish to invoke the hêfûif of the game animals, attract them, and gain power over them. The next day the men set out full of confidence.

L156 787 The Yamana believe that their medicine men can see into the future and that they have infallible prescience. The yêkamuf themselves are especially convinced of this and give advance warnings to individuals. They also may admonish their whole group to be careful or may announce the prospect of a favorable event. On March 28, 1932, I was standing with several people when Mâmmîbem said very distinctly: "Outside I see a long /1423/ canoe approaching with ngwîîwa [Phalacrocorax olivaceus]!" Sure enough, the following day the people sighted unusually dense flocks of these birds which seldom cross a channel in such numbers. On another occasion Emilia stared out at the ocean like a seeress and cried: "The sea is getting white, mountains of waves are forming and a great deal of foam is gathering!" Her words sounded strange to us, since the surface of the water was entirely smooth. The next morning, however, bad weather came up from the east, causing high waves, and we remembered that Emilia had announced this change at noon of the preceding day. A few people said in wonder: "How remarkable it is that our yêkamuf know so many things in advance!"

L156 755 If the population in general is struck by illness, either because they have eaten spoiled meat or, more recently, because of an epidemic brought by Europeans -- something that the yêkamuf occasionally foresee in a dream -- the medicine men feel obliged to help immediately. They are told in a dream at what place all the people must assemble. They announce the place and without delay call the people together to a makîpkîna. First, a big fire is kindled. All the adults and children stand around it. As soon as this circle begins to move, everybody raises his fists, wails in hollow sounds, and interjects frequent loud cries of tg tg. Finally they seize glowing sticks of wood and toss them high in the

Y 756 755 air. They believe that Watauinēiwa-sef sent the affliction (p. 910); therefore, the wrath of all of them is directed against him. After that they repeatedly strike at the fire with their hands with fingers outstretched, as though they were pushing the "sickness-evil" into the flames. After this agitated performance the yēkamuš promise the people that they will soon be freed of their suffering.

Y 756 At this point it should be recalled that the medicine man is sometimes a sort of leader. This is apparent in the lōima-yēkamuš and in the kīna (p. 1215). When a murder is to be avenged, he usually leads his people (p. 901), and two hostile groups attack one another under the direction of their yēkamuš. In everyday life, too, everyone likes to get advice from the medicine man with whom he is friendly and acts accordingly; especially if any kind of danger threatens the entire group appeals to him. The following will show that the yēkamuš feel obligated toward their groups. If a depressed mood, a psychic malady, or a general feeling of fear has seized the people, for example, during widespread illness, the yēkamuš arrange the makāinkīna, which is also the concluding ceremony of the Kina festival (p. 1289). This remedy dispels the particular spirits that have brought about melancholy and general despondency. If the yēkamus wish to calm the people after a day of excitement and prepare them for undisturbed slumber, they start the tīxer song. This is a real evening song, a soothing farewell to the waning day (pp. 797, 841).

/1424/ Y. Harmful Practices

Y 756 754 If the yēkamuš himself has quarreled with a person and wants to cause him grave harm, or if he intends to avenge a personal insult, or if he is carrying out the secret order of a friend who wishes to do away with an opponent, then he must first of all capture the kēspiš of the person and lock it up in a little bag, no matter how far away this kēspiš is. He needs a tiny bit of something that is closely connected or in close contact with that person, either a hair from his cloak of skin, a bit of wood from his hut, or a tendon from his bag; it may even be a

756 754 hair from his head, a bit of fingernail, or any insignificant thing. He takes it in his hands, stares fixedly at it for some time, kneads it and presses it, pulls it and shapes it, until it has taken on the shape of the person who is to be harmed. He can observe this transformation in his awake vision. Then he hides this little piece in an insignificant little bag called wŭkur$^{\underline{i}}$ (334). Now the kĕspiſ

334. I cannot decide whether it is this that BD:275 designates as "humuluf, a skin bag in which yekamuſ kept their odds and ends" /cited in English/. Hyades (q):307 gives this word as "bag of the healer" /translated from French/.

of that person is locked up as in a prison, and he cannot get out by himself. For his wŭkur$^{\underline{i}}$ the yĕkamuſ prefers to use the conical [825] cocoon, about three centimeters long, of the Thanatopsyche chilensis (Bombycidae), an insignificant-looking Fuegian butterfly whose caterpillar usually hangs its cocoon on Berberis bushes. From time to time the yĕkamuſ takes the little piece out of his wŭkur$^{\underline{i}}$, squeezes it and kneads it, crushes it and presses it, pulls and yanks it, drops it on the ground and stamps on it with his feet, tosses it high into the air and catches it again convulsively in his hands, and worries it in every conceivable fashion with emphatic and limitless malevolence. Finally the person from whom this little article was taken feels somewhat weak and unwell. As time goes on his feeling of sickness increases more and more, for he lacks his kĕspiſ which the yĕkamuſ retains in his wŭkur$^{\underline{i}}$ and constantly torments. Since the body of the person must do without his kĕspiſ for such a long time, he uses up his vitality and grows progressively weaker. If a stronger yĕkamuſ does not see the situation in his dream and, aware of the threatened position of that person, order a halt, the person is doomed. If he is stronger than the other yĕkamuſ, he must immediately free the person's kĕspiſ from the wŭkur$^{\underline{i}}$ and lead it back to its body. As a rule the sufferer does not realize soon enough that a yĕkamuſ has robbed him of his kĕspiſ. It is only after much blood has flowed from his nose and mouth and he is very weak that a capable yĕkamuſ will reveal the situation and offer to make the urgently necessary rescue. He does

X156 754 this by freeing the person's késpix from the power /1425/ of the malicious medicine man, catching it with his own hands, and restoring it to the suffering person. Usually this rescuer calls the other yékamuš to account for his base behavior.

Almost all yékamuš practice the above method of harming another person and torturing him to death. Each késpix caught is put in a separate wúkur. When he is not being observed, a yékamuš will take out the little pieces representing the individual persons and their késpix, one after another, mention each person by name, torture each one in a special way, and once again lock each one in his own wúkur. He frequently fills the bag with blubber, so that the késpix will remain motionless, and sews it shut with tendons. He puts the separate wúkur safely away in a secret place. He continues his torture of each individual késpix until the person in question collapses from weakness and dies. In the mental visions of the medicine man the késpix has the same form and shape peculiar to the living human being to whom it belongs, but the yékamuš sees it only in diminutive size.

If a medicine man wants to create a lasting impression among his people, he will call them together and, after singing briefly, put himself into an awake visionary state. Then he shows the people a real wúkur, takes from it an infinitesimally small object, and stares fixedly at a particular person. He says to the person: "Herewith I give you back your késpix, it was in the power of X (335)!" The same thing is repeated with other persons. They are surprised and believe that they remember having felt more or less exhausted. Now they are released from serious danger and loudly thank the yékamuš for their rescue. They have still more respect for him.

335. He specifically names a medicine man, usually one who he knows is hostile to himself or to the person addressed.

A capable medicine man sometimes succeeds in murdering another person within a few days. He either attacks a personal enemy or he acts on the special request of a fellow-tribesman. As he sings he puts himself into the dream state; his own késpix

X756 754 leaves his body and meets his Haučéllakīpa somewhere. The two now undertake a serious attack against the kēspix of the person they wish to destroy. They choke him, wrestle with him, and stamp on him. No matter how bravely the kēspix defends itself, Haucélla is stronger and finally hurls a yēkuš at him so that he falls down dead. The poor man wakes up in a state of utter exhaustion; blood flows from his nose and mouth, and vomiting and other serious difficulties occur. He is so weak that his kēspix does not even remember having fought so hard the night before. /1426/ His physical strength wanes perceptibly and within a few days he is dead. I was told that if a Haucélla fatally injures a kēspix with the yēkuš of her medicine man, there is no hope for the wounded person, but only a few yékamuš succeed in obtaining such capable co-operation from their Haucélla. No one explained to me whether and how the procedure just described can be reconciled with the unlimited right of Watauinéjwa over human life and death. This much, however, is obvious, namely, that the yékamuš are the cause of constant uncertainty and disturbance for their fellow-tribesmen and that everyone must seriously fear and avoid a malicious, hostile yékamuš.

δ. Feats of Strength

X756 787 [555] There are all kinds of occasions when a yékamuš wants to prove his ability to his own family group or his superiority to his colleagues, for the more one of them achieves, the greater will be the people's faith in him and the more he will be esteemed by all. Younger men, especially, are obliged to demonstrate such feats of strength, for they must gain acceptance among their countrymen. It should be noted, however, that all achievements of this kind are performed by the yékamuš in their mental visions, and they clearly describe all the details. For example, one of them will be sitting in front of his hut fire, and during his singing he will become extraordinarily excited. Suddenly he cries: "Now I am seizing hot coals and filling my belly with them!" In the awake vision he stretches out his arms to the fire, as though he were tossing burning pieces into his mouth; after a time he makes vomiting motions, as though he were spewing out the burning embers. Afterward, when he awakes, he is, of course, unharmed, but the people around him believe that everything took place just as he described it. Nevertheless, it happens now and then that he really does seize a burning ember and instantly tosses it away; during this brief interval, noticeable burns cannot form, but his action, which is certainly not deception and is not intended to be, makes an impression (336). On one occasion I was told: "The

336. It is only in this sense that one can interpret what Bridges (k):237 and (l):18 observed: "I have seen one of them hurl himself on the fire and throw the burning embers up in the hut among the people assembled there; meanwhile he danced on the superheated hearth. It is to be supposed that the hard skin of his feet was somewhat burned, and it is probable that he took the precaution of wetting them well beforehand" /translated from Spanish/.

medicine man Inois from the eastern group once had an asikíku in a lonely section of the forest and remained in the dream state for a long time. He saw many čówánni spirits who sat down all around him, were very gay, and invited him to a meal. When he woke up, the fire that the čówánni spirits had kindled was still burning beside him. He seized a few glowing pieces of wood, put them in his mouth, on top his head, and behind his neck and /1427/ then went to sleep again. Later he told his relatives about it. They looked him over carefully, but discovered no signs of burning and were very much astonished." Obviously all this took place in the mental vision of the medicine man. In March, 1923, Charlin told me: "Once there were several yékamuš assembled in Bahía Moat. As it happened, a dead whale was drifting in the broad channel just opposite this place. There were high waves; no one would venture out in a canoe. They had no recourse but to draw the whale to them with their 'strength.' They sat down at the edge of the water and began to sing. Meanwhile each of them hurled a few yĕkuš at the whale. They hit their mark and it drifted to shore. When the people learned of this act of their yĕkamuš, they maveled at their ability." Again this is an incident that occurred in the mental vision of the yĕkamuš and afterward was told to the people.

Moreover, two yĕkamuš will also have an actual contest in which one will try to outdo the other. An example of this has already been given on p. 1310. Usually the procedure is for each one to aim his yĕkuš at a particular goal. The one whose yĕkuš reaches this goal or even flies beyond it is the winner. In another type of contest one yĕkamuš will catch in flight the yĕkuš hurled by his opponent and send it back. The one who cannot muster up the strength to do so loses. The other yĕkamuš can observe such proceedings in their mental visions, and they inform ordinary people of them. The superiority of one yĕkamuš over his opponent is also shown when he forces him to cease his harmful acts. Examples of this have been mentioned on pages 1345 and 1353. They also show how easily a yĕkamuš can disturb the peace and conjure up ill-feeling (p. 1301).

Every yĕkamuš, without any undue effort, can make the kĕspix of an ordinary human being subservient to him, and the younger the person is, the easier this can be done. The yĕkamuš keeps the "spirit" in his power as long as he chooses, unless a stronger yĕkamuš frees him. If this does not happen and the kĕspix is not released, the "soulless" body will gradually waste away and the person will die. For example, if a medicine man commences the Ōima song in his hut and is disturbed by a child, he will seize the child's kĕspix. During the brief period of the song this has no perceptible effect on the child, but the people present are anxiously concerned that the yĕkamuš soon restore the kĕspix to the child. Therefore after the singing is over, he will make violent retching motions, recover the kĕspix, and hand it back to the child by drawing his open hands up and down several times along the child's body. If the kĕspix were not returned in this fashion, the child would die after a time. Every yĕkamuš is closely watched by those around him, which is necessary and advisable since this determines the favorable or unfavorable opinions that his fellow-tribesmen have of him.

/1428/ 2. His Relationship to Spirits

The previous description leaves no room for doubt that all the activity of the medicine man takes place on a spiritual level. Thus he is completely dependent on certain spirits. When he practices his calling, he has no connection with Watauinéiwa, but in individual cases he realizes that he can achieve nothing in opposition to the Supreme Being (p. 1347). Once Mašemikens said to me very definitely: "Watauinéiwa does not bother about the things that the yékamuš do. They ignore him entirely. Sometimes, however, they ask him for help." Similarly the Yamana do not mention any connection between the yékamuš and Yetáita, who is mentioned in the youth initiation (p. 760), or Tánuwa, who plays an important part in the Kina, or the Yoálox family, which rendered important service to the Yamana (p. 1120). The water spirits, Lakúma, which threaten ordinary people, are well-meaning toward a yékamuš and let him pass unharmed if he identifies himself by his singing. He is directly dependent on the Yefáčel and Haučélla (337) in his calling, but occasionally he also

337. Bridges (k):238 has already mentioned this: "The yecamush pretends to have dealings with beings called yapahchel and hoachiella, and they give him the ability to see and do fabulous things, especially to cure and to kill"/translated from Spanish/.

I was told about the following lakúm-asikáku yékamuš, that is, the visionary intercourse of a yékamuš with a lakúma. A yékamuš was married to a woman who was very jealous of him. He was very much concerned about the welfare of his countrymen, which she did not like. Once when the two were on a canoe trip, she said mockingly: "I thought you were a capable yékamuš! You get all kinds of things to eat for other people; for me you do not let a whale or fish be driven ashore, you do not let birds land or crabs come to the surface. You ought to take much better care of your wife!" The yékamuš was very upset by these sarcastic words,

X 756 and, without replying, he lay down. Although he kept his eyes 787 closed, his wife continued to taunt him. She did not stop until the medicine man was snoring loudly. She steered her canoe toward Kāawaja. Meanwhile the yēkamuš slept and called to two Lakūma from Kāluwa [in the west], which was far away. They finally arrived in Kāawaja, immediately seized the canoe, and lifted up the bow. Full of fear, the woman called to her husband, who was still sleeping: "Get up and help me in this danger; after all, you are a yēkamuš!" Very calmly he replied: "Try to get along by yourself. You have often told me that I cannot do anything!" She begged: "I entreat you to help me, otherwise the Lakūma will kill me!" After his wife had trembled for a long time, he sat up, but he still did not lift a hand. The woman was in an agony of fear. Finally he told her: "Paint both Lakūma with white pigment!" She replied: "Impossible, /1429/ I am unable to do that!" So he said: "Then give me the pigment!" With it he approached the bow, leaned over, and painted both Lakūma; one was on the right, the other on the left side. The Lakūma did not offer any resistance. Then the yēkamuš got up, stretched out both arms, and laughed hī hī... The two Lakūma slowly let the boat down and dived. Instantly they sent the canoe favorable weather and it soon reached its destination. The woman was completely convinced and ruefully confessed to her husband: "Hitherto I have made fun of you and regarded you very contemptuously; now I know that you are truly a competent yēkamuš!"

α. The Yefacel

X 756 It is well known that every Yamana has a guardian spirit 776 known as yefačel. Whereas ordinary people act little or not at 787 all on this belief, every yēkamuš maintains the most intimate connections with his yefačel. Even in BD:661 this fact is confirmed: "yāpačāl, a being of more than human power and sagacity whom the yēkamuš claimed as their inspiring power and instructor" /cited in English/.

776
787

The medicine man treats the yefčel somewhat like his child. He calls it to him with tender singing and discusses things with it quite intimately. He gives it all kinds of duties which it fulfills without opposition. The kēpif of the yēkamuš associates with the yefčel in all kinds of things, just like human beings. They see each other in visions and consult with one another. As a matter of fact, it is the yefčel that carries out the work of the medicine man. While it acts by itself far away, he remains completely motionless, stretched out on his pallet, waiting until it has fulfilled the duty given it (338). If it stays

338. Bridges (i):18 also mentioned this state of affairs: "When under the influence of the yapachel they pretended to be insensible to outward things, the burning of the fire and the presence of their friends. They at such times acted as though really possessed" /cited in English/.

near by, it continues the song begun by the yēkamuš, that is, it sings through him. The yēkamuš calls his guardian spirit by means of the song that the yefčel gave him long ago when he received the call to this office (pp. 1318, 1330). This singing is called ušīna yefčel and ašīna lōima. If in an exceptional case the yefčel does not appear, the yēkamuš feels abandoned and disappointed. Loudly enough so that those around him can hear, he complains: "Where is my yefčel today? It probably stayed behind in the woods and is keeping me waiting here. My song is not successful now. I shall have to repeat it later!" The yefčel converse among themselves and with the yēkamuš in a special language. To ordinary people this sounds like a low, resonant tē, tē, but in it are hidden words that are intelligible to all yēkamuš and yefčel. /1430/ The yēkamuš is content in the company of his yefčel. In order to keep it with him now and then, he presses both hands hard against his chest or puts them against his throat. On his own initiative the yefčel will report to his yēkamuš various things which he ought to know. This guardian spirit is the active force in the practice of the yēkamuš and, always at his disposal, is his most intimate companion throughout his life.

β. The Haucella

Besides a yefǎčel, the medicine man is supported by a Haučellakipa. Although the two do not often meet, the Haučella is incomparably mightier than the yefǎčel. The origin of these spirits, which are both male and female, has already been described (p. 1119). To supplement it, here is what Maĭemikem told me in August, 1923. Back in the time when the general upheaval took place, a few women hastened out of the Kina hut and hid on the Wollaston Islands. There they became Haučéllakĭpa and entered the earth. They are hostile to human beings. Each of them succeeded in pulling a man down into the interior of the earth where he became a Haučella. All of them are bent upon ensnaring our men and women with their flirtations. It is very bad that sometimes [male] Haučella even assault our men and Haučéllakĭpa do the same to our women (339).

339. With these words homosexual intercourse is clearly admitted, but only as a rare transgression by the bad spirits mentioned.

Anyone who is ensnared by these spirits is lost, unless he is saved in time by a yékamuĭ, but this is not genuine love. For example, if I should be going to a brook, lost in thought, an enchantingly beautiful woman may suddenly appear before me, enticing me with flattery and breaking down my resistance. This is a Haučéllakĭpa. Thereafter I cannot get rid of this image; it is constantly before my [mind's] eye, and I am caught by the spell of love. Wherever I go, wherever I sit and work, this image hovers before me and follows me everywhere. Months go by and still the image of that woman overpowers me. While all this is going on within the man, he finally comes to his senses and says: "Every move I make is difficult for me, I feel unwell, my strength has long since failed me. But I cannot part from that woman, I am as close to her as though we were married. I am so filled with this woman and so dominated by her, it is as though an illness had penetrated my body. She has

X 156 776 787 long since subdued me, I must die!" That is the way such a man will talk. Sure enough, Haučéllakiya draws him down to her under the earth; his kilpuf remains married to her forever and his earthly body dies. In the same way a [male] Haučéll a bewitches a Yamana woman, until she, too, falls completely into his power. A yékamuf realizes perfectly what is happening between one of our people and /1431/ the Haučéll a. He must free a person in time from the power of those evil earth spirits or the person will surely die.

X 156 828 776 787 Maňermikens added the following to the above description: As a young man I traveled with my cousin south through the Molinare Channel. He was involved with a Haučéll a without admitting it to himself. He had not eaten anything for several days. Although I offered him something to eat several times, he did not take anything. He always replied: "I have no desire to eat! I don't know what is happening to me!" We passed a place where we found many birds' eggs. My cousin did not eat anything. As we traveled on I suddenly realized: my cousin is under the spell of a Haučéll a! After we had traveled on for some time, he leaped up in the forward part of the canoe and cried apprehensively: "A threatening storm is coming up!" I replied: "Not at all! We are having wonderful, calm weather!" He was completely out of his mind. When we reached Arákuwělla, my cousin ordered: "Light a big fire! She is approaching and bringing many asiya [round crabs] with her." I did as he asked, and soon he again ordered: "Make the fire bigger. She is considerably vexed by the cold!" I was speechless. Then my cousin cried: "Now she is here and is seizing me!" Instantly I picked up a stick and beat the air all around my cousin. Gradually he calmed down; we lay down and went to sleep. Since my cousin was feeling better the next morning, we rowed to Ilakěteyiňka. Having arrived there, we landed. Full of despair he said to me: "Let me warn you! -- I must soon die." In my anxiety I again seized a stick and beat the Haučéllakiya close beside my cousin. She, however, escaped under the hut wall and out into the open. My cousin immediately hurried after her and cried longingly: "My wife is running away!" After he had gone a few steps he collapsed and was dead.

In general the interior of the earth is designated as the regular abode of the Haučélla. These spirits live together there in an extremely spacious hut. In his visions a yékamuš can more or less clearly observe what everyone is doing there. Maiemikens assured me: "If a yékamuš suddenly falls down, collapses as though drunk, and lies there motionless, that is when he sees quite clearly what is going on in the spacious hut of the Haučélla." The lóima hut is called "house of Haučélla," because these spirits give the men more trouble there than elsewhere. Individual Haučélla like to inhabit the so-called "dangerous places" which every Yamana anxiously avoids (p. 1200). Calderon said: "If a man alone inadvertently enters such an area, he suddenly becomes weak, sits down exhausted, and falls asleep. In his dream he sees himself lying beside a Haučéllakīpa who fondles him and has illicit intercourse with him. Since he feels utterly weak, he cannot defend himself and must let her have her way. After he /1432/ wakes up, he recalls but faintly what he experienced in his dream, and it frightens him to think that he has lain in the embrace of the Haučélla. His own weakness forces him to lie down again, and he is filled with dreamy bliss. Haučéllakīpa brings all this about because she wants to have sexual intercourse with him. Such a state lasts for many weeks, until a competent yékamuš frees the helpless man. The yékamuš sees what a Haučélla does to every man whom she has charmed into her embrace. With his singing the yékamuš calls together the čówánni spirits, who must release such a man from the spell of that woman. A bitter struggle commences, which the yékamuš watches in his dream. The spirits seize the man [his kéšpix] and pull him away; he is bleeding and his entrails hang out. Haučélla fights for him against the spirits and wards them off. But finally the many čówánni spirits triumph, free the man from the spell of the Haučélla, and bring him back on earth. He is now forever free of that evil woman and slowly recovers from his weakness. The čówánni spirits are the helpers of the yékamuš. They behave like human beings; they see and know everything. He associates with them as with his own kind and gives them instructions which they carry out according to his wishes. The yékamuš is completely free to use these spirits, but he helps only persons

756 he wants to help. He realizes that many other Yamana are under 776 the spell of the Haučélla, but he does not bother about them."
787 As an exception, a yékamuř will have a female yeřčel as his guardian spirit. It is like his daughter, and he may not be guilty of improper behavior toward her. If a yékamuř should force his [female] yeřčel to make love, his Haučéllakípa will grow jealous, come to him in a dream, give herself to him, and make him believe he is embracing the yeřčel. The yékamuř will be overjoyed, for he does not know that he is being deceived by his Haučéllakípa. Slowly he grows weaker, his condition grows constantly worse, and finally, when he is dying, he comes altogether under the power of Haučéllakípa. Such a yékamuř must, from the start, be on his guard toward his female yeřčel. Again it becomes evident that all the Haučélla spirits are unfriendly and spiteful, indeed, hostile toward ordinary people as well as toward the yékamuř.

Children may result from the union of a Yamana with a Haučélla spirit. "They are always full-fledged Haučélla; they remain with the Haučélla in the earth, and now and then let a person feel their dislike for him. The Haučélla spirits are very numerous. A yékamuř is well acquainted with each of them."

756 Although even the yékamuř must be on his guard against a 776 Haučéllakípa, she is a reliable helper for a particularly difficult 787 act. If he wants to do away with an enemy quickly, he sends his 755 Haučéllakípa against him. She enters his body, which swells up enormously, and the end soon comes. For some people it is a pleasure to follow the enticements /1433/ of Haučéllakípa into the earth and to remain with her (p.1041). I was given the following explanation of this. "If someone dies at the instigation of a Haučélla spirit, his kéřpif goes on living among the Haučélla, but he himself does not turn into a Haučélla and does not harm anyone. The yékamuř must see to it that no Yamana lets himself be ensnared by the Haučélla or destroyed by them." If a person is under the spell of a Haučélla spirit, the yékamuř will invite several men and have them form a closed circle around the sick person. He himself holds the evil spirit back for a time within this circle, so that the spirit grows weak. After that the yékamuř angrily bites the ground and wounds the Haučélla spirit fatally:

456 the sick person is then relieved. It may happen that a malevo-776 lent medicine man is accompanied by his Hauʼéllakipa as he 787 walks through the camp. If the two pass an unsuspecting child, 255 she will take its kéipif away. Quickly an alert yékamuf must match the kidnapped kéipiz from the Hauʼéllakipa and give it back to the child. He calls the child to him, rubs his open hands in a gently stroking motion up and down along the child's body several times, makes retching motions and coughs violently. Finally he kneads the child's body and announces: "Now you have your kéipif back!"

456 I see a certain consistency in the fact that the Yamana as-776 sociate the first illness with these spirits. They say: "Before 253 the general upheaval in Yíjaaliga, there was not a single sick person, but afterward one man suddenly felt persistent violent pains. He was ill and could not get up. Excitedly many men assembled and considered how this illness could have come about.
After searching for a long time they discovered that the disease came from that malevolent woman who at that time escaped and fled to the south where she entered the earth (340). The men

340. In one instance it was said that "a woman tried to see whether she could transform herself and become a Haucella" (p. 1120); another time it was said that "a few women on the Wollaston Islands turned into Haucella and entered the earth" (p. 1360). The difference in the number of persons is unimportant; the significant thing is the agreement concerning the act described.

called this dangerous woman Hauʼéllakipa. Then they considered how they could protect themselves against being ill, and they requested the yékamuf to offer their help to all Yamana."
This account is a good explanation of the first activity of the medicine men.

d. Characteristics of the Medicine-Man System

X756 The preceding description definitely shows that the yfkamuf occupies a unique position among the Yamana. The medicine man is more or less feared, no matter how much help he gives his family group. Since he does, after all, attempt at times to bring considerable harm and death to other fellow-citizenmen, whether on his own initiative or at the request of a friend, /1434/ he is remote from the frequently recommended virtue of universal helpfulness. The privileged position which is granted him on some occasions is at variance with the equality that is generally conceded the members of the tribe. As a result, every yfkamuf is exaggeratedly anxious about his personal honor, as is shown in the stories about the medicine man (p. 1266 /unpublished/). Linked with this is selfishness which is strictly prohibited in the everyday life of our Yamana. If a yfkamuf has cast his eye on a beautiful, capable woman, she will marry him even though she has little desire to do so. She is governed by the consideration that he could do her serious harm if she refused. The special feather decoration, apawkra, a unique body painting, and the ikima-yfkamuf, are reserved exclusively for the yfkamuf. If several medicine men are sitting together in a group, other people, especially children, must be particularly respectful and quiet, so that the medicine men are not disturbed. Often a yfkamuf will seize the spirit of the person who comes near him. It is advisable, therefore, to pass in front of him, not behind him, so that one can observe his attitude. If someone is obliged to pass him when his back is turned, he should do this very slowly and cautiously. The medicine men do not trust one another. A person who takes a piece of meat or a swallow of water should first remove the "harm" which an enemy has possibly put into it, or he will become ill. Hence he makes certain movements, as though he were scooping out the "evil"; he places it on his open palm and blows it far away.

X756 766 The corpse of a medicine man is given careful treatment. Soon after his demise he is painted in the manner peculiar to him and decorated with the apawkra (p. 1048). He is also painted red all over (p. 1110). His material possessions are placed beside him and the hut is set on fire (341). The many people who have

341. Despard (9):717 maintains: "When yaccomoob dies, his body is burned to ashes, and these ashes thrown to the winds he rules so mightily, for them to make sport withal" /cited in English/. The last part of this statement is incorrect.

assembled throw all kinds of objects into the fire, whatever they can lay their hands on. They do this in honor of the deceased (p. 1056). Since in recent times even medicine men are buried, the people see to it that his face is turned upward. The community of souls of all deceased yéhamaf and of people who have drowned is regarded as the actual Ehéhelgle. This term, which also has a general meaning (p. 1048), is related to Éléhef in SD:91. These souls move toward the east where they dwell (342). As night they sometimes return to their homes and every living medicine man can see them. Molly Lawrence said in all seriousness "Since our éléhef like to travel to the east when we dream at night or are drowsily beseeling during the day, the yéhamaf meeting /1435/ and when being back the éléhef, or they would be lost in that distant region where the éléhef of dead yéhamaf actually dwell." All this shows the unique position of the medicine men, even though they cannot be noticeably distinguished from their countrymen in everyday life, but conform to tribal tradition as may Tamana.

342. Bridges (1):19 writes that "drowning men were spoken of as the dead wizards of their people" /cited in English/. I did not encounter this belief. It is well known that the Selk'nam regard drowning men as the "prey of the medicine men" (Vol. I, 880).

If one examines the meaning and nature of the medicine man system, its uniqueness becomes apparent. It does not correspond either to the natural disposition of the Tamana or to the

X756 182 basic features of their mental attitude. Legend puts the origin of the medicine-man system outside the boundaries of present-day Yamana territory and connects it with the Kina. Maŕemikens designated Hǵípul, Yo'okalīŋ, and other birds as the first yékamal (pp. 1268, 1271 /both untranslated/). "They taught their art to a few people and that is how it came to us!" There is no connection between the medicine-man system and the other institutions of our Fuegians; it is clearly a peculiar form within their culture as a whole.

G. Mental Capacity

181 114 No people on American soil has been rated as low and esteemed as little by the entire European world as our Yamana. The seed for this unjust opinion was sown by the crew of the Dutch fleet of L'Hermite, the first Europeans seen by the inhabitants of the Cape Horn Archipelago (p. 50 /untranslated/). The description that enjoyed the most notoriety was the inadequate and inaccurate account set down by Charles Darwin, then 22 years old (p. 97 /untranslated/). Although he occasionally made an accurate statement in his writings (343) and, as an old man, changed his opinion very much in favor of our Fuegians (p. 106 /untranslated/), nevertheless this did not effect the bias of the general public. Anyone who leafs through the amazingly large number of accounts by missionaries (p. 146 /untranslated/) will find it strange that the latter almost uniformly speak disparagingly, indeed, contemptuously of the mental performance of these natives, and their opinions of them have not improved despite decades of contact. Bridges outdoes all the other missionaries in his underestimation of the entire cultural heritage of our Fueguians (p. 303 /untranslated/), and none of the missionaries would have succeeded in persuading him otherwise. The Yamana soon realized that Bridges, with emphatic disdain, rejected their ideas and customs, which, without exception, were valuable to them and worthy of respect. Consequently they drew away from him and /1436/ made many of their spiritual possessions unavailable to him (p. 144 /untranslated/). Their attitude did not change even when Bridges, in exceptional cases, spoke a brief word in their favor (344). Actually, Bridges was the > 344. These statements, such as the one in (1).12, therefore have much more value for an outsider: "These natives have usually been described as a great deal worse than they were. I will know they were bad enough as all ignorant, lawless people must be, but they were falsely reported to be cannibals, and the sketches of them have been rather caricatures than likenesses" /cited in English/.

> 343. He (f):I, 234 said: "The Fuegians belong among the lowest savages; I was constantly surprised, however, at how closely the three Fuegians on board the 'Beagle' ...resembled us in general traits and in most of our mental abilities."

adviser and the decisive source of information for all the visitors to Tierra del Fuego who consulted him during his long years of missionary activity. His many publications were also regarded as those of an authoritative observer whom others had no opportunity to correct. Although the members of the Mission Scientifique du Cap Horn, for example, maintained close contact with a group of natives there for an entire year, nevertheless their publications prove how dependent they were on Bridges, especially in their evaluation of the spiritual equipment and mental assets of the Yamana. This state of affairs explains the uniformly low opinion of almost all the travelers who commented on the mental capacity of our Fueguians. Nevertheless, favorable testimony, such as that of Snow (b).D06, is not altogether lacking: "I will only venture to call your attention to the fact, that these savages have a heart and feeling as well as we have. And I saw many instances of warm love and affection for the children, and for each other" /cited in English/.

181 Experts on primitive peoples were not doubt upon the trustworthiness of all these reports on Tierra del Fuego, and from insignificant accounts as well as fair judgments, they brought out many a favorable detail. Wuttke07 emphasized: "One must not believe that the mental dullness [of the Fueginos] prevails throughout among them. . . The four Fueginos whom Captain Fitzroy took with him to London showed altogether good qualities." Ratzel2,120 appreciates their material possessions and social institutions. Beyond that he declares: "The more one learned of their sensibilities and mental capacities upon closer contact, the higher one evaluated them in this respect. The Fueginos, even though they are oppressed by the misery of their situation, are basically indians like all the rest. The inadequate results of missions cannot prove anything to the contrary." Thus, if the Yamana are judged to be genuine Indians, they must also be regarded as capable human beings. The fact that they are indeed such is convincingly proved by their way of life which has been described in the foregoing pages. The following pages will be a not inconsiderable supplement to this. It seems strange to us who have been privileged to obtain such deep insight into the mental life of most of the primitive peoples still available today that it seems necessary to prove that the Yamana, too, are alegitimate human beings.

/1437/ a. Mental Power and Sensory Activity

153 I regard as beside the point the oft-repeated question as to whether the Yamana are an "intelligent people" and capable of meeting the demands of our culture. One will obtain a just evaluation of their mental powers only after he has learned to understand the Fueginos with respect to their mastery of their environment. They have adapted themselves excellently to their country: they have learned to use the available materials for serviceable implements and have asserted their superiority in their struggle with the forces of nature. Indeed, they contrasts themselves to their environment and have attained several not inconsiderable achievements of which many Europeans would be incapable if they were suddenly transplanted to that environment. The reality of their cultural possessions, properly understood or having been fashioned from their natural surroundings, is persuasive testimony as to the mental capacities and well-developed senses that our Fuegians enjoy. They needed to develop their mental aptitude only to a certain degree, and were able to do so, in accordance with the external demands made on them. Once this equilibrium was achieved (340), there was not only a lack of pressure for greater accomplishments, but these would have resulted in a disturbance of the equilibrium. Hence there was an actual standstill, with a steadfast persistence throughout centuries in the particular form of culture with its many striking and insignificant details which was finally achieved after an inestimable number of separate experiences and which ensure the Fuegian an adequately satisfying existence.

340. Darwin did not see this state of equilibrium. Seeing his discussion on the poverty of that corner of the globe, he (1/147) judges quite falsely: "How little the higher mental powers can be exercised here; what can the imagination picture there, what can reason compare, judgment decide? To break off a bowlful of mussels from a rock does not even require craftiness, this humblest mental capacity of an animal. In some respects their skill can be compared to animal instinct, for it is not refined by experience; their canoe, their most ingenious invention, unbearable though it is, has remained the same for the last 100 years, as we know from Drake.

1. Mental Activity

Far from being forced and led by blind instinct alone, the Yamana's actions often follow long, thorough consideration. He makes a plan for a particular goal, considers the ways and means of achieving it, tests the forces at his disposal, and carefully observes the development of his undertaking. Sometimes he discusses it with others and secures the advantages of their advice, experience, and co-operation. He wisely takes into consideration what seems to be most useful for his purpose. Whether the attempt succeeds or not, he mercilessly renders an account of it to himself and his neighbors. In /1438/ so many words he judges this act a failure and that one as the decisive turning point toward success. To their own dismay many a man and woman will frankly complain to others: "I should have done this or that some other way, then I would not have made a useless effort!" Every outsider who carefully observes the Yamana can find hundreds of examples to prove their causal thinking. True, our Fueglans often act without much reflection and do not thoughtfully go over a matter if they must make a momentary decision. Their thoughts then come in fits and starts and their decisions are made without premeditation. Aside from the fact that in this form of behavior they resemble all other groups of human beings, in such a situation they are at least guided by an instinct trained through experience and enlightened by quick thinking. Their language has plenty of bluntly descriptive words for persons who always act thoughtlessly or who behave stupidly.

A person who often considers his own experience and who more than others thinks about the behavior of persons around him will attain considerable keenness of judgment with which he protects himself against mistakes. It is not surprising that a sharp-witted Yamana likes to emphasize: "What our forefathers taught us is most preferable, is most suitable!" He realizes that this or that arrangement or specialty proves to be far better than new experiments, hence everybody's respect for tradition, for the many details and individual items of their cultural heritage. The members of the tribe seek advice from a person who is mentally superior; they follow this advice whenever unusual circumstances arise. To act after judicious consideration, to evaluate calmly the effects of an act, and to adapt to all the knowledge gathered by experience -- all this has led our Yamana to adopt whatever is most serviceable in their country. All subsequent generations have clung to it (346).

346. It is meaningless to say, as Hyades (q):248 maintains about the mental capacities of our Yamana, "that they are little developed, are not applied to bettering existing conditions, and seem incapable of improvement" /translated from French/, or, as Lovisato (b):144 declares, "the Fuegians have little intelligence, very little memory, no retentiveness" /translated from Italian/.

182 The meager natural products that the region offers could probably not be better utilized for modest requirements than they have been by our Fuegians. In particular, the technical perfection of their weapons and implements should be noted (p.210), the efficiency of which could probably not be increased. Men, as well as women, have at their disposal only inadequate resources and raw materials. After all, the tools they use are their own handiwork. One must marvel at the usefulness and effectiveness of all the objects that their patient labor fashions from the rough material. The "artisans" pay careful attention to /1439/ beauty and regularity, which are, correspondingly, more or less praised by other people. Further endeavor and the urge to perfect a piece in order to achieve greater efficiency thus lie beyond the wish and will of the Yamana. For them the traditional goods are the best and most effective because they have been tested by previous generations. With these and similar words the retiring generation justifies itself to the rising generation for its definite resolve, in its own day, to cling to the form of culture achieved and handed down by their forefathers and to abide by it steadfastly (347). Recognizing the useful service of the dog,

347. Weddell (a):6 gave an incorrect explanation: "It has been denied that the inhabitants of Tierra del Fuego have any capacity for mental development and they are credited with an animal instinct. I believe > this condition is merely the result of their remote location, and that it would soon improve with frequent visits from outsiders. I found them obliging and friendly, indeed, in some respects active and inventive."

which was introduced only about two centuries ago, they adopted this animal within a short time (p.292) and accordingly have used the bow and arrow less (p. 155). The material possessions that in recent times have passed from Europeans to the Yamana certainly do not represent an enrichment or an improvement of their conditions of life (p.382).

153 Anyone who compares the mental activity of our Yamana with that of the neighboring Selk'nam will realize that there is an easily recognizable difference. The slowness of the Selk'nam in making decisions and their obvious perplexity in a suddenly altered situation is by no means as widespread among the Yamana. The latter are, by comparison, more animated, more active, and quicker in making decisions. It is particularly striking that the Yamana will immediately understand a joke or a humorous remark, whereas the Selk'nam almost always needs to have it explained. The two tribes, however, resemble one another in their amazing memory which does not fail them under any circumstances (Vol. I, 1089). This is especially true of their memory for places. Finally one must point out a very reliable gift of observation which has helped the Yamana to know in detail everything about their own country and to notice immediately any change. This gift also makes it possible for them to imitate exactly the movements and sounds of animals (348). They have many opportunities to show this accomplishment, not only on the hunt or in the Kina, but especially in their social games.

> 348. My statements are abundantly confirmed by definite examples given by Hyades (q):249 and by many statements of missionaries.

2. Character

157 The character of the Yamana can be sketched in a few strokes, for in general it is simple and transparent, and it can be easily recognized in the behavior /1440/ of individuals. Our Fuegians are extraordinarily shy and reserved toward strangers, which accounts for the incorrect statements of hasty critics (349).

349. For example, Forster (b):244 maintains of the few natives he met in December, 1774, in Christmas Sound: "Their situation was far from any kind of comfort; hence one never notices an expression of joy or contentment on their faces. In fact, these moral, social feelings were foreign to them and were completely swallowed up in their concern for necessities."

In their hearts the Yamana are good-natured and genial, peace-loving and definitely averse to disturbances caused by animosity and hatred (350). They are unpretentious and content with even

350. Aspinall:270 writes similarly: "Generally they are by nature easy-going and helpful. They never speak an untruth or try to appropriate things belonging to others. All the more emphatically, on the other hand, do they insist on what belongs to them 'by right,' and even resort to weapons in order to obtain what is their due." Hyades (c):142 and (d):307 declares: "The character of the Fuegians is generally gay, laughing, changeable, but not very expansive" /translated from French/. Compare Spegazzini (a):167. Bridges (a):293, using ugly colors and untrue assertions, draws a badly distorted character sketch of the Yamana.

157 a little comfort; although they demand nothing for themselves, they freely give help to everyone. A person who puts himself into the hands of a certain group is well taken care of, even if he is a European, and is provided with the best they have to offer. Just as they praise and practice unselfishness, they condemn and loathe egoism in any form. An astonishing delicacy of feeling for dealing with others and for the behavior of the individual in a group has set up rules of conduct (p. 912) which would be appropriate and could be recommended even in Europe.

A strong sense of duty makes their often unpleasant daily work a welcome occupation for our Indians, to which they devote themselves without grumbling (p. 218). They conform to the traditional customs out of respect; they defer to traditional religious and mythological conceptions in their opinions and avoid any kind of fault-finding and quibbling about their inherited fund of ideas. They can hide their feelings to the point of complete unrecognizability if they are confronted by suspicious or hostile persons; in gay company they are sometimes boisterously unrestrained. They pour out their grief, which is always deeply felt, without reserve in a large circle of fellow-tribesmen. Hyades (p):33 describes these traits in the following words: "Their character is serious and concentrated. They do not laugh easily; their laughter is always boisterous" /translated from French/. It is not maintaining too much when I say that every Yamana, man or woman, can momentarily flare up and give free vent to his exuberant temperament. After a few hours, when calm consideration has set in, he collapses like one who has been completely disarmed.

Everyone defends his rights with stubborn persistence and accepts personal praise with satisfaction, although he does not show it. To be treated scornfully hurts even children /1441/ to an extraordinary degree, and adults all the more. They are all quite vain. The Yamana is bold and unafraid toward any kind of danger; confident of his powers, he persists in carrying out his plans. Bridges (e):338 declares that the Yamana "were stronger and wiser in their own appraisement than were the pale faces."

My contact with these people was pleasant and comfortable. I did not have this feeling of well-being to such an extent among

157 the Selk'nam. To the brief portrayal of character given here I add the following testimony from Hyades (q):244: "When one has been among them for a long time and become familiar to them, so to speak, one realizes, as we did, that the general traits of their character are good rather than bad" /translated from French/(351). In their character traits the Yamana appear wholly

351. Along with those words Hyades (q):244 also offers a special section entitled "Expression des émotions."

human. This is corroborated by the opinions assembled here and the many accounts on the preceding pages. Even Darwin (f):I, 234 confesses: "When I lived with the Fueglans on board the 'Beagle,' I was constantly surprised by many minor character traits which showed how similar their mental characteristics were to our own."

156 The character formation just described is fostered by the 577 many principles that are followed in training the young in the parental hut (p.704). No less beneficial for adults is the pressure for many kinds of social duties (p.905). Morality in the widest sense of the term is held in universal esteem (p.1022): the majority of tribal members try to fulfill their duty faithfully. Even Bridges (e):333 did not suppress the following acknowledgment: "Among the Yahgan, vices of all kinds were condemned on account of their evil consequences, while virtue, because of its good results, was recommended." Once again it is to be admitted that many a Fueglan stays on the proper path, especially in the realm of sexual morality, primarily because he wishes to retain his good reputation among his neighbors. The feeling for proper modesty, more among women than men (352), and for justice in general is

352. Snow (s):I, 326, 349 expressed his amazement at this a number of times. He (t):262 says of the women, happily surprised: "The modesty of their conduct was very remarkable, and nothing would induce them to come on deck" /cited in English/. Hyades (d):308, too, declares:

"Modesty exists in both sexes, but it is more developed among the women" /translated from French/. Compare the same opinion in Bridges (h):208. Hyades (p):335 and (q):230 goes even further in the following words: "One will perhaps be astonished to read here that the feeling of modesty is very highly developed among the Fuegians, who are in the habit of going naked" /translated from French/.

well developed; the form and content of Fuegian rules of etiquette are surprising. Bridges later corrected many of his false assertions when he confessed: "The native mind is much more settled in approval of what is good and against evil than ever I have known before, and they are consequently better behaved, and exercise more self-control" /cited in English/ (MM: XVIII, 31, 1894). The licentiousness imported by Europeans has very considerably undermined the former strictness of moral obligations and duties, to the great detriment of the natives (p. 352 /unpublished/).

/1442/ 3. Development of the Senses

What has been said about the mental powers of our Fuegians also implies that they have an adequately developed imagination. It is lively, though not very creative. Nevertheless, its achievements are not slight, considering the many spirit figures in the Kina and the numerous personalities in their mythical world, as well as the considerable variety of games and decorations, ornaments and body paintings. The gift of invention which has created all this and many other things cannot be regarded as limited. The fact that it is still alive is proved by the curiosity of these children of nature toward strange objects. Not infrequently their behavior is even importunate in this respect. Agreeing with many travelers, Despard confirmed: "The Fuegians are very curious, and naturally watch all you do; they like to touch, and feel everything they see" /cited in English/ (VP:VI, 167:1859).

153 This healthy curiosity is combined with a goodly measure of desire for knowledge and aptitude for being taught.

151 In the development of their sensory activity the Fuegians by far surpass us Europeans, and the acuteness of their senses sometimes amazes us, as all critics agree. The sharp eyes of the Yamana miss practically nothing, not the least change, no matter how insignificant, along his path, in his tools, in another person. With sure judgment he recognizes the tracks and traces of animals along the ground, as well as the occupants of a canoe appearing on the horizon. His eye is unerring in observations close at hand or at a distance. Even in old age everyone enjoys excellent vision, although some older people become farsighted, so that if they are looking at or working over smaller objects they must hold them farther away from their eyes. The eyes of the natives can stand direct sunlight and strong light from the hut fire far better than would be possible for European eyes. Hyades (f):580 and (p):329 declares: "The Fuegians have satisfactory visual acuity and...they are, in general, gifted with a great power of accommodation" /translated from French/. Darwin (f):I, 43 affirms briefly from his experience: "I had ample opportunity to observe the extraordinary eyesight of the Fuegians" (353). Their amazing skill in sign language must also be mentioned here. In a way unintelligible to others they can reliably send even important messages to a person and transmit them to the person for whom they /1443/ are intended. This explains the mistrust of everyone toward all those who form a

353. He (d):239 also says by way of supplement: "Their eyesight was remarkably acute. York and Yemmy both were considerably superior to all the sailors on board; several times they said what some distant object was, and, although everyone doubted it, they proved to be right when the object was examined through a telescope. They were well aware of this ability." Bove (c):125 and others agree.

151 larger social group. Hyades (q):196 conducted careful investigations in order to determine the physiological soundness of the eyes of our Yamana.

Since the Fuegians must very attentively note everything around them, they also need their sense of hearing, day and night. The softest sound or the slightest noise does not escape them any more than it does a watchful dog; one would think that they were constantly pricking up their ears. It may be, as Hyades (q):329 says, that "their hearing is as sharp and has the same range as that of most Europeans" /translated from French/, but our Fuegians are more alert; hence they consciously absorb more than Europeans. Constant practice makes it very easy for them to trace individual noises accurately back to their cause, to distinguish the voices of birds and mammals, and to interpret even very faint sounds reliably. It is strange that an unusually violent rending of the air, for example, a loud bang or a shrill whistle, neither startles nor annoys them.

To judge from what was said about our Indians' feeling for cleanliness (p. 87), one might regard their sense of smell as highly insensitive. Hyades (q):209 expresses himself in this vein: "Olfactory sensitiveness is quite blunted among the Fuegians; they do not seem to make a distinction between what we call good and bad odors" /translated from French/. With all this, however, I do not mean to say that their sense of smell is less effective than that of a European. Even the Yamana many times lets his nose decide whether a piece of meat has started to decay and hence has become inedible, or whether putrid matter makes a certain spot uninhabitable for him (p.28). The stench of human or dog excrement arouses passionate repugnance. They have become so completely accustomed to their own skin odor, which is disgusting to Europeans, that they do not seem to notice it at all.

In seeking food and in eating, the Yamana are obviously selective (p.325). Their sense of taste decides clearly enough what appeals to their palate more or less or not at all. They are crazy, so to speak, about the taste of a few things, for example, liquid blubber in a short piece of gut (Fig. 99) and certain pieces of whale meat (p.310). Their country furnishes them extraordinarily few sweets (p.301): hence in recent times people eat

151 extravagant amounts of sugar. Their desire for salt is slight for obvious reasons; they get enough of it in their exclusively meat diet (p.301). They do not really enjoy alcoholic beverages, but most present-day Yamana desire them very much because of their intoxicating effect (p. 302). Even if a person is tormented by hunger he will refuse things abhorrent to his taste.

/1444/ At first glance it seems as though there were some-151 thing peculiar about the sense of touch of our Fuegians. In 147 reality this is not the case; according to Hyades (p):328, also, "their tactile sensitiveness is neither more nor less developed than among the French observers" /translated from French/. The Yamana, however, is not sensitive and plaintive to the same extent as a European. He feels cold and heat, frost and the sun's rays, the sharp stones on the ground and the hardness of his bed, injuries and wounds, but he accepts all hardship with equanimity and bears it silently. If a person must constantly endure considerable pain, he merely groans and whimpers softly. Whenever he can easily /Fig. 99 appears here./ make himself a little more comfortable, he does not fail to do so, but if the annoyance cannot be avoided, he pays no attention to it and makes the best of it. Certainly his skin, especially that of hands and feet, does not react as much as that of Europeans who are constantly protecting themselves with clothing and closed dwellings. He has, however, also hardened himself to a great extent against outward stimuli, and therefore he controls his feelings far better. The many delicate and precise objects made by him show that there is fine feeling even in his heavy hands and clumsy fingers. Moreover, the dexterity that every Yamana shows on the hunt and in setting traps argues for well-developed senses (354).

354. Even Darwin (f):1, 62 was amazed at this and says: "To hit a mark accurately with a stone, as a Fuegian can when he is obliged to defend himself, or to kill birds requires perfection in the efficient correlation of the muscles of the hand, arm, and shoulders, not to mention a fine sense of touch."

b. General Knowledge

The endowment that each child brings into this world as his heritage from his parents and as his natural equipment shows many different gradations even here in Tierra del Fuego. The aptitude of the individual is developed in actual education, at first in the parental hut, later in the Eikaxar. Adults regard their own /1445/ efforts to train growing youngsters as a serious duty which they perform daily, so to speak. Tirelessly they teach their children, they show them this and that operation, explain one thing and another to them, demonstrate this and that, ask their own questions and answer those of youthful questioners, observe the larger's progress and warn them of a wrong course. Although this instruction is primarily designed to help the younger generation obtain great proficiency in the use of weapons and implements, nevertheless in their daily contact the adults also give general information and occasionally special knowledge about definite usage and customs, about religion and mythology in the broadest sense of the term. Step by step and gradually, as circumstances advise and the mental maturity of the young person demands it, he learns more and more about the rich and manifold fund of knowledge of his tribe. There can be no question of orderly lessons, explanations and comments are given on occasions offered in everyday life, the boys being taught primarily by the male, girls by the female adult tribal members, chiefly by relatives within the family group.

Without noticeable coercion, the young people improve themselves, one more than another, according to their natural gifts and personal diligence. Someone who is particularly alert and mentally active makes more rapid progress; the adults are more willing to take trouble with him and they teach him many things earlier than they do his contemporaries. The fact that among the Yamana, also, some persons have a good deal more knowledge than the average can be traced back to inclination, industry, and a desire to learn. Some are extraordinarily limited and know only what is most necessary. A person who commands superior knowledge attracts those around him, influences them, and is highly regarded far and wide. The superior position of great yékamal rests on the fact that they surpass their countrymen in their possession of things of the mind.

If one should gather together all the knowledge gained by experience and the numerous individual facts that every Yamana possesses, he would build up an astonishing fund of information. Borrowing from this source, every generation enriches itself anew and finds it adequate to meet the demands of existence, to satisfy the needs of the mind, to attain the economic goals, and to lead an ordered, harmonious tribal life beneficial to each individual. Relying on his knowledge and his powers, the Fuegian, as master of the animal kingdom and the strong forces of nature in his unfriendly country, strives toward his goals and is confident of victory.

/1446/ 1. Measuring and Counting

The Yamana lack a universal standard of value, such as money or other various kinds of measures. They must resort to estimating actual value in one way or another. This is done according to certain considerations, not the least of which, and often decisive, are the beauty and perfection of the object. The scarcer a thing is, the higher its value. These and other considerations are usually decisive in barter. They also determine whether the recipient of a gift rates it higher or lower. On page 173 there are examples showing a kind of scale of value. It is obvious that our Yamana are unable to evaluate the things given to them by 435 Europeans, and therefore no one should find it strange that the Indians neither protect nor take good care of costly or rare objects. It is quite generally true that they do not handle their tools carefully or protect them; they carelessly trust their own ability and manufacture what they need without much trouble. Any kind of wealth and an accumulation of objects would be nothing more than a burden to them.

802 Their material possessions are amazingly meager. Hence they can do without numbers even more easily than without a complicated scale of value. There are definite designations: one = yĕkĕ́ll; two = hompĕ́ine; and three = mĕ́ten. In general the Yamana do not count beyond that. They designate anything beyond three as wĕ́ru = much. "Very much" is designated either as wĕ́ru wĕ́ru or čĕ́lla wĕ́ru. For an extraordinary amount the expression manĕ́ana wĕ́ru is used. A few compounds are also used to express numbers above three. They say yĕkĕ́ll yĕ́r, "one hand," and hompĕ́i yĕ́r "two hands," which mean "five" and "ten," respectively. BD:235 gives dauačĕ́i, "a few as from five to twenty" /cited in English/. A few other forms are also given in BD. Constructions such as mĕ́ten čĕ́lla mĕ́ten probably first arose under the influence of Europeans. Compare Hyades (q):217. If the Yamana wish to express a figure beyond three, they prefer to use their fingers, and they indicate the number by shaking the specific finger, without forming or expressing a special word for the number. Our Fuegians are unacquainted with measures of length and height. To indicate an insignificant length they make a fist with both hands and, by holding them apart, show the specified length. At the same time they say ketĕ́muka, from ketĕ́m = like this here, mŭ́ka = long. The Yamana do not strive for any particular accuracy either in counting or measuring.

192 A few words that our Indians use as exclamations should be 201 mentioned briefly. If they agree with a word or a request, they utter a faint ŋ, without opening the mouth; sometimes they also bow the head slightly. If they are very much interested, they utter a loud ĕ́ŋ = good, right, very well; or an excited tas = yes, yes; finally, /1447/ wĕ́r = splendid, excellent. They lack what we imply with "no." If a person does not agree with the words of

192 another, he remains silent and motionless; sometimes he turns 201 his head gently to the left and at the same time utters a barely perceptible ɣ. Compare Hyades (q):247.

2. Time Designations

905 The differences between day and night and between one season and the next are too great for our Fuegians not to have designated them with special words. They do not have an expression corresponding exactly to "day"; they use mɨ́ɨla = light, brightness. From this they derive the much used mɨ́ɨlan = daily, and a number of other compounds. Compare BD:251. Although the Yamana do not have a definite division of time in hours, they divide the day into sections of about four hours. They say ɨ́ɨka or mɨ́ɨla tuyɨ́ɨna for the time from dawn to the time when the sun is about halfway to the zenith, that is, about ten o'clock. The basic meaning of ɨ́ɨka is "dawn." BD: 550 gives tuyɨ́ɨna as "to spread as light does so that day is spread abroad" /cited in English/. This is followed by yɨ́ɨnatapa mɨ́ɨla, noonside, from ten to two o'clock. Compare yɨ́ɨnta, "to cross over..." /cited in English/ in BD:555. Then comes ɨ́ɨnɨ́ɨnata, the afternoon, the time to about six o'clock. BD:181 gives ɨ́ɨnɨ́ɨnata, "to get distant, to go a long way off" /cited in English/. This is followed by yɨ́ɨnum ɨ́ɨkagɨ́ɨna, the time of evening twilight until about nine o'clock. The Yamana are familiar with all these expressions.

They also divide up the night. The above-mentioned ɨ́ɨkagɨ́ɨna is followed by ɨ́ɨkɨ́ɨy, the time from the first darkness to midnight. This is followed by the period yɨ́ɨnatapa ɨ́ɨkɨ́ɨy, from midnight to about three o'clock. Finally there is mɨ́ɨlapa yapɨ́ɨnata, the time when it grows light in the morning, between three and seven o'clock. Although these expressions are universally understood, an expert on the stars will now and then also indicate the time of night by their position in the sky.

The Yamana divide the year into definitely recognizable, though not sharply separated periods which they appropriately call seasons. Nature appears in a different garb four times, the change being very apparent. Therefore, our Fuegians speak of four seasons. The word ôrna means "spring". BD:61 writes ôrna, "spring, season of spring" /cited in English/. The word kôi is "summer". kôiskâf is "autumn." The latter word is a combination of kôin, "green beech of summer" (Nothofagus pumilio), and kâf, "red," in other words: time of the red-colored beech leaves. The word ôse means "winter." Compare BD:3 and the word yôkan, "the early part of winter" /cited in English/, in BD:630. The above designations are used in various word combinations, for example, kôiôrna, "next spring," and kôiskâfôse, "next summer." Compare BD:202 and Bridges (1):26. The general concept "season" is not absent. BD:61 also gives ôrum, "season, time" /cited in English/. The Yamana, therefore, favor the following division of the year:

/1448/ kôiôrum: "the time when the bark is loose," when the sap rises in the beech trunks and the bark is easily peeled off. This means early spring, September and October, when the first shoots come out. A person who wants to know "whether the bark is already loose," listens for the sound ôgô, ôgô, the call of the great or the small snipe, known as ôgôsiu or yôlokuchi. This call sounds exactly like the noise one makes when he loosens a strip of bark, tearing it off with a sharp pull. The word ôgôsiu is probably related to ôka, "to make come" /cited in English/, in BD:132. BD:270 also gives kôiuôrum, "the early season for making spring comes early in October" /cited in English/.

ôrno: "the time when one finds the first birds' eggs," the height of spring. A person who now finds the first fresh egg breaks it open and with the yolk drawn a vertical line across his forehead and the bridge of his nose as a sign of joy (p. 986). At this time, also, everyone combs the down for kaiyâf, the sea anemone (Actinaria). He rejoices if he finds particularly luminous colonies of these small animals, for to him they are harbingers of spring (p. 985). BD:61 also gives kôiôrum, "very early in spring" /cited in English/. They are not satisfied, however, with a single indication of spring's arrival. A reliable sign is the ascending sun. A person who knows how to observe it keeps careful watch for a few days through a small hole at a particular spot in his hut, always holding his body in the same position. If he has proved to himself that the sun is ascending, he also concedes the other indications

86 mentioned above and joyfully announces to the whole neighborhood: "Spring is here!"

[illegible]: "the time when birds' eggs are heavy," because the birds are already sitting on their eggs and the embryo is developing. This means early summer.

[illegible]: "the time when birds' eggs are empty," for hatching is over. This is the beginning of midsummer. This term is nothing more than a combination of [illegible], "egg," and [illegible], "to be empty." BD-181 says more briefly, "[illegible], the season of the year when empty shells are in the nest, answering to January" /cited in English/.

[illegible]: "the time when young birds happily stretch and expand," for their large wing feathers are forming and they will soon be able to fly. The height of summer. This word, according to BD-84, 181, is made up of [illegible], "the young of any animals or birds" /cited in English/, and [illegible], "to lie or sit down in the sun to enjoy its heat" /cited in English/.

[illegible]: "the time of the red-colored beech leaves," autumn proper, the whole of March. Now the female otters with their young come back to the coast from the brooks and lagoons in the interior of the islands, to where the male animals stayed throughout.

[illegible]: "the time of the first snow," early winter, April and May. Snow first falls in the mountains, then advances in deeper layers, and finally reaches the coast. A thin coast of ice covers brooks and lagoons. /1449/ Now all the mammals and birds are fat, the marine animals particularly tasty, and hunting profitable for these eight weeks.

[illegible]: "the time when the sun goes west," that is, when it stays longest in the west or north, the time of year around the solstice when the days are shortest. This word is a simple compound of [illegible], "the sun," and [illegible], "to move going W." /cited in English/, according to BD-210. The time of deepest winter. The Yurosse explain: "The sun-man hides in his dwelling and under the large mass of snow, he wants to conceal from the people that he will again return." Some of the older men watch the lengthening days with particular attention. They pass on their observations, and their announcements awaken lead expressions of joy. Hunting is still very good.

These eight periods form the complete cycle of the year. In order to mark them off approximately, the Tonsea at the same time observe the position of certain stars. They wish to prove that their position in the heavens coincides with the corresponding events here on earth. The position of the sun and compliance weather conditions are decisive. In order to emphasize these movements of the sun, the Tonsea use the word [illegible], "time of return of the sun E.-ward after midwinter" /cited in English/, according to BD:104. Or the word [illegible], "strong E. or SW. winds accompanied with rain and clear prevails at the beach up of winter" /cited in English/, according to BD:105. Furthermore, the word [illegible], "the late autumn, early winter, referring to the rainy, overcast, dull weather then prevalent" /cited in English/, according to BD:174. The Tonsea even use compliance phenomena connected with certain species of animals to characterize the seasons. They point to [illegible] (p. [illegible]); they use [illegible], "the time of the young crabs, Oct. and Nov." /cited in English/, according to BD:11. Finally, they speak of [illegible], "dull time when the young birds are hatched, i.e. January" /cited in English/, according to BD:181.

Even regular changes in vegetation, especially in fungi, serve the Tonsea for determining the seasons. They use the word [illegible], "the time of the withering of plants, i.e., early winter" /cited in English/, according to BD:187. The expression based on the growth of [illegible], [illegible], is a great favorite. According to BD:88 this fungus is "the chief summer fungus" /cited in English/, which grows on the healthy parts of bamboo branches (Fig. 8 /in unmentioned portion/). The general term is [illegible], the mature stage is called [illegible] (p. [illegible]).

[illegible]: the fungus when it has just appeared.

[illegible]: the fungus in its maximum size.

[illegible]: the fungus in the sweat, its surface is still smooth.

[illegible]: the fungus with its surface riddled with holes.

[illegible]: the fungus with lessened hyphae, which falls of easily.

[illegible]: stages all fungi have fallen off, but are still somewhat soft.

ɔ̨ɛ́ɛ́ɛ́ ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́, the fungi lying on the moist forest floor are turning black and beginning to rot.

/1450/ The development of Cyttaria darwinii described above takes place from the beginning of December to the end of February. The growing period of the smaller Cyttaria hariotii, ɔ́ɔ́m (p.277), also serves to determine time.

maximix is the name of this tiny fungus when it appears in January.

ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ is its name as long as its surface is still smooth at maximum size.

ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ is the fallen, decayed fungus. This development takes place from January to the end of April. The Yamana refer in the same way to the various stages of development of the large tree fungus, ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́n, and divide up the first half of winter accordingly.

As is evident, the Yamana have a number of time designations, each of which is connected with phenomena in their immediate environment. Besides the expressions just mentioned, one also hears the following: "I'll come back when the first green shoots appear, -- when the young ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ crawl out of their shells, -- when the ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ɔ́ are ready to fly, -- when the red beech leaves fall, -- when the water [in the channel] becomes brown (355), -- when the mussels are poor" (356). These

355. Actually, only the algae change color in the spring; the Yamana expression makes it appear as though the water changed color.

356. This means departing winter.

expressions are simple and perfectly clear to everyone.

3. Astronomy

The appearance and disappearance of a number of stars and their highest and lowest positions likewise characterize the individual periods in the yearly cycle. In former times, before

124 there were actual people, all the stars, whether or not they are now known by name, were independent personalities on this earth. Special myths are devoted to some of them. It is a fact that some individuals among the Yamana, especially certain yékamal of former times, were well acquainted with the peculiarities and movements of the stars and informed their countrymen about them. Most recently, during my stay in Tierra del Fuego, I often used outside with a few old people on a clear, starry night in order to learn something definite from them about the stars, but their knowledge was surprisingly deficient. To their sorrow, these persons confessed that many details had been lost to them since they had adopted the European way of speaking.

The irregular juxtaposition of a few stars is regarded as a family group, in which the larger stars are the adults and the smaller ones the children. The dense clusters of small stars are regarded as a mass of omúyu, berries. Girls like to stretch out their arms as though reaching for them, and they then gesture as though they were scattering a handful of them about. In doing so, they promise themselves an abundant harvest of omúyu. The constellation ushpu, the belt of Orion /1432/ (p. 1274 /unnumbered/), is particularly bright in midwinter. As long as it is visible one may neither split wood nor make a loud noise. Nor may one at this time carry a glowing stick of wood uncovered; it must be wrapped in a piece of bark. Next to it is hiúsepa, Rigel. Aldebaran, α Tauri, is called Yaltúy-ómusipa. The two very-visible nebulae, hámulaf, are described as pockets of the Yaltúy brothers, who keep all kinds of things in them and keep sharp watch over them. The bright, reddish Betelgeuse, α Orionis, is hámusipa, which, as a star, is generally called Lílipa, the first wife of the two Yaltúy brothers (p. 1135). The Milky Way, hámuka chowina, has the same meaning in the canopy of heaven as a wide, pointed post that is used in the framework of the ʼáhuwa hut (p. 677). A few Yamana deduce the direction the wind is expected to take from the brightness of the stars. A closed ring around the sun is regarded as a sign of good weather; if it is open in one spot, there will be strong winds from that direction.

Our Fueguians, of course, observe the striking progressive changes of the moon, and they have special terms for its individual phases. Then, ŋáuuqa wuyíqma is the full moon, ainíkha, the completely invisible new moon, yhum ŋáuuqa, the waxing moon, and, finally, ŋáuuqa téqta, the waning moon. The word téqta is probably the same as tatá, "another, the other" /cited in English/, in 80-302. There are also other designations in 80 for the phases of the moon. The Yaména like to measure time by the whole course of the moon. For example, someone will say: "Yhum ŋáuuqa téqa-mul ter-i-tayqh, I shall come again at the new moon" (80).

307. Hyades (p).360 and Spegazzini (e).169 also briefly referred to the various designations of time used by the Yaména.

As a result of their nomadic life, our Yaména are obliged to observe carefully the extremely changeable weather of their country and to interpret reliably every peculiar phenomenon. In the course of long experience they have attained positive mastery in this, and one can absolutely rely on their opinion. In their observations they usually take two or three phenomena into account at once, not least the behavior of animals. Nevertheless, a family will sometimes be overtaken by a sudden change in the weather and their lives endangered. The Yaména certainly do not lack expressions for individual aspects of the weather. Thunder, kóóka, is almost never heard in that region; our Fuegians have no definite explanation for it or for lightning (p. 33 /unknown/) which is just as rare.

4. Geographical Knowledge

On their constant trips through the narrow channels of the Cape Horn Archipelago our Yaména are confidently sure of themselves because they have a well developed sense of orientation to the quarters of the heavens. They have a wide choice of terms for them. /1402/ The basic terms are: ŋa, ŋa, "the south, southward"; ŋa ŋa, "east, in an easterly direction";

{23} [illegible]. "northerly, the north"; finally [illegible], "in a westerly direction, the west." These root terms serve for all kinds of connections. Instead of listing them, I refer the reader to 80. They are used very often, not only to describe the distribution of the large ethnic groups, but also to designate the directions of air and water currents, of swarms of birds and fish, or of a journey on foot or in a canoe. Accordingly, they say: [illegible], "people of the east." A more complete form of this is [illegible]. The word [illegible] or [illegible] means "from this place, from yonder." In contrast, there is [illegible], "the east wind." It can be stated as a rule that an expression for a motion or an activity of motion at the same time indicates the particular direction. This kind of accuracy, which, as such, is still no proof of the richness of the language, may seem to be exaggerated, but it is valuable and sometimes of vital necessity to a nomadic Fuegian. An example may make this clear. If I am standing to the north and at some distance from a channel, looking south, I call the north coast of this channel [illegible], but its southern coast [illegible]. Using this latter formation, the Yamana says [illegible], namely, a channel extending south of me, or, "[illegible]," a channel which runs from my position to the north. As may be seen from these examples, the relationship of one thing to another in space is specifically designated. This is usually done with reference merely to the quarters of the heavens, often the vertical relation of a thing in space is expressed together with its horizontal relation, that is, according to the quarters of the heavens (308).

> 308. Bridges (b):306 several times confirmed the strikingly frequent use of designations for directions. Compare Furlong (c):171, Hyades (c):181, Lawlors (b):151.

{8} Even more surprising is the almost unbelievably large number of place names. Coves that are more frequently visited and sought out by individual families, above all those along Beagle Channel and Argentine Tierra, have their own names which characterize very short distances or only one spot, a small projection or a rather large stone, a shallow or deep bend, a steep or

(83) flat shore. Every special peculiarity, though it may appear insignificant, is named and provided with the appropriate supplementary term. The following words belong to this category: wólakip, "projection, point"; ólége, "channel, arm, branch"; yóka, "coastal strip, beach"; wíja, "large and small inlet"; yóka, "island, isolated rock, stone protruding out of the water." I entered the least common names on a geographic map of the native country of the Yamana, and I counted more than 370. Most of them are true proper names; the rest are simple descriptions with a supplementary term. Examples of the first group are to be found on pages 300 /unpublished/ and 537; examples of the second group are /1451/ halóuaka-ólma-yóka, the "island of the dirty water," between Tierra Mayor and Goble Island -- halóuaka, "dirty, muddy"; ólma, "water"; yóka, "the island" -- and the longest word in the Yamana language, introduced on page 591. Naturally, there are special names for every large arm of water, for example: ólé(a)-ólége, eastern Beagle Channel, wéjmun-ólége, Brazo Nordeste; lóuf-ólége, Brazo Sureste. Similarly, for a large island or an entire group of islands: Wólíja-yóka, Isla Bonnet in front of Wulaia Bay; Ulúkuz, Hoste Island, Yálúkin, Wollaston Islands. For a large bay: Agíjra, Puemeby Sound; Hórowíja, New Year Sound. For a long coastal stretch: Wasanígja, the southern edge of Navarino Island. Finally, for extensive areas near the shore: Anjowíja, the valley between Ukowíja and Lapwíja. Any large area in the interior of an island, more or less distant from the coast, is commonly called ólla; there are no specific local designations for such areas. The Yamana are also content with the general term mólóra, "mountain," without distinguishing one height from another with a proper name. The wide ocean is called hóka. Very occasionally a larger brook or river also has a special name, for example, Yóll-hóka, Rio Mayor at Puerto Harberde (359). The Yamana use the many individual names with astonishing accuracy.

359. This typical Yamana name is found on maps as "Lastyarchac."

823 They are aided by a no less reliable and very accurate knowledge of places which they acquire by their frequent visits to each locality. Their memory of places is refreshed every time they take a canoe trip or stay anywhere. Thus one thing explains the other. Actually, the region comprising their native land, which every family constantly traverses, is not very extensive. They go beyond these boundaries only on special occasions and then they let themselves be guided by a family native to that region. Moreover, thanks to the excellent gift for observation with which our Fuegians are equipped, old and young really know every nook and rock, every inlet and coast, every brook and beach. The story of the origin of the many wide and narrow, quite irregular channels that make the whole Cape Horn Archipelago look like a land savagely torn to pieces is told in the tale about the Laławája rock (p. 1216 /untranslated/); the origin of the little brooks running down from the hills and mountains is explained in the Čilawája-wátuwa (p. 1207 /untranslated/); legend even tells about the origin of the magnificent glaciers, known as dáun, in Brazo Nordoeste (p. 1233 /untranslated/).

805 823 Contrasted with this wealth of place names, the lack of designations expressing distances, intervals, and time is all the more striking. They usually refer to the position of the sun or the stars in order to determine the approximate time of day or night. Such estimates, of course, leave a wide margin of uncertainty which disturbs the Fuegian not at all. On his journeys and canoe trips he is, in any case, dependent on the quite unpredictable influences /1454/ of natural forces. He never knows beforehand how they will affect him. Those unbridled natural forces to which he is exposed are stronger than he; hence it would be senseless to set a goal to be reached in a short time under any circumstance. If our Fuegian wishes to designate a great distance, he speaks of two or three or many travel-days and estimates from six to eight hours for a single day of the journey. He does not lose or gain anything worth mentioning whether he reaches his goal sooner or later. In a most literal sense, no hour strikes to mar a person's happiness down there in the Cape Horn Archipelago!

5. Botany and Zoology

824 Only a few species of higher plants are represented in Yamana country, but there are considerably more kinds of higher animals. Our Fuegians have an accurate knowledge of the one as well as the other. This means, first of all, that they know the special characteristics of each plant that is of any use in the household, and they have selected it from those available to them on the basis of its suitability for their purposes. I pointed this out most emphatically when I described their individual implements and weapons. The vegetable kingdom does not offer the Yamana any food worth mentioning, but the extremely little that it does offer in luxuries (p.299) -- if one may call it that -- is well known and utilized. One could hardly estimate the number of experiments and the long series of observations by former generations that must have been necessary before this knowledge became a universal possession of the entire tribe. It was then transmitted throughout the centuries to each subsequent generation.

825 The Yamana is vitally dependent every day upon the animal kingdom; to it alone he owes his subsistence. Everyone is therefore obliged to observe carefully the habits and movements of the species useful to him. If the Yamana gives a proper name to every larger plant family, this is all the more true of every animal species, with the exception of insignificant lower animals that are in no way useful to him. He has originated and developed the various hunting methods on the basis of his knowledge of the habits of each species (p.213). His booty by no means has equal value; he distinguishes the various species, and even different parts of the body of the same species, according to the tastiness of the meat, the greater or lesser usefulness of bones and feathers, fur and skins, even sections of gut, according to their durability and efficiency. All this is based on rich practical knowledge. The Yamana can creep up on their game animals with amazing skill, and they imitate the movements of certain species in some of their games. Here, too, one can see how carefully /1455/ our Fuegians observe the animal realm surrounding them. On this, in turn, they base their rules for the hunt, for the gathering

825 of eggs and shellfish. With clever calculation they observe a closed season for certain species, and they know the time of year when it is not advisable to eat certain species. Our Indians very much enjoy watching the harmless play of animal parents with their young; /Fig. 100 appears here/ they marvel at the wonderfully majestic flight of the mighty stormy petrel and thoroughly enjoy the clumsy movements of penguins (Fig. 100) and cormorants; the graceful agility of the pinnipeds in the water amazes them no less than the awkward behavior of these animals on land (Fig. 95) makes them laugh. The hunter approaches a certain species with extreme caution or with the assurance of victory, all depending on its nature, physical strength, and mobility. From the unmatched character delineations in many of the myths one sees how well the hunter is acquainted with all the characteristics of the most common animals. From early youth, through frequent play with young animals and daily observation, the Fuegian acquires his rich knowledge of the peculiarities of the not inconsiderable number of animal species that, like he himself, inhabit the storm-tossed Cape and provide a livelihood for him and his family.

Fig. 100. Pygoscelis adeliae.

Our Indians cannot be blamed for giving a superstitious interpretation to much of the strange behavior of their animals (p. 1189). After all, they want to explain this behavior, and their judgment is usually based on what happens under similar circumstances among people. Thus they say, to mention still another example: If a dog groans in the family hut, as though in despair, this is a sign of mourning, for it knows that a close relative of its master has just died or will soon die.

/1456/ 6. Medicine

In the following pages the work of the yékamuf, which is based on suggestion or on peculiar visions of spirits, will, of course, not be discussed. Similarly, the infections and epidemics that have been imported by Europeans (p. 340 /untranslated/) will not be considered. The Yamana are a healthy, resistant people, even though their physique may have little or no appeal for Europeans (p. 214 /untranslated/). They are as unfamiliar with transgressions against sexual morality as they are with alcohol. Although once or twice a year they overload their stomachs when a whale has been stranded (p.313), they must now and then suffer a temporary food shortage (p.306). They lack many things that could make their lives more agreeable (p.298). The fact that many people have reached a considerable age is due to their mode of life and the atmospheric conditions of their country, but it would be arbitrary to mention age in figures. The infirmities of age, which undoubtedly occurred, seldom annoyed a person seriously. Without protracted suffering, most of them died an almost sudden, gentle death from actual old age (360). Fitz-Roy (a):186 found it > 360. Hyades (f):573 also declares: "The Fuegians can reach an advanced age (70 to 80 years). They then show external signs of decrepitude, but their physical capabilities are, for the most part, retained. The infirmities of advanced age are almost exclusively chronic rheumatic ailments" /translated from French/.

surprising that he met neither men nor women "who appeared to be very old -- certainly no one was decrepit" /cited in English/.

147 Our Fueguians are anything but complaining. They bear physical pain with courageous patience; their feeling of pain is by far not as acute as that of Europeans. Compare Hyades (p): 228. The very first missionaries, Despard (b):698 and Bridges (a):202, mentioned the most common ailments, and Hyades (f): 580 and (c):222 gave an accurate list. I am able to give a few supplementary data from my own observations. The most frequent are regular accidents, namely, burns and wounds (361).

> 361. Burleigh is absolutely right when he declares: "To meet a person of mature age who has not received an injury in some form or other, either violence or accident, is a rare occurrence" /cited in English/ (Mbl.XXV, 23,1931). What Hyades (f):585 says is pertinent in this connection: "It is probable that accidents and injuries carry off a large number of natives, for they do not give any care to the injured" /translated from French/.

Persons of all ages complain of headaches, ilúkpi-ʌ́n a great deal. Rheumatism, alutar-ʌ́ʌn or alutapílio, is a common ailment, but its acute form is rare. The first designation probably corresponds to alítʌ́ʌlʌn, "to chop off" /cited in English/, in RD:18. Gout affects an individual limb for many people, but it soon passes. The respiratory organs are rarely affected by bronchitis and only in quite exceptional cases by pneumonia and pleurisy. Ailments of this kind are called ʌ́ʌmʌ́ʌn-ʌ́ʌn, that is, "stabs, pains in the chest" (p.1079). Older /1457/ persons frequently cough. Abdominal diseases are rare; instead, there are a great many digestive disorders, chiefly diarrhea caused by immoderate eating or spoiled meat. Eczema and other slight skin troubles are more frequently seen; they usually heal within a short time. It is obvious that untended wounds lead to phlegmon and gangrene. Hyades (f):581 declares: "I have not had to see a single cancerous disease" /translated from French/. It is also true that originally the Yamana were free of syphilis, gonorrhea, and all forms of tuberculosis. Most people suffer from inflammation of the eyes because they are constantly exposed to smoke from the hut fire. Mental disorders occur very rarely, but "idiocy is unknown" /translated from French/, as Hyades (p):339 asserts. Many an aged person suffers from impaired hearing, ufkir̄tāuwa. Infectious general diseases, actual epidemics, lēkhāja, lēmāja, did not occur before there was contact with Europeans.

Thus our Yamana suffered very little from disease. This was especially advantageous because effective remedies are totally lacking in their country (362). They try to alleviate the pain or ailment with procedures recommended by general health care. For some reason they expect great results when they are unwell by totally abstaining from food for a whole day. As Bridges (i):19 also declares, everyone expects that this will even bring "good health and efficiency in hunting" /cited in English/. For this reason a hunter considers it beneath his dignity to take refreshment with him when he goes hunting. A sick person sits huddled up in his hut, remains motionless, and lets the warmth of the hut fire have its effect on him. When he requests something, a member of the family hands him what he wants. The Yamana often recommend perspiring; the sick person is placed beside the fire and covered with many skins. Blubber is often used: for rheumatism, the affected part of the body is rubbed with it; for 757 an ear ailment the blubber is warmed in a mussel shell and drops are put into the ear canal. As an alternative, especially to clean the ears of small children, a bit of milk is squeezed from a woman's breast, warmed in a mussel shell, and trickled into the ear passage. The same remedy is used to cleanse the eyes of newborn babies and generally for eye diseases in small children. If a person has a cramp, kelĕki, in some limb, it is rubbed with fresh leaves of Drimys. In case of lumbago, a man is treated in the following manner. He lies down on his belly. His wife warms her right foot at the fire and places /1458/ it gently on his back. Then she lifts her left foot so that the entire weight of her body rests on her right foot. After some time, when the warmth has gone out of her right foot, she climbs down and again warms it. She treats the entire back, section by section, in this way, beginning at the buttocks and proceeding up to the neck.

362. This has been confirmed a number of times. Fitz-Roy (a):186 writes: "When ill, however seriously, they know of no remedies but rubbing the body with oil, drinking cold water, and causing perspiration by lying near the fire, wrapped up in skins" /cited in English/. Despard (b):698 asserts: "Remedies are simple indeed; they burn the part where pain is felt, or produce counter-irritation by whipping with stinging nettles" /cited in English/. According to Hyades (f):585, "the Fuegians do not know any medicines" /translated from French/. Finally, Aspinall:270 says briefly: "The art of medicine is limited to rubbing and the infusion of a few roots."

As a laxative the Yamana recommend chewing the leaves, [278] liuĭ, of ufkútta (Drimys winteri); this is also effective for heart and stomach ailments. Still more effective are large quantities of blubber which must be drunk at brief intervals. Finally, the sap of young beech trees is used in the following manner. The small trunk is broken off or chopped off, the end held over a fire, and the dripping sap caught in a mussel shell. They swallow the sap, as is, and await its laxative effect. This remedy also heals inflamed eyes. In the case of inflamed eyes, téllа sĕx, an actual eye bath is recommended, that is, dipping the face in salt water and opening and closing the eyelids several times while doing so. For cases of violent vomiting, amĕla, one drinks a great deal of [278] salt water. The large beard moss, tŭxalapajĭla (Usnea barbata), is effective against the type of diarrhea, ufpalaxĭna or yikĕna, that is common there. One chews small amounts of it, swallows the juice, and spits out the wood fibers. Nowadays an extract is prepared in a suitable pot. Celery, hŭfun, is recommended for dis- [278] eases of the respiratory organs; stalks of this plant are chewed and the juice swallowed. For coughs the Yamana rub the outside of the throat with spittle, perform a brief, actually magical massage, and finally blow away the coughs, hĕfa, with lively motions of the hands. A person who coughs up blood drinks salt water; better still, he stands in the water, ducks under a few times, swallows 759 the water a number of times, and then dries himself and lies down beside the hut fire. For strong palpitations and shooting pains in the heart the patient must remain motionless on his bed. A person who feels feverish, a rare phenomenon, lies down on the beach in such a way that the waves cover him; sometimes he stays under water for 20 minutes or longer. He does not eat blubber, fat, or the meat of whales, seals, or birds.

As a remedy for the very common headache, fresh nettles are put around the forehead and secured with leather bands. The entire head is also gently whipped with a bunch of Pernettya mucronata (Fig. 12, p. 121 /in untranslated portion/), whose small leaves, as is known, end in sharp, hard points. The yékamus also helps in his way by grasping a bunch of the sufferer's hair and suddenly pulling upward, which causes a faint crackling sound. As an alternative, according to Despard (b):698, "they roast their heads, and take repeated draughts of stagnant sea-water to produce nausea" /cited in English/. Bridges (i):19 maintains, as I, too, observed: "Headache was relieved by making the nose to bleed by cutting it within the nostrils" /cited in English/. Painful areas are relieved by short superficial cuts, causing a slight flow of blood. For sharp pains in the chest and laboged breathing, flat /1459/ stones the size of a hand are placed on the chest after being heated in the fire; when they cool off, they are reheated. A magical effect is obtained if someone hits the painful part with a piece of skin and with each blow loudly and with great exertion exhales a stream of air.

759 The Yamana heal suppurating wounds and abcesses, alax, 278 in various ways. The bark of young branches or long twigs from any kind of tree are held with one end over the fire. The sap dripping off the other end is allowed to fall on the affected part. In the winter finger-thick stalks of Macrocystis are used. Certain growths on beech trunks, about the size of a cherry, contain a sticky substance that is dripped into the wound after crushing the growth. Then down feathers are spread over the wound, which stick to it and dry it up. For skin eruptions, eczema, and similar conditions, chalk powder is rubbed over the entire body or the resinous, gum-like discharge of the cushion plant (Azorella) is

751 spread over it; the latter is a reliable remedy for growths resem-
274 bling carbuncles. Pustules are dashed and rubbed gently with saliva. Fresh small twigs and leaves of Macrocystis are put on swellings; they develop a slimy substance which is allowed to take effect. Fresh barberry shavings are put on an aching tooth. Loose teeth are broken and pulled out with the fingers. Hyades
[15] (y):209 says something that I cannot confirm from my own observations: "Insanity, if it exists, is very rare. The mad are treated with cold baths" /translated from French/. A broken arm is treated 752 by first placing thin sticks and a few pieces of leather around it; then this is bound with most strips of leather. The bandage is kept in place until the pain and swelling have subsided. These are the procedures that the Fueglans know for helping themselves in case of accidents and physical ailments.

5. The Language

192 It is well known that the language of the Yamana has often 114 been described in general accounts and there is an astonishing amount of material. Many a writer has let himself be carried away in repeated references to an unusually rich vocabulary. Bridges himself started this trend. I tried to explain in (gg):102 why he said that his dictionary contained 32,430 words. I have also emphatically pointed out that the Yamana language does not have that number of words and that a rich vocabulary by no means indicates a high level of development for this language. "Quite the contrary," I (hh):183 said earlier, "one will recognize the considerable poverty of a language from the fact that it requires many words." Long before, Garbe:336 pointed to this decisive condition. No one is to be blamed for the fact that a critical study of Yamana grammar as a whole has not yet been carried out -- F. Hestermann worked on a number of parts -- /1460/ for texts are lacking. The comprehensive dictionary of the Reverend T. Bridges was only published in 1933 by Hestermann and Gusinde, and the well-known translations of the New Testament that Bridges made six decades ago are not suitable for this purpose. I, too, should not be reproached and told that I failed to collect original texts. To exonerate myself, I may point out that on my journeys I was

192 completely absorbed by no less urgent tasks. Serious consideration should also be given to the fact that the language in use today has been altered and corrupted as a result of the banding together of the last survivors of the five original dialect groups and their contact with European culture. For example, their own word for "nothing" has dropped out of use completely, and old and young have substituted "nothing" /cited in English/ for it. I was thus faced with the lamentable fact that at the beginning of my journeys it was too late to record the pure, uncorrupted linguistic heritage of the Yamana. However, I was still able to determine the boundaries of the former dialect groups, as I called them (p. 199 /untranslated/), and the phonetic system. Compare Gusinde (1):1000.

197 This is not the place to describe in detail the more important peculiarities of Yamana grammar. Nor need I repeat that in (bb): 183 I maintained that "the low stage of development of the language is in perfect agreement with the whole mental constitution of the Yamana as it is revealed in other areas. This does not in the least cast any doubt on the fact that these Indians, judged by their mental capacity, are fully mature human beings." For the time being one must regard Yamana as an isolated language which is not even closely related to neighboring Selk'nam and Halakwulup. Comparative studies will show whether Yamana can be related to the meager remains of a definite Chaco language.

193 Only the following characteristics of this language will be mentioned. The root and the word are seldom the same. Usually verb and noun are separated; this is less often true of adjective and substantive in the noun, but always of the pronoun. Word formation, as well as every other grammatical formation, occurs through the use of actual prefixes and suffixes. Verbs and nouns abound in formations. The richest of all is the pronoun; on this account it has a prominent place among all the other languages of the world. Nouns are monosyllabic and polysyllabic, the latter being always recognizable as compounds. Often prefix and suffix occur in the same formation. There is no grammatical gender, but number and case are all the more elaborate. The noun has three numbers: singular, dual, and plural, the last two being formed only with suffixes. The genitive is prominent.

193 The suffix added to the genitive, however, also occurs as objective case. The adjective changes in value by its mere position: if it precedes, it is /1461/ attributive; if it follows, it is predicative. The pronoun has a uniform root, but in form it differentiates verbal and personal, possessive and subjective. The diversity of all pronouns is surprisingly great, especially because designations of place are expressed in horizontal and vertical relationships and because the qualification "toward" as a prefix and "away from" as a suffix are joined with a single word (1463).

> 1463. It would lead too far afield to give examples of this; a good selection of them may be found in Hestermann (b), Bridges (k):235, and even more in Hyades pp.200.

The verb can be constructed from a nominal basis by numerous suffixes. Verbs can also be compounded and stand as coordinates. There are four conjugations according to the four different final vowels. The place variation of the noun as described above also extends in every respect to the entire verb. There are at least six different forms of verbal negation. As Hestermann declares, "the inflections briefly alluded to here, along with those affecting the noun, form a veritably inexhaustible phenomenon distinguished by consummate brevity of form as well as sensitive elegance. Yamana is a melodious type of Indian language, tense, rich, precise, and full of meaning." If, in this study, I 197 have several times mentioned dialect differences (p. 200 /untranslated/), I certainly did not mean substantial deviations between one group and another, but merely slight differences in words and appellations for the same thing, as well as in some sounds. These insignificant local peculiarities obviously do not constitute dialects in the strict sense of the word.

c. Artistic Sense

517 All the thoughts and endeavors of our water nomads on Cape Horn are directed toward the inescapable food quest; it almost completely absorbs the individual. Whatever remains of leisure

517 time and unspent energy is devoted to rest or modest social demands. The Yamana do have a feeling for beauty and an understanding of proportion, but the conditions of life are not conducive to a rich development of these tendencies. The Yamana does not receive much stimulation for aesthetic enjoyment or artistic activity from his environment, which is clothed in dull colors and presents wildly chaotic forms. A desire for them emerges now and then from his innermost nature, however, and actually expresses itself within modest limits in one way or another.

1. Sense of Beauty

832 On some occasions our Fuegians indisputably demonstrate their well-developed sense for physical beauty. They prefer a slim, mobile, well proportioned, moderately tall figure, /1462/ full of healthy energy. Such a figure is particularly impressive to youthful representatives of the opposite sex, who quite openly speak about it in company. Marriageable boys and girls are sometimes considerably influenced and affected by the physical form of the person of their choice (p.399). /Fig. 101 appears here./

[856] Parents and close relatives are anxious that a baby develop a beautiful figure from its earliest years. This is the chief purpose of a kind of light massage (p.525), although this alone does not always guarantee success. It is said that a particularly attractive and graceful baby usually changes to the opposite and becomes ugly, whereas often a less beautiful child becomes very well formed after a few years. In the eyes of our Fuegians body hair

302 is unpleasant; hence they pluck out underarm and pubic hair, as well as beard hair (p. 82). For this purpose they like to use two mussel shells that fit together like a pair of pincers. Some people take great pains with the hair, oiling it with blubber and combing it several times a day (p. 85). Most of them have it shortened in due time, so that it hangs about shoulder-level (p.81); it is not gathered into braids. When, in exceptional cases, some men have their head hair cut off before a fight, it is because they wish to prevent their opponents from grabbing their hair and pulling them

832 by it. A European also finds the same satisfaction in the figures

822 that are regarded as beautiful among the Yamana. Spegazzini (a):185 refers to this specifically. The various types of ornament are supposed to increase the allure of physical beauty. The impulse for this sort of thing /1463/ varies according to the person, his age and sex, but coincides almost exactly with what one observes in Europe under the same circumstances.

Fig. 101. A Well-made Little Basket.

517 In making implements and utensils, weapons and ornaments, everyone tries to achieve a certain degree of symmetry, solely because it is agreeable to his eye and feelings. There are even special designations for persons who make certain things perfectly and according to the rules of good workmanship. Some of these expressions are based merely on considerations of usefulness. They use the word wIlEpitas, "clever, expert, careful in cutting up a

517 whale," /cited in English/, according to RO:630, or wáaima for a man who makes a good canoe. People who make a small basket or an ornament with particular care are known far and wide, and the accurate construction of such things is talked about by others because it gives them satisfaction and true enjoyment. One often hears expressions like the following: "What a pretty thing! -- How good-looking that is! -- The workmanship is very accurate and shapely!..." Everyone praises the effort made by an artisan. When they see a perfect specimen, old people encourage the young ones to imitate it. Any kind of praise is gratifying to the Tamana, and he makes an effort to obtain it. Beyond that, however, he also finds particular pleasure in the qualities of the beautiful object. A European, if he wants to be fair in his judgment, must take into consideration the difficulties that hamper the Tamana in the making and fashioning of his implements. For example, he does not have the use of metal tools and measuring instruments, but is dependent solely on his hardened, but very limber fingers and upon the measurements of his eye. For this reason, obviously, the various rows in a little basket (Fig. 101) or an ornament and the lines in a painting are never absolutely perfect. The indolence and the carelessness of persons who do not want to take pains and trouble are, of course, also reasons for many an inadequate piece of work.

531 The Tamana enhance the beauty of certain objects and their 302 own bodies by means of painting. They use the well-known ma-
303 terials (p. 90) for the three colors that are the only ones applied: ítí = red, scarlet; yégu = light, luminous, white; finally, ítmbi = black. The pigments are either rubbed to a dry powder or first mixed with water or blubber in a large Mytilus shell (Fig. 102) to form a thick paste and then applied with the finger or with a painting stick (pp. 95 , 712 , 790). Designations for other tones of color are not altogether lacking, but are seldom used. For instance, one says lakíma, "gray," only for human hair and for fur, whereas the word pówajígu is used for the gray, faded, and pale color of any other object. Light red or a reddish yellow is designated by pójallí. There is no particular significance attached to any of these colors (p. 94) (364), although one or

532 another is preferred on certain occasions, for example, in the case of /[illegible]/ mourning (p. [illegible]). Insofar given the Yamana intense pleasure (365), the color of the [illegible] blossom serves as a standard of comparison for them (p. [illegible]). The Yamana use the 531 well-known pigments to paint their faces or their entire bodies

365. This has been confirmed a number of times. Hyades (b):1361 and (d):398 says: "The favorite color is red; the other colors are often confused" /translated from French/. I also agree with the last part of his statement. The designations that he (d):391 lists for all kinds of colors are worthless.

532 on various occasions. The gay and rich variety of their designs very clearly expresses their by no means limited sense of beauty. This is even more definitely shown in their ornaments and in the patterns of color with which they cover various objects, such as the Kina mats and the ornamental mats used in the [illegible] hut (Plates 2, 3, 4). /Fig. 102 appears here./ The Yamana have a considerable number of special designations for the various types of painting. The word [illegible] means "to paint horizontal lines upon the face with [illegible] as a mark of friendship" /cited in English/, according to BD:410; the word [illegible] means "to paint the face with up and down bands or lines of either red or black" /cited in English/. The painting is sometimes supplemented with a feather
532 decoration. I observed neither a special gift nor an inclination to draw among the Yamana (366). I never saw children scratch simple

366. Differing on this point, Phillips (a):1011 reported: "It was strange that the Fueglans showed a great inclination to draw. Without being told, they collected strips of paper and drew caricatures on them with charcoal, which were supposed to represent their comrades. They were then given pencils, and they eagerly

367. What Know (x):1, 320 has to say proves the curiosity of the Fuegians in Banner Cove: "They were all greatly astonished at my writing in pencil on blank paper.....and they eagerly begged of me some magic wood. Of course I gave them some, and they soon set to work trying to write as I did" /cited in English/.

2. Art Activity

301 The many occasions that show how much the Yamana loves ornamentation have already been mentioned. For some of the people, body cleanliness is far less important than their desire to please others with the beauty of their bodies or with special ornaments. This type of vanity is consciously instilled even in children, and no one sees anything wrong in it. For this reason many persons acquire several ornaments at once and prefer to display those that are conspicuous or that come from a remote region. There are also persons who paint themselves every day just for the fun of it. Since a visitor, as a rule, is supposed to wear a facial painting when he presents himself (pp. 96, 922), many people spend a great deal of time and effort on it, so that they will be admired. It would not do, however, to maintain with Bove (c): 187: "The eagerness for ornamentation seems to be even stronger among the men than among the women." In the one sex as well as the other there are individuals who far surpass most of the people in their passion to please.

237 301 Their excessive desire to please leads them to avail themselves of definite ornaments, besides the actual body painting in all its forms. Ankle bands (p. 99) are of a simple type; necklaces are more elaborate. Either the fine fibers of guanaco or whale tendon are plaited into a long cord and worn in several loops, or the latter is used to string short pieces of bone or small shells, ʷóu̯ ʷlpúka, of Photinula violacea are tied to it close together. These are the basic forms of the necklaces worn by the Yamana. Each of them also has certain unique touches. The small pieces of bone may be longer or shorter; clearly recognizable rings are incised in each of the longer ones, which are then supposed to look like small pieces. Moreover, the pieces that are naturally whitish are alternated with some that have been purposely blackened (p. 103). Finally, as a special pendant, the red beak of the oyster catcher (Haematopus ater, Fig. 76) is attached in the center, or four to six of these beaks are distributed along the lower half of the necklace (Fig. 103). Instead of the short pieces cut from thin, hollow bird bones, the Yamana, for variety, also string the short calcareous tubes of sea worms on a long tendon. Such small pieces

237 are not very regular, however; hence /1466/ /Fig. 103 appears 301 here./ /1467/ this whole assemblage is not valued very much (Fig. 104). The simplest ornaments are those with only a single mussel shell or a small beak of a bird, or several of these pieces, hanging on the tendon. A long string of Photinula shells is regarded as the most beautiful and valuable neck ornament, for it requires great care to make (Fig. 23). /Fig. 104 appears here./

301 For this reason no woman who thinks well of herself is without this piece, which is sometimes more than three meters long. Fitz-Roy (a):201, and later Bridges (i):23, recognized that "the Fuegian necklaces show some ingenuity in those who make them, ... that one is, at first, inclined to doubt their being the manufacture of such uncouth savages" /cited in English/. Spegazzini (a):161, too, does not refuse to acknowledge that these things represent "such careful work that they do not lack beauty" /translated from Spanish/. They indicate a well-developed, sensitive taste. The

301 same thing must be said about the feather ornaments, which can be seen on various ceremonial occasions in the čiéxaus (pp. 713, 790) and at the ceremonies of mourning (p. 1083) as hapaxēl, a larger triangular piece of skin, or kwaxwēxeni, a band of skin two fingers wide and covered with down. The apawēxa is only worn by the yékamuš, who regularly puts it on when he is practicing his calling (p. 1307).

304 It has been proved that the Yamana do not practice any kind of intentional body mutilation (p. 106), and Hyades (b):1345 agrees with various observers that "there are no deformations or ethnic mutilations" /translated from French/. Fitz-Roy (a):138 is also correct when he maintains: "No ornaments are worn in the nose, ears, or lips, nor on the fingers" /cited in English/. Bridges (h):206, Bove (e):157 and (g):234, and Hyades (d):306 and (p):329, as well as other travelers, emphatically deny that the Yamana are acquainted with tattooing. Nevertheless, I was able to prove that, to a modest extent, it was formerly practiced on the candidates in the čiéxaus (p. 715), not, however, for beauty. In the 302 most recent times it has been replaced by a special body painting, either that described on page 717, or the entire upper part of the body is painted uniformly white and two finger-thick, red parallel lines are drawn close together from the farthest lateral projection /1468/ of one shoulder to the other in an arc that extends over the chest and back (cf. Fig. 21 of the photogravure plates /at the end of this work/). This painting is used only for the čiéxaus.

[538] Our Yamana are acquainted with neither poetry nor proverbs,

533 but in the syllables constantly repeated in their songs, there is an agreeable rhythm and a rich sound; they do not have a definite meaning, however. The melodies are always merely short movements with simple motifs. The syllables, made up of the same or a few different sounds, are either repeated on a single pitch or in a variant in which the third predominates. Gay melodies are clearly distinguishable from sad ones (368). The Yamana like to sing;

368. Bridges (a):207 established that "The singing of these Indians is of different kinds" /cited in English/. According to Hyades (p):330, "the song is usually gay; it is made up of a single word or even a single syllable, repeated indefinitely" /translated from French/. In Spencer:111 it is said: "The words, they say [in their songs], have no meaning to them, and have been handed down in parrot form from their ancestors, and all their songs originally came from the Alakaluf tribe" /cited in English/.

how else would the considerable variety of their songs have come about. One may find it strange that, without exception, they are sung by a smaller or larger group. A person going his solitary way or quietly gliding over the water in the canoe with his family would never feel the urge to sing a little song. A mother does not [854] sing any kind of cradle song to her darling whom she cradles in her arms or watches over in his bed. She is content to hold the child in her outstretched arms and gently rock it back and forth. She performs these movements rhythmically, and each time she sways back and forth she repeats the sounds hūš hūš. The rhythms of a few of the social games are accompanied by children and adults with simple melodies set to long words (p.585).

The songs in the čiéxaus, which fall into two groups, are unique. An uninterrupted repetition of a few sounds on the same pitch, carried on at night sometimes by only one person and during the day simultaneously by most of the people, is part of the daily program (p. 791); more elaborate melodies accompany the special dances and social games on most evenings (p.822). In songs of mourning, especially in the yamalašemōjna, the same word, consisting of three to six syllables, is repeated on the same pitch; the melody is constantly interrupted by interjections and loud laments (p.1070).

I would broadly characterize the tā́xer as a mood-song. It concludes a mourning assembly, a festive gathering, or a čiéxaus (p. 841). The brown meadow bird, tā́xer, invented this song and first sang it when, as a capable yékamuš, it once stranded a whale and invited everybody to an abundant feast. A person who now introduces this song wants to please his countrymen with a surprise and create a happy mood, after the example set by that bird.

533 While the singing is going on, a person moves around the circle /1469/ and distributes a bit of meat or a roasted mussel to everyone present. The kēšpiš of each person present abandons, so to speak, the body, which is bound to that place, and goes to the festival of the tāxer bird. Far out on the high seas these kēšpiš meet other kēšpiš and those of their deceased relatives. The latter are hosts to the arriving kēšpiš and they all enjoy themselves for some time. Toward the end of the gathering, the hosts motion with both hands as though they were grasping things and showering gifts on their guests. Thereupon these kēšpiš take leave of one another and return to the hut from which they departed; the other kēšpiš remain far out over the ocean. During the tāxer song the kēšpiš of a human being leaves its body, exactly as it does when the person is dreaming. The song is always sung seriously and calmly; sometimes it is reminiscent of a true song of mourning. What the Yamana express with the word kēšpiš in this explanation clearly corresponds to what we Europeans call "state of mind" or "mood"; the tāxer song is supposed to bring everyone back to calm mental balance after great mental agitation. Every yékamuš has a particular song that was given to him by his yefáčel (p.1918). The čōwánni song, with which the spirits of the sea animals, especially those of schools of herring and those of whales, are enticed, has a set melody, the introduction of which is reserved for the yékamuš (p.1349); in the east the čōwánni song is called uwāwen-yékmuš, in the west, atuíle-yékamuš. It is well known that a medicine man practices his calling only in the "dream state" into which he puts himself by his singing. This singing is also called lōima-yékamuš because during it every medicine man makes contact with his spirits.

The pasánna may be regarded as a kind of jolly folksong; 533 177 the designation tapalisánna is less common. Everyone may sing them wherever and whenever he chooses, following his own inclination without pressure from the outside. There are few people, however, who enjoy them and occasionally entertain their neighbors with them. My informants assured me that all the pasánna were first given to the western Yamana group long ago by the Halakwulup, and that later the former transmitted these songs to the central group. This also explains the fact that the word

533 177 underlying the melody is a clearly recognizable Halakwulup word, not otherwise current among the Yamana. The word ariwa, as well as acagwarafka -- each of which is repeated to a separate melody -- are designated as genuine Halakwulup words. The song based on the latter word is called the "pasánna of the drunken ones": it is sung with great merriment and accompanied by clumsy swaying of the entire upper part of the body. In Halakwulup the word ēk'soxwar means "water, drinking water, alcoholic beverage" (Gusinde [s]:1013). In another pasánna the expression guanāko seftihōx is repeated. The word guanāko possibly /1470/ found its way into Yamana only in recent times through this pasánna, for otherwise they use only amēxa. This pasánna, like the previous one, clearly shows that in the not too distant past the Halakwulup have transmitted one or another of their songs to our Yamana. Gertie and other informants assured me that in their youth, on trips through the west, they learned a song or two which was unknown in the central Yamana region. Just as today a jolly group will occasionally burst into a pasánna, so, in earlier times, this was done on the rare occasion when a European ship passed by as a sign of joy and surprise. The Yamana mother is certainly not fond of singing, but it is true that one of them will occasionally amuse her baby with a pasánna.

533 302 It is customary among the Yamana to pass around some pigment while singing is going on. Everyone present takes a little of it and paints his face, a sign that he is taking part in the singing. A single woman will sometimes sing the so-called akāinix song in jolly company. In the middle of it she will stretch both arms in front of her with the palms of the hands turned upward. Suddenly a little piece of charcoal will be lying on each hand, and with it the singer draws lines on the face of everyone present. No one could tell me the meaning of all this (369).

126 369. On my last two trips through Tierra del Fuego I made phonograph recordings for each of the three tribes living there. E. M. von Hornbostel has arranged this material, but his comparative study, which I received in manuscript, can only appear in the third

126 volume of the present work. For the time being, I wish to call attention to his shorter account, "Fuegian Songs," in the American Anthropologist, Vol. 38, No. 3, pp. 357-367, July-September, 1936. -- At this point I need not discuss the erroneous view of someone like Spegazzini (a):169 and others. Bridges (i):18 briefly mentions a few songs of the Yamana. Cf. in Cooper:90 the report on the songs that Furlong recorded on the phonograph.

533 868 532 It is amusing to learn that occasionally an older man who enjoys singing will call young people into his hut -- a few adults will join them -- in order to practice songs with them. Ašikanšis is known as such a person. They stay together for a few hours, learn or repeat one song after another, and conclude their jolly gathering with the so-called ánawē, a merry performance. A clownish man will step outside and wrap himself in skins so that only his face is uncovered, upon which he draws many red and white dots. Between each corner of his mouth and a nostril, as well as between each pair of eyelids, he stretches short sticks which distort the face. This joke, a favorite among boys (p.580), is called hanaxwénteg, and the little sticks are flexible twigs of the parasitic plant Myzodendron punctatum, appropriately called hánis tauwēla, "basket of the beech," because of its shape. In this disguise the man suddenly steps into the gathering of youthful singers, acts very officiously toward each one, and joins in the general laughter. Sometimes several immature /1471/ youths will dress up in the manner described, and they all end the singing lesson with lively leaps outside the hut of their "teacher." This gay conclusion is called hanaxwérentega (cf. Fig. 4 of the photogravure plates /at the end of the work/).

534 The Yamana do not have actual musical instruments. It is true that children take the short hollow bones of a bird or the hollow lower part of a thick quill, hold the object vertically, and place it against the lower lip, producing soft whistling tones with short puffs of air. These simple objects, called umáku, certainly 533 cannot be regarded as musical instruments. Nevertheless, the 533 various songs, the diversity of body painting, and the delight in ornaments show the not inconsiderable aesthetic feeling of the Yamana. For an evaluation from the viewpoint of culture history, a distinction that was often pointed out to me is significant. The Yamana say: The čōwánni song and every yékamuš song are peculiar to the five ethnic groups alike, but the tāxer song, the [177] čiéxaus song, and the pasánna songs belonged to the Halakwulup and were first transmitted to the western Yamana, who gradually transmitted them to the central Yamana groups so that they, too, have had them since then.

d. Sociability

571 As a result of the type of economy imposed on our Fuegians by their environment, the individual throughout most of his life is dependent upon himself alone or his immediate family. By nature he is capable of getting along by himself and of being self-sufficient. He is constantly stimulated anew by everything around him, and the pressure of food-seeking incessantly arouses his desire for action. Hence he can never be inactive for any length of time and become bored; his temperament is far too lively and active. He knows how to keep himself busy even if he has to be alone. There are many middle-aged and older persons who prefer continuous solitude far more than one visit after another by a related family or a family of friends. The Yamana has many inner resources and likes to give himself up to his own thoughts. He finds great satisfaction in sitting by himself and occupying himself in one way or another. Nevertheless, the great enjoyment that lively social intercourse can offer often drives one or another of them into the company of his fellows, where he can enrich his knowledge and his spirit and where mind and soul derive new stimulation. His happy nature comes into its own in group games; he is a very agreeable companion.

/1471 cont./

1. Gatherings

571 From previous accounts the Yamana is known to be a person 593 who has himself under perfect control and who usually behaves in 521 a very /1472/ reserved manner in the company of others (p. 914).
This attitude is not determined solely by mistrust of others and the traditional rules for social intercourse (p. 913); it is far more a natural characteristic of our Indians, to which their training, of course, contributes its share. Within the family circle every member is very reserved and taciturn. For hours at a time individuals will sit beside each other in the canoe or in the hut without exchanging a word. If they chat with one another now and then, their talk almost always centers around what the present day has brought. Loud gaiety and spontaneous outbursts of joy are more or less rare within the individual family. Nevertheless, many a father will amuse himself with his young sons and many an active mother will do the same with her daughters in every conceivable way. Parents really enjoy playing with their young children and fondle them very lovingly from the day they are born (p. 513).
593 As soon as children have some understanding, the parents confide
861 in them about their own experiences and the knowledge derived 521 from it, as well as much of their religious and mythological belief. In this way the children obtain a rich heritage of ideas and learn to think about it when they are alone. In the evening after the long day's journey, the parents, squatting around the hut fire or stretched out on their hard beds, repeat in detail just about everything that the day has brought. They make comparisons and recall other things, confirm this thing and warn about that, discuss their plans for the morrow, and toy with hopes for the future. This is the particular kind of social life, maintained within narrow (in fact, the narrowest) limits, that the Fuegian family can offer them.

571 On a land or canoe trip individual persons usually pass each
521 other without stopping; both parties are content with a brief greeting, a modest question and an equally brief answer (p. 921). If, however, several families of friends or relatives brought together by chance after a long separation are camping together, there is great liveliness in the group. The greeting of two friends is sometimes loud and impulsive, and on such an occasion the discussion

571 521 between individuals may last far into the night (370). There is an exchange of personal adventures and experiences, they report and discuss what has happened in their own families, and they cover in detail their lives and activities as these unfold day by day in a smaller or larger group. This kind of exchange keeps everyone informed about the actions of his relatives and friends.

370. If, as Bridges (h):205 reports, several families had joined around the fire, "they were very animated, spending most of their time in jovial conversation and in the most exuberant demonstrations of happiness. Their laughter, natural and cordial, was excessive in the extreme" /translated from Spanish/.

571 Of far greater significance are those gatherings that come about in connection with a universal obligation, such as /1473/ to instruct young people in the ćiéxaus (p.705) and kīna (p.1295), to express sympathy to mourners in the yamalaĭemōina (p.1079), or to demand atonement for a crime against life, as happens in the case of revenge for bloodshed (p.898). All these gatherings are occasions for renewed acknowledgment of prevailing custom and lawful tradition, occasions when adults are reminded anew of their valuable heritage and it is passed on to young people. I am thinking here primarily of religious belief and [illegible] social and moral precepts, but also of the historical and mythological tradition (371). It has been mentioned a number of times that a gift

371. The assertions of Bridges (k):236 and Hyades (p):338, namely, "The natives neither preserve any tradition about their past history nor know where they came from" /translated from Spanish/ and "there are two or three legends of fantastic exploits, each telling of some ancient actual deed..." /translated from French/, do not need special refutation in view of what is contained in Part 4 of the present volume.

571 for story-telling is greatly appreciated (pp. 934 ,1096) (372).

372. Bove (e):159 declares: "The Fuegians have an amazing gift of speech [i.e., talent for story-telling!]; very often an old man in the huts will start talking and tell about battles, violent storms, meetings with the evil spirit, and hunting adventures for hours without stopping."

These gatherings are indispensable for the assured and orderly continuance of the entire tribe; they enrich the individual and promote the general welfare. When a gathering breaks up, the participants scatter to the four winds, fully satisfied by the experience and with renewed strength within themselves, willing to conform faithfully to the prevailing obligations and laws.

Thus the larger as well as the smaller gatherings of families are extraordinarily valuable; the individual derives the most benefit from them, and the group as a whole gains many advantages. In this connection there is also the half-serious, half-humorous verbal contest known as wólaʔka (p. 955) which is sometimes followed by a regular fist fight between two groups who finally smash all the implements at hand belonging to each other. It starts out of sheer exuberance, and although the participants become very excited during the mad encounter, they end it with their tempers calmed. Finally, the Ikinalpi, a social celebration on a more modest scale, must be mentioned. It takes place when a few people gather for some happy occasion, for example, if the hunt was very successful or if a girl's parents give their daughter to a young man as his wife. The persons arranging it gather a great amount of meat and invite everyone available to a common meal. The almost commanding influence of a tiāmuna has already been described (p. 635). He is never at the same time a yékamuí. He is very conspicuous at a mourning; he speaks comforting words to those who are most affected, pointing out to them that Watauinéjwa has let their relative die out of righteous indignation and as a punishment. In kindly words, he constantly points out tribal customs to the younger people. Thus, each tiāmuna exerts his influence through precept and example.

/1474/ 2. Amusements

517 524 The way the children play when several families camp in the same spot for a few days has been described (p.576). The way they tease each other in true childish fashion is shown, for example, by the use of Adenocystis alga (Fig. 80, p.598) with which wily boys surprise unsuspecting girls. Smaller as well as larger children have a great deal of fun with the swing (p.585); concerning even middle-aged persons, Bridges maintains that "the swing also they are very fond of" /cited in English/ (VSA: XII, 53;1865). The adults, too, take advantage of being together for mutual diversion and general entertainment (373).

373. Bridges (k):240 says in a very general way: "Their principal amusements are wrestling, playing with a ball, and practicing with spears, arrows, slings, and stones" /translated from Spanish/. Bridges (a):209, Outes (g):53, Spegazzini (a):170, Whaits in MM:X, 12;1876, and others speak of dances. These reports and the few expressions in BD are, unfortunately, incomplete. Bridges (a):209 maintained that "most of their amusements are very childish" /cited in English/; these words alone show plainly how little he understood the characteristics of those Indians.

526 The popular ball-game does not require special preparation. Anyone may call the people out of the huts to a smooth, grassy area where they form a large circle. The ball, kálaka, the size of a fist, is made of the web of the albatross, first blown up to dry, stuffed with down feathers, and finally sewn up. It is tossed up perpendicularly with the flat palm of the hand; when it returns, another player must again toss it into the air and make sure that it ascends as vertically as possible. Otherwise, it usually falls to the ground outside the circle of players, which is supposed to be avoided. Lawrence, along with Bridges (i):16, declares: "The Indians are very fond of playing at ball" /cited in English/ (MM: VI, 128;1872), which they call kálaka áraku. This is almost the

526 same as the other game of ball, known as kálea. BD:201 mentions only kílaka, "a ball of any kind" /cited in English/. For kílea one needs the stomach of a seal, which is dried and blown up. With the hand flat it is tossed vertically into the air, but since the shape of the ball is irregular, its flight is uncertain and it often falls to the ground outside the circle of players.

Whereas men and women join in ball-playing, only two men take part in wrestling, which is less popular. It is called kílaka múlaka. The name is easily explained: Before the match begins, a person chooses his opponent from the audience and challenges him by placing a little ball, kílaka, at his feet. This man must accept if he does not want to be called a coward, and with the other man he immediately steps inside the large circle of spectators. At once they seize each other and wrestle until one of them is held down by the other in such a way that his entire back is on the ground. The spectators follow the match with loud cries and enthusiastically acclaim the victor. Tripping a person is not permitted, but one man can use his knee to kick the shank of the other so hard /1475/ that he sways and is more easily knocked over. The one who is defeated suffers a considerable affront to his own honor and that of his best friends. One of the latter immediately steps inside the circle of spectators, grasps the ball, and places it at the feet of the winner who has no choice but to prove his skill with the new opponent, and the two grapple. As Bridges (i):16 asserts: "they never tried more than twice when those matches proved equal" /cited in English/. Before the fight a yékamuš gives strength and stability to the knees of the wrestlers by his magic massage. The one who is defeated is called ūiya or takupēna. The winner, ášaša kílaka, who is unmarried is very much desired by girls for marriage (cf. the wrestling match of the Selk'nam in Vol. I, 1134). A general struggle, known as hamkajyīwa, takes place if a man has been successively victorious over several men of another group. In order to vindicate their wounded honor, the latter appear before this man, and one of them places the little ball at his feet. The two start wrestling within the large circle of spectators which has quickly formed. If the previous victor keeps the upper hand, a friend of the defeated one will immediately challenge him, and a new struggle begins. A third and a fourth man follow.

526 Soon a second, fourth, and sixth pair have come together, and finally all the men of one group are wrestling with those of the other. Then the women also pitch in and push the wrestling pairs to the ground. Finally, in the general melee, no one knows who can boast of having won. Thus, the ones who began the wrestling believe that their reputation has been restored and both groups separate peacefully. The women do not care for this general wrestling, for it ends in a nasty brawl.

The so-called imitative games are more enjoyable and 527 much more agreeable to the Yamana because they are in such perfect accord with their nature. They reproduce the movements and the calls of certain kinds of animals with amazing accuracy. Mimicry is only a supplementary aspect, for often they repeat the melody without the body movements. These games are permitted only during the čiéxaus celebration, either in the Great Hut or in front of it (p. 222): it is the duty of the winefkēra to keep curious persons away. At the general concluding ceremony, however, old and young may look on (p. 811). Sometimes only men or only women take part, but usually both together. Each of these games has its own melody.

The ímaxēl, the game of the sea lion (Otaria jubata). Both men and women, clumsily and ponderously, lie down close to one another in an irregular group. Some of them stretch slowly, others look around in a bored way, some prop themselves up with their hands flat, while others, half upright, drag themselves along the ground. One person will scratch his back as though his hand were a flipper; another wallows exuberantly in the sand. One person will snore loudly until his neighbor lies down on top of him, whereupon he shoots up angrily and bares his teeth to the one who disturbed him. Two other persons fondle each other, imitating male and female. This or that one will repeatedly snap shut /1476/ his wide-open mouth, as though he had caught fish in the water, make loud chewing motions, and smack his lips with delight. In the midst of all this a few persons will roar in a deep, threatening voice. While this confused tangle moves and stirs about, the spectators nearby repeat the melody and often clap their hands. The players themselves intermittently call out hoxhox... or rūkrūk... After some time a woman gets up and gently taps one player after another with a short piece of leather. Immediately each one collapses and is "dead." Lying in jumbled confusion, they remain motionless until the same woman puts a mussel shell, filled with water, to the mouth of each one; he takes a small swallow and is "alive" again. When all the players have resumed their places, the whole company concludes this extraordinarily charming game with loud, high-pitched cries of hō hō.

The haĭ̯wā́pisa-xēl, game of the blue whale (Balaenoptera intermedia). This is a game for men only. At least 12 of them sit down on the ground; each one spreads his outstretched legs apart and leans with his back close against the chest of the man behind him. The latter puts both arms under the armpits of the man in front of him and holds him tightly. The man sitting at the head of the row rests both fists on the ground and braces himself firmly against the man behind him. Swaying from one side to the other, the whole row clumsily slides slowly from the spot, naturally in the direction opposite the one they are facing. At short intervals all the men howl while the women present uninterruptedly carry on the slow, rhythmic song. Finally a woman hastens along the entire row and gently slaps each man with a piece of skin, whereupon the men in the row lie down on their sides and "the whale is now dead." This game is supposed to show the final clumsy movements of a whale that has been tossed up on the beach.

The ałōula-xēl, game of the small whale (Pseudorca crassidens /the "false killer" whale/). First of all the men form a long row in the manner described above, and the row leans against an identical, shorter one. The former represents haĭ̯wā́pisa, and the latter, ałōula. The accompanying song is similar to the previous one, but the howling of the long row is fainter and more doleful. Both rows slide along simultaneously, but very clumsily. After a while the men in the shorter row brace themselves with all their strength against the men in the longer one. The latter groan most pitifully, the cry gradually subsides, and the row collapses: the ałōula has "fatally wounded" the haĭ̯wā́pisa and the latter "dies."

The ilawā́ja-xēl, game of the kite (Catharista atratus). The men and women crowd close together and assume a squatting position. Their half-open hands rest loosely on the ground and scratch in the sand. They very accurately imitate the rustling beat of the hard, stiff wing feathers of the vulture. A few persons hop about happily,

54 turning in one place or moving forward stiffly. They often interrupt their constant singing with screeches of joy. They grasp a /1477/ a piece of skin with both hands and slap it against the ground or pull it through the sand. This vulture ploughs up the ground in exactly the same way with its wings. Other persons move forward in long steps, spasmodically, as it were. Still others hop with their arms partly raised. In all this one recognizes the movements of ilawkia. Compare Figure 10 of the photogravure plates /at the end/.

The yo'khalla-ell, game of the hawk (Milvago chimango). This is almost the same as the preceding one in its movements, but the melody is different. Besides, the gestures are much more amusing and livlier; the striding motions are slightly springy and graceful. The short, thrill cry repeated by individual persons cannot be distinguished from that of this predatory bird.

The hêlla-ell, game of the great gerfalcon (Polyboru tharus). When the special song is in full swing, a few men and women step out of the circle of participants to the open fire. Here they squat down, resting their open hands lightly on the ground. They repeatedly shake their outstretched arms, just as the falcon shakes its half-open wings. They also make brief rolling motions, exactly like the falcon when it lifts itself up to fly. At the same time their hands are three-quarters open and their fingers spread apart. With the upper part of their bodies bent forward, they scratch busily in the sand with their hands, an activity that the gerfalcon very much enjoys. A gay, thrill cackle is often heard. The people present toss a piece of meat into the circle of players. One or another will grasp the piece with his teeth. Immediately another player jumps up, bites at the piece of meat, and tugs at it impatiently until someone else comes up. Anyone who has torn off a piece cackles loudly and hides it from another person who might snatch it away from him. All the movements are very lively, the leaps gaily excited, and the thrill cries of hêr hêr... or xî xî...or yo yo...are loud. Toward the end, all the players utter several croaking kî kî sounds and the spectators answer with loud cries of ho ho as the conclusion.

The ghîpu-ell, game of the great albatross (Diomedea exulans, Fig. 88). After the people present have introduced the 524 proper melody, a few men and women step inside the small circle. Some of them remain standing; others kneel down and lift their outstretched arms to shoulder height. They keep their arms in this position. The people standing then step slowly forward, gliding past one another and bending the upper part of the body calmly and sedately to one side and then the other. At the same time they move their outstretched arms in wide arcs through the air, but without hitting one another. The moderately loud hoō hoō cries of the gĕrăpu are uttered sporadically and very realistically, sounding like a long drawn-out cooing of doves. The players do not actually make striding motions, but glide along the ground. All their movements are extremely elegant, for only /1478/ slim persons play this game which is supposed to show the majestic flight of the albatross over a raging sea. After some time all the players form a circle, take each other's hands, their arms only slightly held out from their bodies, and slowly walk around the fire. They huddle down several times for a few seconds and then get up again, for the albatrosses, too, sometimes alight on the water close together. While this circle is slowly moving, a woman approaches it; in passing, each one takes a swallow of water from the mussel shell which she holds up to his mouth, for the albatross, too, occasionally comes to the shore for water. When the loud, high-pitched cries of ho ho resound from the group of spectators, the players cease their graceful body movements. Compare Figure 11 of the photogravure plates /at the end/.

The tăkaĭa-xēl, game of the loud gull (Larus belcheri). The participants are mainly girls and young women, who crowd close together and remain for some time in a squatting position. They get up, hold hands, and move about in a circle several times. After they have crouched down, one of them will try to induce another to get up by uttering shrill xa xa cries. Indeed, one or another of them jumps up, bends the upper part of her body partly forward, and keeps her arms bent at the elbow at right angles. This is a favorite position of this gull when it sights its prey. Later when the players again squat on the ground in a closed circle, a woman hastens past them and lets each one take some water out of a mussel shell, for tăkaĭa, too, drinks fresh water. Amid loud cries of xa xa the players all get up and go back to their places.

524 The sĕkuĭ-xĕl, game of the Molinas goose (Chloephaga hybrida /kelp goose/). The men and women who step inside the open circle bend their bodies slightly forward from the waist, bend their knees considerably, hold their upper arms horizontally at shoulder height, and let the lower arms fall down loosely from the elbow at right angles. They remain in a squatting position until the song of the people present is loud enough. All get up and again assume the position just described, while the men utter lively xi xi calls and the women joyous xa xa calls. Then they hop every which way in a crowded heap, and amid loud pe pe calls, every man seeks either his own wife or a woman friend. This pair hops happily up and down on the same spot; the two gaze at each other lovingly and beat or stroke each other with their "wings." The man repeats his pe pe calls and the woman her xa xa calls very animatedly; he taps her on the shoulders and she taps him on the hips. This pair hops and giggles until another man moves up to the woman and shoves the first man aside. The happily excited song of the spectators encourages the pair in their charming love-play, until it is ended with loud cries of ho ho. It is well known that sĕkuĭ is strictly monogamous.

The kĭmpa-xĕl, game of the Magellan goose (Chloephaga picta). In this game, too, the people leave a central circular area free. The players /1479/ assume the position they take in the sĕkuĭ-xĕl. First a few of them remain in the squatting position for a short time; then a man rises, moves to a woman he is fond of, taps her on the shoulders, and thus invites her to the love-play. She rises at the same time. These two persons, facing each other, take turns in loudly twittering xa xa... and xi xi... and hop hither and yon. Then they separate again and form couples with other persons. The short striding motions are stiff, like those of kĭmpa. As in the sĕkuĭ-xĕl, the love-play of this species is also portrayed very realistically indeed. The two games are clearly distinguished by their melodies.

The ulpĕ̆ĕ̆ĕ̆ĭ-xĕl, game of the oyster catcher (Haematopus ater, Fig. 76). Several persons, huddled together, hop into the circle. Again and again they bow their heads almost to the ground, support themselves on their arms, and constantly repeat short pit pit calls. Three or four hop simultaneously to the same place, bow their heads several times, and repeat the pit pit calls. This is exactly the way the oyster catcher behaves on the beach. Amid shrill sounds of ì ì, all the players rise up at once, as though a flock of these birds were flying off. They disperse to loud ho ho cries of the spectators.

The toywilwa-xēl, game of the Vigua cormorant (Phalacrocorax olivaceus). Several women squat beside the fire or in the open space amidst the group of people who have begun singing the melody. They use their fists for support in such a way that thumb and forefinger are pressed against the earth. Hopping gently, they move in this crouched position and give a good imitation of the waddling walk of the cormorant (Fig. 103). Now and then they twitter xì xì...as they push past one another. Finally they form a circle, hold hands, rise, and go around the circle a few times. A woman stands beside this circle, holding a mussel shell filled with water in her left hand and a little twig in her right hand, with which the bespatters everyone who glides past her, "for when toywilwa build their nests, they come to the shore, drink water, and spatter it in all directions." At a sign from the leader, this game is ended with loud cries of ho ho.

Sometimes the calls of the winelwa are heard during the course of the individual games. The games are put on in the ʔiʔkaxa but and not in full view of the public because "the animals imitated were formerly human beings and much of what happened to them is known." I did not have an opportunity to see some of these games, for example, the lakēma-xēl, the people were not nice enough of the melody. Instead, Nelly Lawrence and elderly women told me about the following custom. Formerly the Yamana made these games even more realistic by actually masking the participants. Each one wrapped himself up completely in a sea-lion skin from which the head had not yet been cut off, or he placed /1480/ a piece of skin over his head so that only part of his face was uncovered and put a few large teeth of the sea lion into his mouth so that they protruded very prominently. All the people thus masked very carefully imitated the movements and the behavior of the sea lions while they moved from the ʔiʔkaxa hut to the shallow water at the beach. Clumsily they slid into the sea and squirted themselves with water out of sheer exuberance. If while this was going on several women succeeded in surrounding a man, they kept him encircled and led him back to the [illegible] hut. It was only here that the victorious women released him amid loud laughs. The Yamana of earlier times also had appropriate masks for the other imitative games. In any case, however, the games gave all the participants great enjoyment. Naturally, the men to this day also entertain themselves now and then with games for practice, some of which are popular among young people (p.578). during these games they try, at the same time, to become more proficient in handling their weapons. They never have races, however, which Bridges (a) 209 mentioned. Their many other amusements, which never bore them, are amply sufficient for them and relax them.

H. Characteristics of Yamana Culture

The numerous details presented in this book characterize the economy of the Yamana as one at the gathering stage. Everything that these natives need and use is simply taken by them in the form offered voluntarily by nature. They themselves make no effort to produce the materials they need or to raise plants and animals. Thus, these people are wholly dependent on their environment.

Such a relationship, however, is not one of total inactivity or indifference on the part of man. His entire attention and untiring efforts were always directed toward utilizing the conditions imposed by the given environment and controlling natural forces as much as possible. By doing so he finally achieved an adaptation to his environment which could scarcely be improved upon under existing conditions. In my opinion, his economy, as a whole and in its details, represents optimum adaptation. I have often referred to the high degree of efficiency of most of the arrangements of the Yamana and the amazing effectiveness of their weapons which require a minimum of human effort. The reason that the Fuegian did not achieve more in his economy is by no means because he lacks the necessary physical equipment or mental powers. It is the environment itself which has set insurmountable barriers to his efforts toward progress. He has truly pushed ahead to these barriers by creating his unique, very functional implements. The bark canoe has no counterpart /1451/ anywhere in the wide world. Even that of the neighboring Halakwulup shows differences imposed by the material used. Could a more effective weapon be invented with such simple materials as those used by our Foegian for his large harpoon? Using the possibilities offered by his environment and by existing conditions, he has created the characteristics of his form of economy.

Such achievements are true works of culture in the narrowest sense of the term, accomplished in the given locale. The ancestors of the Yamana, in their wanderings through the extensive American continent from the far north to the southernmost tip, possessed, of course, various cultural assets of a material and spiritual nature, which they brought with them to their ultimate homeland. However, all the special forms that have an "indigenous smell," if I may so express it, were created by these immigrants in Tierra del Fuego itself. This means true cultural progress beyond that enjoyed by those first newcomers up to that time, and by means of these accomplishments they actually made cultural history. All the new achievements with which they, as the first proven settlers of the Cape Horn Archipelago, must be credited were, to be sure, not transmitted to other peoples, because the Yamana have remained completely isolated. Nevertheless, this cultural heritage has absolute value and therefore is an enrichment of the culture of mankind as a whole. Moreover, the Yamana developed their achievements to the degree of perfection permitted by the material itself. If this limit had not been imposed, who could doubt that our natives commanded sufficient mental power to have accomplished even greater things. The environment itself made it impossible for them to develop further the economy they adopted. Morton (d) 378 is of the same opinion, that "this apparent inferiority is due to the land environment in which they obtain their food, principally by fishing in the fjords in their canoes" /tried in English/. When, after long observation and experimentation, those forms and peculiarities were chosen and permanently adopted, which made possible a calm equilibrium between the inhabitants' demands and necessities of life on the one hand, and the meager supply of raw material and the unpropitious living conditions of the Cape Horn Archipelago on the other, 182 the Fuegian was satisfied with this harmonious balance. For that reason he stubbornly persisted in maintaining his traditional material heritage. Once he was offered from the outside the possibility of a slight change and a certain amount of progress through the introduction of the dog, he resolutely adopted it and made this new source of strength an integral part of his previous economic arrangements. This is proof enough that the limitations of the economic form actually achieved by the Fuegian were imposed upon him from the outside; there was still more vitality for progress within him, but it could not become effective.

/1482/ Fuegian social organization is closely connected with this state of affairs. A livelihood through gathering does not permit an organization of all tribal members and a close, permanent union. Their religious awareness culminates in the assumption of a personal Supreme Being with definite characteristics. The image of his deity that the Fuegian has created does not show any kind of environmental influence. Quite the contrary, it is the result of simple reflection, of a direct demand for causal thinking. It is quite different from mythological and superstitious conceptions.

086 Historical relationships between these Fuegians and other peoples, as well as comparisons of their culture with that of other ethnic groups, would be in order, for merely to ascertain facts, describe objects, and evaluate institutions is not culture history. I am well aware of this, and I shall comply with these justifiable demands in the third volume of this work. With abundant satisfaction I shall now conclude this long description. It presents a total picture of the strange and unique culture of this tribe of people that lived on the inhospitable southern tip of the Americas for centuries and has only recently been driven to destruction by the intrusion of European culture. The last two dozen surviving Yamana will soon have sunk into their graves. To this people misunderstood by Europeans for three centuries, the tossing, foaming waves of the eternally restless sea around Cape Horn will sing a never-ending dirge. /Fig. 105 appears here./

Vorwort

Mehrere Ursachen verschiedener Art haben das Erscheinen des vorliegenden Werkes verzögert. Eine davon ist sein ansehnlicher Umfang. Man wird es mir wohl nicht verübeln, daß ich die gesamte Darstellung so ausführlich als möglich geboten habe. Als ich im September 1923 von dem kleinen Häuflein der Yamana, die sich noch des Lebens freuten, für immer Abschied nahm, wußten es sie sowohl wie ich selber, daß ihre Volksgemeinschaft nicht mehr lebensfähig wäre und daß binnen kurzem der Letzte ihres Stammes ins Grab sinken würde. Während der Niederschrift und Drucklegung dieses Werkes habe ich in größeren Zeitabständen zuverlässige Nachrichten aus dem Kap Hoorn-Archipel erhalten, die mir den Tod so mancher meiner feuerländischen Freunde meldeten. Zu Beginn dieses Jahres 1937 erreichten die Überlebenden, einige Bastards eingerechnet, nicht einmal mehr die Kopfzahl 25. Nach einigen Jahren wird es keinem europäischen Forscher möglich sein, weder Yamana in ihrem eigentlichen Heimatgebiete anzutreffen, noch weniger ihren einstigen Kulturbesitz kennenzulernen. In Anbetracht einer solch betrüblichen Sachlage habe ich in diesem Buche alle jene Kenntnisse und Beobachtungen niedergelegt, die ich auf meinen vier Reisen gewonnen habe. Sie zu erweitern oder zu vertiefen, da manche Einzelheiten ungeklärt geblieben sind, ist heute nicht mehr möglich. Mag man das eigenartige Völkchen der Yamana noch so sehr bedauern, es ist für immer vorüber.

Der Beschreibung der Pflanzen- und Tierwelt des Kap Hoorn-Archipels habe ich bewußt eine reichliche Ausdehnung gegeben. Jeder Leser wird sich davon überzeugen, daß die dort heimischen Tierarten, noch mehr als die Pflanzenarten, auf die wichtigen Glieder der gesamten Kulturform, nicht zuletzt auf das eigentliche Geistesleben dieses Volkes, einen durchaus bestimmenden Einfluß ausgeübt haben. Die Tätigkeit der englischen Missionare während eines halben Jahrhunderts hat unvermittelt die uralte Lebensweise der Yamana in gänzlich andersartige Bahnen gelenkt. Dieses grundstürzende Geschehnis, erläutert an ungewöhnlich zahlreichen Berichten, verdient es wohl, daß es unter mehrfacher Rücksicht eingehend behandelt wurde. Die geographischen Bezeichnungen wurden hier in der Form wiedergegeben, die an Ort und Stelle gebräuchlich ist. Die wissenschaftliche Klassifikation der Vögel erfolgte vorwiegend nach der bekannten Abhandlung Roberto Darbene's, da mir die wertvolle Monographie Charles E. Hellmayr's erst nach Abschluß meines Manuskriptes zugänglich wurde. Personennamen erscheinen immer in Majuskelschrift und die Namen von Schiffen stehen regelmäßig in Anführungszeichen. Einige wenige Yamana bezeichne ich hier mit ihrem christlichen Namen; ihre ortsüblichen Namen, die teilweise sehr lang und schwer leserlich sind, werde ich bei einer späteren Gelegenheit bekannt geben. Über die Sprache der Yamana liegen mehrere Einzelabhandlungen vor und in vielen Berichten finden sich kürzere oder längere Angaben. Da sie ansehnlich viele Ungenauigkeiten enthalten, habe ich die zahlreichen vorliegenden linguistischen Einzelheiten bei meiner Bearbeitung nur selten berücksichtigt; jetzt, da das Yamana-English-Dictionary des Rev. T. Bridges veröffentlicht ist, braucht sich niemand mehr abzumühen, aus zweiter oder dritter Quelle zu schöpfen. Die häufig verwendeten phonetischen Zeichen in Yamana-Wörtern sind in meiner kurzen Abhandlung (s) erklärt worden.

Sämtliche Darstellungen auf den Tiefdrucktafeln sind Wiedergaben eines geringen Teiles meiner eigenen photographischen Aufnahmen; die erste Farbentafel ist eine Nachbildung einer farbenphotographischen Aufnahme mit einer Lumière-Platte. Die in den Text eingestreuten Zeichnungen hat Herr Eduard Samer in Wien hergestellt; ausgenommen die Nachzeichnungen einheimischer Tierarten in den Abbildungen 9, 13, 58, 76, 82, 91, 92, 94, 95, 100 und 105, welche ich Frau Koller S. in Wien verdanke.

Sowohl das Bundes-Ministerium für Unterricht in Wien, als auch der Hwste Herr P. J. Grendel, Sup. gen. SVD. in Rom, hat durch hochherzige Zuwendung einer eigenen Geldsumme zur Drucklegung dieses Buches beigetragen. Öffentlich dafür zu danken, ist mir eine angenehme Pflicht.

Bereits im Vorwort zum Band I dieses Werkes habe ich in aufrichtiger Anerkennung jener hochherzigen Personen gedacht, die zur Förderung der Wissenschaft vom Menschen durch ihre persönliche Hilfe und die erforderlichen Geldmittel dazu beigetragen haben, daß meine vier Reisen nach der Südspitze der Neuen Welt zustande gekommen und von reichem Erfolg begleitet gewesen sind. Der gastfreundlichen, immer hilfsbereiten Familie Lawrence am Canal de Beagle bleibt das unbestreitbare Verdienst, in derart selbstloser Weise mich bei meinen Forschungen unterstützt zu haben, daß ich nach ergiebiger Feldarbeit das vorliegende Werk zusammenstellen konnte. Insbesondere hat Nelly Lawrence, dieser vollendete Typus einer Yamana-Frau, mit besorgter Aufmerksamkeit mir den Eingang in die eigenartige Geisteswelt ihres Volkes geöffnet, die in solchem Ausmaß andern Europäern nie zugänglich gemacht worden ist. Dieses Buch ist ein untrüglicher Zeuge meines aufrichtigen Dankes an jene schlichte, liebenswürdige, edle Feuerländerin vom Kap Hoorn-Archipel.

Laxenburg bei Wien, im Mai 1937.

ERSTER TEIL

Heimat und Geschichte

Kap Hoorn und seine sturmgepeitschte See sind seit ihrer Entdeckung der Schrecken aller Seefahrer. Trutzig und sieghaft ragt dieser Felsenblock in die kalten Wasserströmungen und in die eisigen Winde hinein, die das lebenmordende Reich des Südpols entsendet. Wie an einem unerschütterlichen Eckpfeiler nimmt hier der amerikanische Erdteil seinen Anfang und zieht sich, lang sich streckend und sich verbreiternd, hoch hinauf in das gegenüberliegende Reich von Eis und Schnee. Wilhelm Julius Schouten, ein holländischer Flottenführer, und sein jugendlicher Begleiter, Jacob Le Maire, haben als erste Europäer das Kap Hoorn am 29. Januar 1616 gesichtet. „Sie glaubten, daß es der südlichste Punkt und Bergpfeiler aller nordwärts liegenden Länder und Inseln der Tierra del Fuego und ganz Amerika's sei, und gaben ihm den Namen 'Het Kap van Hoorn' zu Ehren der Stadt Hoorn, aus welcher der Kapitän Schouten und die Mehrzahl ihrer Rheder, so wie auch einige ihrer Reisegefährten gebürtig waren. Sie erkannten damals noch nicht, daß das Cap Hoorn bloß die südlichste Spitze einer kleinen Insel sei. Weil sie diese südlichste Partie Amerika's nur von ferne sahen, erschien ihnen der ganze dortige Insel-Archipel als ein zusammenhängendes Ganze" (Kom.: 445). Tatsächlich schließt sich, wie es die genaue Forschung in den folgenden Jahrhunderten erwiesen hat, jenem südlichsten Felsen nach Norden und Nordwesten ein wildzerzaustes Inselgewirr an, das sich wie ein Bollwerk der Südspitze des eigentlichen Festlandes vorlagert; zwischen diesem und dem eigentlichen Archipel windet sich die enge Magellan-Straße durch. Auf der Ostseite sind es die langgezogenen, schweren Wogen des Atlantischen, auf der Westseite die stürmischen, unruhigen Wellen des Stillen Ozeans, die dagegen fast unaufhörlich mit drauender Stoßkraft anschlagen und selten nur die unverrückbaren Felsenufer leicht plätschernd umschmeicheln.

Die Gesamtheit jener vielgestaltigen und verschieden großen Eilande nennt man einfachhin "Das Feuerland". FITZ-ROY (a): 132 rechnete hierzu, ohne irgendwelche Einschränkung, „all the islands southward of the Strait of Magalhaens (including Staten Land), as far as the Diego Ramirez islets". Eigentlich gebührt nur der größten Insel im Osten die Bezeichnung "Isla Grande de la Tierra del Fuego" (Bd. I, 1). Der wohlberechtigte und brauchbare Vorschlag der MISSION SCIENTIFIQUE du Cap Horn, man möchte sich auf die Benennung "Magellanische Inselwelt" einigen, fand leider keine Beachtung und die geographische Namengebung für jene Gegend blieb nach wie vor schwankend. Die Eilande im Süden des Canal de Beagle, letzteren in seiner ganzen west-östlichen Ausdehnung einbezogen, bezeichnet man gern als den "Kap Hoorn-Archipel". Diese Umschreibung soll, wegen ihrer Einfachheit und Bestimmtheit, auch im vorliegenden Buche bevorzugt werden.

Einem Dreieck gleich läßt sich der sogenannte Kap Hoorn-Archipel mit langen, geraden Strichen umgrenzen. Er ist die Heimat der südlichsten Feuerland-Indianer und somit der am meisten nach Süden vorgeschobene, von menschlichen Wesen erfüllte Lebensraum auf der Erde. Nächste Nachbarn dieser Yamana sind die Selk'nam (Ona) auf der Isla Grande im Nordosten und die Halakwulup (Alakaluf) in jenem Inselgewirr, das sich als das sogenannte westpatagonische Inselreich von der Peninsula Brecknock beim westlichen Ausgange des Canal de Beagle bis weit nach Norden hinauf ausdehnt.

Mit vollem Recht genießt der äußerste Süden der Neuen Welt seinen schlechten Ruf und seine gefürchtete Berühmtheit; denn für manches stolze Schiff ist er zum Verhängnis geworden und seine tückischen Gewässer haben den kühnsten Wagemut vieler erprobter Seefahrer gebrochen. Seit Jahrhunderten braust nun schon bedrohlich der heulende Sturm über die zerrissenen Inseln und zerklüfteten Felsen hinweg, oder er peitscht sie unter klatschendem Aufschlag mit eisigkalten Regenschauern, oder er hüllt sie in dichte Schneewirbel ein; das ewig unruhige Meer bedroht auch weiterhin einen jeden, der sich seinen unberechenbaren Launen vertrauensselig überläßt, mit sicherem Untergange in seinen schaumgekrönten Wogen, die über grundlose Tiefen mächtig dahinrollen. Alle jene Einzelunternehmungen unerschrokkener Seeleute und die Entdeckungsfahrten kühner Forscher, die während der letzten vier Jahrhunderte in ihren kleinen, schwankenden Fahrzeugen den Kampf mit den Wogen und Stürmen in der Kap Hoorn-Nähe aufgenommen haben, sind eine glänzende Geschichte übermenschlichen Heldentums und großartiger, unerreichbarer Entdeckerleistungen. Außergewöhnlich stark fühlt man sich angeregt, darin herumzublättern. Indes, in die vorliegende Abhandlung können nur jene Forschungen und Beobachtungen einbezogen werden, die zur Kenntnis und zum Verständnis der körperlichen Eigenart, der Lebensgewohnheiten und Einrichtungen jener dort beheimateten Eingeborenen mehr oder weniger beigetragen haben. Dieses Buch ist ausschließlich der Ethnographie der Yamana, den alteingesessenen Urbewohnern des gefürchteten Kap Hoorn-Archipels gewidmet.[1]

Kein Wunder, daß die ersten in Europa verbreiteten Nachrichten über menschliche Lebewesen, die auf jenen abgelegenen, unfreundlichen Eilanden ihr Dasein fristen, großes Befremden erregt haben und daß deren Erforschung von den Seefahrern bei weitem nicht mit der Aufmerksamkeit betrieben wurde, mit der eine zügellose Phantasie und eine uneingeschränkte Beurteilung sich deren Daseinsweise auszumalen beliebte. Bis in die Neuzeit hinein blieben völkerkundliche Mitteilungen aus dem Feuerlande immer lückenhaft und unzureichend. Erst jetzt, kurz vor dem unaufhaltsamen Aussterben der wenigen letzten Yamana, kann eine in etwa vollständige Beschreibung der Kulturform jenes südlichsten aller Indianerstämme der Öffentlichkeit übergeben werden. Die Gelegenheiten zu deren Erforschung waren früher unvergleichlich vorteilhafter[2] und jene entfernten Gewässer sind von vielen Schiffen verschiedener europäischer Nationen durchquert worden; ihr Ziel jedoch war die Entdeckung neuer Welten und die Eroberung fremder Länder, nicht aber die Kenntnis und das Verstehen andersgearteter Menschen. Überdies trieben die von allen Seiten eindrängenden ernsten Gefahren in der Kap Hoorn-Gegend alle Seeleute zu eiliger Fahrt an; sie trachteten unterschiedslos dem drohenden Unheil möglichst schnell zu entfliehen. Trotzdem gelang es nicht allen, diese gefährliche Stelle zu umschiffen und sie fanden einen kläglichen Untergang in den erbarmungslosen Wellen. Kaum ein anderes Küstengebiet dürfte so dicht und so reichlich, wie jenes, mit den zermalmten Trümmern gescheiterter Fahrzeuge und zerschellter Schiffe besät sein.[3]

[1] Einen guten geschichtlichen Überblick über Entdeckungsfahrten und Forschungsergebnisse in der Antarktis gibt Deus: 241—257. Vgl. zur Ergänzung auch den Abschnitt: "Historique des voyages au Détroit de Magellan", in Martial: 56—72.

[2] Für einzelne Reisende waren die Forschungsmöglichkeiten allerdings knapp und beschränkt, für andere aber sehr günstig. Daß ihrem Bemühen sich zuweilen starke Hindernisse in den Weg gestellt haben, sei unumwunden zugegeben. An sie erinnert Dabarnay (b): 276 mit folgenden Worten: „Todas las historias están llenas de las horrores de aquellas sombrías regiones; y desde que el esfuerzo de los españoles, de fundar una colonia en Puerto Hambre, había fracasado, se miraba sólo con el más profundo terror la tierra de los esquiretes gigantes y el vecino archipiélago habitado por la raza más infima del género humano. De modo, que si las penas de aquellos cuyo oficio es luchar contra los elementos, si los triunfos de la conquista han enriquecido con datos positivos la ciencia ésnica de la virgen América."

Mit der sich steigernden Sicherheit der Seefahrt[4] häufte sich das Zusammentreffen der Europäer mit den dortigen Eingeborenen. Die fast nur gelegentlichen Beziehungen, die dabei angeknüpft wurden, dehnten sich langsam weiter aus. Später faßten anglikanische Missionare sogar mitten unter jenen Feuerländern festen Fuß. Selbstverständlich schlossen sich diesen Glaubensboten außer Siedlern schnell noch Geschäftsleute an, die alle mitsammen heute das ganze Gebiet beherrschen und für sich allein beanspruchen. Je mehr jedoch das Ausländerwesen sich dort ausbreitete und einnistete, um so schneller wich unter seinem übermächtigen Andrange das uralte Indianertum zurück. Heute ist es nur noch in einigen unvollständigen Resten und zusammenhangloosen Trümmern erhalten, die längst schon dem baldigen Untergange rettungslos überantwortet sind. Wenige Jahrzehnte europäischer Beeinflussung haben auch in jenem abgelegenen Weltwinkel genügt, um das dort festverwurzelte, uralte und lebensfähige Volk mit unheilvollen Todeskeimen ganz zu durchsetzen und von der Erdoberfläche restlos abzudrängen.

A. Die Heimat

Eine engbegrenzte, unfreundliche Inselwelt ist den Yamana, den südlichsten Erdenbewohnern, als Lebensraum zugefallen. Ihr weites Vorrücken an den südlichen Polarkreis heran läßt von vornherein auf sehr ungünstige Witterungsbedingungen schließen, die der Pflanzen- und Tierwelt nur einen knappen Raum zur Entfaltung freigeben. Wo die Sonne ihre Licht- und Wärmefülle nicht ausschüttet, gedeiht das Leben nur spärlich und kümmerlich. All das wirkt sich hemmend und einschränkend auf die Daseinsmöglichkeiten, im besonderen nachdrücklich bestimmend und richtunggebend auf die Wirtschaftsform der Eingeborenen aus. Sie sind und bleiben auf das, was sie umgibt, scheinbar so notwendig angewiesen, als könnten sie von dort nicht

Signaboos vestigios, de cuerpos y mástiles destrozados, de maderas destrozadas y fierros torcidos, testigos mudos de algún drama ignorado, de algún cuadro de terror, de algún grito de desesperación ahogado por las saladas aguas del Océano". Vgl. hierzu "Anuario Hidrográfico de la Marina de Chile", año V, VI, VII; Santiago 1879, 1880, 1881, sowie FACALDE: 95, MORRAL, PORTER (a): 75 und a. m. KOHL: 315 und MARTIAL: 54 geben eine vollständige Zusammenstellung der wichtigsten Quellen für Berichte über die früheren Entdeckungsfahrten durch das Kap Hoorn-Gebiet.

[4] Früher waren die kühnsten Seeleute allen erdenklichen Zufällen wehrlos ausgeliefert und eine verhältnismäßig gute Kenntnis der örtlichen Bedingungen nützte ihnen dagegen fast nichts. Das ersieht man beispielsweise aus "LA PEROUSE'ns Entdeckungsreise in den Jahren 1785 bis 1788", wo es u. a. heißt: „In dergleichen offenen Buchten (wie Bahia de Buen Suceso), wo die See mit dem größten Ungestüm an das Gestade schlägt, muß man nicht selten halbe Tage lang warten, ehe man es wagen darf, die Boote ans Land zu schicken. Hätten sich überdies Südwinde eingestellt und mich in die Notwendigkeit gesetzt, eine Zeitlang in dieser Bay zu bleiben: so würde mittlerweile die schöne Jahreszeit vorüberhin seyn, mein Schiff konnte den größten Schaden leiden, auch meine an Bord befindliche Mannschaft durch Strapazen so abgemattet werden, welches dem Fortgang der ganzen Reise gewiß nachtheilig gewesen wäre" ("Magazin", Bd. 14, S. 155).

mehr heraus. Die Schöpferkraft indes, mit welcher der Mensch sich über die Naturkräfte hinaushebt und mit der er auch diese in seinen Dienst einzwängt, feiert trotzdem seine Triumphe. Ein Zeugnis dafür liefern auch die Feuerländer. Im Vergleich mit dem Kulturgut anderer Völkerschaften ist im besonderen ihre Wirtschaftsform, ohne Deuteln und Übertreibung, außerordentlich bescheiden und dürftig; der genaue Beobachter aber erkennt sie mit überraschender Deutlichkeit als eine vorzügliche, vielseitige Anpassung an die Umwelt und als die einzig vorteilhafte für ein Naturvolk, das allein auf sie und auf seine eigenen Kräfte angewiesen ist. Man mag an der Sonderkultur, die unsere Yamana sowohl wie ihre beiden Nachbarvölker zur Ausgestaltung gebracht haben, den mächtigen Einfluß ermessen, den der Lebensraum auf Völkerschaften mit einfachen Kulturformen auszuüben imstande ist.[3] Kaum je wird man die Umweltbedingungen eines Naturvolkes zu ausführlich schildern können; denn erst sie vermitteln ein volles Verständnis jener Kulturform und Lebensgestaltung, die es im Rahmen solchen Zwanges und solcher Beschränkung geschaffen hat.

Abb. 2. Immergrüne Buche

Mit der vorhin angedeuteten Ungunst der Verhältnisse ist vor allem die niedrige Jahrestemperatur und das rauhe Klima gemeint, verbunden mit ungewöhnlich reichlichen Niederschlägen in einer hohen Luftfeuchtigkeit. All dem, was auf das Gemüt und auf die gesamte geistige Haltung eines Menschen nichts weniger als günstig einwirkt, gesellt sich noch das ständige Stürmen aus dem eisigen Süden und das Gefahrdrohende der nimmermüden Meereswogen[4] bei. Das alles behindert aber auch das Gedeihen der höheren Pflanzen in einer Weise, daß man sich wundert, wie trotzdem die antarktischen Buchen (Abb. 2) sich zu einem teilweise prächtigen Waldbestand

[3] Wie offensichtlich diese Tatsache für die nördlichen Nachbarn auf der Isla Grande zutrifft, lehrt der besondere Abschnitt: "Der Selk'nam in vollendeter Anpassung an seine Heimat", in Bd. I, 305. Die örtlichen Bedingungen der Halakwulup stimmen weitgehend mit denen unserer Yamana überein, was im III. Bande dieses Werkes noch zu zeigen sein wird.

[4] Auch in neuester Zeit, trotz des staunenswerten Fortschrittes der Schiffsbautechnik, wiederholen sich noch entsetzliche Schiffsunglücke in der Nähe des Kap Hoorn. Einige zusammenschließen und als Einzelstücke sogar die Felsen des Kap Hoorn selber verschönern. Die niederen Pflanzen, zumal die Moose, entwickeln sich in der reichlichen Feuchtigkeit sehr üppig. An Landtieren kann man nicht viel erwarten; statt dessen aber gibt es eine gute Auswahl an individuenreichen Seesäugetierarten und eine fast unübersehbare Menge von Seevögeln vieler Gattungen. Eine stark betonte Einförmigkeit bildet den Hintergrund der gesamten dortigen Pflanzen- und Tierwelt.

An dem düsteren Anstrich des Landschaftsbildes hat auch die europäische Besiedlung nichts verbessert. Von vornherein war an eine merkliche Umgestaltung der Boden- und Wachstumsverhältnisse nicht zu denken. Für die Wohnungen, Werkstätten und Maschinenanlagen mußte man einen Haustyp wählen, der dem reichlichen Niederschlag genügend Rechnung trägt. So entstanden die einstöckigen, kistenförmigen Bretterbauten mit grauem Wellblechbeschlag. Widerlich sind sie anzuschauen und außerordentlich langweilig nehmen sich ganze Reihen dieser Häuser aus, die das heutige Ushuaia bilden. Dieses Städtchen entstand aus den bescheidenen Anfängen einer Missionsstation, die als Zweiggründung der Zentralstelle auf Isla Keppel hier von den anglikanischen Missionaren im Jahre 1869 eröffnet worden ist. Um den Missionar THOMAS BRIDGES sammelten sich nach und nach die Indianerfamilien, die aus verschiedenen Gegenden heranströmten. Im Oktober 1884 richtete die argentinische Regierung hier eine Sub-Prefectura für den ganzen Süden der Republik ein und damit begann die Besiedlung jener den Eingeborenen sehr vertrauten Bucht mit einigen zehn Häuschen für Europäer. Im Laufe der nächsten Jahrzehnte vermehrte sich deren Zahl, besonders seitdem die geräumige Strafanstalt erbaut worden ist. Die Bevölkerungsziffer schwankt ständig, im Mittel aber rechnet man etwa 700 Ansiedler und 500 Sträflinge. Ushuaia liegt malerisch schön am Fuße einer hohen, schneebedeckten Gebirgskette, deren Fuß dichte Buchenwälder bedecken. Auch ist es gut geschützt gegen Nordwinde, erhält aber während der langen Wintermonate keine Mittagssonne; im kurzen Sommer bietet es einen angenehmen Aufenthalt. Wachstum und Lebensfähigkeit dieses Städtchens hängt allein von der größeren oder kleineren Zahl der Gefängnisbeamten ab; denn Vieh- und Holzwirtschaft sind in jener Gegend bedeutungslos.[7] besonders beklagenswerte Ereignisse hat PORTA (d): 166 zusammengestellt. Anschließend daran schildert er sehr anschaulich das unheilvolle Wüten der unbezähmbaren Naturgewalten.

Schon 1889 wurde in der Bahía Buen Suceso eine weitere Sub-Prefectura eingerichtet und gleichzeitig damit ein Militärposten in der Bahía Sloggett. Die Notwendigkeit hierfür ergab sich aus dem massenhaften Andrange von Goldsuchern (Bd. I, 154). Als aber nach wenigen Jahren planlosen Raubbaues die Erfolge ausblieben und die vielen Arbeiter sich von dort wieder verzogen, wurden auch jene beiden Behörden abberufen.

[7] Ausführliche Nachrichten über Ushuaia bringen ANCHORENA: 162, HYADES (q): 388, NORDENSKJÖLD (f): 214 und ROSSOUW: 233.

Bald darauf versuchten andere Neuankömmlinge dort ihr Glück mit Schafzucht, seitdem der frühere Missionar THOMAS BAMGES im heutigen Puerto Harberton und auf Isla Gable sich eine eigene Farm eingerichtet und von den Falkland-Inseln die ersten Zuchtschafe am Canal de Beagle eingeführt hatte. Nach und nach erstanden einzelne Farmen, so in Puerto Eugenia, in Punta Remolino, in Puerto Rosa und an einigen anderen geschützten Stellen des östlichen Canal de Beagle. Über die Bahía Yendegaia hinaus nach Westen ist kein Versuch unternommen worden; die außerordentlich hohe Feuchtigkeit ist für Zuchtvieh unerträglich. Wohl aber nach Süden hin versuchte mancher sein Glück, ermuntert durch das Vorgehen der Missionare bei Eröffnung einer Missionsstation in der Bahía Tekenika, und es entstanden Farmen in Bahía Windhond, in der Caleta Wulaia, an der Mündung des Rio Douglas, auf Isla Bertrand und anderswo. Kurz vor meinem ersten Besuche brach ein derartiges Unternehmen auf Isla Hermite zusammen. Sogar in der allernächsten Nachbarschaft des Kap Hoorn hat es ein gewinnsüchtiger Unternehmer gewagt, Zuchtschafe auszusetzen! An einzelnen Orten wurden Sägewerke eingerichtet, beispielsweise in Lapataia, in Punta Remolino, in Puerto Brown; aussichtsreich jedoch sind diese Unternehmungen nicht.

Auch dann, wenn nach wenigen Jahren die letzten Ureinwohner verschwunden sein werden, bietet jener äußerste Süden keine Aussichten auf wirtschaftliche Erfolge. Die großartige Pracht seiner Gebirge und Landschaft ist von volkreichen Städten zu weit abgelegen, als daß sie eine starke Anziehungskraft auszuüben vermöchte. Nach wie vor steht die rauhe, unfreundliche Natur unbesiegbar im Besitze ihrer Vorherrschaft da.

Fast der ganze Heimatbereich der Yamana rechnet politisch zu Chile. Erst einige Jahre nach der internationalen Einigung über die Grenzen im ganzen Feuerlande wurden, vom Cabo Espiritu Santo auf dem Ostufer der Isla Grande längs des Grenzmeridians (68° 36' 38.5" W.) bis nahe der Bahía Lapataia, 25 Pyramiden in zwei Arbeitsabschnitten (Januar bis April 1894 und November 1894 bis März 1895) aufgerichtet. Dadurch ist endgültig festgelegt, daß nur das Nordufer des östlichen Canal de Beagle zu Argentinien gehört.*

a. Die örtlichen Bedingungen

Deutlich und scharf ist der sogenannte Kap Hoorn-Archipel, die Heimat der Yamana, durch natürliche Schranken vom Heimatgebiet ihrer feuerländischen Nachbarn getrennt. Die Nordgrenze verläuft dem Nordufer des Canal de Beagle entlang und zwar östlich bis etwa zur Bahía Aguirre an der Südostspitze der Isla Grande, nach Westen bis zum äußersten Vorsprung der Península Brecknock. Sein Nordufer bilden schroffe und steile Felswände der Isla Grande, während ein vielgestaltiges Inselgewirr sich zu seinem Südrande zusammendrängt und ihn gegen die Wogen des Stillen Ozeans deckt. Am 14. April 1830 wurde er von FITZ-ROY, dem Befehlshaber der "Beagle", entdeckt, nach der er seinen Namen erhielt. Der eigentliche Lebensraum der Yamana aber ist alles, was an Inseln und Eilanden, an Wasserarmen und Kanälen, an offenen Häfen und stillen Buchten südlich von jener langen Uferlinie bis zum Kap Hoorn selber liegt.

Diese Inselwelt wird fast genau vom 55. und 56. Grade südl. Breite, sowie vom 66. und vom 72. Längengrade eingeschlossen. Auf die nördliche Erdhälfte übertragen entspricht der gleichen geographischen Breitenlage die der dänischen Insel Seeland mit Kopenhagen. Die geradlinige Entfernung der am meisten nach Osten und nach Westen vorspringenden, bereits genannten Grenzpunkte beträgt etwa 380 km, vergleichbar der Entfernung zwischen Berlin und Kopenhagen. Daß trotz dieser fast mittleren geographischen Breitenlage der Kap Hoorn-Archipel seine berüchtigt ungünstigen Witterungsbedingungen aufweist, braucht nicht zu befremden, empfängt er ja doch unmittelbar den eisigen Wind und die kalten Meeresströmungen aus der Antarktis, während Dänemark nach Norden hin durch die skandinavische Ländermasse gedeckt wird und die Vorteile des warmen Golfstromes genießt. Völlig schutzlos liegt dieses Inselreich dem Wüten der Naturgewalten ausgeliefert und offen da.

Die zuverlässige Forschung hat erwiesen, daß jenes Dreieck zwischen Kap Hoorn, Peninsula Brecknock und etwa Punta Julieta bei Bahía Aguirre von den Yamana selber als ihr ausschließliches Heimatgebiet immer und ununterbrochen betrachtet worden ist. SPEGAZZINI (a): 160, einer der neuzeitlichen Reisenden, äußert sich folgendermaßen: Die Volksgruppe „de los Yagan vive en todas las costas e islas del Sur hasta el Cabo de Hornos, no pasando nunca en sus emigraciones al Oeste, más allá de la isla de London, y del canal de Brecknock, al Este de la isla Nueva y de la Bahía de Sloggett". Von vielen anderen Forschern ist diese Umgrenzung, wie noch weiter unten ausführlicher wird zu beweisen sein, bestätigt worden.*

Eine verhältnismäßig geringe Ausdehnung besitzt dieses Heimatland der Yamana: trotzdem unterscheidet man sehr deutlich morphologisch und landschaftlich zwei verschiedene Gebiete. Der regenreiche, dichtbewaldete Westen ist ein genaues Bild des weiter nach Norden sich hinziehenden westpatagonischen Inselreiches; hier hat sich bis in die Gegenwart hinein eine ausgedehnte Masse von mächtigem Inlandeis erhalten, das sich als prachtvolle Gletscher in die salzigen Fluten ergießt. Die östliche Hälfte jenes Landes zeigt den Einfluß der bis fast zur Mitte der Isla Grande übertragenen typischen Pampaformation des Festlandes; diese prägt sich zwar ganz so deutlich dort nicht mehr aus, bildet aber doch noch weite, offene Ebenen, die mit Buchenbestand (Abb. 3) abwechseln. Hier sind die Niederschläge viel geringer als im Westen. Die Grenze zwischen dieser West- und Ostzone, die selbstverständlich ganz scharf sich nicht zeichnen läßt, ist eine wellige Linie, die von Punta Divide durch die Angostura Murray zur Bahía Nassau verläuft.

Die hier nur kurz angedeuteten, nicht unerheblichen Unterschiede spiegeln sich in einigen Sonderformen im Wirtschaftsleben der dortigen Eingeborenen wieder. Aufgabe der folgenden Zeilen ist es, das Landschaftsbild nur insoweit aufzurollen, ferner die Pflanzenwelt und endlich die Tierwelt nur unter der Rücksicht zu beleuchten, als sie die Lebensweise der Eingeborenen zu verstehen helfen und die Haltung dieser zur gegebenen Umwelt erklären. Sowohl Geologie wie Meteorologie, Flora und Fauna jener südlichsten Ecke der Neuen Welt sind von Fachleuten verschiedener Nationalität, am meisten von schwedischen Forschern gründlich und fast vollständig untersucht worden; ihre weit zum Südpol hin vorgeschobene Lage hat doch die Aufmerksamkeit der Wissenschaft in Europa auf sich gelenkt und eine starke Anziehungskraft ausgeübt.

1. Die Landschaft

Der Kap Hoorn-Archipel zeigt weder in Form noch Aufbau eine erkennbare Regelmäßigkeit. Wo immer man hinschaut, erscheint er dem Auge wie eine wirr zerrissene Landmasse, durch die mit jeder Flut stark gepreßte Wogen sich schlängeln. Man trifft dort Inseln der verschiedensten Größe und Gestalt an, entweder als nackte, niedrige Steine, über die jede Sturmwelle hinwegfegt, oder als hohe, bewaldete Felsen mit sanft ansteigenden Ufern und mit glatten, aufrechten Wänden, in die sich die salzige Flut unablässig hineinfrißt. Der Meeresboden fällt fast überall bereits unweit vom Ufer in unerreichbare Tiefen ab und die steil herausragenden Felswände werden nur bei außergewöhnlich starkem Zurückweichen der Ebbe ein wenig freigelegt. In jenem Gebiete gibt es ungezählte Stellen, die dem Indianer das Landen mit seinem leichten Rindenkanu sehr bequem machen; aber bei weitem nicht alle bieten ihm auch den Schutz, den er zum Übernachten und zum Aufrichten seiner Hütte nötig hat. Am größten ist die Isla Hoste, mit ihren nach allen Seiten in merkwürdigen Formen ausgreifenden Halbinseln. Östlich von ihr, nur durch die enge Angostura Murray getrennt, zieht sich die viel kleinere Isla Navarino mit einer in etwa geschlossenen Form und mit abgerundeten Küsten hin. Nördlich der Península Cloué liegt die ansehnliche Isla Gordon, die den westlichen Canal de Beagle in einen Nordwest- und in einen Südwestarm spaltet; beide trennen sich voneinander an der Punta Divide. Rund um die größeren Landmassen herum lagern sich regellos verschiedengeformte Eilande, zackige Riffe und trotzige Felsen, wie die von einem großen Block wüst heruntergeschlagenen Trümmer; sie halten sich standhaft und unerschütterlich in dem ruhelosen, tosenden Meere. Die schaumgekrönten Wellen zernagen aber doch das harte Gestein und machen es an der Oberfläche brüchig, sie bohren tiefe Höhlen und geräumige Grotten aus, in denen unübersehbare Massen von Seevögeln und ganze Herden von Seesäugetieren reichlichen Schutz und sichere Deckung finden.

Die kleinen Eilande und streckenweise auch die größeren Inseln werden meist von einem schmalen Küstenstreifen aus schwerem Geröll und grobkörnigem Kies umkränzt, den Ebbe und Flut blendend weiß waschen und teilweise zu feinem Sand abscheuern. Bei Hochflut wird er meistens vom Wasser überdeckt. Angefangen von dieser Grenze höchsten Wasserstandes landeinwärts ist das Erdreich mit Moos und Gras, mit Buschwerk oder Baumwuchs bestanden. Jede größere Insel ist ein Fels oder Hügel oder Berg, vereinzelt ein Gebirgsstock mit mehreren Ausläufern; ihre Ufer steigen entweder sanft vom Wasserrande her auf oder erheben sich schroff als steile Wände mehr oder weniger senkrecht aus dem Wasser, ohne dem Rindenkanu für eine Landung den geringsten Raum freizugeben. Manche Gipfel erreichen eine ansehnliche Höhe. Als bedeutendster überragt der Pico Navarino auf der Insel gleichen Namens mit 1195 m alle übrigen Erhöhungen dieses Inselgebietes. Das ganze Jahr hindurch sind sie mit Schnee und Eis gekrönt. Im Frühsommer ergießen sich die Schmelzwasser als schäumende Sturzbäche oder als tiefeingeschnittene, silberhelle Wasserbahnen in die Tiefe, wo sie in steilwändige Fjorde oder in stille Lagunen oder in ausgedehnte Moore einmünden. Außerordentlich zahlreich sind die größeren und kleineren Bäche, auch gibt es einige Flüsse. Sie haben in ihrem kurzen Unterlauf ein sehr geringes Gefälle und schlängeln sich oft in vielen Windungen dahin. Nicht selten laufen sie in Moore aus, mit denen die meisten Kordillerentäler angefüllt sind. Häufig zeigen die Täler eine gewisse Ausdehnung und werden von steilen Wänden eingefaßt. Auf ihren Torf- und Wiesenmooren gedeiht eine üppige Sumpfvegetation. Hir und da übertönt ein verborgener Wasserfall den ruhigen Wellenschlag einer zurückliegenden Bucht, plätschernden Bächlein mit kurzem Lauf begegnet man auf Schritt und Tritt, um die schneeverhüllten Bergesgipfel heult ruhelos der Sturm.

In dieser unübersehbaren Abwechslung von Inseln und Eilanden gleicht kaum eine Uferbildung der anderen; in welcher Richtung auch immer man geht oder fährt, unaufhaltsam ändern sich Form und Gestalt des Landschaftsbildes. So folgt auf eine steile Küste ganz unerwartet eine stille Bai, der sich eine zerrissene Felsklift anschließt, und nicht weit hiervon zerstückeln tiefeinschneidende Einbuchtungen eine ausgedehnte Landmasse. Überall drängt sich ungeduldig die salzige Flut landeinwärts vor, zerfetzt nicht selten selbst hohe Felsmassen mehrere hundert Meter tief und schlägt unaufhaltsam gegen die harten Steinwände. Breite Strandflächen fehlen fast ganz.[10] Indes gibt es verborgene, gesicherte Plätzchen allerorts, obgleich sie manchmal erst nach weiten Abständen zwischen langgezogene Steinwände und enge Fjorde eingeschoben sind; liebliche Buchten mit schneeweißem, schmalem Uferrande erhalten Deckung durch trutzige Gebirgsgipfel oder durch überhängende Felsen. Deutlicher hier wie sonstwo erkennt man das Bestreben des Waldes, bis zur Wasserlinie sich vorzudrängen. Das sind die Stellen in jenem verwirrenden Durcheinander verschlungener Wasserarme und unregelmäßig gewundener Kanäle, an denen der Indianer einen sicheren Unterschlupf sucht, wenn die allmächtigen Naturgewalten ihm erbarmungslos ein jähes Verderben androhen. Die wüst zerzauste Umrißgestalt jener vielen Inseln und Eilande ist das Zerstörungswerk der ewig bewegten salzigen Flut.

Weite Ebenen sucht man in jenem Inselreich vergeblich, alles ist hügelig und gebirgig.[11] Eine in etwa einheitlich ausgeprägte Richtung der Gebirgszüge erkennt man auf den ersten Blick; denn die großen Massive verlaufen vorwiegend von Westen nach Osten, mehr oder weniger als Fortsetzung der durch die Magellan-Straße unterbrochenen Cordillera de los Andes. Die Gipfelreihe auf Isla Inés und Isla Clarence ragt über 1000 m zwar nicht hinaus, ist aber das ganze Jahr hindurch mit Schnee und Eis bedeckt. Auf dem südlichen Teile der Isla Grande jedoch, der ganz nahe an den Canal de Beagle heranrückt und sozusagen sein nördliches Ufer bildet, gewinnt die Kordillere ihren Hochgebirgscharakter wieder zurück und erreicht im Monte Bove ihre bedeutendste Höhe, nämlich 2400 m. Ihn umstellen einige andere Berge, die nur wenig niedriger sind und die als Massiv die Cordillera Darwin von etwa 130 km Länge bilden. Weiter nach Osten erhebt sich der kürzere, nordwest-lich-südöstlich verlaufende Gebirgszug der Las Pirámides, der fast in seiner ganzen Länge und auf jeder seiner beiden Seiten von den Wellen der tief einschneidenden Bahía Lapataia und der Bahía Yendegaia umspült wird. Zu der nördlich davon gelegenen Sierra Valdivia gehört der Monte Olivia,[32] nach Acostini: 192 über 1320 m hoch, der den Hintergrund der Bahía Ushuaia bildet. Auf diese Kette folgt nach Osten die Sierra Sorondo, deren Ausläufer sich noch weit über Puerto Harberton hinaus hinziehen; ihre Gipfel aber halten sich niedrig. Also nicht nur der westliche, sondern auch der östliche Abschnitt des nördlichen Canal de Beagle-Ufers wird von steil aufsteigenden Bergketten gebildet.

[10] „Muy raras veces se halla una formación de playa, las hay especialmente en las bahías, en conexión con los conos de deyección de los arroyos que ahí desembocan; pero tales playas apenas si tienen unos pocos metros de ancho, porque pronto empieza el monte más espeso, en el que es casi imposible penetrar" (Kuzun: 157).

[11] Für größere europäische Ansiedlungen eignen sich die im Kap Hoorn-Gebiet naturgegebenen Bedingungen deshalb nicht, weil die wenigen ebenen Flächen nur sehr geringe Ausdehnung aufweisen. Das kleine Städtchen Ushuaia kann sich allein als zaun schmale Häuserreihe in östlich-westlicher Richtung am Fuße des hohen Monte Olivia hinziehen. Hierzu sagt Kuzun: 158, daß „por lo general la costa fueguina es una costa acantilada, inaccesible; sólo en algunas pequeñas bahías hay lugar para un establecimiento (estancia o aserradero), como Harberton, Brown, Almanza, Lapataia, que yacen en una soledad casi absoluta".

Diese Höhen, angefangen vom Monte Navarro im Westen bis etwa zur Bahía Ushuaia, tragen ein langgesagenes Schnee- und Eisfeld, das nirgendwo eine nennenswerte Unterbrechung erfährt und aus dem einzelne scharfkantige Gebirgszacken sich trutzig in den freien Luftraum recken. Fast das ganze Jahr hindurch sind sie von undurchsichtigen Wolkenballen eingehüllt und die leichten Nebelschleier darunter zerfetzen an den spitzen Steinrändern. Dieses ungeheuere Eislager entlädt sich nach Süden als prachtvolle Gletscher, die dicht nebeneinander sich herunterwälzen und meist unmittelbar in die salzige Flut einmünden. Vereinzelt nur baut einer dieser gewaltigen Eisströme an seinem unteren Ende eine Stirnmoräne auf und er selber schmilzt in der Tiefe nach beiden Seiten hin ab. Der eine und andere Gletscher, wie im Puerto Garibaldi und im Seno Ventisquero, liegt weit im Inneren eines engen, malerischen Fjordes zurück, und seine vielen Eisblöcke von ansehnlicher Größe werden mit jeder Ebbe in den offenen Canal de Beagle abgetrieben. Durch sie und noch mehr durch solche Eismassen, die in dieser Wasserstraße selber zuweilen in bedrohlicher Menge sich von ihrem Gletscherstrome loslösen, wird der sogenannte Nordwest-Arm für die gebrechlichen Rindenkanus der Eingeborenen sehr gefährlich. Letztere vermeiden es bekanntlich, sich hier länger als nötig aufzuhalten.

Die größeren Gletscher sind durch die Mission Scientifique untersucht worden.[33] Auf ihr Ergebnis beruft sich Nordenskjöld (i): I, 28 und schreibt: „Der Yendegaya-Glacier kommt von einem großen Eisfeld an der Nordseite des Darwinmassivs und endet in einer Entfernung von 7 km vor dem Fjord; an zwei Stellen bildet das Eis bedeutende Abstürze, welche dem Ganzen ein stufenförmiges Aussehen verleihen. Der Avalanche-Gletscher[34] kommt von der Südseite desselben Massivs und erreicht das Meer, wo losgerissene, mehrere [32] Irrtümlicherweise hat sich die Bezeichnung Monte Olivia eingebürgert, weswegen ich hier diese Schreibweise beibehalte. Richtiger muß man Monte "Ulewaia" sagen. Dieses letztgenannte Wort ist indianischen Ursprungs, Kuzne: 138 benutzt ausschließlich diese Form.

[33] Martial: 128. Vgl. auch Anderson: 54 und Kuzne: 47; endlich Hyades: Géologie; in Mission Scientifique du Cap Horn, vol. IV; Paris 1891.

[34] Dieses Namen erhielt der Gletscher vom jugendlichen Charles Buxton selber, der an dessen Rande beinahe um Leben gekommen wäre.

Kubikmeter betragende Blöcke umherschwimmen. Seine Länge mit mindestens 10 bis 20 km. Unter dem Namen 'Glacier Darwin' wird ein anderer Gletscher, wie es scheint der Ostspitze der Gordoninsel gegenüber gelegen, beschrieben und abgebildet. Er kommt aus einem großen Eisfelde an der Südostseite von Monte Darwin. Die vordere Zunge hat eine Länge von mehreren Kilometern und läuft in einer Entfernung von etwa 1 km von dem Meere in eine bis 50 m hohe Eismauer aus, die zuweilen senkrecht, zuweilen zerklüftet 'wie die Türmchen einer Cathedrale' ist. Vor der Eismauer liegt ein hoher Erdwall, wahrscheinlich eine frühere Endmoräne, die jetzt mit Wald bewachsen ist.[10] Vielleicht das größte Eisgebiet des ganzen Archipels ist das, welches die Halbinsel Cloué (NW. Teil der Isla Hoste) bedeckt. Ein großer Gletscher, welcher in einem schmalen tiefen Fjord mündet und Glacier Pasqui benannt wurde, endet in dem Meere mit einer 200 m breiten und 40 bis 50 m hohen Eismauer ... Einige kleine Gletscher in der Umgebung von Ushuaia sind alle nur kleine Hängegletscher. Gegenüber der Romanche Bay liegt ein schmaler Eisstrom, der für mehrere andere typisch ist. Das Eis füllt ein ziemlich niedriges Kerbtal aus; vorne liegt etwa an der Waldgrenze ein moränenartiger Wall. Gegen die See endet dieses Kerbtal mit einem verhältnismäßig breiten, sehr steilen Abstoßen, frei von aller Vegetation, während die steilen Seitenwände waldbedeckt sind; über dieser Wand bildet der Gletscher einen Eisfall. Es scheint fast sicher, daß das Eis selbst diese Einsenkung ausgehöhlt und in später Zeit ausgefüllt hat." Die an sich reichlichen Niederschläge fallen auf den Höhen auch im Sommer fast nur als Schnee statt als Regen. Die übrigen Wetterbedingungen helfen dabei mit, daß sich solch ausgedehnte Eisfelder bilden, die sich kaum verkleinern, trotz ihrer Lagerung in verhältnismäßig niedrigen Breitengraden.[11]

Aus eigenartigen Formenreichtum und aus unaufhörlich wechselndem Farbenspiel dieser wunderbaren Naturgebilde, die häufig in das Düster einer feuchtigkeitsschwangeren, eintönig grauen Lufthülle eingefaßt sind, kann sich das beständig schauende Auge vielmal sättigen. Im östlichen Abschnitt des Canal de Beagle fehlen Gletscher ganz und gar. Die Gebirgszüge sind eben

[10] Eine ausführliche Beschreibung dieses Gletschers findet sich in Martinez: 486.

[11] Die Gletscher, die sowohl am Canal de Beagle wie auch an der südlichen Abdachung der dortigen Gebirgszüge sich unmittelbar ins Meer ergießen, sind eine überraschende Eigenart des Feuerlandes. Sie schildert sich folgendermaßen: „Die ungewöhnliche Entwicklung dieser Gletscher und ihre Ausdehnung bis zum Meeresspiegel wird in der Hauptsache durch die große Feuchtigkeit des Klimas bedingt, die eine tiefe Lage der Schneegrenze (900 m) zur Folge hat. Es ist heute erwiesen, daß zur Bildung und Entwicklung von Gletschern an ungeheuer Schneemassen nötig sind, daß die Sommerwärme nicht imstande ist, diese völlig zu schmelzen. An der westlichen Abdachung des Feuerlandes und der patagonischen Anden vereinigt sich tiefe Temperatur mit reichlichen Niederschlägen die unerläßliche Voraussetzung für Gletscherbildungen" (Aznarez: 141). Und damit stimmen die Beobachtungen von Lozano: 93 überein: „Hallándose el límite inferior de la nieve sólo a una altura entre 900 y 1000 metros, resulta que la cordillera fueguina, a pesar de su altura poco considerable, está muy cargada."

niedriger, sie fallen etwas sanfter zur Küste hin ab, die bereits sich stellenweise verbreitert und zum trockenen, freiliegenden Schwemmboden konnte; erst weiter landeinwärts beginnt der Wald. Landungsstellen für die Rindenkähne der Yamana gibt es demnach im Osten viel mehr als im Westen."

Der eigentliche Gebirgs- de las Andes gleicht die französische Gebirgswelt fast ganz in ihrem geologischen Aufbau. Überwiegend wird sie von dunkelgrauen kristallinischen Schiefern der paläozoischen und mesozoischen Erdperiode gebildet, die bereits jene charakteristische Formgebung der einzelnen Berge und Gipfel bestimmen. Die vielen unregelmäßigen Verschiebungen der geologischen Schichtenlager lassen auf starke Umwälzungen in der Frühzeit unserer Erde schließen. Auch tertiäre Ablagerungen finden sich mancherorts und deren „Anordnen verdient in den verschiedenen Gegenden recht bedeutend", wie Nordenskjöld (II: I, 19 [illegible]) hat. Die geologischen Verhältnisse können hier nicht weiter erörtert werden;[*] hinzuweisen ist nur noch darauf, daß breite Flüsse gänzlich fehlen. Durch tiefeingeschnittene Täler ergießen bemooste Sturzbäche der einzelnen Schmelzwasser ins Meer.

Zwar zeigt der östliche Kap Horn-Archipel viele schöne Landschaftsbilder, aber der Westen übertrifft mit seiner wunderbaren Pracht viele ausgesucht herrliche Gegenden in der Alten und Neuen Welt. Vor allem im Nordwest-Arm des Canal de Beagle „eröffnet sich dem Fremdling eine der großartigsten Szenerien der Erde. Er nimmt selbst eine Breite von 5 km an. Zu beiden Seiten erheben sich die eisbedeckten Alpen, von welchen große Gletscher ausgehen, die oft gebirgiger als die schönsten in Norwegen oder in der Schweiz zu schwellen sind. Die unübersehbaren dünnen Urwälder erstrecken sich längs des Kanales in einem breiten Gürtel von der Schneegrenze nieder bis zu den Moorbeeren und Moosrasen, wo das herbstende Strandgebüsch stellenweise ganz unerwartet von einem Gletscher, der sich schlängelnd durch den Wald verwärts bis zum Meere drängt, unterbrochen wird. Und hier kann man dicht neben dem üppigen Grün des Strandes bläuliche Eisstücke nahezu schwimmen sehen ... Über die ganze Natur liegt hier die Freiheit und Ungebundenheit einer Wildnis gebreitet, die nicht von den wenigen Kanälen, die dicht am Strande errichtet sind, gestört wird. Udmain selbst sagt hat diesen Gegräge der Wildnis" (Dom: 81). Das Farbenspiel der Gletscher und der kleinen Eisberge hat es Fitz-Roy (a): 216 besonders angetan. Er, der Entdecker dieser Welt des Eises, preist in bewegten Worten ihre Wunder: „Wherever these enormous glaciers were seen, we remarked the most beautiful light blue or sea green tints in portions of the solid ice, caused by varied transmission or reflection of light. Blue was the prevailing colour, and the contrast with its extremely delicate hue, with the dazzling white of other ice, afforded to the dark green foliage, the almost black precipices, and the deep, indigo blue water, was very remarkable. Miniature icebergs surrounded us; fragments of the cliff, which from time to time fall into a deep and gloomy basin beneath the precipice, and are floated out into the channel by a slow tidal stream." Diese gewaltigen Eismassen sind eingefaßt in das tiefe Grün dichter Buchenwälder, die, in moorigem Boden wurzelnd, ganz nahe an die Gletscher heranrücken. Sie schieben vor sich die blühende Fuchsie und die antarktische Veronika her, deren Blüten bis zum Eisrande hinüberreichen und hier sogar noch den scheuen Kolibri anlocken. Die bunte Farbenmischung im feuerländischen Landschaftsbilde hält auf Schritt und Tritt das staunende Auge gefesselt."

Abb. 4. Mayteno magellanica. ½ n. Gr.

Zwar ist das Gebiet klein und ein Fernstehender vermutet, dort nur einheitliche Gleichförmigkeit in Form und Gestalt anzutreffen; vielmehr stößt man überall auf die größten, kaum glaublichen Gegensätze. Sie äußern sich auf verschiedene Art und Weise, einerlei ob man die Inselgruppe im orographischen oder geologischen, im klimatischen oder tier- und pflanzengeographischen Sinne betrachtet: sowohl aus dem Bau des Landes selber wie auch aus den dort herrschenden physikalischen Verhältnissen erklären sie sich.

* Von vielen Reisenden, bei Darwin angefangen, sind die Wunder dieser Gletscherwelt mit staunenden Blicken betrachtet und mit begeisterten Worten gepriesen worden, namentlich von Agassiz und Spencer: 56, ebenso von G. Pannwitz in seinem Buche: "Silberhunder über Feuerland". Diese Beschreibung trägt auch der von ihm aufgenommene prachtvolle Film.

Wer bedauert nicht schon das Hinsterben der ungeheuren Eisriesen in den immergrünen Wald? Über beiden tummeln sich Vögel, die man nur warmen Erdstrichen kennt. Dazu ein üppiges Wachsen niederer Pflanzen auf dem durchnässten Boden und im Unterholz, in dem ein ganzes Heer niederer Tiere kriecht und krabbelt, genau so wie im Tropenwald. Verläßt man aber die inneren, geschützten Wasserpartien und wagt man sich bis an den aufbrausenden Sunde vor: Wie ist die Natur hier so tot und kahl, so bedrängend und gefahrdrohend! Die nackten Felsen starren einem als wie Grabmale, blasse Grabsteine all jener, die von der tückischen Flut in die Tiefe gerissen worden sind. Alles, was hier sein Leben fristet, erscheint mit dem Fluche schwerer Lähmung beschwert. Remuna Fenrens erscheinende in dieser tollen Öde, die nur im Sommer ein wenig belebt wird und dann, wenn so irgendwelcher Jahreszeit die ungeheuerlichen Naturgewalten sich wieder für eine Zeitlang entfernte. „Wie öde, wie tot ist alles auf den gefrorenen Klippen des Feuerhundes! Wie kaum die Jahreszeit, in welcher sich dort auch einige Lebenskraft regt! Was ist die träge Bewegung der einzigen Geschöpfe dortiger Gegend, der Walfische, der Robben und Pinguine, im Vergleich mit der Schaffkraft und dem Feuer, welche unter einem wolkenlosen Himmel in allen Thierarten wirkt?" (Gemma Fenrens [b]: 110).

Man erschrickt, wenn man sich an den Sinn der Namen erinnert, den viele der dortigen Inseln, Felsen und Kanäle tragen; sie erzählen, ein jeder für sich, wie gefahrdrohend dieser südliche Rand des Feuerhundes jedem kühnen Eindringling empfingt. „Die ersten Entdecker dieser Küste nannten sie die Küste der Verwüstung (Coast of Desolation), oder die öde Küste, und diese Benennung kommt ihr mit vollem Rechte zu." So äußerte sich Gemma Fenrens (a): II, 373, während Admiral Amun sie mit erhabenster Stimme als „the most horrible country which it was possible to conceive!" bezeichnet. Mag man auch auf Felsengrunde stehen oder in sicherer Bucht vor Anker liegen, das Dröhnen der gewaltigen Wogen vom Südwestwind her und die dumpfen Anschläge gegen den harten Stein macht einem doch erzittern. Wie von höllischer Angst gepeitscht beschleunigt jeder die kurze Fahrt an der Halbinsel Brockmark vorbei, um, von Nordwest kommend, mit dem Blick in den offenen Ozean an den Farlan-Felsen vorbei, schließlich in den geschützten Pass Brockmark einzubiegen. Sogar der Riesendampfer "Cap Polonia", den ich auf meiner vierten Reise von Punta Arenas bis Udamia benutzen durfte, gerieth auf dieser kurzen Strecke durch die Gewalt der allseitigen Wogen in bedenkliches Schwanken: Unsagenerhöhlich gefährlich war es, wie dieser Gigantenriese gegen die Übermacht der wütenden Wassermassen ankämpfte! Und er retirirte sich doch blutiger in die Bucht des Kanals. Sogar bei geglätteter See ist die Fahrt um diesen Felsen ein Wagnis. Vor wenigen Jahren schrieb Wanna: 116, ein experimentirter Matrose: „Wir hatten eine günstige Wetterprognose erwartet und fanden am nächsten Morgen den Ozean heftiger bläuk vor. Trotzdem nahen die kahlen, glattgewaschenen Felsen drohend nun, und die ungeheure Dünung ging immer noch sehr stark auf und nieder. In tiefe Wasser-Sicher Schritt wie Steinbock, von im schönsten Moment hervorauf zu eilen. Wie ein kleiner Inselchen kreuzen wir auf dem unendlichen Meere Gottes von den Brodkamb-Felsen herum. Die Kanten schimmern gewaltig, wenn sich die hohen Wogen an dem massiven Stein brechen. Mit donnerartigem, unbeschreiblichem Getöse schlagen die Wassermassen über den Uneinfluss zusammen." Das erlebte jeder heute auch, der beim Umschiffen des Brodkamb glücklicherweise eine glatte See traf. Ist er narrenhaft der Gefahr entronnen, eilt er sich sofort in die schrecklichste Pracht der Gletscherwelt versetzt.

Wunderbar erhebt ist diesen Fleckchen Erde, beunruhigend jeder, der es betreten und mit offenen Augen genießen darf. Ich kann nicht umhin, noch einmal diese erhabene Herrlichkeit in mir aufleben zu lassen und mitzuteilen, was Max Strasser dort empfunden hat: „Die wunderschönen, oft 15 bis 20 Meilen langen Gletscher bestehen aus dem schönsten blauen und grünen Eis und dem reinsten Schnee; ihre mächtig aufragenden Wände ragen gerade aus dem Wasser empor, und die ungeheuren Eismassen, welche sich beständig bedrohen und mit donnerähnlichem Getöse in die Flut hinabstürzen, bauen dann in gewaltigen Wellen am jenseitigen Ufer brandend hoch emporschlagen. Die Berge sind hier keineswegs so hoch, wie die Alpen in Europa; aber sie machen trotzdem einen weit überwältigenderen Eindruck, weil sie in ihrer ganzen Höhe vom Fuße bis zum höchsten Gipfel deutlich sichtbar sind; die schönsten Gletscher Norwegens und der Schweiz erscheinen neben diesen verhältnismäßig unbedeutend. An diesem Theile der Mauerwand glänzten die mit dem reinsten Schnee bedeckten jungfräulichen Spitzen gaukelnden Tirmen. Gewöhnlich sind diese Gebirgsgipfel in einen Schleier von Nebel, Schnee und Regen eingehüllt, und nur selten erblickt man sie so deutlich, wie wir sie dann sahen ..." Ein Naturerlebnisgipfel unvergleichlicher Herrlichkeit ist die Frauenmalgrang bei wolkenfreier Luft. „Hoch am Himmel prangte klar und hell der Mond; der jungfräulichste Schnee der Firnen war von einem leichten rosigen Schimmer überhaucht, allmählich wurde der Mondschein kräftiger, heller und höhere einen wunderbaren Contrast an den tiefen Schluchten, welcher Felsen, Eisberge und Alles eingaben wie mit einem dichten Schleier umhüllte. Majestätisch ging die Sonne empor; die zarte Dämmerung der Berge ging in ein brennendes Gold und dann in blendendes Weiß über; die Schnee-Decklen senkten sich immer tiefer in die dürftenen Thäler, durchdrangen die verschiedenen Wärmegrade und brachten die mannichfalten Farbenmischungen und Schattierungen von Grün, Roth und Grau hervor. Je weiter wir kamen, um so prächtiger gestalteten sich das Bild. Die wunderschönen Alpenblumenbeete dehnten sich vor unseren Blicken aus; über den ungeheuren Kuppeln der Berge ragten schlanke, eingeschneite Spitzen und Zacken empor; wundersam dehnten sich blendendweiße Schneefelder; schauerlichst tönten die Wellen den Fall bisweilen herabstürzender Gletscher; mächtige Grün schmückte die Ufer, unbeschreiblich jedes Vergnügen; vielfachige Flechten schmiegten sich an nackt-kahlen Felsen, rankten an steilen Klippen sich empor. Die phantastischen Gestalten der Eisberge glichen mährchenhaften Ungeheuern; die schönsten blauen Inseln gewagten in Angig gelbem Schwanke, und die kreuzfarbene Fleck, welcher an Höhe mit der Farbe des Elements wechselte, erzeugte jedes Bild mit solcher Klarheit und Deutlichkeit zurück, daß man wieder an unerschöpfliche verwunderte, wo die Wirklichkeit aufhörte und die Täuschung begann."

Knapp 200 km von dieser gut gelungenen Wanderung entfernt regt der ewige Kap Hoorn-Fahrer um der Schiffer besser und mehr unerschütterlich im Tuche einhaltenden, gewaltigen Wogen.

3. Die Witterung

Von den ersten Entdeckern jener Gegend bis herauf in unsere Tage wird unerschöpflich die derzeit außerordentlich wechselnde Witterung beklagt und gefürchtet, die für viele zum Unterzum geworden ist. Man vermutet nicht zu verdienen eine das ganze Jahr fast sich gleichbleibende Kälte, die mit außerordentlich hoher Feuchtigkeit verbunden ist, denn der Kap Hoorn-Archipel liegt ja noch in mittleren Breitengraden. Eine häufige Erfahrung hat bereits Cameron(8) ausgesprochen: „Alle Eingeborenen stimmen darin überein, daß es in der südlichen Hemisphäre unter gleichen Breitengraden doppelt so kalt, wie in der nördlichen ist." Aber auch Wind und Wetter haben ihre Schwächen.

Außer der ungünstigen Lage ohne geborene Deckung auch Nähe bis an die kalte Westwindzone, die von dorther sich bemerkbar, für die Witterungsbedingungen unerhörtlich verantwortlich. Die Kap Hoorn-Schwenkung stößt genau auf den Ausläufer kalten und verläuft von hier aus in südlicher Richtung weiter. Bald erreicht sich im Osten der Ende die ungemeinen "Cordoses de Falkland", die von hier an sich in weit Ausgeglitzt und auch Nordwestwärts (Karten 100). Eingangs wieder diese Bedeutung ein ganz wahr an das Festland heran. Sie besitzt eine Durchschnittstemperatur von nur 6° und eine Sonnenscheindauer von 1 bis. Auf den Lufterscheinungen im Kap Hoorn-Gebiet erhalten, nach Amerson 16, nach „die vorher, ungemeinen Brasilianische Wasserscheinung einen geringen Einfluß ausüben, ein Lumen im Süden herrscht, begleitet die pataguinischen Küsten und insonderlich eine kleine Ader zum Gestade des Feuerlandes. Diese vorne Wasserscheinung, die eine Erwärmung und somit ein Anfangen der ein begleitenden Luftmassen hervorruft, stehe die von der Kordillere herabkommenden kälteren und schwereren Luftmassen an sich heran und begünstige so die Entwicklung und Stärke der Winde, die in jener Zone ganz besonders heftig auftreten." Unzählbarer Einfluß auf die Kondition der derzeigen Umgebungen übt weiter diese auch jene Wasserscheinung aus, denn die Inlanse entfernen sich so wenig als möglich von den Küsten.

Hier die gemeinen Strömungen, vor allem der Kap Hoorn-Strom, sind die Ursache für die mehrere englischsächsen Westwindbewegungen, die sich wiederholt an gleichem Tage in den Winter und Sommermonaten vollziehen. Der Wetterwechsel erfolgt meist plötzlich, einerlei ob im Nach-[illegible] Wasserversorgung beschränkten, oder ob auf einem reihigen, sonstigen Vorsprung ein einfacher Regenschutzer den ganzen Siedelbing ausfüllt. Von einer mehr oder weniger sich gleichbleibenden Regelmäßigkeit der Wetterungsbedingungen im Sommer und im Winter konnte man dort nicht sprechen. Bennett (s): 229 äußerte sich hierzu folgendermaßen: „Les conditions climatologiques varient considérablement de site en site. Aux en la Tierra del Fuego austral se lave entièle grandes eaux devenir el verano, causando graves perjuicios, pero los extremadas la gravamentos de la sensible baste hallarse desnudada avanzada la estación, dépenses sino las frías y las heladas permanecen con la constancia. Sucle ser el viento nuevamente cesa siempre, por lo general, en la estación más Revisos del año." Plötzlicher Schneefall ist auch im Hochsommer keine unmöglichkeit Erscheinung, ich habe sie erwartet erlebt. Zu Weihnachten 1954 lag Wanne-Eickel mit seinem kleinen Fahrzeuge „eisfest in einer Bucht der Hellmut Bucht auch vor Anker. Obwohl wir auf der südlichen Halbkugel waren, hatten wir doch Weihnachtswetter, es hatte geschneit und die ganze Gegend war in ein weißes Kleid gehüllt. Was sagte sich Kap Horn dazu, ob es Winter oder Sommer war, es gestaltete das Wetter nach seinem Vergnügen". Die Jahrhundert Gäste hatte Fitz-Roy (s): 214 den Sommerlichkeiten Sommer durchgemacht: „Northerly winds usually begin again, during the summer months; but all manner of shifts and changes are experienced, from north to south by the west, during that season, which would hardly deserve the name of summer, were not the days so much longer, and the weather a little warmer. Rain and wind prevail during the long, much more than in the short days." Die derzeitigen Eingeborenen empfinden sogar einen plötzlichen, sehr bedeutenden Wetterumschwung kaum merklich; langsamer gewinnen empfindliche Amerikaner und andere Siedlerer dadurch unwohlen im Verkehrsleben.

Um die Witterungsbedingungen in dem an sich kleinen Kap Horn-Archipel richtig zu beurteilen, ist es wohl angebracht, [illegible] Wetterverhältnisse zu umgrenzen. Der Westen, nördlich vom Meridian über Punta Dirdis bis Brookbank, als natürliche Fortsetzung des Westpatagonischen Inselreiches, bildet die ganze breite Sequenzen mit dem "Regenschleier", wie die Seemänner sich ausdrücken. Die Niederschlagsmenge ist hier ganz unverhältnismäßig groß. Obwohl genaue Beobachtungen nur in der Bahia Orange von der Mission Ingenieros durchgeführt worden sind, behauptet Dante (s): 417, daß die Niederschlagsmenge „wenigstens über die Höhe von 4 m als von 3 m erreicht. Allerdings ist die Niederschlagsmenge hier so groß, daß die Regenmesser für einen der regenreichsten Tage des Erdballes gehalten werden soll. Sie ist ebenfalls gleichmäßig über das ganze Jahr verteilt". Man darf aber nicht übersehen, daß die Bahia Orange, mit einer Niederschlagsmenge von 1200 mm sich in einer gegen die vorherrschenden Winde geschützten Lage befindet; je weiter man nach Süden und Südwesten vordringt, eine bis an den außerfegenden Inseln, um so mehr erhöht sich die Niederschlagsmenge in dem von Dante gemessenen Ausmaße. Der schwedische Botaniker Skottsberg (s): 11 beschreibt „den Kilma des westpatagonisch-feuerländischen Kanal- und Inselgebietes gebietes als kalttemperiert mit sehr geringem Unterschied zwischen Sommer und Winter, sehr stürmisch, sehr regenreich mit Regen zu allen Jahreszeiten."[30] Die Osthälfte des Yamana-Gebietes ist eine "mittelfeuchte Zone" und zwar die der "Mischwälder", weil die typischen Sommerwälder erst weiter im Innern der Isla Grande beginnen. Für Ushuaia, das in dieser Zone liegt, wird, nach Mitteilungen von Dusen (a): 446, die Niederschlagsmenge mit 511 mm angegeben. Nur 50 km genau südlich davon liegt die Bahía Orange, in der bekanntlich eine Niederschlagsmenge von 1500 mm nachgewiesen worden ist. Noch weitere 20 bis 30 km nach Süden und nach Westen erhöht sie sich zumindest um das Doppelte. Die Übergänge von der einen Zone in die andere vollziehen sich zwar allmählich, aber mit schnellem Ansteigen.

Meistenteils sind die N i e d e r s c h l ä g e, Regen mehr noch als Schnee, vom Wind und Sturm begleitet: Am häufigsten ziehen sie aus dem Südwesten herauf. Was Lehmann: 171 für die Bahía Orange festgestellt hat, gilt mit geringen Schwankungen nach unten und nach oben für das ganze Inselgebiet: „La précipitation de l'eau sous toutes ces formes, pluie, neige, grêle ou grésil, cristaux de glace, est extrêmement abondante sur les pentes ou sur les sommets des montagnes voisines du Pacifique, aussi bien que sur les rivages occidentaux de l'archipel Fuégien. Dans ces regions, d'un bout de l'année à l'autre, la pluie ou la neige ne cesse guère de tomber, hiver comme été." Zahlreich sind schwere Platzregen, die fast immer strichweise fallen. Erst prasseln sie mit lautem Aufschlag auf die außenliegenden Felsen und Inseln nieder, die deshalb fast durchgehends bis zum Meeresspiegel herunter nackt abgewaschen sind. Über sie hinweg zieht das Unwetter weiter, entlädt sich teilweise über den Wasserarmen und inneren Inseln, und stößt schließlich auf höhere Gebirgszüge, die es nur selten überschreitet. Oft und oft erreichen die schweren Platzregen sogar den Canal de Beagle. Noch häufiger hüllt feiner Staubregen die ganze Landschaft mehrere Tage ein; er ist zuweilen fast undurchsichtig wie dichter Nebel. Mit viel Gewalt fegen Schneewirbel über die Gegend hinweg. Ruhig und sanft, in dicken Flocken, fällt der Schnee nur selten; dafür aber umso öfter in Form von ganz feinen, kristallenen Körnchen. An den vielen geschützten Stellen, in Tälern und Buchten, die zu nordwärts gerichteten Wänden und Abhängen liegen, dort lagert er drei bis vier Monate am Boden. Von jenen weiten Flächen aber, die vor den Süd- und Südwestwinden gar keinen Schutz haben, wird er baldigst weggewischt. Daraus erklärt sich der seltsame Anblick, daß ausgedehnte Schneeflächen von niedrigen Höhen an bis hinauf zu den Bergesgipfeln nur die Ost- und Nordostseite der Gebirge, die oft allein mit Baumwuchs bestanden sind, als zusammenhängende oder unterbrochene Flecke bedecken." Hagel mit kleinsten und großen Schlossen [30] Er fügt Tabellen an, aus denen „die Variation in den Niederschlagsmengen" von einigen Punkten in dieser Regionzu ersichtlich ist.

[31] Schon Fitz-Roy (b): 312 ist darauf aufmerksam geworden, daß an den südwestlichen, außenliegenden Inseln: „the higher land is covered with snow throughout the year, and you find the heights close to the sea thickly wooded towards the east, though ist nichts seltenes in jener Gegend, er wird meist vor stürmischen Luftbewegungen hergetrieben.[19] Dafür wird sie von sehr dichten Nebeln fast ganz verschont, ebenso von Blitz und Donner. Mächtige Böen steigen vom Süden und Südwesten her auf und künden warnend durch dicke Wolkenmassen ihr Kommen an; furchtbar werden sie, wenn sie Schnee und schweren Hagel mitbringen. Klare Tage und zumal solche, an denen die helle Sonne vom wolkenlosen Himmel herniederscheint, gibt es außerordentlich wenige. Großartige Wolkengebilde zeigen sich oft, meist aber ist der graue, eintönige Vorhang schwerer, regenschwangerer Atmosphäre vor das Himmelsblau gezogen. Zusammenfassend sagt FITZ-ROY (b): 313 hierzu: „Fogs are extremely rare on this coast; but thick, rainy weather, and strong winds prevail. The sun shows himself but little; the sky, even in fine weather, being generally overcast and cloudy. A clear day is a rare occurrence." Düster und unfreundlich ist diese Gegend, es regnet das ganze Jahr hindurch und im Westen fast jeden Tag."

Selbstredend steht in ursächlichem Zusammenhange mit alledem auch eine ungewöhnlich hohe Luftfeuchtigkeit. „Die Atmosphäre in der Gebirgszone des Feuerlandes und auf den südlichen Inseln ist häufig nahezu voll gesättigt; der jährliche mittlere Feuchtigkeitsgrad wird auf 83 Prozent geschätzt, monatlich schwankt er zwischen 75 und 85 Prozent" (ACOSTINI: 96). Damit stimmt sehr gut überein, was HYADES (f): 554 in der Bahia Orange beobachtet hat: „L'état hygrométrique de l'air est, par suite, très élevé et correspond à 82 pour toute l'année. Il varie peu entre l'hiver et l'été, qui ne sont pas, d'ailleurs, au cap Horn, des saisons bien marquées." An diese Bedingungen sich zu gewöhnen, gelingt nicht jedem Europäer; den dortigen Eingeborenen sind sie selbstverständlich. Man bedenke, daß nach den von LEPRAY: 169 durchgeführten Untersuchungen „l'atmosphère de la région maritime de la Terre-de-Feu, est souvent dans un état très voisin du point de saturation". Hingegen ist der Luftdruck niedrig. Nach GAUGEN: 509 beträgt er für den ganzen Süden durchschnittlich 752 mm, für die Bahia Orange, nach LEPRAY: 148, genau 747,18 mm als Jahresmittel. Dieser niedrige Barometer-barren on their western sides owing to the prevailing winds. These heights are seldom covered with snow, because the sea winds and the rain melt it soon after it falls".

[19] LEPRAY: 172 berichtet: „A plusieurs reprises, pendant que les sommets de 250 m à 300 m des collines voisines blanchissaient sous une épaisse couche de grêlons, nous avons remonté, au niveau de la mer, une ondée abondante aux gouttes larges et glacées qui, bien certainement, représentaient des grêlons fondus à leur passage dans la couche atmosphérique inférieure."

[20] Die meteorologischen Beobachtungen der Mission Scientifique in der Bahia Orange während eines ganzen Jahres (1882 bis 1883) haben nach HYADES (f): 551 ergeben, „qu'il y a eu, pendant l'année, 278 jours pluvieux et 70 jours de neige: la hauteur totale de l'eau tombée a été de 1 m, 333, dont 2 m, 60 de neige qui correspondent à 0 m, 30 de pluie. On a compté chaque mois en moyenne 25 jours pluvieux, dont 7 sur 8 au moins de grêle ou de neige". Hierbei ist zu beachten, daß die genannte Gegend längst nicht die größte Niederschlagszone im Kap Hoorn-Archipel aufweist.

stand muß als Ursache für die während des ganzen Jahres stürmisch bewegte Atmosphäre bezeichnet werden.[24]

Wiederholt wurde schon darauf hingewiesen, daß in dortiger Gegend, und zwar während des ganzen Jahres, die Winde mit ungewöhnlicher Stärke auftreten. Am häufigsten sind die aus dem Südwesten bis Nordwesten und sie herrschen fast ununterbrochen durch nahezu neun Monate. Im Sommerhalbjahr machen sie 75 Proz. aller Winde, im Winterhalbjahr 47 Proz. aus; während des letzteren betragen die Ostwinde 22 Proz. Die mittlere Geschwindigkeit der Winde ist im Sommer größer als im Winter, abgesehen von denen aus dem Nordnordwesten und Nordosten. Der Januar ist der am meisten bewegte Monat; denn alle drei bis vier Tage kehren die Stürme wieder und zwar fast ausschließlich aus dem Süden und Südwesten. Im Mai beginnen die warmen und trockenen Ostwinde, auch Nordwinde setzen ein; beide halten bis Juli an. Westwinde nehmen wieder im Oktober überhand und sie gewinnen bis Januar, dem subantarktischen Hochsommermonat, beständig an Stärke (Lepray: 146). Man kann von einem andauernden Windzug aus dem Süden oder Westen sprechen.[25] Hyades (f): 555 nennt 23 km 766 m als mittlere Stundengeschwindigkeit, „avec une vitesse maxima diurne de 52 kil, 82 en été et de 44 kil, 4 en hiver. La plus grande vitesse de vent observée a dépassé 39 mètres à la seconde". Windstöße sind fast immer sehr stark und plötzlich. Nach Fitz-Roy (b): 313, „gales of wind succeed each other at short intervals, and last several days ... South-west and southerly winds rise suddenly as well as violently". Eisigkalt sind die Winde aus dem Südsüdwesten und Südosten, hingegen linde die aus dem Nordosten. Mit Recht wird die ganze Kap Hoorn-Gegend wegen ihrer unberechenbaren, stürmischen Unruhe von den Segelschiffen gefürchtet und die mächtigen Windstöße haben ihr eine berüchtigte Berühmtheit eingebracht.

Dabei ist die Luft nur selten ganz klar und durchsichtig. Fast immer hängt am Himmel irgendwelche Bewölkung, häufig eine schwere Dunstschicht und noch öfters das gleichförmige Grau eines unmittelbar bevorstehenden Regens. Sonnige Tage sind selten, immerhin im Winter ein wenig häufiger als im Sommer. Hyades (f): 555 bestätigt, daß „le soleil brille raremont: il y a en moyenne 1 heure de soleil pour 4 heures de ciel couvert. En juin 1883 on n'a constaté que 28 heures de soleil pendant tout le mois". Vergleicht man die Verteilung des Sonnenglanzes auf die Tagesstunden innerhalb eines gewissen Zeitraumes, so ergibt sich die auffällige Erscheinung, daß, um mit LEPRAY: 177 zu sprechen, „les chances de voir briller le soleil augmentent avec sa hauteur."[16] Im Jahre 1882/83 betrug die Bewölkung 7,9 für das ganze Jahr, 8,5 für den Sommer und 7,5 für den Winter. FITZ-ROY (h): 314 schreibt: „The most usual weather in these regions is a fresh wind between north-west and south-west, with a cloudy overcast sky." Er gibt auch zu, daß „at times the weather is comparatively fine and settled for perhaps a fortnight but those periods of quiet are few". Dem gegenüber aber sei betont, daß zwei bis drei zusammenhängende Tage schönen Wetters eine große Seltenheit sind.

[24] Fitz-Roy (b): 314 macht folgende Bemerkung: „Much difference of opinion has prevailed as to the utility of a barometer in these latitudes. I may remark, that during some year's careful trial of a barometer and sympiesometer (Adie's), I found their indications of the utmost value."

[25] Nach Hyades (f): 555, „le vent est presque continuel dans les parages du cap Horn; les vents d'Ouest dominent toute l'année". Genauer drückt sich Fitz-Roy (b): 314 aus: „Westerly winds prevail during the greater part of the year. The easterly wind blows occasionally in the winter months, and at times very hard, but it seldom blows in summer ... When the fury of the north-wester is expended, which varies from twelve to fifty hours, or even while it is blowing hard, the wind sometimes shifts suddenly into the south-west quarter, blowing harder than before. This wind soon drives away the clouds, and in a few hours ensues clear weather though perhaps with heavy squalls passing occasionally."

In all den vorher gezeichneten Bedingungen ist selbstverständlich kein Raum für eine angenehme, günstige Temperatur. Die vorherrschende Feuchtigkeit, das trübe Wetter mit schwerer Bewölkung, der kalte Wind und die häufigen Niederschläge lassen keine rechte Freude aufkommen. Will man die Wirklichkeit genau schildern, wird man sich auf eine lange Beschreibung einlassen müssen; denn die örtlichen Unterschiede sind in dem an sich kleinen Gebiete doch ganz ansehnlich. So hat es den Anschein, als ob in den Berichten dieser und jener Reisender auffällige Widersprüche lägen; tatsächlich traf der eine ausnahmsweise sehr günstiges und der andere schauerlich schlechtes Wetter an.[17] Am sichersten geht, wer die Temperatur an den verschiedenen Punkten genau beobachtet. Ganz allgemein jedoch gilt, daß weder starke Hitze noch bedeutende Kälte auftritt. Nach HYADES (g): 6 stellte die Mission SCHIRRTSQUE, während ihres einjährigen Aufenthaltes in der Bahía Orange, das Folgende fest: „Die Mitteltemperatur des Dezember, des wärmsten Monates, überstieg nicht +7,9° C, während allerdings die des Juni, des kältesten, nicht unter +2,2° C fiel." Das allein beweist den geringen Ausschlag nach oben und nach unten. Doch hat HYADES (f): 555 und (g): 33 auch bestimmte Zahlen für die gleiche Stelle genannt: „Von einer strengen Winterkälte ist hier keine Rede; die Mitteltemperatur beträgt zwar nur +5,40°, sie übersteigt im Sommer nicht +7,17° und fällt im Winter nicht unter +3,56°." Der höchste Thermometerstand war +23° am 20. Februar, um 11 Uhr vormittags; der niedrigste war —7°, um 3 Uhr morgens am 7. August 1883.[30] Doch haben extreme Temperaturen niemals lange an. Nach HYADES (f): 555 beispielsweise, „dans le mois le plus chaud (février 1883) les températures extérieures ont varié, à 7 jours d'intervalle, de +24,5° à 9°; dans le mois le plus froid (août 1883), cette variation a été de +11° à —7,3°, à 10 jours d'intervalle". Aus Ushuaia wurde für das gleiche Jahr ein Maximum von +25° und ein Minimum von —9° gemeldet. Stellt sich, wie ich das selber einigemale erlebt habe, große Hitze oder empfindlicher Frost ein, sind beide immer nur von kurzer Dauer, was frühere Reisende längst beobachtet hatten. Zweifelsohne ist das eine angenehme Erscheinung in den sonst wenig erfreulichen Wetterbedingungen. An jedem Tage das ganze Jahr hindurch bewegt sich, nach Mittelmaßen, das Thermometer nur zwischen einigen Graden, nämlich „de 4°, vers 3 h du matin, cette température moyenne diurne s'élève, vers 1 h du soir, à 8° environ; c'est donc un écart de 4° au plus qui existe entre ces extrêmes moyens diurnes" (LEPRAY: 160). Als eine übersichtliche Zusammenfassung sind die folgenden Zahlen, die GANZAN: 509 für die ganze Inselgruppe aufgestellt hat, zu werten: das Jahresmittel wäre 6,1°, die mittlere Temperatur des Sommers 10,8° und die des Winters 1,3°. Somit ist es weder ungewöhnlich heiß noch kalt. Die Temperatur des Bodens unterliegt demzufolge noch geringeren Schwankungen.[31]

[16] „Ce résultat, au moins curieux, est facile à expliquer par la considération des autres parties des nuages auxquelles donne lieu le soleil à diverses hauteurs au-dessus de l'horizon" (ib.).

Da die Wärmeunterschiede während eines ganzen Jahres sich nur zwischen engen Grenzen bewegen, fehlt demzufolge eine deutliche Trennung der Jahreszeiten voneinander. Man würde letztere noch viel weniger, ja zuweilen fast gar nicht empfinden, blieb das buntfarbige Wechselspiel der sich ändernden Flora aus. Vor allem sind es die blattwerfenden Buchen, die mit den auffälligen Gegensätzen ihrer kräftigen Farbentöne jedes Jahresviertel unübersehbar deutlich in die Landschaft zeichnen. Der Sommer fällt auf Januar, Februar und März, der Winter auf Juli, August und September; der wärmste Monat ist Januar und der kälteste ist Juli. Die Übergänge vollziehen sich sehr sanft und die Unterschiede verwischen sich zuweilen ganz und gar. Im Sommer erlebt man nicht seltener Schneefälle als warme Tage im Winter. Für beide Erscheinungen kann ich mich auf eigenes Erleben berufen.[32] Besondere Ausnahmen treffen überdies noch ein. So berichtet BOVE beispielsweise: „A milder winter than that (1882) which we spent in Beagle Channel, had never been known within the memory of man. We were only [30] Aus LEPRAY: 158 ist diese Angabe genommen. HYADES (f): 555 schreibt: „La température moyenne, pendant l'année des observations, qui a compté 73 jours de gelée, s'est élevée à +[illegible] avec un maximum de +19°,5 et un minimum de —7°,3."

[31] Für die Bahía Orange nennt HYADES (f): 555 als mittlere Jahrestemperatur +5°,92 in einer Tiefe von 0,15 m und +5°,64 bei einer Tiefe von 0,30 m. Genaue Einzelheiten ersieht man aus LEPRAY: 163.

[32] Kurz und bündig drückt sich BOVE: 32 aus: „Now white man at Ushuaia told me that it was a climate in which winter and summer alternated every week, and that describes the matter fairly well."

visited by snow on two or three occasions. It fell in very small quantities, and disappeared in a very few days. The months of June and July, the depth of winter, were unusually fine. For days and days together there was not a breath of wind, nor was there a cloud to be seen. I asked myself several times, if these could be the same lands that FITZ-ROY and DARWIN depicted in such sad colours! Ours, however, was an exceptional year. The mild temperature was no doubt due to the unusual prevalence of the north-east winds" (MM: XVII, 235; 1883). Im Gegensatz hierzu sagt DUSEN (a): 419 vom Jahre 1897, „daß man seit Menschengedenken keinen so heißen und trocknen Sommer erlebt habe, und als Wirkung dieses trocknen Sommerklimas wurde besonders hervorgehoben, daß der Waldboden ziemlich vollständig ausgetrocknet sei".

Nach den genauen Beobachtungen des bekannten FITZ-ROY (b): 315 sind in der Nachbarschaft des Kap Hoorn die Äquinoktialmonate die schlechtesten des ganzen Jahres und um diese Zeiten herrschen schwere Stürme vor. Von August bis Oktober gibt es vorwiegend sehr schlechtes Wetter, häufig treten starke Winde, Schnee, Hagel und Kälte auf. Dezember bis Februar sind die wärmsten Monate mit langen Tagen und einigem Schönwetter. Während dieser ganzen Zeit finden sich vorübergehend starke Winde mit viel Regen ein. Der März ist sehr bewegt und wegen seiner Stürme der ungünstigste Monat, obgleich er nicht so viel Regen wie der vorausgegangene Sommer bringt. Vom April bis Juni zeigt sich das beste Wetter und obwohl die Tage kurz sind, ist es mehr als zu den übrigen Zeiten des Jahres sommerlich. Ostwinde stellen sich häufig ein, die von gutem, klarem und beständigem Wetter begleitet sind. Schlechtwetter fehlt zwar nicht ganz, ist aber nicht so häufig wie in den übrigen Monaten. Im Juni und Juli geht es genau so, allerdings blasen die Ostwinde im Juli stärker. Im Kap Hoorn-Archipel ist also, wie man sich ausdrücken pflegt, der Typ eines konstanten Klimas vertreten. Trotz der auffällig geringen Temperaturschwankungen während des langen Jahres herrscht dennoch in der dortigen Gegend fast ununterbrochen schlechtes, regnerisches Wetter, fegend schwere oder leichte Stürme oft darüber hinweg und der Himmel ist fast beständig mit Wolken verhangen.[21]

[21] Meteorologische Beobachtungen mit ausführlichen Tabellen enthalten fast alle Tagebücher jener Schiffe, die den südlichsten Abschnitt des Feuerlandes durchquert haben. Besonders seien noch erwähnt, als Ergänzung zu den bereits aufgezählten, die von FITZ-ROY (b): 311—317, mit "Some Observations upon the Appearance and Character of the Sea Coast of Tierra del Fuego; a brief Description of the Anchorages: and a few Remarks upon the Seasons, Wind and Weather", aus dem Jahre 1830; ferner seine Mitteilungen in (b): 1—64. L. F. MOUCHEZ: Mission du Cap Horn: Rapport sur les recherches hydrographiques de la "Romanche", dans l'archipel du cap Horn; Comptes Rendus hebd. des séances de l'Académie des Sciences, tome 98, Janvier—Juin 1884, p. (19)—(21): Paris 1884 J. LEVASSEUR: Mission du Cap Horn: Sur le climat du cap Horn; ibidem p. (25)—(31) bringt kurze Beobachtungen und Übersichtstabellen über die einzelnen Monate von September 1882 bis August 1883. Vgl. ANSORGE: 23, BANSONS (b): 291, DUSEN (a): 445, HAMOY: 323, SARTORIUS (f): 14 und (g): 9 u. a. m.

Zum Abschluß lasse ich eine eindrucksvolle Beschreibung aus der Feder Barclay's (a): 62 fc'gen. Die Heimat der Yamana „presents the aspect of a submerged mountain chain, whose summits now are alone visible. The islands thus formed are exposed to the full force of continual southerly gales. Their steep sides, naked save for the moss that clings to some meagre crevice, are streaked 500 feet high with the white sea-drift. On their lee side, and in less exposed situations leading to the inner channels, they are covered with a dense growth of stunted beech woods. In a latitude of only 55° to 56° S., the line of perpetual snow comes as low as 1500 feet above sea-level. During a short week the summer climate will present all the variations which, in the same latitude north, might reasonably be looked for throughout a twelve month. Hurricane gusts alternate with breathless calms, showers of rain and sleet with a hothouse sun. This is the land of the Yahgans, the men who mark the limit of human life in the south, whose hunting-grounds are disputed only by the sleek seals and screaming gulls that play around the Horn". Gar so fürchterlich, wie manche Seefahrer es an vielen Einzeltagen erlebt haben, ist das Klima in jener südlichsten Inselwelt das ganze Jahr hindurch denn doch nicht.[32]

b. Die Pflanzenwelt

Angesichts der wenig vorteilhaften Witterungsbedingungen möchte man einen nennenswerten Baumwuchs im Kap Hoorn-Archipel kaum vermuten. Skottsberg (g): 11 folgend, muß man „das Klima des westpatagonisch-feuerländischen Kanal- und Inselgebietes als kalttemperiert mit sehr geringem Unterschied zwischen Sommer und Winter, sehr stürmisch, sehr regenreich mit Regen zu allen Jahreszeiten" bezeichnen.[33] Um so mehr überrascht die Pracht der subantarktischen Buchenwälder und zwar dann am meisten, wenn diese in das zarte, frische Frühlingsgrün gehüllt sind oder wenn sie den purpurroten Blättermantel im Herbste tragen. Bald aber gewahrt man eine empfindliche Artenarmut, verbunden mit weitgehender Einförmigkeit der gesamten Pflanzenwelt. Anders kann es auch nicht sein, fehlt doch sowohl die Kraft der Sonne wie eine anhaltende Wärme. In fast gesättigter Luftfeuchtigkeit, unter häufigen Stürmen und Schneefällen gedeiht eben kaum eine beschränkte Zahl von höheren Pflanzenarten. Um so üppiger wuchert die Kleinwelt der Kryptogamen.[34] Eine jede der beiden Gruppen weist etwa 300 Arten auf. Die meisten in Europa heimischen Familien haben hier ihre Vertreter, manche allerdings nur einen einzigen.

[32] Sehr beachtenswert ist neben Wenzel's Urteil (vgl. Fußnote 27) auch das von Agostini: 23: „Der Gegensatz in den Berichten der Reisenden erklärt sich einfach daraus, daß die einen das Feuerland nur an der Südwestküste längs dem Stillen Ozean berührten, von der Isla Desolación, deren Name gewiß wenig ermutigend klingt, bis zum Kap Hoorn, während die andern in die Kanäle vordrangen und das Land weiter im Norden und Osten erforschten. Nach unserer eigenen genauen Kenntnis des Landes können wir feststellen, daß der feuerländische Archipel nicht entfernt so abstoßend ist, wie ihn manche beschrieben haben, weder im Klima noch in der Beschaffenheit des Bodens."

[33] Hamont: 323 sagt: „La température n'est jamais extrême, jamais chaude, jamais froide non plus; mais on tout temps il neige et il pleut. C'est bien là le type d'un climat constant, à variations peu nombreuses, mais régulières."

Das ganze Heimatgebiet unserer Feuerländer bildet den südlichen und östlichen Abschluß des etwa im Golfo de Peñas beginnenden Regenwaldes. Die Botaniker pflegen zwar die unmittelbare Umgebung von Ushuaia, also den Kern der mittleren Yamana-Zone bis etwa Puerto Harberton im Osten, noch in den Bereich der Sommerwälder einzubeziehen. Indes glaube ich darauf nicht eigens Rücksicht nehmen zu brauchen, weil jener schmale Streifen einer etwas anderen Waldform sich im Wirtschaftsbetriebe unserer Eingeborenen nicht auswirkt; dem aufmerksamen Auge eines Europäers entgeht er keinesfalls. Die geschlossene Ausdehnung des Regenwaldes ist trotzdem beschränkt; denn erstens steigt er nur zwei- bis dreihundert Meter hoch an und zweitens sind bei weitem nicht alle unterhalb der Baumwuchsgrenze liegenden Flächen bewaldet. Dunkelgrüne Waldflächen wechseln mit offenen rotbraunen oder braungelben Wiesenmooren und schütter bestellten Waldmooren ab, aus unregelmäßigen Rasenflächen erheben sich nackte Felsen. Über die Verteilung des Waldbestandes entscheidet offensichtlich das Klima und die Ortslage. Ohne sich der Übertreibung schuldig zu machen, muß man sagen, daß der Regenwald eigentlichen Windschutz sucht. Am deutlichsten erkennt man dieses sein Bestreben darum, daß die nach Norden und nach Nordosten abfallenden Gebirgswände fast vollständig und dicht mit Baumwuchs bestellt sind, hingegen die vor dem Süd- und Südwestwinde offen daliegenden Flächen ganz nackt sind. Auch umsäumt dieser Wald die kleinen Häfen und stillen Buchten, er füllt geschützte Täler und verborgene Schluchten aus, sogar in Fugen und Ritzen hoher, steiler Felsen auf der Lee klammern sich die Wurzeln einzelner Bäume fest. Doch bin ich weit entfernt davon zu behaupten, daß sich die wirkliche Verteilung der bewaldeten Flächen allein aus den Windverhältnissen erkläre."[35]

Der Regenwald erscheint ganz eindeutig durch die fast ausnahmslose Alleinherrschaft der schönen, immergrünen Buche šŕ'ŽÍ (Nothofagus betuloides) gekennzeichnet. Ihre Neigung, dichtgedrängt zu stehen, schafft den eigentlichen Urwald. In seiner dunkelgrünen Tönung unter einem fast ständig bedeckten, nebelgrauen Himmel macht er einen düsteren, zuweilen unheimlichen Eindruck; aber unglaublich verschieden gestaltet sich der Anblick, wenn die Sonne ihr helles Strahlengold darüber ausgießt. Eine bedeutende Höhe erreicht die immergrüne Buche nicht, meist strigt sie nur bis etwa 12 m empor, ausnahmsweise bis 15 m oder gar 20 m, und dabei zeigt sie eine Dicke von höchstens 35 cm Durchmesser. Die schönsten und kräftigsten Bäume findet man nicht in der regenreichen Gegend, sondern an der Grenze zum mittelfeuchten Gebiete hin. Eingestreut als Einzelstücke, hauptsächlich in den Niederungen und an Lichtungen, beobachtet man eine Magnoliacee, den Winterrindenbaum ülkütta (Drimys Winteri), der durchschnittlich nur 10 m hoch wird und zuweilen die beträchtliche Stammdicke von 20 cm erreicht.[24] Er zeigt sich sehr empfindlich gegen den Westwind, der schnell seine Blätter und Rinde zum Trocknen bringt. Am Waldesrande steht häufig die Leñadura ïyakur (Maytenus magellanica), die durchschnittlich bedeutend kleiner bleibt (Abb. 4). Der einzige Nadelbaum, der sich bis zum Canal de Beagle vorgeschoben hat und in versprengt gestellten Einzelstücken westlich der Punta Divide angetroffen wird, ist eine Cypresse Ilpaix (Libocedrus tetragona); sie wird hier nie über 10 m hoch und kommt als waldbildend nicht in Betracht. Schließlich gedeiht als Kurzstammbäumchen mit scharlachroten, weithin leuchtenden Blüten der máku (Embothrium coccineum). Mit Vorliebe stellt er sich in die Küstenwälder, an Waldränder und Flußufer; hier bildet er nicht selten einen wichtigen Bestandteil der Uferdickichte, selbst an Stellen, wo starker Wind die Waldbäume nicht hochkommen läßt.

[34] Dusen (a): 140 hat den südlichsten Zipfel der Neuen Welt in drei Zonen verlegt. An Hand übersichtlicher Tabellen beweist er die schnelle Abnahme der Zahl der phanerogamen Arten vom trockenen über das mittelfeuchte zum feuchten Gebiete, während die Artenzahl der Kryptogamen von jenem zu diesem erstaunlich ansteigt. Wie weit diese drei Gebiete voneinander abweichen wird darum ersichtlich, daß nur wenige Arten in ihnen gleichzeitig vertreten sind.

Was im besonderen die subantarktischen Buchen betrifft, so spielt, wie gesagt, Nothofagus betuloides die alleinherrschende Rolle im feuchten Urwalde und zwar ganz ausschließlich westlich von Punta Divide. Nach Osten hin, auf beiden Ufern des Canal de Beagle, erscheint in Form von kleinen Beständen auch die sommergrüne Buche kónis (Nothofagus pumilio) eingestreut, die auffällig die Nordküste der Isla Navarino bevorzugt, aber nicht weiter nach Süden vordringt. Sie bildet hier nicht mehr, wie inmitten der Isla Grande, stattliche Wälder. Die andere blattwerfende Buchenart kóthrus (Nothofagus antarctica), die in der Gegend südlich des Rio Grande auf Isla Grande in herrlichen Beständen gedeiht, vereinigt sich hier an Bächen oder am Seeufer zu kleinen Hainen oder Galeriegehölzchen und besetzt größere Flächen regelmäßig nahe den Gletschern oder sieht von unten aufstrigend in breiten Streifen bis oben zur Grenze des Baumwuchses hinauf. Wenn im Herbste ihre Blätter sich in Scharlach- oder Weinrot verfärben, heben sich diese leuchtenden Flecken glühend aus der weiten Landschaft heraus. Nicht minder farbenprächtig ist im Frühling der auffällige Gegensatz des jungen Blattgrüns zur dunklen Tönung der immergrünen Buchen. Die Nothofagus antarctica (Abb. 5) entwickelt eine staunenswerte Anpassungskraft und gedeiht noch auf Höhen, welche die beiden anderen Buchenarten nicht erreichen.[27] An geschützten Orten wird sie 15 m hoch und sogar noch mehr; wo sie schweren Winden ausgesetzt ist, bildet sie ein dichtes Buschwerk und preßt sich eng dem Boden an. Dergleichen Bestände zu überqueren geschieht am leichtesten dadurch, daß man darüber hinwegschreitet. Ein eigenartiger Anblick ist es, einzelne Bäume dieser Buchenart mit nur wenigen Wurzeln in Felsenspalten fest verankert zu sehen, wie sie dem wüsten Sturm, der sie beugt und zerzaust, immer noch siegreich Trotz bieten. Die merkwürdigsten Wachstumsformen bilden sich dabei heraus. Sogar auf den Felsen des eigentlichen Kap Hoorn hat, neben der Nothofagus betuloides, auch jene blattwerfende Buche Wurzel geschlagen (vgl. Dusen [a]: 421). Indes trifft man Drimys Winteri nur auf den nördlichen Inseln Wollaston und noch bis zum Cabo Falso de Hornos an.

Abb. 5. Sommergrüne Buche

Die matte Beleuchtung bringt es mit sich, daß die ganze Landschaft einförmig und traurig erscheint. Aber das Waldesinnere ist unvergleichlich düster und dunkel, weil die Baumkronen ein dichtes Blätterdach bilden, das nur an vereinzelten Stellen ein Sonnenstrahl zu durchdringen vermag. Blätter und Äste, Zweige und Stämme triefen vor Feuchtigkeit und der Erdboden ist von der reichlichen Nässe ganz und gar durchweicht. Unter solchen Bedingungen erkranken die Stämme sehr bald und brechen zusammen. In wüstem Durcheinander bedecken sie den Boden und vermodern unter schweren Mengen von allerlei Flechten, Moosen und Farnen. Zwar fehlt es im subantarktischen Buchenwalde fast ganz an dem niederen Buschwerk und an dem sogenannten Unterholz; jetzt sind es jene Massen von verfaulenden Stämmen, die eine Wanderung außerordentlich behindern.[*] Übel wirkt allein schon der schwere Moderduft und der hohe Wassergehalt der Luft. Zur Sommerszeit sind diese düsteren Buchenwälder trotzdem etwas belebt; oft und oft hört man das aufdringliche Hämmern des Spechtes und das Gekreisch kleinerer Papageienschwärme, auch lassen vereinzelte Vögel kurz ihre Stimme vernehmen, kleine Wasserratten schleichen leise dahin und silberhelle Bächlein murmeln; zumindest aber schüttelt der Wind rauschend die Äste oder heult der Sturm durch die dichten Blätterkronen. Still und einsam jedoch ist der Wald im Winter, wenn auf weiten Strecken die Buchen mit entblätterten Zweigen dastehen und wenn aus dem Geäst der immergrünen Bäume die munteren Vögel entflohen sind. Dann sind auch die lustigen Bächlein zugefroren und die ganze Landschaft liegt erstarrt unter einer dicken Schneedecke. Gegen den bleifarbenen Himmel heben sich nur einige steile Gebirgsrücken ab, die weder Eis noch Schnee halten; sonst ist alles in eine gleichmäßig düstere Farbentönung eingetaucht. Nahe dem Meeresufer und noch mehr von gewisser Höhe an wird der Wald oft und unregelmäßig von nackten Felsen oder von dünnbestellten Wiesen oder von zugedeckten Moosen unterbrochen; erst auf den höchsten Abhängen der Berge, weit jenseits der Baumgrenze, gewahrt man größere oder kleinere Schneeflecken, die auch während des Sommers liegen bleiben. Abgesehen vom jungen Frühlingsgrün flimmert über den bewaldeten Flächen, wenn man sie von weitem betrachtet, eine leichte bräunliche Farbentönung.

[27] Entgegen der Ansicht Hrusa' (r): 294 sei festgestellt, daß die Nothofagus antarctica im allgemeinen erst etwa 300 m über dem Wasserspiegel beginnt und mindestens bis auf 500 m hinaufreicht, während die Nothofagus betuloides sich unter 300 m hält. Dusen (a): 138, 300 berichtet: „Nothofagus antarctica verkrüppelt, wenn sie sich aufwärts verbreitet, allmählich und findet sich in der alpinen Region nur als niedriges Gebüsch oder am häufigsten als zwergartige, an den Boden gedrückte Sträucher, die einen Durchmesser von kaum 0,5 m erreichen. So weit ich mich erinnern kann, gibt es kaum einen Baum, dessen Form und Größe innerhalb so weit von einander entfernten Grenzen schwankten, wie Nothofagus antarctica."

Fast überall umsäumt den Urwald ein mehr oder weniger geschlossener Dickicht von Sträuchern, die zuweilen, je nach den Lichtbedingungen, auch ein wenig in das Innere vordringen. Zu dieser Strauchflora gehört vor allem die in hellem Gelb blühende Berberis ilicifolia und Berberis microphylla, Rubus magellanicus mit seinen großen Blättern (Abb. 6) und Chiliotrichum diffusum mit seiner reichen Fülle weißer Blüten. Viel niedriger hält sich die zarte Fuchsia magellanica, die den Schatten der Waldränder anscheinend nicht entbehren kann, dafür aber den größten Teil des Jahres hindurch blüht.[20] Auf offener Fläche steht die Pernettya mucronata dichtgedrängt, daß man sich kaum einen Weg hindurchbahnen kann, mag sie nur 20 cm oder bisweilen sogar 80 cm hoch sein. Ähnliches gilt von der immergrünen Baccharis magellanica und Baccharis patagonica, die mit Senecio-Arten abwechseln (Abb. 7). In den Mooren und Heiden wuchern als wichtigste Zwergsträucher Empetrum rubrum, Gaultheria serpyllifolia und Myrteola nummularia. Ausschlaggebend wird die Physiognomie des feuerländischen Regenwaldes dadurch bestimmt, daß die Chusquea-Arten fehlen.

Abb. 6. Ribes magellanicum. 2/3 n. Gr.

Auf die Kräuterflora, im besonderen auf die vielen einjährigen Pflanzen hier einzugehen ist unmöglich. Kurz sei noch hingewiesen auf die biologisch sehr merkwürdigen phanerogamen Polsterpflanzen in stattlicher Artenanzahl, die weite Flächen bedecken, einerlei, ob als Flachpolster oder als Kugelpolster. Keine einzige Liane tritt hier auf und meines Wissens überschreitet weder Philesia noch Prionotes, welche beide im südlichen Westpatagonien so häufig sind, die Halbinsel Brecknock. Höhere Epiphyten kommen nicht vor und auch die epiphytische Farnflora ist arm; am häufigsten sieht man Asplenium magellanicum, Polypodium Billardieri, Hymenophyllum secundum und tortuosum, ferner an schattigen Stellen das zierliche Hymenophyllum pectinatum und endlich Blechnum magellanicum. Der Reichtum an Kryptogamen ist fast unübersehbar; denn „peu de régions sont aussi saturées d'humidité" (Hariot: 323). Im Walde wuchern viele Pilzarten in Masse, die, weil nicht giftig, fast ausnahmslos genießbar sind. Auf besonderen Wulstungen an Buchenästen (Abb. 8) entwickeln sich die beliebten Cyttaria-Arten, von denen Cyttaria Darwini, weißlich gelb und von der Größe einer Walnuß, am meisten auffällt. Weite Flächen des Feuerlandes sind vermoort. Zu den Charaktermoosen dieser Moore zählen, außer dem alles verdrängenden Sphagnum, besonders Discranum- und Rhacomitrium-Arten; zwischen ihnen schießt Marsippospermum grandiflorum hoch. Auch Waldboden, Steine und die Baumstämme sind von Moospolstern überdeckt. Von Lebermoosen (Hepaticae) behauptet sich Lepicoles am stärksten. Aus der Gruppe der Flechten sind, neben Stictaceen, einige boreale Typen zu nennen, beispielsweise Cladina, Cladonia, Stereocaulon u.a. Außer einigen anderen Parasiten verleiht das vielverbreitete Myzodendron punctulatum,* neben Usnea barbata, dem subantarktischen Buchenwalde mit seiner schwachen Beleuchtung einen märchenhaften Schimmer. Am auffälligsten von den vielen Meeresalgen tritt schließlich die gewaltige Macrocystis pyrifera hervor.

Abb. 7. Senecio Darwinii. ½ n. Gr.

Die geringe Wärme und der Mangel an Sonnenlicht sind die letzten Ursachen dafür, daß nur eine kleinblätterige Flora aufkommen und daß eine buntfarbige, reiche Blütenpracht sich im Kap Hoorn-Gebiete nicht entfalten kann. Einige genügsame, neuestens von Europäern eingeführte Nutzpflanzen erfordern auf gutem, geschütztem Boden sorgfältige Pflege, trotzdem tragen sie nicht viel. Wie Hyades (g): 6 berichtet, wurden bereits durch die Mission Schmidtiques in Bahia Orange 1882 „zwei Versuchsgärten angelegt, der eine im Walde, der andere in sandigem Boden am Meeresstrande; Bohnen, Erbsen, Kohl, Salat, Rettig, Petersilie wurden in verschiedenen Varietäten angepflanzt, im Strandgarten auch Kartoffeln. Letztere allein geben einen kleinen Ertrag, Salat und Rettig wachsen kümmerlich, die anderen Sorten gar nicht. Auf dem Terrain der Missionsstation [Ushuaia] hat man erheblich günstigere Resultate erzielt; der Boden ist freilich dort besser und die Lage geschützter, auch der Sommer, da das offene Meer weiter abliegt, wärmer, wie der Winter kälter." Der dortige Erdboden könnte also weder die Eingeborenen noch die angesiedelten Europäer ernähren. Die wenigen gesunden Baumstämme, die gefällt werden, haben sehr geringen Wert und finden nur beschränkte Verwendung. Dem reichen Holzvorrat allerdings ist es zu danken, daß die Feuerländer in den ungünstigen Witterungsbedingungen ihrer Heimat ein beschränktes Dasein fristen können."

c. Die Tierwelt

Die Seefahrer der frühesten Zeit bereits hatten ihr Augenmerk auf die Vertreter aus der Tierwelt, die den südlichsten Ausläufer des amerikanischen Festlandes bevölkern, gerichtet. Seinerseits hat CHARLES DARWIN jenes Inselreich als eine selbständige geographische Provinz beurteilt und mit ihm neben auch andere Beobachter in der Magellan-Straße eine deutlich einschneidende tiergeographische Grenze, als ob die Eigenart der Fauna nach Süden hin von jener des Festlandes verschieden wäre. Indes, wie neuerdings NAUMANN (i): 6 erweisen konnte, haben „spätere Untersuchungen dies nicht ganz bestätigt und besonders CUNNINGHAM's Fund einer feuerländischen Eidechse (Ptygoderes pertinatus Dum.) und die Arbeiten der französischen Cap Horn-Expedition haben die Ansicht von einer feuerländischen, vielleicht gar antarktischen Provinz von Landtieren erschüttert". Die genauen Forschungen seit Mitte des verflossenen Jahrhunderts haben jene für die Tiergeographie wichtige Frage endgültig in dem Sinne beantwortet, daß die Magellan-Straße eine gewisse Grenze bildet, hinter der nach Süden hin die Flora sowohl wie die Fauna plötzlich weit ärmer erscheint, und zwar in viel zu hohem Grade, als sich dies aus der geringen Breite der Straße selber und aus dem unbedeutenden Unterschiede des Klimas erklären ließe. Jedoch treten weder Pflanzengattungen noch Landtiere im Feuerlande auf, die auf dem Festlande fehlen würden. Einige Landsäuger indes haben die Magellan-Straße nicht überschritten, nämlich Strauß (Rhea Darwini), Puma (Felis concolor),* Hirsch (Cervus chilensis) und Stinktier (Conepatus Humboldtii). Weiters vermißt man im Süden die Schlangen und Batrachier (Frösche, Laurchen, Kröten), die Skorpione und viele Insekten, denen man auf dem Festlande begegnet. Zur Erklärung dieser Erscheinung nimmt Nauman[illegible] (1) an, „daß klimatische Verhältnisse oder andere Umstände erst in sehr später Zeit die Einwanderung der nördlicheren Formen erlaubt hätten."

Abb. 8. Berberitzenzweig mit Wurzelstock. ½ n. Gr.

Und somit unter dem verhältnismäßig kühlen Klima des Kap Horn, dessen eigenartige zoologische Sonderformen nicht zu erwarten, möchte man das unerwartete Auftreten von Seevögeln und die Vielheit der Hochdichtung einiger Singer nicht dadurch hinwegzudeuten, daß die dortige Tierwelt [illegible] ist.

Nur eine gewisse Anzahl von höheren und niederen Tieren findet die erforderlichen Lebensbedingungen. Wären die rauhen Küsten nicht, so dürften einige Strandläufer und sicher auch viele Vögel hinzutreten, aber man in jenen kleinen Insektenbrüter nur sehr wenige Lebewesen. Tatsächlich trifft man auf dem Lande selber kaum einige Vertreter höherer Tierspezies an, die weder durch ihre Gestaltung noch durch ihr Äußeres hervorstechen. Zwar erheben sich manche Vögel einen lauten Gesängen; doch auch deren Farben sind matt und blaß, dunkel und unauffällig, wie die aller übrigen Lebewesen. Dergleichen Abtönungen im Unterbinden gleiten allgemein in das dürftige Dunkel einer vom grauen Himmel überzogenen, an Bäumen armen Landschaft hinein, wo die Sonne nur selten durch Wolkenlücken zeigt und Regenschauer mit schweren Stürmen abwechseln. Es ist als ob auch die Tiere erschaudern vor der Unguust des trostlosen Feuerlandes.

Als größtes der Landsäugetiere hat die wiederkauende Art der südamerikanischen Cameliden, nämlich das Guanaco, andere (Lama huana-

Westlich der Augustinus Bucht kommt er innerhalb des Yamana-Gebietes nicht vor.* Nach seiner Größe und Gestalt gleicht er am meisten dem europäischen Eichhörnchen und lebt gewöhnlich in kleineren oder größeren Rudeln. Seine Eigenschaften und Gewohnheiten werden, weil er das einzige bekanntwichtige Jagdtier der Selk'nam ist, bereits in Bd. I, 11 ausführlich dargelegt.* Im Wirtschaftsleben der Yamana hat er eine verwaltnismäßig geringere Bedeutung, vor allem deshalb, weil er nur im Canal auftritt. Seiner wählen die östliche Gruppe unserer Eingeborenen nicht gern verlassen; denn sie müssen es so vollständig tun, wie die Selk'nam das tun. Auch jagen sie es mit Bogen und Pfeil, in der gleichen Weise wie diese, vollständig verwiegend im Winter, wenn es die bewohnten Höhen verlassen muß und an den Uferrändern sich aufhält.

In allen Teilen, doch nicht sehr häufig, begegnet man dem großen Fuchs (Canis sive Cerdocyon magellanicus), einem kräftigen Tiere, das nach seiner Entwicklung und Stärke dem nordischen Wolfe gleicht. Dieser Fuchs ist bekanntlich der größte seiner Art in Südamerika. Er trägt einen dichten, fast langhaarigen, schön gefärbten Pelz.* Früher gab es auf Isla Hoste die meisten Füchse, seit einigen Jahrzehnten hat ihre Zahl ebenfalls unendlich abgenommen. Wenn ich [illegible], auf der Halbinsel Brecknock „Jagen wir schnitzwieder wegen zwei Füchse; ihre Felle waren natürlich ebenso wertvoll wie die Gegend und mir war es ein Rätsel, wie sie überhaupt da hinein kamen. Es war doch immerhin der westlichste Zipfel von Feuerland".* Außer diesem großen Fuchse trägt sich auch der kleinere Canis griseus an einzelnen Stellen. Die Yamana schenken weder diesem noch jenem eine nennenswerte Beachtung. Anders ist es jedoch mit dem Fischotter (Lutra felina), der in sehr deutlich erkennbarer Fährte auftritt.* Die Eingeborenen selber halten beide durch besondere Namen auseinander und bezeichnen den großen Innenotter als djapag, den viel kleineren Außenotter als djijiji. In Gewohnheiten und Lebensweise weichen sie von ihren europäischen Verwandten nicht ab. Beide werden ihres Felles wegen von den Indianern verfolgt, in neuester Zeit aber so rücksichtslos von europäischen Pelzjägern angehetzt, daß die Eingeborenen ihr Glück in sehr versteckten Kanälen und in fast unzugänglichen Wasserarmen versuchen müssen.[*] Die Feuerländer verschmähen das Fleisch der Otters.[]

Von den drei Arten aus der Ordnung der Fledermäuse (Chiroptoren) sieht man Vespertilio magellanicus und die graue Fledermaus mit den langen Ohren, genannt apuréte (Myotis chiloensis), am häufigsten. Abgesehen von einer schwarzen Ratte aréuina, die neuerdings durch die stärkere europäische graue Ratte Mála aréuina verdrängt worden ist, und von dem erst kürzlich eingeführten, heute verwilderten Kaninchen yamdrau[] gibt es noch einige Mäusearten als Vertreter der Nagetierordnung (Rodentien).

Ehedem tummelten sich in unerhaltlicher Zahl die gewaltigen Meeresungeheuer aus der Unterordnung der Wolfiocha (Cetaceen) nicht nur ganz nahe den feuerländischen Küsten, sondern auch weiter nach Norden hinauf. Jahrzehntelange Ausbeute mit wirksamen Geschossen durch gewinnsüchtige Walfänger hat jene Geschöpfe auf einen kleinen Restbestand zurückgeführt und bereits einige Arten gänzlich vernichtet. Gegenwärtig verirrt sich nur selten noch ein jüngeres Tier in die Kanäle des Kap Hoorn-Archipels; früher war es gar keine Seltenheit, daß einer jener ungeschlachten, lebensmüden Ungeheuer auf die Küste gerettet oder gegen eine Insel abgetrieben wurde.[*] Die größten Tiere sind die Blauwale, nämlich Balaenoptera intermedia, genannt Antipodyim, Balaenoptera Schlegelii, genannt [] Dumeril (1): 330 behauptet: „En la Isla Rabbid en el canal de la Bragle hay una especie de conejo; el Lepus (Oryctolagus) magellanicus, variedad del Lepus cuniculus que ha vuelto al estado salvaje." Doch ist es Tatsache, daß diese Kaninchen sich auch an vielen anderen Stellen finden und beispielsweise den Boden der Isla Navarino gänzlich unterwühlt hat.

[*] Bougainville berichtet über einen gemmten Wanen (1768), der mit zwei Blasrohren von einem kleinen Kutter aus diesen Tieren nachgegangen war: „Am 18. Dezember 1924 [also nach einer Jagd von kaum sechs Wochen] hatten wir schon siebenundzwanzig Otters erbeutet. Am 23. Dezember beschlossen wir, den Fang abzubrechen und die Strecken auszuwerfen. Hundertzwei Otters und fünf Fischen hatten wir erbeutet."

[*] Anläßlich seines Aufenthaltes in der Bahía Buen Suceso schrieb James Cook (1): IV, 31 im Dezember 1774: „Le Lieutenant venu apporte que la Baie Anse remplie de baleines en de venue nuejen. Nous quitons aussitôt ainsi des baleines dans la Détroit, comme on vient le dire; car le vent de la terre de Feu ne particulier, il y en a en grand nombre."

hepatopodipius, und Balaenoptera patagonica, genannt colilaja. Außerdem leben dort der Südwal, Balaena australis, nanuca (Mensch), der Schnabelwal, Ziphius spec?, genannt tijila, und endlich der Buckelwal, Megaptera longa. Sie alle sind unserer Feuerländerin eine ergiebige Bezugsquelle für mannigfaltige Dinge, die sie benötigen. Es verlohnt sich, die in biologischer Hinsicht wertvollen Beobachtungen einzelnigen, die Gannes Feuerrea (s): 309 im Dezember 1774 bei der Bahia Buen Suceso gemacht hat: „... Einige dreißig große Wallfische und eine unendliche Menge Seehunde machten sich im Wasser um und neben uns lustig. Die Wallfische schwammen nahezu halb parallel beisammen, welches anzeigen schien, daß dies die Zeit ihres Begattens sei. Sie alle sie auf der Seite des Schiffes, wo der Wind herkam, Wasser von sich blasen, hatten wir jedesmal einen unerträglich faulen und ungesunden Geruch wahrzunehmen, der drei bis vier Minuten anhielt. Hierzu begaben sie sich auf den Rücken und plätscherten mit ihren langen Brustflossen auf dem Wasser, welches einen Knall verursachte, als wenn ein halbpfündiges Stück abgefeuert wird. Dieses Spiel hat vermutlich zu dem Mutmaßungs-Märchen Anlaß gegeben, daß der Drache und der Wallfisch unerbittlich miteinander fechten. Der Drache wird gewöhnlich als ein langer Fisch vorgestellt, der aus dem Wasser springt, um dem Wallfisch einen derben Schlag beizubringen. Oft wünschen sie auch den Schwertfisch mit hinein, der diese Gelegenheit wahrnehmen soll, um dem armen Wallfisch den Bauch aufzuschlitzen. Der geringen Entfernung wegen, in welcher sich die Fische von uns befanden, konnten wir bei der oft wiederholten Bewegung der Flossen deutlich sehen, daß die inneren Seite dunkelrot, ingleichen der Bauch weiß, das übrige hingegen schwarz ist. An einem, der sich keine 200 Fuß weit vom Schiffe herumwälzte, nahmen wir viele in die Länge laufende Falten oder Runzeln auf dem Bauch wahr; diesem Kennzeichen zufolge gehörte er zu der Gattung, welche beim Nitze von Lenni Balaena Bonga heißt. Ihre Größe umgreifet, die der Länge nach nicht weniger als 10 Fuß und im Durchmesser 10 Fuß beträgt, sah man sie unweites ganz und gar aus dem Wasser springen und dann fühlen sie jedesmal mit gewaltigem Getöse zurück, so daß es uns ist bis ... " Der obere gemeinte Drachen oder Schwertwal ist Orca magellanica, Spalatti, eine Varietät von Gladius orca (Orca gladiator), der wütendste Verfolger aller Wale und Anfälliger der Sagenhaftigkeit, vor allem der kleinen Schwertwale. Paradoxa ornatissima, bekannt als ulalajo. Häufig sieht man den Tümmler, Tursio sea Delphinus Peronii, der im Zwischenhalbrit spielt und im Nähhalbrit mähen hilft, ferner den Grind, Globicephala melas, genannt ulaina, und endlich den Kurzschnabelhelphin, Lagenorhynchus Fitzroyi, nanuca ancyduna. In den mythologischen und abergläubischen Vorstellungen der Bewohner des Feuerlandes spielen gerade die Delphine[*] eine bedeutende Rolle.

Indes sind in dem Wirtschaftsleben die Pinnipedier (Pinnipedier) von einer Bedeutung, die gar nicht hoch genug veranschlagt werden kann. Denn manche hohe Gattung und Art, die sich unseren Blicken einer Anzahlung. Verwandtschaftsverein sind die Robben in dieser Beziehung nicht nur nahezustellig, sondern auch als Arten kaum minder reich vertreten, wie in den nördlichen Meeren. Überdies erfüllen die nördlichen Formen eine mitbilligere Gestalt. Zwar fehlt in den neuseeländischen Gewässern die Familie der Walrosse (Odobenidae), dafür aber stellt die der Ohrenrobben (Otariidae), sowohl wie die der Seehunde (Phocidae) mehrere Arten. Denn Seltenheit im Wasser sind diese Tiergruppen durch mächtige Fettmassen ausgezeichnet, die unter der Haut liegen und die eine glatte Abrundung des äußeren spindelförmigen Körperbaues bewirken.

Unser Pinnipedier bewirkt und erzeugt gar sehr die Fettschichten, das Fleisch und das Fett, dicke Leder dieser Pinnipedier, deshalb jagt er allen jenen Tieren, die an den Küsten seiner Heimat sich aufhalten, eifrig nach. Er kennt sie genau nach Art und Gewohnheit, nach Alter und Herkunft, mit dem Lebensgewohnheiten und natürlichen Anlagen ist er vollkommen vertraut; er schätzt die Verwertbarkeit des Felles, die Schmackhaftigkeit des Fleisches und Fettes, die Dauerhaftigkeit der Knochen dieser und jener Art mehr oder weniger, und endlich gibt er einer jeden dieser bestimmten Eigenschaften. Unterschiedslos gilt er ein jeder dieser Tiere auf die gleiche Weise an, sei es auf dem Lande, sei es auf dem Wasser. Bekanntlich sind alle Robben, von meistens in dieser Jugend, sehr zutraulich und von Natur aus neugierig. Der Jäger, der von einem Kanu aus ingend einen dieser Tiere beobachtet, vermag durch eintönigen Pfeifen, durch leises Klopfen mit einem Stockes, durch sanftes Rasseln mit Steinen, durch geschickliches Schlagen gegen die Wasseroberfläche mit dem Ruderblatte dasselbe näherhin zu sich heranzuziehen, daß er es mühelos mit Speeren oder Harpunen tödlich verwunden. Tagelang liegen einzelne Tiere und ganze Herden, sich sonnend und schlafend, auf den Felsen und Klippen herum; denn vorzugsweise der nachts gehen sie im Wasser ihrer Nahrungssuche nach. Fast und gewöhnlich erwachen sie sich auf dem Strande um und gehen allein dadurch deutlich zu erkennen, wie lustig ihnen jede Bewegung ist und wie ungern sie gestört werden wollen; schwerfällig nur verharren sie in langen Zwischenräumen ihrer Lage, um bald den Bauch und bald den Rücken, bald die eine und bald die andere Körperseite den verschiedenen Sonnenstrahlen vorzugsweise zu kehren. Nähert sich ihnen der Mensch, so entschließen sie sich meist erst im äußersten einen Dummerwerden unwillig zur Flucht.

Da, wo hinreichend bekannt ist, alle Robben sehr gewillig sind, versammeln sie sich dort an großen Herden, wo die Gegend bilbar und einsam ist, wo Störungen durch andere Wesen ihnen fast ganz unmöglich bleiben; deshalb werden sie hier eher auch von so lebhaftiger und sie schützenden Lebensweise zu bemerken, wenn menschenscheuer ein Mensch in ihre Nähe aufmarsche. ein Schutz. Die Bärenrobben haben die Gewohnheit, während die jungen Tiere gebären werden und die diese sich begatten, ununterbrochen auf dem Lande zu verweilen und auf jeweilige Nahrung gleichlich zu verzichten. Erst erste Wochen nach ihrer Geburt sind die jungen Tierchen imstande im Wasser zu gehen, so lange ernährtenen Jungen die Alten auf dem Strande; allerdrüberen erhalten sie sich nur vom eigenen Fett und magern allmählich sehr viel ab. Diese Erscheinung ist wohl auch unter dem Namen geographischer Sterben bekannt.

Merklich kleiner als die beiden genannten Ohrenrobben ist der südamerikanische Seebär, die Bärenrobbe tāpēwa (Arctocephalus australis), in dortiger Gegend als "lobo de dos pelos" bekannt. Nur selten noch läßt er sich gegenwärtig in der Nachbarschaft des Kap Hoorn sehen. Die Tiere dieser Art, einst in bedeutender Zahl, sind wegen ihres kostbaren Pelzes von Robbenjägern rücksichtslos verfolgt und sehr verringert worden. Bekanntlich bleiben sie den größten Teil des Jahres ununterbrochen auf hoher See und kommen nur anläßlich der Fortpflanzung für insgesamt vier Monate an eine Küste, wo sie jahrein, jahrein die gleiche Landungsstelle wählen, um nachher wieder in der Hochsee zu verschwinden. In nennenswerter Menge ist endlich noch die falklandische Robbe lēfkgōma (Otaria falklandica) vorhanden. Das erwachsene Tier mißt etwa 1½ m und ist auf dem Rücken gleichförmig hellgrau gefärbt."

Die östliche Elefantenrobbe hōinguma (Marrorhinus leoninus) ist eine Bauchrobbe aus der Familie der eigentlichen Seehunde. Früher war sie bis zur Isla Juan Fernández hinauf an der chilenischen Küste anzutreffen; heute sieht man sie in der Kap Hoorn-Gegend selten und weiter im Süden leben nur noch wenige Vertreter. Die Elefantenrobbe (Abb. 9) gleicht in ihrem Äußeren und in ihren Lebensgewohnheiten den anderen Robben, übertrifft sie aber weit an Körpergröße, die bei männlichen Tieren sogar 6 m,[13] bei weiblichen reichlich 3 m beträgt. Die Nase der ersteren verlängert sich zu einem kurzen, stumpfen Rüssel, daher der Name Rüsselrobbe und See-Elefant. Aus der Unterfamilie der Mönchsrobben treten dort noch die Seeleoparden pēigus (Ogmorhinus seu Leptonychotes Weddelli), ferner mokōjinzugyōmx (Ogmorhinus leptonyx) und endlich der sehr seltene alcinuma (Lobodon carcinophagus) auf. Alle drei erreichen eine mittlere Größe.[14] Damit schließt die Reihe der in jener Gegend heimischen Säugetiere ab.

[13] Wilczynski (a): 82 hat von den Lebensgewohnheiten der falklandischen Robbe, des See-Elefanten und der verwandten Arten eine ausführliche und genaue Schilderung hinterlassen. Daraus ersieht man, wie bereits zu seiner Zeit jene Tiere in ungeheuren Mengen vernichtet worden sind.

[14] Dabbene (c): 250 behauptet sogar, „que alcanzan hasta seis metros de largo". Er fügt hinzu: „Los Romanches ebefantes de mar han sido desde mucho tiempo objeto de taleprecauciones por parte de los balleneros norteamericanos, a causa del aceite que de ellos extraen, que es ahora muy difícil encontrarlos cerca de la Tierra del Fuego e islas vecinas. Se han refugiado más allá del límite de los témpanos de hielo y sólo de vez en cuando aparecen por casualidad algún ejemplar sobre las costas magellánicas." Auch Hyades (b): 1312 bestätigt, daß „quant à l'Éléphant de mer, c'est une espèce presque entièrement détruite."

Scharben, Möwen und Pinguinen wimmelt er auf einzelnen Stellen. Wenige Arten kleinerer Vögel treten in Schwärmen auf, so der Papagei und der Austernfischer, die Strandläufer und die meisten Finkenarten. Die übrigen Vertreter des Federvolkes zeigen sich in beschränkter Zahl. Flüchtig seien hier nur jene genannt, die durch ihre Anwesenheit jene Landschaft beleben und kennzeichnen.

Von den Tagraubvögeln (Raptores diurni) sieht man den mächtigen Condor oder Rabengeier ṇëṇiyáṇ (Cathartes sura), den großen Geierfalken kötlu (Polyborus tharus), den Hühnergeier ilaváṇ (Catharista atratus), den grauen Geierfalken kiginteku (Circus cinereus), den Bussard kilagila (Buteo poliosomus), den Habicht yookallg (Milvago chimango), den eleganten Falken ahimagdin (Ibycter australis), den Habicht (Accipiter chilensis) und vereinzelt den starken Bussard (Geranoaetus melanoleucus). Die Nachtraubvögel (Raptores nocturni) jener Gegend sind der große Uhu kuhárux (Bubo magellanicus), die hellfarbige Ohreule sta (Nyctalops seu Asio accipitrinus), die Tag- oder Erdeule vefutíla (Speotyto cunicularia), die gesprenkelte Nachteule hátunatëfkir' (Syrnium rufipes) und endlich der kleine Waldkauz Ëfkóiyu (Glaucidium nanum).

Sperlingsvögel und Stieglitze, Drosseln und Meisen beleben Wiese und Wald. Oft hört man den Schrei kleiner Schwärme vom grünen Papagei klnër (Microsittace ferruginous) und das Hämmern des großen Schwarzspechtes lána (Ipocrantor magellanicus), sowie das leise Klopfen des kleinen Spechtes dërëhárux (Dendrocopus lignarius). Zutraulich nähern sich die kleinen Baumläufer tëëikúina (Aphrastura spinicauda) und ëllix (Cistothorus platensis), der winzige Zaunkönig čúnux (Zonotrichia canicapilla) und der noch kleinere hulusënuwu (Troglodytes hornensis) schaut neugierig aus seinem Dickicht hervor auf den Fremden, der den stillen Wald durchschreitet. Am Rande der Bächlein fliegt der schöne Eisvogel čégetë (Ceryle torquata var. stellata) auf und hier, wo offene Fuchsiablüten sich sanft neigen, schwirrt als seltener Gast sogar ein Kolibri omóru (Sephanoides sephaniodes) vorüber. Der rothrüstige Star sëëlg (Trupiales militaris) wie auch die vielköpfigen Scharen der grüngelben Finken tyuin (Spinus seu Chrysomitris icterricus) und lukuimlág (Spinus seu Chrysomitris barbatus) bringen frische Farbe und etwas Leben in das Fleckchen Erde, auf dem sie sich niederlassen. Im hohen Grase versteckt sich die gewöhnliche Schnepfe čukág (Gallinago nobilis), die häufige Santschnepfe (Thinocorus orbignyanus) und das ihr nahestehende Rebhuhn (Attagis malouinus).

Den Strand beleben kleine Gruppen von Austernfischern nimiller' (Haematopus ater), sowie die Schwärme niedriger Wasser- und Stelzenläufer, unter die sich der kleine Haubentaucher twiána (Podiceps americanus), der Seetaucher taperdla (Podiceps calipareus) und der größere Strißfuß kuyóma (Aechmophorus major) mischt. In den Sümpfen geht der dunkelgraue Nachtreiher tlurug (Nycticorax obscurus) und der kräftige, rostbraune Brüllenibis Ilyuma (Theristicus melanopis) seiner Nahrungssuche nach.

Sehr günstig ist das ganze Gebiet für Enten, die reichlich und in verschiedenen Größen vertreten sind, aber matte Farben zeigen. Am stärksten sieht man wíyen (Anas cristata), die Dampfschiffente álukuł (Tachyeres brachypterus), dółin (Tachyeres patachonicus), mułłpu (Nettium flavirostre), wlpatax (Querquedula cyanoptera), łáwł (Querquedula versicolor) und włcabiż (Dafila spinicauda). Drei Arten von Wildgänsen kennzeichnen auffällig jene Landschaft, nämlich die Magellangans łímçu (Chloëphaga picta), die buntgefärbte Graukopfgans łárux (Chloëphaga poliocephala) und endlich die streng monogam lebende Molinasgans łółuł (Chloëphaga hybrida). Auch der Schwarzhalsschwan włoume (Cygnus melanocorypha) und der mächtige Pelikan łłkukuta (Pelicanus thagus) zeigt sich zuweilen. Dauernd schießen Möwen durch die Luft und sammeln sich raubgierig dort, wo etwas zu erhaschen ist; dichtgedrängt sitzen sie auch auf niedrigen Felsen und bedecken flächenweise den ebenen Strand. Genannt seien hier nur łiwáqu (Larus dominicanus), włmarłkipa (Larus glaucodes), die laute łółuła (Leucopheraus Scoresbyi) und die weißbäuchige Seeschwalbe łółix (Sterna hirundinacea).

In Klüften und Felsenhöhlen, die zum Meere hingewendet und den Stürmen ausgesetzt sind, nisten massenhaft die Scharben. Das Kap Hoorn-Gebiet besitzt seine eigenen Arten; am häufigsten sieht man die Haubenscharbe wúçnim (Phalacrocorax gaimardi), die schwarze Scharbe yłłex (Phal. atriceps), den magellanischen Kormoran çetex (Phal. magellanicus) und den farbenschillernden Vigunakormoran tugułłiwu (Phal. olivaceus). Auch die Pinguine sind hier zu Hause, obenan der Brillenpinguin łółła (Spheniscus magellanicus), außerdem der kleinere Felsenpinguin kełłiwu (Spheniscus Humboldti), der goldhaarige Pinguin kúlawiwu (Catarrhactes chrysocome) und der Goldschopfpinguin gerónuq (Catarrhactes chrysolophus), endlich der Riesenpinguin łaiumłnapi (Aptenodytes patagonica), der nur selten sich zeigt.

Im tosenden Unwetter tummeln sich auf der Hochsee die gewaltigen Sturmvögel und schwingen sorglos über den schaumgekrönten Wellen in majestätischer Anmut auf und nieder. Stundenlang möchte man ihrem selbstbewußten Schweben durch das Wüten der Naturgewalten zuschauen! Am bekanntesten sind die beiden großen Albatrosse gerápu (Diomedea exulans) und dółułuq (Diomedea melanophrys), sowie der kleine schwarze Albatros yłłpudółułuq. Im Wetterleuchten zeigen sich der langschwingte kóru/ (Macronectes giganteus) und der kiłółum (Phoebetria fusca) mit den Sturmtauchern tugułłiwu (Puffinus griseus) und ółóin (Pringella glacialoides) vergesellschaftet. Wütende Raubvögel der Hochsee sind wilmółu (Megalestris skua chilensis) und der gefürchtete winełkłłwu (Leucopharus antarctica). Noch viele andere, weniger charakteristische Vögel[10] sind den dortigen Eingeborenen gut bekannt und tragen auch besondere Eigennamen; doch jagt man sie nicht. Manche Arten ziehen sich im Winter nach Norden zurück, dann ist die Gegend sehr einsam und fast ganz leblos.

In den vielen und reißenden Bächen, die immer eiskaltes Wasser führen, gibt es nur wenige, kleine Fische, darunter Galaxias maculatus. Der Reichtum, den die Meeresarme bergen, ist unergründlich. Dies bestätigend schrieb Bancas: „Fish are plentyful and of many kinds, such as the trout, mullet, smelt, eels, mackerel, red hering, and many other large fish, whose names in English I do not know" (MM: III, 114; 1869). Nach Crawshay: XXVIII, „most of these Fishes are edible, but among them the Atherines (Atherinichthys), misnamed Smelts, take the first place". Für die Eingeborenen haben dichtgedrängte Heringsschwärme Illi hohe Bedeutung, die dann und wann sich auf ebene Uferflächen schieben und von einigen anderen größeren Fischarten begleitet sind. Jene Arten echter Heringe sind Clupea sprenta und Clupea pertinata. In seichten Buchten stehen zur Sommerzeit armlange Elegiana macloviana am Grunde und verschiedene kleinere Arten leben im dichten Gewirr der schwimmenden Macrocystis-Stämmchen. Außerdem finden sich Makrelen, Rochen, Schleimaale,[*] Beersen und Schellfische. Doch besteht zu Recht, „as regards Freshwater Fishes, the Antarctic region generally is poor in variety of types" (Crawshay: XXVIII). Die jene Gegend kennzeichnenden Familien sind Nototheniidae und Galaxiidae. In der Bahia Orange hat Hyades (r): 294 beobachtet, daß acht bis zehn verschiedene Arten mittelgroßer Fische im Dezember erscheinen und nach März wieder verschwinden. Diese allein haben ein schmackhafte Fleisch. Von kleinen Fischen verhältnen dort drei Arten während des ganzen Jahres, die man bei Ebbe leicht mit der Hand faßt, die aber selten gefangen werden, weil ihr Fleisch weniger gut ist.

Die Zahl der Insekten- und Spinnenarten ist verhältnismäßig gering;[*] auch die der Muschel- und Schnecken, obgleich letztere in unübersehbarer Menge auftreten. Das gilt vor allem für die Miesmuschel kwaf (Mytilus chilensis) und kyéja (Mytilus edulis), für Trochus, Fissurella, Patella, Porten, Sabo, Photinula, Valuta, Chiton, Venus, Mactra u. a. m. Die Mehrzahl der Mollusken ist dort bodenständig, sie bilden somit eine eigene malakologische Gruppe. Von den vielen Krebstieren sind die große Krabbe aplya (Lithodes antarctica) und die kleinere ayhálai (Paralomis vestrocosus) zu bekanntesten, bei ersterer beträgt der Abstand der Spitzen der vierten Beinpaares zwischen 50 cm und mehr. Endlich seien von Stachelhäutern (Echinodermen) noch die vielen Seesterne und der schmackhafte Seigel (Echinus) genannt.[] [] Bancas (k): 232 behauptet ebenfalls, daß „en la Tierra del Fuego hay relativamente pocos insectos, y los que existen no son muy numerosos. Hay que exceptuar, sin embargo, los mosquitos, que en algunas ocasiones son insoportables." Vgl. Dumont (p): 317.

[*] Die Mannschaften der "Adventure" und der "Beagle" haben eine umfangreiche Sammlung von Säugetieren, Vögeln und sonstigen Arten angelegt und nach England zur Untersuchung mitgenommen. Kerr: 329—334 veröffentlichte darüber einen "Catalogue of the more interesting Specimens of Natural History that were collected during the voyage". Vgl. auch Commerson und endlich O. Nordenskjöld: Wissenschaftliche Ergebnisse der Schwedischen Expedition nach den Magellanländern 1895—1897, Band 3; Stockholm (1902).

In mattem, blassen Farben ist die Tierwelt des südlichsten Feuerlandes gehalten, durch große Sonderformen fällt sie ebensowenig auf, und als Gesamt stellt sie sich passend hinein in die graue Beleuchtung unter dem wolkenschwer verhangenen Himmel. In das leise Rauschen und in den schwachen Wellenschlag der nimmermüden Fluten mischt sich das heisere Krächzen der Möwen und das schrille Lachen der Seeschwalben, unterbrochen vom Brüllen einiger träger Seelöwen und vom pfeifenden Heulen eines kurzen Windstoßes. Aber wenn der Sturm sich erhebt, der schaumgekrönte Wellen und schwere Unwetter tobend vor sich herstößt, dann verbirgt sich angstvollst alles Getier und nur die mächtigen Sturmvögel wiegen sich im weiten Bogen über den erregten Fluten. Auch die Menschen erschaudern unter den entfesselten Naturgewalten im Bereiche des Kap Hoorn. Selten nur grüßt in einer sternenklaren Nacht vom pechschwarzen Himmel her friedenverkündend und hoffnungsfreudig das leuchtende Kreuz des Südens.

B. Geschichte der Yamana-Forschung

Als der iberische Flottenführer Fernando de Magallanes unter unsäglichen Mühen die Ostküste des südlichen Amerika abgesucht und trotz offener und heimlicher Meuterereien seiner Mannschaft die enge Meeresstraße erreicht hatte, die heute seinen Namen ehrt, da führte ihn sein Glück auf diesem schwierigen Wasserwege vom 21. Oktober bis zum 28. November 1520 weiter bis zum Ausgange in den Stillen Ozean. Die Verbindung der beiden Weltmeere war damit eröffnet.[*] Im Februar 1570 zeigte vom Sarmiento de Gamboa erstmalig, daß man nicht minder vom Westen nach Osten die vor wenigen Jahrzehnten aufgefundene Wasserstraße überwinden könne, so gefährlich auch ihre engen und gewundenen Ufer sein mochten. Mit unsagbarer Freude hatte Europa diese hochbedeutsame Entdeckung umjubelt, durch welche sich für die Beurteilung der Erdoberflächengestalt und für den Weltverkehr ganz ungeahnte Möglichkeiten eröffneten.

Erneut wurde Europa auf die Vorteile dieser W a s s e r s t r a ß e hingewiesen, als der deutsche Seemann Gerrit Schaats im holländischen Auftrage auf einer durch seltenen Glück gebrüderten Reise in der kurzen Frist von nur neunundfünfzig Tagen, nämlich vom 28. März bis 6. Mai 1615, die mühelos durchquerte. Die jetzt wiederum aufflammenden Eifersuchtskämpfe zwischen Spaniern und Holländern waren der Anlaß dazu, daß weitere Flotten ausgesandt wurden.[] Diese waren es, die neben ihren Hauptzielen ganz anderer Art viele bislang noch dunkle Stellen im Weltbilde aufzuhellen halfen.

[] Die politischen Hintergründe dieses scharfen Gegensatzes und die nationalen Ziele der kampfgierigen verschiedenen Unternehmungen sind in S. Rosen: Geschichte des Entdeckers

Für den Süden der Neuen Welt erhielt die Vermutung eines selbständigen und zusammenhängenden Südkontinentes bald ihre endgültige Berichtigung. Bereits MAGALLANES hatten die zahlreichen Wasserarme, die im westlichen Feuerlande nach Norden und nach Süden hin sich erstrecken, ahnen lassen, daß sie unmittelbar in das sogenannte "Südmeer" einmünden. Dieser Tatbestand wurde bei DRAKE volle Überzeugung, da er glaubte, die Südwestküste und überhaupt die Südspitze des Feuerlandes erreicht zu haben, von der aus sich der offene Ozean nach Süden hin weitet. Einwandfreie Klarheit brachte wenige Jahrzehnte später, im Januar 1616, die überraschende Entdeckung durch die beiden Holländer LE MAIRE und SCHOUTEN jener von ihnen selber so benannten "Meerenge Le Maire", durch die sie bis zum südlichsten Felsen jenes Archipels vordrangen und der von ihnen den Namen "Het Kaap van Hoorn" [41] erhielt. Damit war das besondere Ziel dieser holländischen Flotte erreicht, die ausdrücklich mit der Aufgabe betraut worden war, einen anderen Verbindungsweg zwischen dem Atlantischen und dem Stillen Ozean im Süden der Magellan-Straße zu suchen. „Die neue Le Maire-Straße ist mithin, wie KOBL: 126 begründet, ebenso planmäßig und nicht zufällig aufgefunden, wie die Magellan's-Straße selbst." Durch diese Tat der Holländer wurde die Entdeckung des iberischen Flottenführers fast ganz in Schatten gestellt; denn der soeben aufgefundene Seeweg durch die Le Maire-Straße versprach größere Bequemlichkeit und höhere Entfaltungsmöglichkeit als die Magellan-Straße.

In der Folgezeit trat der Inselcharakter des Feuerlandes immer deutlicher in die Erscheinung und das offene Südmeer wurde der von den späteren Schiffahrtsunternehmungen meist bevorzugte Durchgang von einem Ozean in den anderen. Jenen beiden Holländern waren auf der gleichen Spur, auf der neuen "Via Regia", unmittelbar die beiden NODALES gefolgt, die als erster das östliche Feuerland wirklich erforscht haben (Bd. I, 26).[42] Demnach war mit dieser zweiten glücklichen Durchquerung der Le Maire-Straße ein weiterer Beweis erbracht, daß dieser neue Verbindungsweg gegenüber der Magellan-Straße tatsächlich ganz erhebliche Vorteile den Seefahrern bietet. Verständlich in Holland und in Spanien erwachte das lebhafteste Verlangen, sich diesen „so weit geöffneten Tor, das viel breiter und dabei achtzehn Mal kürzer sei, als die Magellan-Straße", ausgiebig zunutze zu machen. Schon mit der staatlichen Flotte von elf großen, bestversorgten Schiffen, der sogenann-der Entdeckungen (Berlin, 1881), S. GÜNTHER: Geschichte der Erdkunde (Leipzig 1904), A. HEIM: Die Entwicklung der Anschauung über die Erde (Potsdam 1931), und in ähnlichen Werken dargelegt.

[41] Diese Bezeichnung wählten sie, wie KOBL: 128 nach dem Urtext wiederholt, „zu Ehren der Stadt Hoorn, aus welcher Capitän Schouten und die Mehrzahl ihrer Rheder, so wie auch einige dieser Kriegsführer gebürtig waren".

[42] „Es ist überhaupt, so unglaublich es erscheint, die erste Forschungsreise längs dieser Partie des Feuerlandes, die wir sicher nachweisen können ... Noch im Jahre 1788 wünschte man in Spanien diese vielverschlungene Gestalt des Feuerlandes nach der Aufnahme Cook's" (KOBL: 126).

ten "Nassauischen Flotte" (S. 51), die bereits 1623 auslief, traten die Holländer wieder in offenen Krieg mit den Spaniern. Nacheinander folgten sich in längeren oder kürzeren Zwischenräumen Seefahrtsunternehmungen verschiedener Art, an deren Masten die Fahnen der maßgebenden europäischen Staaten flatterten. Zeit zu gewinnen auf jenem neuen Weltwege und unbehelligt den bald berüchtigten Stürmen der Kap Hoorn-Gegend zu entkommen war ihr ängstliches Sorgen in jenen südlichen Gewässern. Die Küsten und Buchten selber genau zu untersuchen lag ihnen fern: denn die Ungunst der Witterungsbedingungen riferte sie an, je eher je lieber den unheimlichen Stürmen und gefährlichen Wogen zu entrinnen. Viel weniger noch hätten sie sich dazu verstanden, der dortigen Eingeborenen wegen vor Anker zu gehen und sich bei ihnen länger aufzuhalten. Nur wenn das Unwetter sie zwang, wider Willen in einem Hafen eiligst Schutz zu suchen, trafen sich Europäer und Indianer gegenüber. Dergleichen Besuche waren also, trotz ihrer Seltenheit, jedesmal nur eine übel erzwungene Gelegenheitssache.

Erst seit einem Jahrhundert hat der Fortschritt des allgemeinen Wissens auch im Erforschen jener fernen Gegend deutlich Wandel geschaffen. Mit den Fahrten der "Adventure" und der "Beagle" begann das sachgemäße Erkunden und Untersuchen der vielverzweigten, wenig bekannten Feuerlandinseln, sowie gleichzeitig damit ihrer Bewohner.[*] Kurz darauf erschienen englische Missionare auf dem Plane, deren langjähriges Zusammensein mit den Eingeborenen die Kenntnis ihrer Sitten und Gebräuche steigerte. Als Erfolg dessen begann das wissenschaftliche Bemühen weiterer Kreise Europas um die kulturelle Eigenart der Feuerländer, häufiger besuchten von jetzt an ausländische Schiffe den Kap Hoorn-Archipel mit handelspolitischen Absichten und als die Grenzregelung zwischen Argentinien und Chile zustandegekommen war, wurde auch ein mehr oder weniger regelmäßiger Verkehr mit den inzwischen dort angesiedelten Weißen eingerichtet. Parallel zu dieser aufsteigenden Entwicklung der Verkehrsverbindungen mit dem äußersten Süden und zum Besitzergreifen aller verwertbaren Naturgüter durch die Weißen läuft der beklagenswerte Niedergang und die unaufhaltsame Verminderung der Zahl der Eingeborenen, so daß merkwürdigerweise mit dem erreichten Beherrschen des Kap Hoorn-Archipels durch die Fremden auch der Untergang der einheimischen Bevölkerung vollendet erscheint.

Aufgabe dieser Zeilen kann es nicht sein, die Geschichte der Entdeckungs- und Aufklärungsfahrten durch den Süden Amerikas zu wiederholen, mögen einzelne derselben sich auch noch so bedeutungsvoll und außerhalbgewöhnlich her-zusammenstellen. Vielmehr werden aus der älteren Zeit nur jene Reisebeschreibungen und Tagebücher herausgegriffen, die kürzere oder längere Mitteilungen über die Eingeborenen enthalten. Im Anschluß an jene Quellenzusammenfassungen werden einige kritische Bemerkungen über die Reisen der neuzeitlichen Forscher, die das feuerländische Inselreich aufgesucht haben, eingeflogt.

a. Berichte aus älterer Zeit

Einem glücklichen Zufall ist es zu danken, daß L'Hermite, dessen Flotte als erste den Seeweg durch die Le Maire-Straße rund um das Kap Horn in den Stillen Ozean eröffnet hat, gleichzeitig damit als erster Europäer die Bekanntschaft mit den dort beheimateten Yamana machen konnte. Ihm sind andere kühne Seehelden durch jenen offenen Verbindungsgang zweier Weltmeere gefolgt, die sich noch viel weiter in den einigen Süden vorgewagt haben. Was sie anstrebten waren in erster Linie handelspolitische Ziele, denen die geographische Forschung und die Erweiterung oder Bereicherung des Kartenbildes untergeordnet blieb. Weder die Ländereien noch deren Bewohner boten ihnen nennenswerte Vorteile, weswegen sie diesen sowohl wie jenen schnell wieder den Rücken kehrten, um in den sturmbewegten Gewässern ihre Fahrzeuge nicht zu gefährden. Unmöglich konnten sie von vornherein eine Landung in dem Wirrwarr unbekannter oder unsicher bestimmter Ufer an vielen Inseln und Eilande, die von Winden und Wogen dauernd gepeitscht werden, auf ihren Reiseplan setzen; vor der Übermacht rasender Naturgewalten fliehend, suchten sie notgedrungen Schutz in stillen Buchten und in sicheren Häfen des feuerländischen Archipels.

An derglichen Stellen war es, wo ihnen gelegentlich einzelne oder mehrere Eingeborene unter die Augen traten, deren ungewöhnlichen Benehmen sie befremdete. Erst später, nämlich mit Knox und Fitz-Roy, werden auch die Indianer selber zum besonderen Gegenstande eingehender Beobachtung gemacht. Seither fällt in England und bald danach im übrigen Europa der Gedanke festen Fuß und wurde der Wunsch zur Tat, jenen rückständigen Menschen die Vorteile einer christlichen Zivilisation zugänglich zu machen.

Kein einziger jener Männer, die gewissenhaft das Tagebuch ihrer schwierigen Segelfahrt führten, konnte und wollte sich um eine zeitgemäße, gründliche Beschreibung der Eingeborenen bemühen. Das war auch gar nicht anders zu erwarten. Sie nahmen eben ihre wenigen diesbezüglichen Beobachtungen als Erlebnisse und Erfahrungen im gleichen Sinne auf, wie jene über die fremdartige Tierwelt oder über die außergewöhnlichen Naturerscheinungen. Obwohl ihren Schilderungen ganz offensichtlich System und Methode abgeht, hatten sie dennoch einen unschätzbaren Vorzug, nämlich den einer naturwahren Genauigkeit. Eine außerordentlich schwierige Beobachtungsgabe war das natürliche Eintrittsgeld, mit dem diese wetterfesten Männer bedacht waren. Daher erweisen sich so viele ihrer Mitteilungen als unerschöpfbar bedeutsig. Was im besonderen ihre völkerkundlichen Aufzeichnungen anbelangt, so fehlte von vornherein jeder Anlaß, die Beurteilung der Eingeborenen sowie deren Sitten und Einrichtungen zu fälschen und zu färben oder auch irgendwelcher Richtung hin zu übertreiben. Der gewaltige Eindruck und die unerwartete Überraschung, die unbekannte Körperform, bizarre Bemalung, allgemeine Aufregung und unsagbare klingende Sprache der Indianer ihnen vorzauberten, waren so mächtig und wirkten, daß sie wie zwangsweise die Feder bei der Niederschrift über die Grenzen des wirklich Erschauten nicht hinausgleiten ließen. Mit der handschriftlichen Wiedergabe der Erlebnisse war es sich so viel Neues, Überraschendes und Ungewohntes freigelegt, daß ein Wunsch zu Ergänzungen und Übertreibungen, herzustammen aus dem Reiche der blauen, lebensuneuchten Phantasie, keine leise sich regte. Allerdings knüpften die Seeleute an die von ihnen erschaute, sehr lebensnahe Wirklichkeit gar manche Erwägungen und Schlußfolgerungen an, die immer auf Vergleiche mit europäischen Verhältnissen hinausliefen. Derjenigen Erweiterungen und Anwendungen jedoch lassen sich auf den ersten Blick von all dem trennen, was als unverfälschter, echter Eigenheit der Indianer dargestellt wurde.

Was den Mitteilungen der übrigen Seefahrer über ihre Erlebnisse mit den feuerländischen Eingeborenen ein ungewöhnliches Gepräge verleiht, ist die herzhafte, derbe, unverhüllte Offenheit ihrer Ausdrucksweise, verbunden mit kaum geschätzter Bestimmtheit. Wetterzerpeitschte Seeleute sind immer karg in Worten und da ihr Zusammensein mit den Indianern sich meistens auf nur wenige Stunden beschränkte, deshalb sind ihre Aufzeichnungen regelmäßig sehr kurz ausgefallen, so sehr wir heute das bedauern. Mit dem, was sie erzählenden, hielten sie sich an das Äußerliche, an das Sinnfällige. In unbeschränktem gedankenlosem Verkehr fehlte es hüben wie drüben an der Kenntnis der Sprachen und mit Zeichen allein konnen sich seelische Empfindungen, religiöse Anschauungen und mythologische Vorstellungen nicht ergründen. Aufklärungen um diesen Gebiete würde man vergeblich in jenen übrigen Reisewerken suchen. Um so wertvoller aber sind die genauen Angaben über das weit entwickelteste Bestehen jener einheimischen Gerätschaften und Einrichtungen, die sich in der Folgezeit ganz verloren haben, oder die abgeändert worden sind, oder die verschwunden bis in die Gegenwart hinein sich erhalten konnten. Eben dadurch werden jene Aufzeichnungen zu ethnologischen Fundgruben von außerordentlichem Werte. Sie belehren uns, wie nicht anders zu erwarten, das überwiegend Ungewöhnliche in Körperform und Kleidung, in Wohnung und Ernährungsweise, in geographischem Bereich und das besonders Auffällige im Ausdruck ihrer Gefühle während der Anwesenheit der Fremden.

Nachweislich fehlte es damals noch an jeder Beeinflussung durch Europäer und europäische Kulturgüter. Das Lebensbild, wie es in jenen Darstellungen gezeichnet wird, bewahrt demnach in unverfälschter Ursprünglichkeit auf. Um den Eindruck des Unmittelbaren, der die ihnen Bereiter

In dieser Einführung ist das Anschließende enthalten, was die Kritik von der Beurteilung und Wertung der Aufzeichnungen jener Reisen lediglich fordert und erwartet. Nur so weit sie Nachrichten über den Verkehr der Tamaroa mit den Weißen, über deren Einrichtungen und Lebensweise enthalten, werden sie herangezogen.[*] Im Verlaufe der weiteren Ausführungen verweise ich nur gelegentlich auf bestimmte Einzelheiten aus diesen alten Quellen, die ja als Gemeinguut für sich allein sprechen und so sich von selbst Worte sind.

JOHANNES van WALBEECK: Im Verfolgerzeit zur Ausnützung der kürzlich entdeckten Magellan-Straße, in der bewußten Absicht, die Vormacht über das "Mar del Sur" zu erringen, folgten auf die schon den Spaniern bereits entgegenwesenen Engländer auch bald die Holländer. Der bemerkenswerte Nebenzweck waren die "Gewürzinseln", die sie auf dem Seewege westlicher Richtung schneller und sicherer zu erreichen hofften. Mehrere Schiffe wurden ausgerüstet und verfolgten nacheinander die heimatlichen Häfen; die Flotte waren zuerst Sawan de Weer und Simon de Cordes im Jahre 1598, dann Jacob van Swanenburg im Jahre 1601 und gleich darauf auch Le Maire und de Sweerte im Jahre 1615 (S. 1).[*] Dieses folgte Jacques L'Hermite im Jahre 1623, vor allem um die neuentdeckte Le Maire-Straße für die Holländer wirtschaftlich auszunützen. Dieses kühne Flottenführer war es beschieden, als erster Europäer mit dem Stamme der Tamaroa bekannt zu werden und die ersten Mitteilungen über sie in seine europäische Heimat zu bringen. Sehr bald wurde im Zusammenhange mit diesen schlimmen Neuigkeiten sogar eine Zeichnung von jenen Eingeborenen, ihren eindrücken Menschen verfertigt (Abb. 10).

Die Beschreibung der Eingeborenen und deren Gebrauchsgegenstände aus erster und ältester Quelle ist unbestreitbar von größter Bedeutung.[*] Dieselben erscheinen so völlig gleichgültig, welchem Teilstamme an jener Entdeckungsfahrt der gute Bericht zu danken ist. Wahrscheinlich hat Wuamoa den Tag-

Ein Mitglied dieser "Nassauischen Flotte" war der Offizier der Landschiffsmen Armand Duzan, der, von jeuem [illegible], einige eigene Beobachtungen niederzuschreiben pflegte. Unter Führung des kundigen Piloten Vicente Jonas, der schon unter den beiden Narvaez gegen Gegenden kennen gelernt hatte, ging die "Nassauische Flotte" im Februar 1820 am Südufer der Isla Navarino, wahrscheinlich in deren indianischen Tribe, nämlich in der heute als Bahia Nassau bekannten großen Einbuchtung, vor Anker. Dazuzu schreibt: „Als die Matrosen Wasser holten, kamen Wilde an diesen, die sie durch Gebärden sehr freundschaftlich anredeten. Gleich darauf entstand ein so heftiger Sturm, daß 19 Mann von uns an Land blieben mußten, indem sie nicht wieder zu ihren Chaloupen kommen konnten. Den folgenden Tag fand man von diesen 19 Mann nur noch zweien ein Leben. Die Wilden waren gegen Abend gekommen und hatten 17 mit ihren Schleudern und Keulen getödtet, welchen Tod jene leicht gefallen war, weil die Unsrigen kein Gewehr bey sich hatten. Indessen hatte keiner von ihnen diesen Barbaren die geringste Beleidigung angethan. Man fand an dem Ufer nur 3 Todte, vermutet sich auch der oberste Steuermann und zween Schiffbrüchige befunden. Diese hatte man in vier Theile zerschnitten, und jener war auf eine unmenschlichste hin geschlachtet worden. Die übrigen hatten die Wilden schon fortgeschleppt, als wir kamen. Man erkletterte nun bei dem keiner Chaloupe [illegible], wenn sich nicht in jeder 8 bis 10 Mann zur Vertheidigung befunden; es war zu spät, denn dieses wilde Volk ließ sich nicht weiter sehen ... Der Vicecadmiral kam an die Küste in derjenigen Gegend, wo man in einer anderen

In der hier angeschlossenen Beschreibung fehlt Dereux all seine Beobachtungen zusammen. Man ersieht daraus, daß er Eingeborenen an mehreren Stellen begegnet sein muß und auf gewisse örtliche Unterschiede, die er gewissenhaft unterstreicht, aufmerksam geworden ist.

„Die Einwohner dieses Landes sind so weiß, als die Europäer, so wie wir an einem jungen Kinde sehen. Allein sie reiben sich den Leib mit einer rothen Farbe, und malen sich mit verschiedenen anderen Farben und auf mannichfaltige Art. Einige haben das Gesicht, die Arme, Hände, Schenkel und andere Glieder roth und den Ueberrest des Leibes weiß gemalet, allein aber mit Punkten von anderen Farben gefleckt. Andere sind halbroth, oder ganz roth auf der einen Seite und ganz weiß auf der andern; mit einem Worte, jeder malet sich nach seinem Gefallen. Sie sind stark und wohlgebaut, und überhaupt mit den Europäern fast von einer Größe. Sie haben schwarze dicke und lange Haare, welche ihnen ein fürchterliches Ansehen geben; ihre Zähne sind so scharf, als die Schneide eines Messers. Die Männer gehen ganz nackend, allein die Weiber bedecken ihre natürlichen Theile mit einem Stücke Leder. Sie sind wie die Männer gemalet, und tragen um den Hals, Halsbänder von Muschel- oder Schneckenschalen. Einige haben eine Haut von Seehunden auf den Schultern, die sie aber nicht sehr wider die Kälte, die hier sehr heftig ist erhitzen kann, daher es zu verwundern ist, wie sie solcher ertragen können. Ihre Häuser, oder vielmehr ihre Hütten sind von Bäumen verfertiget, unten rund, und endigen sich oben, wie die Gewölbe, fast in eine Spitze,[11] worin sich eine kleine Oefnung befindet, um den Rauch durchzulassen. Sie sind inwendig 2 oder 3 Fuß tief in die Erde gegraben, von Außen aber mit Erde überzogen. Alles Hausgeräthe in diesen Hütten besteht in einigen Körben von Binsen, worin sich die Werkzeuge befinden, deren sie sich zum Fischfang bedienen, nehmlich Seile und Angeln, welche letztern aus Stein sehr künstlich und fast wie die Unsrigen verfertiget sind; sie hängen Muschelig daran,[12] und bekommen auf diese Art so viele Fische, als sie nur wollen. Sie sind auf verschiedene Art bewaffnet; einige haben Bogen und Pfeile, an deren Ende sich steinerne und sehr künstlich gearbeitete Spitzen befinden; andere bedienen sich langer Wurfspieße mit einem scharfen Knochen an der Spitze, der mit Hakeln versehen ist, damit er desto besser in dem Fleische halte; auch andere haben Keulen, Schleuder und sehr scharfe Messer von Stein. Sie gehen niemals ohne ihre Waffen, weil sie, so viel wir erfahren konnten, beständig mit einem anderen Volk in Krieg verwickelt sind, welches einige Meilen von ihrem Lande in Osten von Gueron und auch der Insel Tierhaltera zu wohnen. Dieses Volk ist ganz schwarz gemahlet, so wie dasjenige, welches an der Bay Schapenham wohnet. Die Einwohner der Windhundbay aber gehen fast ganz nach...

Ihre Canots sind sehr sonderbar. Sie schälen einen der grössten Bäume aller Rinde ab, und krümmen solche so gewichtig, daß sie die Gestalt der venetianischen Gondeln bekommen. Zu dem Ende legen sie die Rinde auf ein gewisses Holz, fest an, wie man in Holland die Schiffe auf dem Zimmerplatz legt. Wenn sie die gehörige Gestalt bekommen, bestreichen sie solche inwendig von einem Ende zum andern, mit Querhölzern, solche fest zu halten, und bedecken diese Hölzer mit einer andern Rinde, verunitzlirt deren das Fahrzeug dicht, und für dem Wasser sicher wird. Diese Canots sind 10 bis 16 Fus lang, und fast 2 Fus breit; sie können 7 bis 8 Mann fassen, ohne daß man an den Seiten einen Vorsprung nöthig habe, wobey sie denn so geschwinde gehen, als eine Chaloupe mit Ruderen.

Was ihre übrigen Sitten und Gewohnheit betrifft, so sind diese Leute den Thieren ähnlicher, als den Menschen. Denn anfänglich, daß sie die Menschen verzehren und das Fleisch derselben roh und blutig essen, so bemerket man bey ihnen nicht den geringsten Funken der Religion oder Furcht. Im Gegentheil leben sie wie das Vieh; wenn sie sich bey einander befinden, und genötheiget hat, ein Wasser abzuschlagen, lassen sie solches einander auf den Leib, wenn sich nicht dasjenige, der in der Nähe ist, aus dem Wege macht. Sie lessen die Wurzeln der Farnpäer nicht, und können sich, wenn sie einen Spiel oder eine Pfeife sehen, nicht einbilden, daß man damit verwandte Töne, dahero sie auch kein Bedenken tragen, die Klinge einer Säbels in die Hand zu nehmen; indessen bestehen sie Geschicklichkeit genug, beschaft, lustig und munter zu seyn. Sie erbrechen gegen die Fremden freundschaftlich, machen aber zu gleicher Zeit nur Gebärden sie zu überfallen, sie anzupfeifen und zu verwundern so wie sie es in Anmahnung der 17 Matrosen von ihrem unsere Schiffe machten. Mit einem Worte dasjenigen, welcher Lustig in die Bay Nassau einlaufen wollen, können sicher hoffen, Wasser, Holz und Fische daselbst zu finden; wie aber haben auch der Bay Schapenham zu, welche Vieh auch Fische anzeiffen können, und weiter nichts als viele Menschen gewahren. Vor allen Dingen muß man sich hüten, daß man den Wilden nicht trauen, so gut sie sich auch stellen, man muß immer im Gewehr seyn, und sich um Vieh zu bekommen, nicht tief in das Land wagen, wo, wie wir wissen, es Vieh, und andere Erfrischungen giebt; denn diese Verhängen und die Mannsgröße, die man zu denen Beleidigung nehmen könte, würden sehr unglücklich ausschlagen. Wegen wirrhaftlichen, daß es in dem Frauenhande Vieh[*] gehen mögen, ist dieses, weil wir an verschiedenen Grade Tüchtigkeit und Gebrauchsamkeit gemacht haben. Uebrigens berichtete ein Soldat, als die Jacht vor Gaeten [Canal de Gaeta] vor Anker lag, und derselbe ein wenig im Land hinein gegangen war, dem Vorgesetzten, daß er vielen Vieh auf einer Wiese weiden gesehen."

So sehr jedenfalls die Ausführlichkeit dieses Bericht über die Tonerde begrüßt, so wird er trotzdem nicht minder den verhängnisvollen Anfang dieses ersten Zusammenstoßes mit Europäern beklagen. Die Vorgänge werden sehr unmöglich geschildert und somit erscheint es unsicher, die Ursachen oder Anlässe der Erscheinung von eisbemalter Matrosen heute noch klarlegen zu wollen. So viel jedoch ist wohl sicher, daß man nicht gezwungen ist, mit Dennis auf Menschenfresserei zu schließen.

Der Wert dieser ersten Mitteilung über die südlichsten Bewohner der Erde wird außerordentlich durch das eingefügte Bild (Abb. 18) gesteigert. Offensichtlich lebt dieser Zeichnung die merkwürdige Gesinnung einer Photographie; demnach versteht sie an viel Naturwahrheit im allgemeinen und gestattet einen einheitlichen Blick in den gegenständlichen Besitz der Eingeborenen, daß sie als bedeutsamer kulturgeschichtlicher Erkenntnis um weit zurückliegender Zeit je länger je mehr geschätzt werden wird. Dem Texte ist vorzüglich die um nahezu Stücken zusammengestellte Gesamtes zu entnehmen."

Außerdem sind wichtige geographische Entdeckungen dieser "Nassauischen Flotte" zu danken. Die zusammenfassenden bei Kern: 145 zusammengestellt: „Bei der Untersuchung der Nassau-Bai bemerkte L'Hermite auch, daß das Cap Hoorn, welches Sarmiento und La Maire als einen continentalen Theil und Ausläufer des großen Feuerlandes dargestellt hatten, nur einer kleinen Inselgruppe angehöre, die man von nun an nach dem Entdecker 'die L'Hermite-Inseln' nannte, welchen Namen sie noch tragen. Es wurden auch noch einige andere neue Buchten und Häfen des Feuerlandes gefunden und benannt. So die 'Wachtel-Bay' (nach einem Schiffe der Flotte 'de Wachtel' genannt), der Canal 'Goeree Road', die 'Schagenhoeve's-Bay' (an Ehren des Vice-Admirals der Flotte Schagenhoeve so genannt), deren holländische Namen man bedauern an die Expedition L'Hermite's, welcher mehr nur Kenntnis der Geographie des Südens, des Feuerlandes beigetragen hat, als irgend einer anderen Entdeckungsreise, noch jetzt auf den englischen Admiralitäts-Karten figurieren." Als Ergänzung dieses Bildes ist noch das maßgebende Urteil James Brooke's: III, 10 am: „The mathematician J. Van Wassenaer, made a chart of 'Nassau le Maire' and of the NE part of the 'Terra del Fuego', which is here copied from the 'Journal'. It furnishes the most authentic geography, we have of Nassau Bay, and of the land within Cape Horn, and bears the marks of having been done with much care and examination."

nicht mehr begegnet. Schließlich verließen er den heimatlichen Hafen am 1. Juni 1771.

Bereits ein Jahr später, am 13. Juli 1772, mag er an einer zweiten Weltumsegelung teil und führte nun die beiden Naturforscher Joseph Banks und Daniel Solander als wissenschaftliche Arbeiter mit. Drei südlichen Amerika näherte sich die Flotte diesmal von Neu Seeland kommend, und zwar den Inseln am Westausgange der Magellan-Straße. Das beschwerliche Unkosterbrauen in den Wärmungsverhältnissen dieser unbewohnten Gegend mußten die neuen Reisenden bald erfahren. Sie erblickten, wie Hermann Forster schreibt, „am 13. [Dezember 1774], nicht lange nach Mitternacht, Land. Es war die Gegend um den Cap Deseado ... Dreyzehn Tell von Amerika, den wir jetzt vor uns hatten, sah höchst traurig aus! Gegen drey Uhr Morgens Sahen wir dicht an die Küste heran, die unbewegbarlich in dickem Nebel gehüllt war ... Um eilf Uhr kamen wir an einer weit in See ragenden Landspitze vorüber, die Capitain Cook Cap Gloucester benannte ...“ Beim Cap Noir, „dieses bloßer Name, seit Anson's Zeiten, allen Seefahrern eine Schreckens geworden ist, hatten wir die heftigsten Stürme, nicht aber eine so milde Witterung erwartet. Drei mehr Leute an uns, verursachte eine ganz entgegengesetzte Erfahrung, gewiß Wahn ein Ende machen zu können“ (Georg Forster [a]: II, 369). Nahe dem York Minster-Felsen, auf der Isla Waterman südlich der Bahia Good, gingen sie „nach einer einunddreyßigtägigen Fahrt, auf welcher wir von Neuseeland bis zum Cap Deseado, so schnell als glücklich quer über das ganze Südmeer weggesegelt waren, zum erstenmale wieder vor Anker“ (ib. II, 372). Hier verließ die Flotte etwa eine Woche. Die beiden Forster widmeten sich der Beobachtung der dortigen Tierwelt und haben davon sehr reichhaltige, ausführliche Schilderungen niedergelegt. Die Mannschaft feierte hier auch das Weihnachtsfest und „diese Bahia, den wir jetzt verließen, ward der Name Christmas Sound (Weihnachtsbuchten) beigelegt“ (ib. II, 380). Am 28. Dezember 1774 wurden die Anker gelichtet und die Flotte nahm Richtung auf das Kap Horn. Bald ließ sie die Isla Diablesses rechts, umsegelte die südlichste Felsenspitze und verriehte am nächsten Tage, am 29. Dezember, abermals die Bahia Buen Suceso (Bd. I, 15).

Während einer kurzen Ankerstatt bei Isla Waterman hatte die Besatzung nur zweimal Gelegenheit, wenige Eingeborene,[1] denen Cook das Wort "Feuerholz" aus dem Munde kam, zu sehen. An einer analogen Stelle im Heimatgebiete der Yaruma Nahua sie sich nicht aufgehalten. Kapitän Cook, dessen ausführliche Logbuchaufzeichnungen (s. über die zeitgenössischen Verhältnisse des südlichen Feuerlandes ein neues helles Licht werfen, schildert die Indianer mit den Worten Hermann Forster's. Dadurch habe auch ich mich

an die Mitteilungen dieses unvollständigen Naturforschers; er hat sie seinem eigenen unfehlbaren Bericht* gelegentlich eingefügt, die wir hier später als Grundlagen in deutscher Sprache verfassen soll. Was ich davon hier wiedergegeben wiederholte, bezieht sich auf die Isle Waterman und deren allernächste Umgebung. Gennes Fenerua (s): II, 174 weist hin auf eine „Art von Wildnis unter denen Schatten etliche unbewohnte Hütten standen. Die Beschreibung und Abbildung einer solchen Hütte, welche in der gedrucktem Nachricht von Capitain Cook's zweiter Reise um die Welt befindlich ist, gefällt vollkommen auf diese Ansicht, nur mit dem Unterschied, daß die Hütten hier nicht mit Beschmidelfiber bedeckt waren. Vielleicht wird diese Deckung auch nicht allzeit gebraucht, oder, je nachdem die Wilden dieses Wohnsitz verlegen, als ein unwichtiger Teil der Wohnung überall mitgenommen. Hier war blos das Gerüppe der Hütten vorhanden, und das bestand aus etlichen Zweigen, die gottbewahrt nach grüner Hütten hatten, mithin nur höchstens von so diesem Behelf mehrere angewandt worden wie ....“

Während ein kleiner Teil der Mannschaft den einbeiligegrabenen Wasserwan durchfuhr, um das Innere zu lernen, „hatten sich einige Eingeborene in eine kleinere Canoe beim Schiffe gewagt. Sie wurden von ihr abwärts, sowie, ohne besondere Geschicklichkeit bemerkbar, die dort Speere, Beschmidelfiber u. dgl. freiwillig und unentgeltlich weggegeben. Es ist uns bekannt, daß wir sie nicht gerufen hatten, durch ward dem Schiffer bald abgeschlossen, denn um Edgeradere Mangel hatten sie, den Regeln angewiesen, wieder. Neue Canoes waren nun Bemerkbar vorhanden, welche, der Gefahr nach zu verhüten, wohl schwerlich in diesem Hafen gewachsen wie konnten. Einige kleine Insulaner dieses neuen Rippen, um die Hände in der Hütte, oder da wo der größter Bauch des Paleuragen ist, anzuschlagen, den Bord machte auf jeder Seite ein langer Bambus aus, über den die Hände herausgeschlagen und hingeschlagen war. Mitten im Canot lagen etliche Steine neben einem Haufen Erde und konnten unterschiedene die Wilden beständig ein Feuer.“ Dies war auch insofern nötig, weil sie durch allmählichen Rudern sich eben nicht zu erwärmen vorhatten. Die Ruder waren nur klein und schlecht geschnitzt. In jedem Canot waren Graf im ein Pomaren, Kinder mit eingerechnet, allein, ohne daß alle andere Nationen in den Häfen gewei-Ihre Körperpartie und Kleidung indem sich Pneumon (ca. 11, 302 wohl deshalb so unähnlich, weil ihre die unerhörtlicher Umschreibung der Namen von den Nidenchinesen in die Augen fiel. „Sie waren von kurzer Statur, keiner über 5 Fuß 6 Zoll (englischen Maßes) lang, hatten dicke gerade Köpfe, breite Gesichter, sehr platte Nasen und die Backenknochen unter den Augen sehr hervorragend, die Augen selbst waren von besonderer Farbe, ohne Licht und matt, das Haar schwarz, ganz gerade, mit Thran eingerieben und lang, hart wild und rottig um den Kopf. Anstatt des Bartes standen einige einzelne Haarre auf dem Kinn, und von der Nase bis in das Mähnlein, wie oftmal Mal war ein beständig Blutrauber Canal vorhanden. Diese Dinge machten zusammen genommen das vollständigste und erbärmlichste Bild von dem tiefen Elend aus, welche dies unglückliche Geschlecht von Menschen dahinlebte. Ihre Hautfarbe hat von jener dieser Physiognomien eine sehr eigenartige, charakteristische Zeichnung verliehen. Schultern und Brust waren breit und stark gebaut, der Unterleib des Körpers aber so mager und eingeschrumpft, daß man sich kaum vorstellen konnte, er gehöre zum ebenen. Die Beine waren dünn und krumm und die Knie viel zu stark. Die einzigen etwaigen Kleidungsstücke bestand in einem alten blauen Seehundfell, welches vermittels einer Schnur um den Hals befestigt war. Ihrigeren gingen sie ganz unbekleidet, aber auf dem, was Anständigkeit und Sittlichkeit bei uns fordern würden, die geringste Rücksicht zu nehmen. Ihre Lebensalter war allerdings mit einem kupferfarbigen Glanze und bei manchen auch durch aufgeregtere Stellen von rothem oder weißem Ocker erhöhet. Es scheint folglich, daß die Begriffe von Schmuck und Zierath über und vielgenommen bei uns sind, als die von Reinlichkeit und Schamhaftigkeit. Die Weiber waren beinahe wie die Männer gestaltet, nur etwas kleiner, den Gesichtszügen nach nicht minder häßlich und wildig (1686, 11).

Einige wenige hatten jedoch außer dem Felle, welches die Schultern bedeckte, noch einen kleinen Lappen, kaum eine Hand groß, vom am Schamhaarbehängen, der vermittels einer Schnur um die Hüften befestigt war. Die

Ihre gesamtes Wissenschaft war so unmöglich, sich diesen Eingeborenen durch die Sprache verständlich zu machen.[8] Doch ergab die Einfachheit ihrer Lebensweise unsere Naturforscher zu lerninhaltlichen Betrachtungen an, die trotzdem die heidnischen Gedankengänge jener Zeit durch das Reich der Natur-völker wiedergegeben.[9] Diese allen werden schließlich die Beobachtungen über die Lebensbahnung der Yaraana ausgeschlossen.

Vielleicht ist es Instinct, der ihnen dies ranzige Fett verzehren heißt, denn alle in kalten Erdstrichen wohnende Völker sollen es für Leckerbissen halten und dadurch in Stand gesetzt werden, die Kälte besser zu ertragen. Die natürliche Folge einer solchen Nahrung war ein unerträglicher fauler Gestank, der aus ihrem ganzen Körper ausdunstete und sich allem, was sie nur an und um sich führten, mitgetheilt hatte. Dieser Gestank war uns dermaßen zuwider, daß wirs unmöglich lange bei ihnen aushalten konnten. Mit geschlossenen Augen konnte man sie bereits in der Ferne wittern. Wer die Seeleute und ihre sonst eben nicht ekle Begierden kennt, wird kaum glauben, was doch wirklich geschah, nämlich, daß es ihnen, dieser unerträglichen Ausdünstung wegen, gar nicht einmal einfiel, mit dem sauberen Frauenzimmer genauere Bekanntschaft zu machen. Die Matrosen gaben ihnen Pökelfleisch und verschimmelten Zwieback; sie machten sich aber nichts daraus und konnten kaum dahingebracht werden, es zu kosten. Wir bemerkten unter ihnen nicht den mindesten Unterschied des Standes, weder Oberherrschaft noch Abhängigkeit. Sie irren, der Nahrung wegen, aus einer Bucht in die andre..."

Am 27. Dezember 1774, am Tage vor der Ausfahrt der Flotte aus dem Paso Christmas, kamen die nämlichen Eingeborenen „wieder zu Bord, doch hielten sie sich nicht lange auf, weil wir ihres unleidlichen Gestanks wegen uns nichts mit ihnen zu schaffen machten. Sie riefen ihr Losungswort Pesserüh manchmal mit einer so kläglichen Stimme und so gedehnt aus, daß wir glaubten, sie wollten damit betteln; wenn wir sie aber darauf ansahen, so war in ihren Mienen nicht die geringste Bestätigung dieser Vermutung, nichts begehrendes, nichts als das unbedeutende Angaffen der tiefsten Dummheit überzeugt zu werden, daß wir bei unserer gänzlichen Verfassung unendlich glücklicher sind. So lange man nicht beweisen kann, daß ein Mensch, der von der Strenge der Witterung beständig unangenehme Empfindung hat, dennoch glücklich sei, so lange werde ich keinem noch so beredten Philosophen beipflichten, der das Gegentheil behauptet, weil er entweder die menschliche Natur nicht unter allen ihren Gestalten beobachtet, oder wenigstens das, was er gesehen, nicht auch gefühlt hat. Möchte das Bewußtsein des großen Vorzugs, den uns der Besitzer von so vielen unserer Mitmenschen verliehen, nur immer zu Verbesserung der Sitten und zur strengern Ausübung unserer moralischen Pflichten angewandt werden; aber leider ist das der Fall nicht, unsre civilisierten Nationen sind vielmehr mit Lasten beflecht, deren sich selbst der Elende, der unmittelbar an das unvernünftige Thier grenzt, nicht schuldig macht. Welche Schande, daß der höhere Grad von Kenntnissen und von Beurtheilungskraft bei uns nicht bessere Folgen hervorgebracht hat!"

ausgedrückt"... In eben diesem Sinne ist auch das Schlußwort gehalten, in das GEORG FORSTER (a): 455 einen Vergleich der Feuerländer mit andern Naturvölkern[*] zusammenfaßt. Er sagt: In jenem „Winkel der Erde hatten wir nicht ohne Mitleid die armseligen Wilden vom Tierra del Fuego gesehen; halb verhungert, betäubt und gedankenlos unfähig sich gegen die Rauhigkeit der Witterung zu schützen und zur niedrigsten Stufe der menschlichen Natur bis zu die Grenzen der unvernünftigen Thiere herabgewürdigt".

RAYMOND FORSTER hat sich einmal (in GEORG FORSTER [b]: 261) zu dem unwandelbaren Behaften der Yamana auf ihren einfachen, altbergebrachten Gerätschaften folgendermaßen geäußert: „Auffallend war es mir, daß dieses blödsinnige Volk, den Vorrath des schönsten Baukolzes, der in der dortigen Gegend angetroffen wird, nicht besser benutzt, und bessere Häuser und Kähne daraus verfertigt. Man möchte vielleicht einwenden, sie wissen das Holz nicht zu zerschneiden und zu einem Behuf zu verarbeiten, es fehlt ihnen an Werkzeugen u. s. f.; allein dies ist nicht der Fall, sie können allerdings das Holz bearbeiten, denn die Stangen, wozu sie ihre knöchernen Muschelhaken befestigen, sind zehn bis zwölf Schuhe lang, ganz gerade, glatt und achteckig. Eben so sehr muß man sich wundern, daß sie bey einem Vorrath von Robben-, Fuchs- und Guanacofellen, an welche sie doch hin und wieder lederne Riemen genähet hatten, sie darauf verfallen sind, zu ihrer eignen Bequemlichkeit noch einen Schritt mehr zu tun, und die Felle dergestalt zur Kleidung zuzuschneiden und zusammenzunähen, daß sie dadurch gegen die Strenge der Witterung vollkommen geschützt würden. Nichts stellt uns ihren tiefen Verfall so lebhaft vor Augen, als diese mit Blödsinn vergesellschaftete Unbehulfenheit. Es ist wahr, eben diese Eigenschaften machen sie gleichgültig und unempfindlich gegen ihr Elend; allein schwerlich ist es bloß angeborene Indolenz und Gleichgültigkeit, die sie zu einer genärblichen Lebensart unfähig macht; sondern man muß vielmehr aus allem obigen schließen, daß sie die unglücklichen Opfer der Rache oder des Uebermuths ihrer stärkeren Nachbarn geworden, und von denselben hieher, in die unfreundlichste Gegend von Südamerika, vertrieben worden sind."

Die Eigenart der feuerländischen Kulturverhältnisse, die jeden Beschauer auf den ersten Blick befremdlich anmutet, hat scharfsinnige Beobachter, wie die beiden FORSTER es waren, unwiderstehlich zu allerhand Erklärungsversuchen gedrängt. Mögen diese letzteren auch überwiegend verfehlt ausgefallen sein, die nüchterne Schilderung alles Gegenständlichen, das damals noch von jedweder Vermischung mit europäischem Einfuhrgut frei war, ist dessungeachtet außerordentlich wertvoll. Die Zeichnung von einem Feuerländer jedoch, die JAMES COOK in sein großes Reisewerk aufgenommen hat und hier (S. 60) wiedergegeben ist, vermittelt keinen zuverlässigen Eindruck und ist für die Beurteilung der Geisteksbildung der Yamana nicht maßgebend.

ANDREAS SPARRMANN: In den gleichen Tagen, an denen die Schiffe des englischen Flottenführers JAMES COOK dort vor Anker lagen, erreichte auch SPARRMANN[96] mit dem schwedischen Schiffe "Schloss Stockholm" den südlichsten Teil des Feuerlandes. Obwohl er nichts über die Bewohner erzählt und er sich nur wenige Tage dort aufhielt, verdient sein allgemeines, knappes Urteil es doch, hier eingereiht zu werden; es beweist nämlich, wie es mancher Seefahrer der damaligen Zeit gar kein Verständnis für die Eigenart der fremden Völkerschaften aufbrachte. Er schreibt: „In einer Zeit von sechs Wochen waren wir über den Ocean zwischen Neuseeland und der südlichsten Spitze von Amerika weggesegelt, so daß wir den 29 December an der mittägigen Küste des Feuerlandes die Anker warfen. Hier sahen wir die allerelendesten Menschen in der Welt. Den 29sten segelten wir Hoorns Vorgebirge vorbey, und den 31sten, den Tag vor dem Neujahre, gingen wir bey einer kleinen Insel, nahe bey Staatsland vor Anker." Weiteres berichtet er über die Feuerländer nicht.

JAMES WEDDELL: Erst fünfzig Jahre später erhalten die Yaména wieder den kurzen Besuch zweier europäischer Schiffe. Dem wenig bekannten seemännischen Unternehmen des englischen Flottenführers WEDDELL kommt auch deshalb eine besondere Allgemeinbedeutung zu, weil ihm nicht unwichtige Entdeckungen im Antarktischen Meere zu verdanken sind. Er beginnt seinen Bericht[97] mit folgenden Worten: „Da es mir auf meiner Reise gelang, zu einer höheren südlichen Breite zu dringen als bisher geschehen war, so hielt ich es für nützlich, besonders in hydrographischer Hinsicht, die Hauptumstände meiner Reise bekannt zu machen. Unser Zweck war, Robbenhäute zu holen; die dazu bestimmten Fahrzeuge waren die Brigg 'Johanna' von 160 Tonnen und der Cutter 'Beaufoy' von 65 Tonnen, beide auf gewöhnliche Weise ausgerüstet und auf zwei Jahre verproviantiert: die Brigg, mit 22 Personen bemannt, stand unter meinem Befehl, der Cutter, mit 13, unter dem des Hrn. MATHEW BRISBANE." Am 17. September 1822 verließ diese Flotte den heimatlichen Hafen und steuerte geradewegs auf das südliche Eismeer los. Die genauen Beobachtungen über die antarktische Tierwelt und die zahlreichen Mitteilungen über die Falklandinseln müssen hier beiseite gelassen werden. In der Bahía S. Francisco, zwischen Isla de Hornos und Isla Hermit, also im Südwestlichen der Wollaston-Gruppe, begegnete diese Flotte am 26. November 1823 den ersten feuerländischen Eingeborenen, die in zwei Kanus herankamen. Ausführlich schreibt WEDDELL (a): 92—98 darüber:

„Als die Feuerländer näher kamen, erhoben sie eine Art Gesang und machten eine Menge Pantomimen, wie ich später erfuhr, lauter Zeichen der Freundschaft. Als sie 8 bis 10 Yards vom Schiff waren, machten wir ihnen

Ähnliche Zeichen und winkten ihnen an Bord zu kommen, aber sie blieben in der Entfernung. Ihr Betragen bewies großes Erstaunen, sie waren so lebhaft bewegt, daß sie über eine Viertelstunde ohne Unterbrechung laut sprachen. Endlich als sich ihr Stimmen etwas gelegt hatte, ruderten sie um das Schiff herum, betrachteten es von allen Seiten und schienen ungewiß, ob es todt oder lebendig sey, denn da sie nie zuvor ein Schiff gesehen hatten,[1] wußten sie nicht, was sie daraus machen sollten. Endlich erhielten sie mehr Zutrauen, kamen an die Steuerbordseite und zwei Männer stiegen herauf. Da sie jämmerlich aussahen, so glaubte ich ihnen mit Nahrungsmitteln den besten Dienst erweisen zu können, sie erhielten Hanfbrieh, Wein und Brodt: Fleisch aßen sie wenig, Brodt und Wein wurden gar nicht angenommen.

Ich bemerkte, daß sie ihre Weiber nicht aus den Canoe's herausließen, was ich mit Recht der bei den Wilden gewöhnlichen Eifersucht zuschrieb, doch wollte ich die Damen nicht vernachlässigen, ich schickte ihnen also etwas Wein in einer Porzellanschale. Das Gefäß erregte ihre Aufmerksamkeit so, daß sie bei der Untersuchung derselben den Wein verschütteten, und es einer Umstände bedurften. Ich dachte nicht daran, es wieder zu verlangen und glaubte, sie würden es herausnehmen, um darum zu trinken, aber am Tage zuvor sah ich es in kleinen Stückchen am Hals der Weiber hängen.

Die Männer staunten Alles an, was sie sahen, das Eisenwerk zog besonders ihre Aufmerksamkeit auf sich, und vor einem Kessel am Gallieren, der 200 Gallonen hielt, schienen sie zu erschrecken. Da ich eine Menge eiserne Reifen an Bord hatte, so schenkte ich jedem ein Stück, worüber sie sehr erfreut waren; sie verließen uns mit diesem Geschenk zufrieden, und begaben sich nach ihren Hütten, die in der Nähe des Hafens lagen.

Am 27. [November] bei Sonnenaufgang erschienen die wieder und erhoben ein großes Geschrei, das ihre Angst über unsere Dahlchen ausdrückten schien. Ich hatte Befehl gegeben, daß keiner eher an Bord gelassen werden sollte, bis die Mannschaft auf dem Deck versammelt wäre, was um 4 Uhr geschah. Nach einiger Zeit erschien noch ein drittes Canoe, das ebenfalls an das Schiff kam, was bewies, daß unsere ersten Gäste ihren Landsleuten unsere freundliche Aufnahme geröhmt hatten. Nun waren 22 Personen an Bord, Männer, Weiber und Kinder und jetzt, da sie von unserer Freundschaft überzeugt waren, wurden sie immer zutraulicher. Ich zeigte ihnen die Cajüte, wo besonders der glänzende Ofen und der Spiegel sie zu interessieren schien. Vor dem Spiegel betrugen sie sich ganz wie Affen, und suchten eifrig das zurückgeworfene Bild hinter dem Glas, und ob sie sich gleich gewiß oft genug im Wasser gesehen hatten, so war doch ihre Urtheilskraft nicht scharf genug, um die Ähnlichkeit beider Erscheinungen zu entdecken. Da ich die Neigung der Wilden zum Diebstahl wohl kannte, so ließ ich beständig Acht auf sie geben, aber als der Hauptbootsmann vom Hafen zurückkam, meldete er, daß sie die Rolle von einem Fall abgemühtigen hatten. Auch hatte, trotz unserer Aufmerksamkeit, ein Meister in der Kunst, zu stehlen, einen starken eisernen Nagel entwendet. Ich hielt es dadurch für ziemlich, ihnen eine Idee von der Sinnfluchtigkeit des Diebstahles zu geben; der Nagelchen wurde zu dem Tauwerk gebunden und erhielt einen dicken Blick mit den neuen Seilungen, wobei ich ihm deutlich zu machen suchte, wofür er benutzt würde. Dieß Verfahren hatte die erwünschte Wirkung, keiner nahm von nun an auch nur den kleinsten Stückchen Eisen ohne Erlaubniß.

[1] Natürlich war ja seiner auch sie ein europäisches Schiff an jenen abgelegenen Inseln vor Anker gegangen.

Am 27. [November] hatten wir schönes Wetter; die Zimmerleute führten Bäume und zogen sie in Bretter, was den Französchen vielen Spaß zu machen schien, die Säge gefiel ihnen so wohl, daß sie sie gewiß gestohlen haben würden, wenn wir sie nicht über die Nacht an Bord gebracht hätten. An diesem Tage kamen 1848 Männer und Knaben an Bord, wahrscheinlich waren die Frauen anderweit beschäftigt. Unter ihnen war ein hübsch gewachsener Bursch von 14 bis 15 Jahren, den ich gern bei mir behalten hätte, aber als er meinen Wunsch bemerkte, kehrte er schnell in das Canoe zurück und kam nicht wieder an Bord.

Am 28. [November] war der Wind so veränderlich, daß er rund um den Compaß herumging. Am Morgen erschienen die Französchen wieder, aber in einer anderen Tracht oder eigentlich Farbe, denn die Weiber, die zuvor roth waren, waren jetzt pechschwarz, und die Männer waren mit weißen und rothen Streifen verziert, die horizontal und kreuzweise über den Gesicht liefen. Sie glaubten sehr schön gepatzt zu seyn, hatten aber ein sehr greuliches Ansehen.

Im Anfang unserer Bekanntschaft gaben sie mir die Kleinigkeiten, die ich von ihnen verlangte, ohne Weiteres, jetzt aber hatten sie schon eine Idee vom Tauschhandel und verlangten gewöhnlich irgend etwas Glänzendes, wie Knöpfe u. dgl., zu Ersatzes Bäuchen ihnen aber doch die eisernen Beile, und ich bin überzeugt, daß sie das Eisen für unsere größere Reichthum hielten. Den letzten Handel machte ein hübscher junger Matrose, mit dem sich vorzüglich die Weiber abgaben, doch weiß ich wirklich nicht, ob sie sich nicht vielleicht in seinem Gewehrlicht irrten. Durch ihn erhielt ich einen jungen Hund, der sich durch seine Klugheit auszeichnete; sie haben nur diese eine Art Hunde, die dem Fuchs sehr gleich und ziemlich die Größe eines Schäferhundes hat. Sie lieben ihre Hunde sehr, und wenn sie irgend einem Object eine übernatürliche Kraft zuschreiben, so sind es wahrscheinlich die Hunde, denn ihre Aufmerksamkeit und Sorge für den Wohl derselben ist außerordentlich.

Am 29. [November] war das Wetter schön, am Morgen kam der "Bonfay", der zugleich von den Französchen einen Besuch erhielt. Sie begingen bei dieser Gelegenheit mehrere kleine Diebstähle, von welchen ich nur einen als Beweis ihrer Nachahmungsgabe anführen will. Ein Matrose hatte einem Französcher einen eisernen Topf voll Caffee gegeben, er trank ihn aus und wendete alle Kunst an, ihn zu stehlen. Nach einiger Zeit fiel dem Matrosen ein, daß er den Topf nicht zurückerhalten hatte, er verlangte ihn, aber statt den Topfe gab ihm der Feuerländer jedes seiner Worte deutlich zurück. Endlich wurde der Matrose ärgerlich, nahm eine drohende Stellung an und rief in heftigem Tone: Du kupferfarbiger Spitzbube, wo ist mein Zinntopf? Der Feuerländer nahm genau dieselbe Stellung an und rief mit demselben Tone: du kupferfarbiger Spitzbube, wo ist mein Zinntopf? Alle Umstehenden lachten überlaut, denn die Nachahmung war sehr täuschend, nur der Matrose blieb ernsthaft und untersuchte den Dieb, der den Topf unter dem Arm verborgen hatte: er sollte bestraft werden, aber Hr. Bennett erbrachte ihm die Strafe und schickte den Roß in sein Canoe mit dem Bedeuten, nicht wieder an Bord zu kommen.

Am 2. Dezember [1823] um Mittag versammelten sich die Feuerländer an der Küste und fuhren mit den Canoes aus dem Hafen heraus, ohne daß wir früher bemerkt hatten, daß sie wegziehen wollten. Ich vermuthete, sie hätten uns einige Kleinigkeiten gestohlen, und wollten sich nun mit ihrer Beute heimlich entfernen; statt ihres gewöhnlichen Geschreies hörte man auch nicht einen Laut und sie ruderten so dicht an der Küste, daß man sie kaum bemerkte. Ich ließ sogleich ein Boot bemannen, und verfolgte sie, sie ruderten mit allen Kräften, aber vergebens, ich holte sie ein, und sie schienen allerdings eine Unternehmung nach gestohlenem Gut zu erwarten. Aber ich beschenkte jeden Mann mit einem Stück Reif und jede Frau mit einem glänzenden Halspanzer, der durchlöchert war, damit sie ihn an den Hals hängen konnten: sie waren sehr erfreut über diese Gaben, die sie keineswegs erwartet hatten, und als ich mich einem Händedruck von jedem Abschied genommen hatte, ruderten sie mit ihrem gewöhnlichen Freudengeschrei davon.

In Ehren der Menschheit möchte ich gern diesen so geringgeschätzten Menschen einen andern Achtung in intellectueller Hinsicht verschaffen, aber ich muß leider eingestehen, daß sie noch auf der allerniedrigsten Stufe stehen. Bei dem Alter der Welt erscheint es beinahe unglaublich und ist gewiß nicht wahrscheinlich für das menschliche Geschlecht, daß ein Volk so lange in seiner alten Unwissenheit stehen, bleibt.

Da ich bei den Feuerländern nichts fand, was eine fremde Hand verrieth, so läßt sich wohl daraus schließen, daß wir die ersten waren, welche sie besuchten, wenigstens für die jetzige Generation waren wir es gewiß. Bei diesen gilt dieselbe Sitte, wie bei vielen andern Wilden, nämlich daß den Weibern alle Arbeit aufgebürdet wird, sie rudern, während der Mann ruhig im Canoe sitzt, sie sammeln die Muscheln, erziehen die Kinder, bauen die Hütten, kurz sie verrichten Alles, was Mühe kostet, dagegen zeigen die Männer viele Zärtlichkeit für ihre Weiber und Sorgfalt für ihre Kinder. Einen Zug ihrer liebenswürdigen Liebe bemerkte ich bei einem unerwarteten Besuch ihrer Hütten, wo sie in der Furcht, ich käme, um ihre Kinder zu stehlen, diese mit ihren Armen umschlungen und trotz allen Zeichen der Freundschaft von meiner Seite ließen sie sie nicht wieder los.

Diese Feuerländer waren kleiner Gestalt, ich maß zwei Männer, von denen einer 5 F. 4 Z., der andere 5 F. 5 Z. hatte. Ihre Gesichtsbildung und die

Form ihrer Köpfe ist bei den meisten Indianern gewöhnlicher: sie haben flache Nasen, kleine Augen, volle gut gebildete Brüste, schwache Arme, ihre Schenkel sind dünn und schlecht gestaltet, wahrscheinlich weil sie die Gewohnheit haben, auf den Waden zu sitzen, in welcher Lage sie ein höchst unbehelfenes Ansehn haben. Die Frauen sehen besser aus, als die Männer, manche unter ihnen haben interessante Züge, und meinen Erachtens zeigten sie auch einen lebhafteren Beobachtungsgeist. Das einzige Bekleidungsstück der Männer ist ein Fell, das von den Schultern bis auf den halben Rücken herabsteht; einigen fehlte auch dies kümliche Gewand. Die Frauen tragen ein größeres Fell und sind überhaupt so bekleidet, daß sie die Sittlichkeit nicht verletzen, und selbst die kleinsten Mädchen sind so verhüllt, was ein Gefühl der Schamhaftigkeit beweis't, wie man es selten unter so ungebildeten Völkern findet.

Diese kurze Schilderung mag dem Leser einen allgemeinen Begriff von diesen entfernten Südländern geben, in der Folge werde ich noch mehrmals auf die Bewohner jener Gegenden zurückkommen und durch genaue Mittheilungen aller meiner Beobachtungen den Leser in den Stand zu setzen suchen, ein richtiges Urtheil über ihren Character zu fällen." Daß WEDDELL (a): 92 selber ein erhebliches Vorurtheil gegen sie mitgebracht hatte, ist seinen Zeilen unschwer zu entnehmen.

Wenige Tage später ging die Flotte im südlichen Seno Aha Nuevo vor Anker. „Wir hatten eben das Loth ausgeworfen, als wir vier Canoes voll Feuerländer sahen. Zuerst schienen sie erstaunt, dann machten sie ihrem Gebrauch gemäß ein Freudengeschrei und allerlei lächerliche Pantomimen. Wir ruderten bis auf 12 Yards auf sie zu und zeigten ihnen Stücken von eisernen Reifen, um ihre Aufmerksamkeit zu fesseln. Wie unsere ersten Gäste, waren auch diese eifersüchtig oder sehr besorgt für ihre Weiber, die Männer stiegen in zwei Canoes und kamen allein zu uns gerudert. Wir suchten ihr Zutrauen zu erhalten, und machten ihnen Zeichen, mit uns nach den Schiffen zu rudern, was sie thaten und selbst ihre Weiber mitbrachten: jetzt, wo die Männer selbst mit ruderten, blieben sie in der hohen See neben unserem Walfischboot. Da diese Feuerländer von einem anderen Stamme[*] waren, und ein besseres Ansehen hatten, als unsere früheren Gäste, so versprachen wir uns neue Unterhaltung von diesem Zusammentreffen. Sie zeigten übrigens dasselbe Erstaunen, wie jene, und besaßen gar nichts, was eine Bekanntschaft mit Europäern verrieth, weßhalb ich auch von diesen glaube, daß wir die ersten Fremden waren, die sie sahen. Sie hatten allerlei selbstgefertigte Dinge bei sich, die wir größtentheils durch Tausch zu uns brachten. Auch ihnen waren unter allen Dingen Eisenstückchen das Angenehmste, denn die einzigen Instrumente, die sie zum Schneiden hatten, waren Muschelschalen, und unsere Geschenke werden noch nach vielen Jahren zum Beweis unseres freundschaftlichen Verkehrens dienen.

[*] Genauer gesagt, müßte es heißen, diese gehörten einer anderen Dialektgruppe an als jene; obwohl damit allein ein bedeutender Unterschied im Körperbau nicht gegeben ist.

Da wir nach der Trennung von dem 'Beagle' nur zwei Boote zu unserer Disposition behielten, so hielt ich es für nützlich, ein Canoe von den Feuerländern zu uns zu taufen. Da Bilder ein solchen Fahrzeug viele Mühe und Arbeit kosteten, so glaubte ich mich freigebig zeigen zu müssen, ich bot ihnen zwei ganze eiserne Reifen, wofür sie vor Freude aufjauchzten; in weniger als 5 Minuten war die ganze Familie mit allen ihren Geräthschaften in ein anderes Canoe gestiegen, und hatte uns das ihrige übergeben. Ich ließ es sogleich auf das Schiff bringen, bei welchem Transport sich meine Leute über die Schwere desselben beklagten, was sich daraus erklärte, daß der ganze Boden 6 Zoll hoch mit Lehm als Ballast belegt war, wodurch das Canoe vor dem Umkommen gesichert war, denn sie haben beständig Feuer darin. Es war 12 F. 4 Z. lang, und hielt an der breitesten Stelle 2 F. 2 Z.; es war aus starken Birkenrinde gebaut, die breiter erhöht als sie die Männer an der Küste liefern, und wahrscheinlich aus dem Innern herbeigebracht worden war. Das ganze Fahrzeug bestand aus drei Stücken, zwei bildeten die Wände und eins den Boden, alle waren durch dünne Zweige an einander befestigt. Die Rippen waren von halbcirkelförmiger Gestalt, mit der flachen Seite nach unten, so daß sie sich vertical berührten, und durch den Leim zusammengehalten, ein starkes Canoe bildeten, das selbst gegen den Wind rasch geht. Die innere Einrichtung zeigt von einer gewissen Ordnung: in der ersten Abtheilung liegen die zum Fischen nöthigen Geräthschaften, in der zweiten sitzen die Weiber, die das erste Ruder führen, in der vierten sammelt sich das Wasser, das ausgeschöpft wird, dann kömmt der Aufenthaltsort der Männer, hierauf der der Weiber, welche das hinterste Ruder führen, und endlich kommt der Raum, in welchem sie ihre sonstigen Geräthschaften aufbewahren. Ihre Speere liegen gewöhnlich quer über dem Steven." Wie wertvoll diesen Leuten Eisen erschien, ist aus obigem Zitat sehr deutlich zu erkennen.

Das gewöhnliche Wurfzeug der Feuerländer ist die Schleuder, die sie aus Robben- oder Otternhäuten verfertigten; sie ist etwa 3 Fuß lang und hat die gewöhnliche Gestalt, die Bänder bestehen gewöhnlich aus schmalen Därmen, die gut zusammengeflochten, und durch geschickt geschlungene Knoten verbesuchen sind.*" Ich tauschte einige Schlenkern von ihnen, und bei einem der geschickteren war die Art sich dieser zu bedienen, so zeigte, er that es, ohne Hr. Bennett verstand es wenigstens ebenso gut, weniger sie nicht wenig erstaunt waren. Ihre Speere bestehen aus feinen Knochen, sind 7 Fuß lang, scharf zugespitzt, und haben vier Zoll von der Spitze, einen Widerhaken an der einen Seite; sie haben auch eine andere Art, die auf einer Seite mit vielen kleinen spitzigen Widerhäkchen besetzt ist, und an einer 10 F. langen, glatten, gerade hölzernen Stange befestigt wird. Am Knochen ist ein kürzerer oder längerer Streif von Haut befestigt, und diese Waffe dient ihnen bei allen Jagden. Sie halten den Speer in der Mitte, ziehen mit dem rechten Auge, und werfen dann mit großer Sicherheit.

Nach dem Mittagsmahl suchte sich das Schiffsvolk mit unsern Gästen einen Spaß zu machen, ein lustiger Matrose fing an zu singen und zu tanzen, wo denn die Feuerländer sogleich einen Kreis um ihn bildeten und Gesang und Tanz auf das Genauste nachahmten. Endlich artete der Tanz in ein Kampfspiel aus, in welchem ein Matrose und ein Feuerländer rangen; ich hoffte der Fremde würde geworfen werden, aber trotz dem, daß der Matrose ein kräftiger 22jähriger Bursche war, täuschte ich mich, er stand fest und war wenigstens ebenso gewandt, als der Matrose, so daß es befürchtet war, dieser würde endlich unterliegen. Einige Feuerländer glaubten ihren Landsmann in Gefahr, und sprangen ihm zu Hülfe, worauf ich sogleich dem ganzen Kampf ein Ende machte. Die Feuerländer schienen eine Art Triumph zu feiern, was mir sehr unangenehm war, ich verbot streng jeden ähnlichen Kampf, weil es gefährlich war, den Fremden die Idee einer gleichen Kraft und Gewandtheit beizubringen.

Ich bemühte mich sehr zu erforschen, ob sie eine Idee von einem göttlichen Wesen hätten, ich las ihnen ein Capitel aus der Bibel vor, nicht als wenn ich geglaubt hätte, sie würden es verstehen, sondern nur ihnen dabei durch Zeichen Tod, Auferstehung und Gebet deutlich zu machen. Sie schienen mich nicht zu verstehen, ahmten aber genau Alles nach, was ich that, und bei'm Nachsprechen hielten sie ebenso, wie ich, die Stimme fallen, und erhoben sie wieder. Übrigens zeigten sie die größte Aufmerksamkeit, und sahen mir mit Erstaunen starr in das Gesicht. Einer von ihnen hielt sein Ohr an das Buch, und schien zu glauben, es sprächen; ein anderer wollte es in sein Canoe mitnehmen, kurz alle zeigten ein Interesse dafür.

Auch bei diesem Stamme fehlte es nicht an Dieben, als man ihnen den Gebrauch eines Feuerzeugs wies, entwendete einer den Stahl und verbarg ihn unter seinem Arm. Ich schickte den Verkäufer unter ernsten Drohungen, die er sehr gut verstand, in sein Canoe zurück. Sie erhielten Eisenarbeitwerkzeuge mit einem Feuersteine zusammen, und fingen die Funken in einer trockenen [illegible] Substanz auf. Unsere Matrosen verschenkten ihre alten [illegible] Kleider, und die Feuerländer erschienen nun in einem sehr liebenswürdigen Costüme, einer hatte eine Jacke an, der andere ein Hemde, der dritte einen Wamse u. s. w.

Einen Aufführer schienen sie nicht zu haben, auch keinen zu beachten; sie bewegten sich gegenseitig mit der größten Liebe und benahmen Alles gemeinschaftlich, durch einigen jeder einen Eifer, etwas von uns zu erhalten, sey es um den Ehre willen, es erwerben zu helfen, oder um es zuerst zu besitzen. Diese [illegible] Verhältnisse und die formelleren Bewegungen gegen uns sprechen gewiß sehr zu ihren Gunsten; ihre geringe Civilisation ist bloß eine Folge der Gottlosigkeit, sie zeigen übrigens mehr Gelehrigkeit als alle andern wilden Stämme, mit denen ich je zusammenkam."

Nach einer sehr gewagten Fahrt an den südlichen Inseln Diego Ramirez kehrten die Schiffe in den Sund Isla Nueva zurück. In der Bahia Inglesa beobachtete Wimmer (c): 108 am 24. Dezember 1833 eine andere Gruppe von Eingeborenen. Darüber schreibt er: „Die Wohnungen der Feuerländer waren auf einer Insel am Eingang der Bai, so daß sie unsere Ankunft sogleich bemerkten, sie kamen bald in mehreren Canoes heraus, erhielten die gewöhnlichen Geschenke und bestiegen ihre Armes um, deren Anwesen auch mit einem aus Furcht und Freude gemischten Gefühl. Ich bewog sie bald an Bord zu kommen, wo ich mehrere bemerkte, die eine andere Gesichtsbildung hatten, sie hatten hohe Nasen und waren etwas größer als die übrigen Feuerländer. Es schien mir, als wären diese Abkömmlinge von den Spaniern, die sich vor 244 Jahren an der Magellans-Straße niederließen, aber nur 7 Jahre dahinlebten; meine Vermuthung wurde dadurch bestätigt, daß sie zwei spanische Wörter kannten, Canoa, das Canoe und Perro, der Hund. Mein Provianmeister, ein geborener Spanier, sprach unbeirrt mit ihnen spanisch, aber er fand keine weiteren Spuren ihrer Kenntniß dieser Sprache. Da sie unsere Worte immer wiederholten, so war es sehr schwer, ihre Sprache kennen zu lernen, doch gelang es mir endlich den Sinn folgender Wörter zu erfahren: Sayano, Wasser, Alaiah, das Weib, Sheeno, Billigung, Nash, Vordeck. In allen Wörtern scheint das S und Sh vorzuherrschen . . .

Am 27. Dezember erhielte ich den 'Beagle' mit einem Zusatz von 14 Mann von der Brigg nach dem Diego Ramirez-Inseln. Gegen Mittag kamen gegen 40 Feuerländer an Bord; ich ließ sie durch einen Matrosen gesammelt bewachen, aber da sie überall herumgingen, so waren kleine Diebstähle nicht ganz zu verhüten. Ich schenkte ihrem Häuptling und einer jungen Frau, die etwa 8 Wochen alt war, aber dennoch stahl ein 60jähriger Mann eine kleine Flasche, die ein Matrose für sich aufbewahren wollte. Gewöhnlich lachen die Feuerländer, wenn man sie bei einem Diebstahl ertappt, aber dieser alte Mann war sehr bestürzt, ging sogleich in sein Canoe und kam nicht ehe wieder an Bord, als bis ich ihm mehrmals durch Zeichen zu verstehen gegeben hatte, er sey wieder zu Gnaden aufgenommen.

[illegible] wie die andern, doch waren einige [illegible] Ocker, mit dem sie bemalt waren, für ein Geschenk geben lassen will. Wir hatten nur wenig Kleider mehr zu verschenken, weil sie [illegible] waren, doch gab ich mehreren für die Gesichtsfelle, die sie auf dem Rücken hatten, irgend ein Kleidungsstück. Einem schenkte ich ein weißes [illegible] Hemd, das er sogleich anzog, und [illegible] Perlen unter seinen Gefährten herumhüpfte; dies Geschenk wurde sehr geachtet, jeder trug es 10 bis 12 Minuten lang; dann rissen sie es in kleine Stücken, die sie gewissenhaft untereinander vertheilten.

Da ich, um das Schiff voraus in die Höhe zu bringen, im hintersten Raum [illegible] Wasser auf[illegible] ließ, so ließ ich die Feuerländer Wasser tragen, was sie bald eben so gut verrichteten als meine eigenen Leute. Auch zum Ziehen und Stoßen benutzte ich sie, wenn Kraft nöthig war, wo sie [illegible] Eifer zeigten, nur war ihr Gesang dabei kaum zurückzuhalten; besonders als sie bemerkt hatten, daß ein Matrose bei der Arbeit sang, glaubten sie, es gehöre dazu und arbeiten alle zusammen. Die Weiber blieben mit den kleinern Kindern hart am Schiff in den Canoes, wo wir sie von Zeit zu Zeit mit kleinern Geschenken erfreuten. Um zu erfahren, welchen Eindruck die Musik auf sie machen würde, ließ ich die Violine spielen, was ihnen zu gefallen schien, doch fand die Quadrille noch mehr Beifall und am besten gefiel ihnen Vocalmusik. Die Weiber schienen von dem Gesang eines jungen Menschen, der eine hübsche Stimme hatte, ganz bezaubert. Ich zeigte ihnen einige Streichhölzer, die ihre Aufmerksamkeit nur kurze Zeit fesselten, am längsten besahen sie die mit hellen glimmenden Farben angemalten.

Als sie im Schiff ein Fell voll Lobos fanden, den wir von den Falklandsinseln mitgebracht hatten, beschmierten sie sich am ganzen Körper damit und schienen über ihre neue Kleidung sehr erfreut. Die Weiber legten nicht so viel auf, und wenn der Lobos trocken geworden war, riehen sie ihn wieder ab.

Da ich bemerkte, daß ein Feuerländer an bösen Augen litt, so bereitete ich eine Salbe und bestrich ihn damit. Er begriff meine Absicht sogleich und war nach 3 Tagen völlig hergestellt. Ich schnitt ihm das über die Augen hängende Haar ab, um jedem Reiz zu verhüten, aber seine Landsleute glaubten, daß dieses zur Verschönerung und kamen alle zu mir, um sich die Haare schneiden zu lassen, welchen Wunsch ich gern erfüllte und sie noch obendrein mit Mehl puderte. Den Weibern gefiel dieser Kopfputz außerordentlich wohl, aber ich fand ihn wegen unseres geringen Vorraths für die Zukunft nicht räthlich.

Ich machte sie mit der verwüstenden Wirkung der Feuergewehre bekannt, bei'm Abbrennen einer Kanone erhoben die Weiber, die Männer wurden blaß und sahen mit einem gedankenvollen Staunen nach dem Geschütz. Ich bemerkte einen verschmitzten muthigen Burschen unter ihnen, der der angeketteten Dieb dieses Stammes zu seyn schien; er wurde eines Tages erwischt, als er beschäftigt war, das Eisenstück von der großen Stange abzubrechen; ich befahl ihm durch Zeichen, herabzukommen, aber er achtete nicht darauf; um ihn zu ersticken, nähte ich mit einer Tauchergummiplatte nach ihm, worauf er herabstieg, aber auf dem Deck nahm er eine drohende Stellung an und warf mir einen Lappen in das Gesicht. Um diese Grobheit zu bestrafen, ergriff ich meine Vogelflinte und legte sie auf ihn an, wo er dann sogleich nach dem Vordertheil des Schiffs lief, wohin ihm seine Gefährten mit großem Geschrei, in welches auch die Weiber einstimmten, folgten. Ich legte das Gewehr nieder und schickte den Übeltäter in sein Canoe, doch war für heute das gute Verstehen gestört und unsere Gäste entfernten sich viel früher als gewöhnlich.

Da ich jetzt nur 8 Mann an Bord hatte, worunter zwei Knaben waren, so hielt ich es für nöthig, sie mit Säbeln und Pistolen zu bewaffnen, im Fall die Feuerländer sich irgend einer Feindseligkeit erdreisten sollten. Am Morgen des 30sten, um 4 Uhr, kamen 40 bis 50 Feuerländer an Bord, ehe es meine Leute nur bemerkt hatten. Der Unterstuhlfer kam sogleich in meine Cajüte und meldete, die Feuerländer wollten das Schiff in Besitz nehmen, ein Verdacht, der nicht ganz unbegründet war. Als ich, die Pistolen in der Hand, die Treppe heraufstieg, fand ich mehrere im Begriff, herauszuspringen, sie flohen sogleich und die auf dem Deck befindlichen brachte ich bald zur Ordnung. Ich nahm von diesem Versuch weiter keine Notiz und in kurzer Zeit trat das alte freundschaftliche Verstehen wieder ein. Um Mittag versammelte ich sie um mich herum, und versuchte wie bei dem vorigen Stamm, ob sie eine Idee von Gott und der Zukunft nach dem Tode hätten. Es schien mir, als hätten sie irgend eine solche Ahnung, sie sahen einander mit großem Erstaunen in das Gesicht und sprachen mit leiserer Stimme; übrigens bemerkte ich nie eine Art Gottesdienst unter ihnen.

Ich tauschte eine Menge Kleinigkeiten von ihnen ein, als Halsbänder, Körbe, Bogen und Pfeile. Die Halsbänder bestanden aus gewundenen Muschelschalen von schöner glänzender Farbe, die nahe an der Oeffnung durchlöchert und auf eine sehr zierlich geflochtene Schnur aufgeschnürt waren. Das Band war nicht dicker als eine dünne Pfeifenschnur, bestand aber aus 5 einzelnen Streifen, und war so kunstreich geflochten, daß man sich kaum denken kann, daß es bloß mit der Hand gearbeitet sey. Die Körbe bestanden aus starkem Gras und waren ebenfalls künstlich gefertigt, alle Halme waren in rechten Winkeln verbunden wie ein Gewebe und oben war ein Griff, der die halbe Circumferenz des Korbs hatte.

Die Bogen waren gewöhnlich 3 F. 8 Z. lang und aus einem glatten, festen, elastischen Holz bereitet; die Schnur besteht aus Robbenhaut oder geflochtenen Därmen.[*] Die Pfeile sind von hartem Holz und frin polirt, 25 Zoll lang und vorne mit einem eingeklemmten dreieckigen, spitzigen Stein versehen. Wenn der Pfeil irgendwo eindringt, so kann das Holz herausgezogen werden, der Stein aber bleibt stecken. Sie besitzen noch eine andere Waffe, nämlich sie ihnen so gutmütiger Kissel wird vorne in einem 9 Zoll langen Griff eingepaßt und dient wahrscheinlich als Dolch. Krieg schienen übrigens diese Männer nicht zu führen, doch sah ich drei Männer unter ihnen, die Narben am Körper hatten, welche von Wunden herrührten schienen.

Am Hafen [Dunwalter] kam der 'Brawley' mit einer Quantität Rehbockfellen an. Gleich nach der Ankunft des 'Brawley' erschienen die Feuerländer, wahrscheinlich in der Hoffnung auf einen Schmaus von Rehbockfleisch und Fett, wie sie auch von Hr. Bauman erhielten. Unsere Leute schnitten den Thran von den Fellen ab, zu welcher Arbeit sich auch unsere Gäste anbieten, um die Fettstreifen zu erhalten. Sie stellten sich ziemlich geschickt an, aber bald bemerkte ich, daß sie noch anderer Absichten hatten, einer hatte ein ganzes Fell in kleinen Stückchen auf eine listige Weise unter seinen Arm verborgen. Der Unterschiffer bemerkte es, als der Dieb sich eben entfernen wollte, der Feuerländer lachte herzlich, aber als ich hervortrat, sprang er in sein Canoe, weil er wohl wußte, daß er sich gegen mich vergangen hatte. Seit sie einer Idee vom Tauschhandel bekommen hatten, stahlen sie auch mehr und zwar suchten sie das auf dem Cutter gestohlene Gut auf der Brigg für Dinge zu vertauschen, die ihnen besser gefielen.

Da wir jetzt wieder stark genug waren, um sie nicht zu fürchten zu brauchen, so ließ ich den Burschen, der mir den Lappen in das Gesicht geworfen hatte, wieder an Bord und machte ihm deutlich, daß er jetzt ganz in meiner Gewalt sey, da er aber sich sehr furchtsam und unterthänig bezeigte, so wurde er begnadigt.

Nachmittags ging ich mit Bauman auf die Insel zu den Feuerländern, denen ich unsere Absicht vorher deutlich gemacht hatte; sie ruderten vor uns her und einige empfingen uns am Ufer, von wo sie uns nach ihrer Stadt führten, die aus wenig schlecht gebauten Hütten bestand und von etwa 60 Personen bewohnt wurde. Der erste Umstand, der mir auffiel, war, daß sie alle Weiber und kleinen Kinder entfernt hatten, sie waren in den Wäldern, wo sie überall Feuer anzündeten. Es schien dieß eine Art Freudenbezeugung über unseren Besuch, vielleicht aber war es auch ein Signal, für andere Feuerländer; wirklich kamen zwei fremde Canoes an. In einer Hütte fand ich eine ganz zahme Seemöwe, was die Neigung dieser Völker zu den Thieren beweis't. Ich ließ der Sicherheit halber das Boot in der Nähe und die ganze Mannschaft war bewaffnet, so daß wir unbesorgt unter ihnen herumgehen konnten. Da ich Muscheln zu essen wünschte, so zeigten sie mir zugleich welche und jeder beeilte sich, mir die heitern zu bringen. Der alte Mann, der die kleine Robbe gestohlen hatte, zeigte sich hier zum ersten Mal wieder und ich gab ihm zu verstehen, daß ich ihm verzeihen habe. Um sie etwas zu schrecken, schoß ich auf einen Schuß mit meiner Doppelflinte zwei Möven, worüber sie, besonders die neu angekommenen, sehr erstaunt waren.

Meine Leute tanzten und sangen mit den Feuerländern, aber als einige in die Wälder gehen wollten, so wurden sie besorgt für ihre Weiber, weßhalb ich die Matrosen zurückhielt. Diese Schonung von unserer Seite vergalten sie [illegible] ganz und gar nicht, ein Französischer Infanterist [illegible] unserer Infanteriejungen, dem er für ein Mädchen hielt, so unverschämt, daß er sich erkundigt in den Boot zurückzukehren wollte, um [illegible] Nachrichtungen zu empfangen. Nachdem wir unsere Neugierde befriedigt hatten, engten wir Ihnen Lebensmittel und Lebewohl an Bord zurück.

Einen Kranken sah ich nicht unter diesen Frauen, auch keinen Leibarzt, bis auf einen einzigen, den der Schiffs gestellten hatte. So viel ich bemerken konnte, betrug die Zahl der Weiber etwa ½ von der der Männer und von den Alten betrifft, so konnte sich alle in 4 Classen abtheilen. Die Jüngsten waren 2 Mädchen, die ich zwischen 60 und 70 schätzte, dann kamen 24 Männer und Weiber gegen 40 Jahre, dann 27 von 20 bis 30, und die übrigen 26 bestanden aus Knaben, Mädchen und Kindern.

Am 1. Januar [1824] landeten die Französinder an der Spitze der Bai und einnahmen das Gebäude an. Da der Rauch, der Richtung des Windes gegenüber, gerade auf uns zukam, ließ ich eine Flinte über ihre Köpfe abschießen, aber sie kehrten sich nicht daran und fuhren fort vorzudringen, so daß wir ganz in den Rauch eingehüllt waren und ich mich genöthigt sah, einer Kanone abzufeuern an Land, natürlich nach einer Seite, wo keine Menschen standen, aber durch so nahe, daß sie das Pfeifen der Schaaren hörten. So wie sie den Knall hörten, eilten sie in ihr Canoe und ruderten so schnell als möglich nach ihren Hütten. Da sie recht gut wußten, daß uns der Rauch sehr unangenehm war, so mußte ich das Betragen für eine wirkliche Neckerei halten und durch eine kräftige Maßregel ihr ein Ende machen.

Am andern Morgen kamen die Französinder an Bord, aber an denen, die wir gestern irgend etwas vorgeschwätzt, sie betrugen sich sehr höflich. Um 10 Uhr kehrten wir die Anker und gingen bei W. nach dem Dorpe Kamiroe-Insulin, der "Broadley" blieb hier liegen. Bis zum 3ten [Januar] blieben wir bei jener Insulin unter Segel, dann kehrten wir zurück. Als uns die Französinder sahen, erhoben sie einen Streit zu Gunsten und ruderten eilig auf die Seite. Da der ganze Stamm sehr mehrere Freunden, im Canoe über 11 Canoes um die Brigg herum waren und deren jedes wenigstens 7 Personen enthielt, so hielt ich es für rathlich, dem "Broadley" ein Signal zu machen, der auch sogleich ein Boot abordnete. Hr. Brennan kam selbst und versicherte, die Französinder hätten sich sehr anständig betragen und es habe nicht den geringsten Auftritt mit ihnen gehabt."

Abschließend legt Wesseel (s): 119 seine Beurtheilung der Lebensbedingungen und Kulturverhältnisse der dortigen Eingeborenen vor: „Was nun endlich meine Erfahrungen über die Französinder betrifft, so kann ich wohl sagen, daß ich niemals so unerfahrne Menschen sah, übrigens meine ich nicht, wie so viele Reisende, daß dieß einer mangelhaften geistigen Organisation zuzuschreiben ist, im Gegentheil sie erkennen mir ziemlich bildsam. Beinahe alle Reisenden, die mit den Französinden[*] zusammengetroffen sind, stellen dessen diese Expedition begegnete. Ein furchtbarer Wetter entwickelte sich englisch gegen die Mannschaft, die man weiter Mole sich so weit in den Sturm vorgewagt hatte. Im Logbuch heißt es: „30th January 1830. A continued gale, with rain and thick weather throughout the day. During the night the weather became rather more moderate; but on the morning of the 31st, the wind again increased to a gale, and towards noon, the willowers were so violent, that our small cutter, lying astern of the ship, was fairly capsized, though she had not even a mast standing ... Considering that this month corresponds to August in our climate, it is natural to compare them, and to think how hay and corn would prosper in a Fuegian summer. As yet I have found no difference in Tierra del Fuego between summer and winter, excepting that in the former the days are longer, and the average temperature is perhaps two degrees higher, but there is also then more wind and rain." The gale still continued, and prevented any thing being done out of the ship" (Kno: 290).

Weil das Boot schon einige Tage ungeschützen war, heißt dem Platzmeister berechtigte Unruhe. „At three this morning (5th February 1830), I was called up to hear that the whale-boat was lost-stolen by the natives; and that her coxswain and two men had just reached the ship in a clumsy canoe, made like a large basket ... They had been sent by the master, who, with the other people, was at the cove under Cape Desolation, where they stopped on the first day. Their provisions were all consumed, two-thirds having been stolen with the boat, and the return of the natives, to plunder, and perhaps kill them, was expected daily" (Kno: 291). Ohne Verzug eilte der Kommandant den gefährdeten Matrosen zu Hilfe. Er erreichte sie, trotz ungünstiger Witterung, an ihrem Unglücksorte und erkundigte sich unverzüglich nach dem Verbleib des Bootes, das „must, indeed, have been taken away, just before daylight, by the natives". Als die Matrosen den Verlust gewahr geworden waren, merkten sie längstlich darauf und obwohl sie Anzeichen von der Anwesenheit mehrerer Eingeborener entdeckten — „they found the wigwams, evidently just deserted: the fire not being extinguished" —, war ihr Suchen nach dem Fahrzeuge einige Tage lang vergeblich. Sie kamen aber schließlich den Dieben auf die Spur, ohne indes das gestohlene Boot zu erlangen und ohne den Ort zu erfahren, wo es versteckt gehalten wurde. „Disappointed in the hope of obtaining a guide, we determined to prevent those people [eine kleine Gruppe von Indianern] from escaping far, and spreading any intelligence likely to impede the return of our boat, which we daily expected: we therefore destroyed two canoes, and part of a third, that the natives were building, and burned every material which could be useful to them in making another canoe."

[*] Die in jenen Gegenden herrschenden unberechenbaren Witterungsverhältnisse hat Fitz-Roy (b): 311—317, auf zutreffenden Beobachtungen fußend, in einem besonderen Abschnitt seines Werkes zusammengefaßt. Er überschreibt denselben mit: "Some Observations upon the Appearance and Character of the Sea Coast of Tierra del Fuego; a brief Description of the Anchorages; and a few Remarks upon the Seasons, Wind, and Weather."

Die Matrosen konnten die Suche nach dem für sie wichtigsten Boote nicht aufgeben und fuhren von einem Beiwohl zum andern. Schon vier ganze Wochen lang hatten sie sich erfolglos bemüht und konnten endlich wieder zur Bibile zurück, wo der fehlende Boot entwendet worden war. Sie hielten jene Eingeborenen, denen sie hier von neuem ansichtig wurden, für die Bootsdiebe und überfielen sie. In einem wüsten Handgemenge wurde ein Indianer getötet, andere entwichen und mehrere Personen — zwei Männer, drei Frauen und zwei Kinder — wurden gefangen genommen. „When fairly embarked, and before we asked any questions, the natives around very anxious to tell us where our boat was; but pointed in a direction quite opposite to that which they had previously shown us." In der Hoffnung, endlich das langgesuchte Boot zu erreichen, suchte die gelungene Mannschaft in der angegebenen Richtung weiter. Die Eingeborenen wurden scharf bewacht; trotzdem entwichen einem Nachts drei Männer in den dichten Wald, wo sie nicht mehr eingefangen werden konnten.

Unerwartet erreichten die Matrosen ihre durch einen besonderen Umstand erschwerten Bemühungen fast. „Next day (19th February 1830) I passed over to Gilbert Island, and in a cave found such recent marks of natives, that I felt sure of coming up with the chase in the course of the day. When the Fuegians stop anywhere, they generally hack a few trees, to repair their canoes or cover their wigwams; but those whose traces we were following, had made long journeys without stopping; and, where they did stay, hacked no trees, which was one reason for supposing them to be the party in our boat. In the course of the day we pulled nearly round the Gilbert Islands, looking into every cave."

Entmutigt durch die Nutzlosigkeit aller Anstrengungen gab der Kommandant endlich weitere Bemühungen auf. In Händen einzelner Indianer, denen er begegnet war, hatte er wohl Stellfeder und kleinere Gegenstände entdeckt, die der Mannschaft des verlorenen Bootes entwendet worden waren; dieses letztere jedoch konnte er nirgends auffinden. Wieder waren einige Tage untätig vergangen und so entschloß man sich schließlich zum Hauptschiffe zurückzukehren. „We reached the 'Beagle' in the evening (23rd Febr. 1830), but found that all the other prisoners, excepting those children, had escaped by swimming ashore during the preceding night. Thus, after much trouble and anxiety, much valuable time lost, and as fine a boat of her kind as ever was seen being stolen from us by these savages, I found myself with these young children to take care of, and no prospect whatever of recovering the boat ... Much time had certainly been spent in this search, yet it ought not to be considered as altogether lost"; denn verschiedene Beobachtungen von Bedeutung für die allgemeingeographische Auffassung und für die Schiffbarkeit jener Gegend sind währenddessen durchgeführt worden.

Mit vollem Rechte konnte somit der Oberbefehlshaber folgendes Ergebnis buchen: „Considering the extent of coast we had already examined, we ought to be thankful for having experienced no other disaster of any kind, and for having had the means of replacing his loss" (King: 389—405).

Das erste Zusammentreffen des Kapitäns Fitz-Roy mit den Yamana war für ihn mit so viel Enttäuschung und Benachteiligung verbunden,[*] daß aller Wahrscheinlichkeit nach diese unangenehme Erfahrung mit ihnen nicht ohne Einfluß auf seine spätere Gesamtbeurteilung jener Eingeborenen und ihrer Einrichtungen geblieben sein konnte. Eine überaus wichtige Überzeugung aber hat er bereits hier, im Stewart Harbour in der Bahía Desolada gewonnen, die er am 20. Februar 1830 niederschrieb: „I became convinced that so long as we were ignorant of the Fuegian language, and the natives were equally ignorant of ours, we should never know much about them, or the interior of their country; nor would there be the slightest chance of their being raised one step above the low place which they then held in our estimation. Their words seemed to be short, but to have many meanings, and their pronunciation was harsh and guttural."

Die Schiffe hielten sich noch immer bei den außenliegenden Eilanden. Der Flottenführer schickte am 2. März 1830 den Obermaat mit einigen Matrosen zu Vermessungen aus und „he might have been expected to return in a week or ten days... Two of the three children, left by their mother at Stewart, Fuegians he might find most to the westward, whence they would soon find their friends. The third, who was about eight years old, was still with us: she seemed to be so happy and healthy, that I determined to detain her as a hostage for the stolen boat and try to teach her English" (King: 409). So kam dieses unmündige Mädchen auf die englische Flotte.

Endlich glaubte sich der Kapitän frei von den lästigen Eingeborenen. Doch schon am Morgen des nächsten Tages „some Fuegians in a canoe approached us, seeming anxious to come on board. I had no wish for their company, and was sorry to see that they had found us out; for it was to be expected that they would soon pay us nightly as well as daily visits, and steal every thing left within their reach. Having made signs for them to leave us, without effect, I sent Mr. Wilson to drive them away, and fire a pistol over their heads, to frighten them. They then went back, but only round a point of land near the ship; so I sent the boat again to drive them out of the harbour, and deter them from paying us another visit. Reflecting, while Mr. Wilson was following them, that by getting one of these natives on board, there would be a chance of his learning enough English to be an interpreter, and that by his means we might recover our lost boat, I resolved to take the youngest man on board, as he, in all probability, had less strong ties to bind him to his people than others who were older, and might have families. With these ideas I went after them, and hauling their canoe alongside of my boat, told a young man to come into it; he did so, quite unconcernedly, and sat down, apparently contented and at his ease.[36] The others said nothing, either to me or to him, but paddled out of the harbour as fast as they could. They seemed to belong to the same tribe as those we had last seen. This afternoon (4th March 1830) ... FUEGIA BASKET[37] told YORK MINSTER[38] — the man I took out of the canoe — all her story; at some parts of which he laughed heartily. FUEGIA, cleaned and dressed, was much improved in appearance: she was already a pet on the lower deck, and appeared to be quite contented. YORK MINSTER was sullen at first, yet his appetite did not fail; and whatever he received more than he could eat, he stowed away in a corner: but as soon as he was well cleaned and clothed, and allowed to go about where he liked in the vessel, he became much more cheerful" (KING: 409).

Wenige Tage später traf FITZ-ROY, in einem kleinen Hafen, auf eine aus vierzehn Männern und zwei Frauen bestehende Schar von Eingeborenen. Aus Furcht vor ihnen, „I resolved to drive them out of the harbour, as it was absolutely necessary. Already they, or their countrymen, had robbed us of a boat, and endangered the lives of several persons; and had they been allowed to remain near us, the loss of that part of another boat which was already built would have followed ... Another motive for searching the canoes, arose from seeing so many men without women ... At all events they came prepared for war, being much painted, wearing white bands on their heads, carrying their slings and spears, and having left all their children and dogs, with most of their women, in some other place. Two boats being manned and armed, I went with Lieut. KEMPE and Mr. WILSON to chase the Fuegians, who were paddling towards another part of the harbour. Seeing the boats approaching, they landed and got on the top of a rock, leaving the canoes underneath with the two women. From their manner I saw they were disposed to be hostile, and we therefore approached leisurely. Their canoes being within our reach, I told the bowman to haul one alongside that we might search it, but no sooner did his boathook touch it, than a shower of stones of all sizes came upon us; and one man was knocked down, apparently killed, by the blow of a large stone on the temple. We returned their volley with our firearms, but I believe without hitting one of them. Stones and balls continued to be exchanged till the cutter came to our assistance. The Fuegians then got behind a rock, where we could not see them and kept close. Their canoes we took, and finding in them some bottles and part of our lost boat's gear, we destroyed them" (KING: 413). Nach diesem Vorfall fürchteten sich die Indianer und

[36] Auf diese Weise kam der zweite Vertreter des Yamana-Stammes an Bord des englischen Schiffes, wo kurz vorher bereits die kaum achtjährige FUEGIA BASKET aufgenommen worden war.

[37] Diesen Namen gab FITZ-ROY dem Yamana-Mädchen „in remembrance of the basket-like canoe by which we received intelligence of the loss of our boat" (KING: 410).

verstockten sich im Walde auf der Isla Wittlebury. Als sie am nächsten Tage das Boot ihrer europäischen Angreifer sich nähern sahen, löschten sie ihre Feuer aus, um ihren Gegnern die Möglichkeit zu nehmen, sie zu erkennen. Die Matrosen indes durchforschten den Lagerplatz, fanden jedoch nur leere Hütten und daneben „a piece of 'King's white line', quite new, was picked up; therefore our boat had been there, or these were some of the people who stole her. . . Looking round on the other side of that island, we saw two canoes paddling right away from the islands. Knowing . . . that they were the fugitives from the wigwams, we gave chase, and came up with them before they could land, but so close to the shore that while securing one canoe, the other escaped. From that which we seized a young man and a girl jumped overboard, deserting an old woman and a child, whom we left in order to chase the young man; but he was so active in the water that it was fully a quarter of an hour before we could get him into our boat. Having at last secured him,[*] we followed the others, but they had all handed and hidden, so we returned across the sound with our captive" (King: 415). Die Jagd auf eine andere kleine Gruppe erwies sich bald als erfolglos und wurde eingestellt. „So by thus harassing them I hoped to be freed from any more of their visits while we remained in the neighbourhood."

Die bisherigen Erfahrungen zugrunde legend macht Fitz-Roy gerechtfertigte Schlüsse auf die Art, wie Europäer jene Eingeborenen behandeln müssen und begründet das folgendermaßen: „The bodily strength of these savages is very great (York Minster is as strong as any two of our stoutest men), which, with their agility, both on shore and in the water, and their quickness in attack and defence with stones and sticks, makes them difficult to deal with when out of their canoes. They are a brave, hardy race, and fight to the last struggle; though in the manner of a wild beast, it must be owned, else they would not, when excited, defy a whole boat's crew, and, single-handed, try to kill the men, as I have witnessed. That kindness towards these beings, and good treatment of them, is as yet useless, I almost think, both from my own experience and from much that I have heard of their conduct to sealing vessels. Until a mutual understanding can be established, moral fear is the only means by which they can be kept peaceable. As they see only vessels which when their boats are away have but a few people on board, their idea of the power of Europeans is very poor, and their dread of fire-arms not nearly so great as might be imagined" (King: 415). Sicherlich aber wird zur Befriedung jener Eingeborenen der betrübliche Umstand nicht beigetragen haben, daß wieder ein junger Indianer von jenen Europäern auf ihr Schiff verschleppt wurde.

[*] Dieser Mann ist der dritte Yamana, der der Übermacht dieser Engländer sich ergeben mußte und von ihnen, gleichzeitig mit seinen beiden Landsleuten, fortgeführt wurde. In England erlag er schon nach einem Monat den Blattern und hat sein Heimatland nie mehr wiedergesehen.

Fitz-Roy fährt mit seiner Beschreibung fort: „From this cove we returned to the 'Beagle'. My Fuegian captive, whom I named 'Boat Memory', seemed frightened, but not low-spirited; he eat enormously, and soon fell fast asleep. The meeting between him and York Minster was very tame, for, at first, they would not appear to recognise or speak to each other. Boat was the best-featured Fuegian I had seen, and being young and well made, was a very favourable specimen of the race: York was one of the stoutest men I had observed among them; but little Fuegia was almost as broad as she was high: she seemed to be so merry and happy, that I do not think she would willingly have quitted us. Three natives of Tierra del Fuego, better suited for the purpose of instruction, and for giving, as well as receiving information, could not, I think, have been found" (King: 416).

Dem soeben eingefangenen Yamana-Manne fiel es besonders schwer, sich an das Leben auf dem Schiffe und an das Zusammensein mit den beiden anderen Stammesgenossen zu gewöhnen. Schon am folgenden Tage, dem 10. März 1830, machte Fitz-Roy einige Beobachtungen, die ihn über seine Absichten mit den drei Feuerländern etwas beruhigten. Er schreibt: „This morning, having been well cleaned and dressed, Boat appeared contented and easy; and being together, kept York and him in better spirits than they would probably otherwise have been, for they laughed, and tried to talk, by imitating whatever was said. Fuegia soon began to learn English, and to say several things very well. She laughed and talked with her countrymen incessantly." Der Flottenführer nahm sich seiner Gefangenen gleich anfangs mit aufrichtiger Menschenfreundlichkeit an und hat sie alle später aufs beste in England betreut. Seine Bemühungen um diese drei Vertreter eines sehr primitiven Volkes werden weiter unten noch ausführlich dargestellt. Zum Verständnis aber all dessen schien es angebracht zu sein, bei welch merkwürdigem Spiel des Schicksals jene drei Yamana auf die englischen Expeditionsschiffe gekommen sind.

Wenige Tage später, am 14. März 1830, traf Fitz-Roy abermals mit einigen Feuerländern zusammen: „most of whom were armed with slings, spears, and cutting weapons made with pieces of iron hoop fastened on a stick. They were very troublesome, expecially at night, and obliged him [den Bootsmaat] to keep them at a distance. Their respect for a musket was not so great as might have been expected, and unless they saw it tolerably close, and pointed directly at them, they cared not. The boat's crew bought some fish from them, for buttons and other trifles. From forty to fifty men, besides women and children, were seen in one place alone; and many were met elsewhere" (King: 417).

Auf der Weiterfahrt kamen den Engländern zunächst keine Eingeborenen mehr zu Gesicht. Am 3. April 1830 verzeichnete Fitz-Roy in seinem Tagebuch: „Our Fuegians were becoming very cheerful, and apparently contented. We gave them as much fresh provision (birds and fish) as we could obtain with guns and lines, and hitherto they had fared very well. All that was shot went to one stock, from which it was divided in rotation to the messes, the sick being first provided for, and then the Fuegians" (King: 427).

Doch schon nach zwei Tagen stellten sich wieder andere feuerländische Besucher ein, wahrscheinlich Leute der Wollaston-Dialektgruppe. Nur so erklärt sich die sprachliche Verschiedenheit der drei Yamana an Bord von den neuen Gästen, die hier in der Bahia Schapenham, im Südosten der Peninsula Hardy, auftauchten. Fitz-Roy indes „was sadly grieved at finding that some Fuegians who arrived were not of the same tribe as our captives, nor even spoke the same language. On the contrary, much enmity appeared to exist between them, though their colour, features, and habits were similar. At first, York and Boat would not go near them, but afterwards took delight in trying to cheat them out of the things they offered to barter, and mocked their way of speaking and deck; but the instant she saw them, screamed and ran away. Some one told her, in jest, to go into their canoe and live with them, which frightened her so much, that she burst into tears and ran below to hide herself. After they were gone, Boat and York made us understand they had had fights with that tribe, and showed the scars of wounds received from them. By the help of signs we could comprehend much of their meaning, but very few words were yet learned on either side" (King: 427). Dieses Erlebnis bringt deutlich zum Ausdruck, daß sich Feindschaften zwischen den einzelnen Gruppen entwickelten, die zuweilen sehr lange anhielten.

Am gleichen Tage beobachtete der Flottenführer die besondere Form der Wohnhütte und der Fischangel der dortigen Eingeborenen. Auf Grund dessen gab er sich auch jetzt wieder klar Rechenschaft von den örtlichen Verschiedenheiten der indianischen Gebrauchsgegenstände innerhalb des eng-begrenzten Heimatgebietes.

Währenddessen war der Schiffsoffizier Murray damit beschäftigt, den nördlichen Teil der großen Bahia Nassau auszukundschaften. Wie er seinem Befehlshaber, dessen Schiff gut verankert in der Bahia Orange lag, am 14. April 1830 berichtete, sah er „great numbers of natives near the narrow passage [100] and upwards of a hundred canoes were seen in one day, each containing from two to six people. These Fuegians had much guanaco skin, and many of the bones of that animal made into spear-heads, but very little seal-skin. The wigwams were large and commodious, compared with those of the western tribes, being built of small trees piled up endwise, and tied together at the top, their outside being covered with bushes, grass, etc, to keep out the cold, and the earth inside scooped out much below the surface of the ground. Some could hold about twice as many people as the western wigwams: but all were not so large. Every canoe gave chase to our boat, eager to see the strangers, and exchange small fish, spear-heads, or arrows, for buttons, beads, and other trifles. No arms or offensive weapons were seen among them, excepting fish spears, bows, arrows, and slings: they had not even clubs nor such lances as are used by the western tribes. They seemed to be more tractable, and less disposed to quarrel than those of the west. Wherever the boat went, she was followed by a train of canoes, each full of people, and having a fire smoking in the middle. Where they got the guanaco skins was a question not easy to answer . . .[101] One native showed how they ran, and their shape, and how they were killed, also the kind of noise they made" (King: 429).

In den folgenden Tagen wurde die Erforschung der Isla Kap Hoorn und ihrer nächsten Umgebung durchgeführt. Bei nördlicher Fahrtrichtung erreichte die Flotte vorerst die Isla Nueva und ankerte in einem Hafen der Isla Lennox. Ein Teil der Mannschaft suchte nun die südlichen und östlichen Ufer der Isla Navarino ab. Am 5. Mai 1830, nahe der Bahia Windhond, „we saw four fine guanacoes feeding close to the water. They did not seem to be much alarmed; but walked away from us round a projecting part of the shore" (King: 439).[102] Auch hier wurden „several canoes, full of natives" gesichtet.

Am Abend des 6. Mai 1830 richteten sich die Seeleute nahe der Angostura Murray ein einfaches Nachtlager ein. In der Morgenfrühe des nächsten Tages, „soon after we set out, many canoes were seen in chase of us: but though they paddled fast in smooth water, our boat moved too quickly for them to succeed in their endeavours to barter with us, or to gratify their curiosity . . . When we stopped to cook and eat our dinner, canoes came from all sides, bringing plenty of fish for barter. None of the natives had any arms; they seemed to be smaller in size, and less disposed to be mischievous, than the western race: their languages sounded similar to that of the natives whom we saw in Orange Bay. We found a very large wigwam, built in a substantial manner,[103] and a much better place to live in than many of the huts which are called houses in Chiloe. I think twenty men might have stood upright in it, in a circle; but, probably, of these Fuegians, it would house thirty or forty in the cold weather" (King: 439). Bald traf Fitz-Roy hierselbst mit Eingeborenen zusammen. „These Fuegians appeared to think the excrescences which grow on the birch trees, like the gallnuts on an oak, an estimable dainty. They offered us several, some as large as an apple, and seemed surprised at our refusal. Most of them had a small piece of guanaco, or sealskin, on their shoulders or bodies, but not enough for warmth: perhaps they did not willingly approach strangers with their usual skin dress about them, their first impulse, on seeing us, being to hide it. Several, whom I surprised at their wigwams, had large skins round their bodies, which they concealed directly they saw me. Fish and the birch fungus must be their chief food, for shell-fish are scarce and small: but they catch an abundance of excellent rock-fish, smelt, and what might be called a yellow mullet. Guanaco meat may occasionally be obtained by them, but not in sufficient quantity to be depended upon as an article of daily subsistence" (King: 440).

[101] Dennoch läßt sich diese Frage leicht beantworten; denn auf der Isla Navarino gab und gibt es eine gute Zahl von Guanacos. Mitglieder der "Nassauischen Flotte" haben diese großen Tiere bereits entdeckt (S. 35, Fußnote 43). Daß von dorther jene Gegenstände herstammen mußten, deutet Fitz-Roy (ib.) selber an; schreibt er doch, daß „the people made signs to Mr. Murray that they came from the eastward", wo die genannte Insel liegt, und „none pointed towards the north". Einen Monat später sah er selber an den Ufern der Bahia Windhond „several guanacoes near the shore as we passed along" (King: 445). Sogar auf der Isla Nueva beobachtete Murray „a large guanaco, and just afterwards a whole herd feeding, for which he seemed to be doing the duty of a sentinel . . . Traces of, and paths made by guanacoes, were very numerous in every direction" (ib.).

[102] Fitz-Roy (ib.) hat diese Tiere genau beobachtet. „They appeared to be much larger than those I had seen near Port Desire, on the Patagonian coast, their bodies being far heavier, and their tails longer and more bushy." Zwar nicht in diesen, wohl aber in anderen kleinen Äußerlichkeiten unterscheiden sich die Guanacos in den beiden genannten Gebieten voneinander (Vgl. Bd. I, 11).

[103] Die Möglichkeit wäre nicht von der Hand zu weisen, daß diese außergewöhnlich große Hütte für irgend eine der geheimen Zeremonien, wie sie bei den Yamana üblich sind, errichtet worden war.

Die Flotte gelangte bald in den Canal de Beagle hinein und fuhr in westlicher Richtung weiter. „No natives were seen, though a few wigwams of the round-topped kind, were passed. The westernmost sharp-pointed, or Yapoo wigwam, was on the main-land, close to the island of the Devil; it was made of small trees, piled up in a circle (the branches and roots having been broken off) with the smaller ends meeting at the top." Wegen ihrer größeren Maßverhältnisse hielt man diese Hütte für ein "Meeting-House"; auch deshalb, weil man diesen Platz als neutrale Stelle zwischen den beiden benachbarten Gruppen deutete.

„Next day (11. Mai 1830) we landed, for dinner and rest, near the Murray Narrow, and close to a wigwam, whose inmates ran away; but soon returned, on seeing us seated quietly by their fire. We bought fish from them for beads, buttons, etc, and gave a knife for a very fine dog, which they were extremely reluctant to part with; but the knife was too great a temptation to be resisted, though dogs seemed very scarce and proportionably valuable. Afterwards we continued our route, but were stopped when in sight of the Narrow by three canoes full of natives, anxious for barter. We gave them a few beads and buttons, for some fish; and, without any previous intention, I told one of the boys in a canoe to come into our boat, and gave the man who was with him a large shining mother-of-pearl button. The boy got into my boat directly, and sat down.[104] Seeing him and his friends seem quite contented, I pulled onwards, and made sail. Thinking that this accidental occurrence might prove useful to the natives, as well as to ourselves, I determined to take advantage of it. The canoe, from which the boy came, paddled towards the shore; but the others still paddled after us, holding up fish and skins to tempt us to trade with them. 'Jemmy Button', as the boat's crew called him, on account of his price, seemed to be pleased at his change, and fancied he was going to kill guanaco, or wanakòye, as he called them — as they were to be found near that place." Während der Fahrt durch Bahia Windhound „two canoes had come, at different times, to the ship; but the natives were extremely quiet and inoffensive, and, sold our people a large quantity of fish".

[104] So kam der vierte Vertreter des Yamana-Stammes auf das englische Schiff. Niemand konnte ahnen, welche bedeutende und einflußreiche Rolle er später spielen würde.

Über die vier jugendlichen Eingeborenen an Deck der "Beagle" schrieb Fitz-Roy am gleichen Tage, den 13. Mai 1830 ganz kurz: „Our Fuegians were in high spirits, and the meeting between them and Jemmy Button was droll enough: they laughed at him, called him Yapoo, and told us to put more clothes on him directly" (King: 445).

Nicht ungenau ist es, zu sagen, daß die Isla Nueva die Ostgrenze des Yamana-Gebietes darstellt. Murray bestätigt dies: „Near Cape Graham we saw a large party of Indians, with several canoes, one of which, paddled by two men and a woman, came alongside of our boat, and they sold us some fine fish, for the large price of two metal buttons and a small string of beads" (King: 446). Als bald danach, am 19. Mai 1830, die "Beagle" selber am östlichen Ufer der Isla Lennox vor Anker ging, „natives had come alongside at various times, to sell fish for old buttons and other trifles. It was amusing to witness York and Boat taking in these people, by their bargains. The same men who, two months back, would themselves have sold a number of fish for a bit of glass, were seen going about the decks collecting broken crockery-ware, or any trash, to exchange for the fish brought alongside by these 'Yapoos', as they called them; not one word of whose language did they appear to comprehend" (King: 449).

An dieser Stelle endlich verließ die englische Flotte die Heimat der Yamana und steuerte nordwärts in den Atlantischen Ozean hinein. Die "Adventure" und die "Beagle" liefen in Rio de Janeiro am 6. August wieder aus und erreichten Plymouth Sound am 14. Oktober 1830. King führte noch den Oberbefehl über die gesamte Flotte, indes sind die meisten der oben nachgedruckten wertvollen Abschnitte dem Tagebuche des Fitz-Roy, der bereits die "Beagle" befehligte, entnommen. Ein so inhaltsreiches und vielgestaltiges Bild der Lebensgewohnheiten und Besitzgüter jener fernen Inselbewohner hat er auf Grund seiner unmittelbaren Beobachtungen entworfen, daß man dasselbe beim Studium der feuerländischen Kulturverhältnisse nicht missen möchte, deshalb, weil doch bis dahin die Eingeborenen noch nie in so anhaltende Berührung mit den Europäern gelangt waren.[100]

ROBERT FITZ-ROY: Seit 1828 gehörte Kapitän Fitz-Roy der englischen Forschungsexpedition "Adventure" und "Beagle" an, und zwar als Befehlshaber des letztgenannten Schiffes. Auf der Heimfahrt in der ersten Hälfte des Jahres 1830 befanden sich an Bord seines Schiffes die drei jugendlichen Yamana-Männer York Minster, Boat Memory, Jemmy Button und die kleine Fuegia Basket. Ununterbrochen war er darauf bedacht, sie genau kennenzulernen und dadurch einen Einblick in die Gedankenwelt und Geistesverfassung des ganzen Stammes zu gewinnen. Diese Bemühungen setzte er auch weiterhin fort. „During the time which elapsed before we reached England, I had time to see much of my Fuegian companions; and daily became more interested about them as I attained a further acquaintance with their abilities and natural inclinations. Far, very far indeed, were these of the number from deserving to be called savages — even at this early period of their residence among civilized people — though the mother, named York Minster, was certainly a displeasing specimen of uncivilized human nature" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 1). In England selber, wo die Flotte am 14. Oktober 1830 einlief, sorgte er für seine feuerländischen Schützlinge nach bestem Wissen und Können (S. 136). Trotzdem starb Boat Memory an den Blattern bereits November 1830, obwohl er gute Pflege im Royal Naval Hospital zu Devonport erhalten hatte.

In der zweiten Hälfte des Jahres 1831 wiederholte die britische Admiralität ihre frühere Entscheidung, die "Beagle" nochmals in die Kap Hoorn-Gegend zur Fortsetzung der hydrographischen und geographischen Beobachtungen zu entsenden. Der Oberbefehl wurde Fitz-Roy übertragen. Mit Sorgfalt und Eifer traf man die Vorbereitungen für die vielen und verschiedenartigen Bedürfnisse, die "Beagle" selber mußte [illegible] in Dock gehen und gut verstärkt werden. Als diese Arbeiten sich de[illegible] näherten, wurden die drei jungen Yamana mit einer reichen Auswa[illegible] [illegible]lerhand Gegenständen aus Walthamstow geholt, und schließlich besorgte [illegible] genügend Vorräte an guten Lebensmitteln und den besten Instrumenten.[] „Anxious that no opportunity of collecting useful information, during the voyage, should be lost; I proposed to the Hydrographer that some well-educated and scientific person should be sought for who would willingly share such accomodations as I had to offer, in order to profit by the opportunity of visiting distant countries yet little known. Captain Beaufort approved of the suggestion, and wrote to Professor Peacock, of Cambridge, who consulted with a friend, Professor Henslow, and he named Mr. Charles Darwin, grandson of Dr. Darwin the poet, as a young man of promising ability, extremely fond of geology, and indeed all branches of natural history. In consequence an offer was made to Mr. Darwin to be my guest on board, which he accepted conditionally; permission was obtained for his embarkation, and an order given by the Admiralty that he should be borne on the ship's books for provisions. The conditions asked by Mr. Darwin were, that he should be at liberty to leave the 'Beagle' and retire from the Expedition when he thought proper, and that he should pay a fair share of the expenses of my table" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 18).

[] Wie Fitz-Roy (a): 43 selber anerkennt, „never did a vessel leave England better provided, or fitted for the service she was destined to perform, and for the health and comfort of her crew, than the 'Beagle'. If we did want any thing which could have been carried, it was our own fault; for all that was asked for, from the Dockyard, Victualling Department, Navy Board, or Admiralty, was granted". In einem Briefe an Professor Henslow vom 15. Nov. 1831 sagt Charles Darwin (e): 195 übereinstimmend damit: „Kein Schiff hat England je mit einem solchen Satz von Chronometern verlassen, nämlich vierundzwanzig, und ähnlich sehr gute."

Als die "Beagle" den englischen Hafen verließ, waren 74 Personen an Bord. Wegen anhaltender Stürme hat sich die Ausfahrt bis Ende Dezember verzögert; am 27. Dezember 1831 endlich ging sie von Barnpool aus in See.

Nach wiederholtem, verzögerndem Aufenthalt an der östlichen Küste Südamerikas waren gegen Ende des Jahres 1832 die magellanischen Gewässer erreicht. Als das Schiff am 15. Dezember am Cabo Peñas auf dem Ostufer der Isla Grande vorbeifuhr, zeigten sich mehrere Eingeborene. „They were tall men, on foot, nearly naked, and accompanied by several large dogs. York Minster and Jemmy Button asked me to fire at them, saying that they were 'Oens-men', very bad men. Our Fuegian companions seemed to be much elated at the certainty of being so near their own country; and the boy was never tired of telling us how excellent his land was, how glad his friends would be to see him, and how well they would treat us in return for our kindness to him" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 119).

In Bahía Buen Suceso besuchten Darwin, Hamond und andere eine kleine Gruppe von Eingeborenen.[107] „One of the Fuegians was so like York Minster, that he might well have passed for his brother. It was amusing and interesting to see their meeting with York and Jemmy, who would not acknowledge them as countrymen, but laughed at and mocked them. It was evident that both of our Fuegians understood much of the language in which the others talked; but they would not try to interpret, alleging that they did not know enough." Am 22. Dezember wurde Kap Hoorn gesichtet, Bahía Nassau nach schwerem Kampfe mit Sturm und Wellen erreicht, Bahía Windhond vorübergehend als Zufluchtsstätte genommen und in der sicheren Gorre Road der Anker geworfen.

Am 18. Januar 1833 unterbricht Fitz-Roy (a): 129 seine Tagebuchaufzeichnungen und schiebt in sein Werk einen besonderen Abschnitt[108] über die "Southern Aborigines of South America" ein. Er bekennt: „Of the tribes which scantily people Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego, far less is yet known than might generally be expected. Although frequently seen by white men, [107] Dieses Zusammentreffen auf der Isla Grande am 17. Dezember 1832 hat Darwin (d): 231 sehr anschaulich geschildert (Bd. I, 36). Der Originalbericht ist betitelt: Journal of Researches in Geology and Natural History of the various countries visited by H. M. S. "Beagle" under the command of captain Fitz-Roy (London 1839).

[108] Gemeint im "Chapter VII" seines Buches: "Proceedings of the Second Expedition..."

and often holding intercourse with them, probably no person even moderately educated, excepting FALKNER, has staid among them long enough to become acquainted with, and describe their peculiarities." Über die Bewohner des Feuerlandes „a few notices are to be found in narratives of various voyagers; but the imperfect description here given is principally derived from the natives who went to England in the 'Beagle'; and from Mr. Low, who has seen more of them in their own country than any other person".

Diese Selbstbewertung ist quellenkritisch von hoher Bedeutung; denn nachweislich hat FITZ-ROY das heimatliche Gebiet der Yamana nach allen Richtungen hin durchkreuzt und überall kleinere wie größere Gruppen derselben gesehen; für Erklärungen und Deutungen all seiner Beobachtungen blieb er ausschließlich auf das Urteil der jugendlichen Personen angewiesen, die er an Bord der "Beagle" mit sich führte. Allein schon ihr geringes Alter und ihre nicht unbedeutend lange Abwesenheit von den eigenen Landsleuten lassen es begreiflich erscheinen, daß sie selber über viele Dinge keine genaue Anschauung besessen haben konnten. Überdies war ein freier Gedankenaustausch dadurch behindert, daß sie selber der englischen Sprache auch später noch nicht mächtig waren. Wie weit sie sich überhaupt darin mit ihren europäischen Freunden verständlich machen konnten, findet sich nirgends bestimmt angegeben.

Demnach befremdet es nach den Ergebnissen neuzeitlicher Untersuchungen nicht, wenn FITZ-ROY's geographische Abgrenzungen und besondere Benennungen der einzelnen Stammesgruppen meistenteils unzuverlässig sind. Das gilt bereits für die Kennzeichnung der Yamana als Volkseinheit; schreibt er doch: „Beyond a range of high mountains to the southward of the Yamana [die südlichsten Tehuelche], is the tribe formerly called Key-uhue, now probably the Tekeenica. These are the smallest, and apparently the most wretched of the Fuegians. They inhabit the shores and neighbourhood of the Beagle Channel. The number of adults in this tribe may be about five hundred."

Auch weist er mit sicherer Beurteilung auf die Schwierigkeiten der Forschung hin: „The difficulty of obtaining either language or information from the Fuegians can only be well appreciated by those who have had intercourse with them, or with the New Hollanders; whose mimickry of what one says is as perplexing as the same trick is when speaking to the Fuegians" (FITZ-ROY [a]: 132). Geographisch trennt er von den Nachbargebieten die eigentliche "Tierra del Fuego" ab und rechnet hierher „all the islands southward of the Strait of Magalhaens (including Staten Land), as far as the Diego Ramirez islets".

Die körperliche Beschreibung der Yamana ist treffend ausgefallen, weil der Wirklichkeit und vielen Beobachtungen entnommen: „The Tekeenica, natives of the south-eastern portion of Tierra del Fuego, are low in stature, ill-looking, and badly proportioned. Their colour is that of very old mahogany, or rather between dark copper and bronze. The trunk of the body is large, in proportion to their cramped and rather crooked limbs. Their rough, coarse, and extremly dirty black hair half hides yet heightens a villainous expression of the worst description of savage features. Passing so much time in low wigwams, or cramped in small canoes, injures the shape and size of their legs, and causes them to move about in a stooping manner, with the knees much bent; yet they are very nimble, and rather strong.

They suffer very little hair to grow, excepting on their heads. Even their eyebrows are almost eradicated — two muscleshells serving for pincers. This aversion to the smaller tufts of hair does not extend to the thatch-like covering of their ugly heads, which is lank, covered with dirt, hanging about their ears, and almost over their faces. Just above their eyes it is jagged away by a broken shell, if they have not a piece of iron hoop for a knife, the pieces cut off being scrupulously burned. In height varying from four feet ten to five feet six, yet in the size of their bodies equalling men of six feet, of course they look clumsy and ill-proportioned: but their hands and feet are rather small with respect to the size of their bodies, though not so in proportion to their limbs and joints, which, excepting the knees, are small. Their knees are all strained, and their legs injured in shape, by the habit of squatting upon their heels. Awkward and difficult as such a posture appears to us, it is to them a position of easy rest." Über die Gestalt der Frauen fügt er hinzu: „They are short, with bodies largely out of proportion to their height; their features, especially those of the old, are scarcely less disagreeable than the repulsive ones of the men. About four feet and some inches is the stature of these fire-Fuegians — by courtesy called women. They never walk upright: a stooping posture, and awkward movement, is their natural gait. They may be fit mates for such uncouth men; but to civilized people their appearance is disgusting. Very few exceptions were noticed. The colour of the women is similar to that of the men. As they are just as much exposed, and do harder work, this is a natural consequence: besides, while children, they run about quite naked, picking up shell-fish, carrying wood, or bringing water. In the colour of the older people there is a tinge of yellow, which is not noticed in the middle-aged or young. The smoke of wood fires, confined in small wigwams, hurts their eyes so much, that they are red and watery."[109]

Aus den Angaben über Kleidung, Schmuck und Körperpflege sollen an dieser Stelle nur wenige wiederholt werden, alles Weitere findet sich an passenden Stellen dieser Abhandlung eingestreut: „Sometimes these satires upon mankind wear a part of the skin of a guanaco or a seal-skin upon their backs, and perhaps the skin of a penguin or a bit of hide hangs in front; but often there is nothing either to hide their nakedness or to preserve warmth, excepting a scrap of hide, which is tied to the side or back of the body, by a string round the waist."[110] Women wear rather more clothing

[109] Noch ausführlicher ist die Beschreibung der körperlichen Besonderheiten der Feuerländer, die Fitz-Roy (a): 175 weiter unten gibt und die fast ausschließlich für unsere Yamana gilt.

[110] Ungenau indes ist es, wenn er diesen eigentlichen Röckenbehang folgendermaßen deutet: „Even this is only for a pocket, in which they may carry stones for their slings, and hide what they pick up or pilfer."

[than men], that is, they have nearly a whole skin of a guanaco, or seal, wrapped about them, and usually a diminutive apron. The upper part of the wrapper, above a string which is tied around the waist, serves to carry an infant. Neither men nor women have any substitute for shoes."

Nun folgen noch einige Worte, die den Gesamteindruck dieser Indianer auf Europäer vervollständigen: „The effects of their oiling, or greasing themselves, and then rubbing ochre, clay, or charcoal, over their bodies; of their often feeding upon the most offensive substances, sometimes in a state of putridity; and of other vile habits, may readily be imagined" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 139).

Nach knappen Angaben über die Wohnhütte und das Kanu der Yamana beschließt er seine Mitteilungen über sie mit einer eindrucksvollen Schilderung der Landschaft: „The country of this people may be briefly described by saying that deep but narrow arms of the sea intersect high mountainous islands, many of whose summits are covered with snow, while the lee or eastern sides of their steep and rocky shores are more than partially covered with evergreen woods. Between projecting rocky points are sandy or stony beaches, fronting very small spaces of level land, on which the huts of the natives are generally placed. Almost throughout the year, cloudy weather, rain, and much wind prevail; indeed, really fine days are very rare. Being so near the level of that great climate agent, the ocean, frost and snow are far less frequent than might be expected in a high latitude, among snow-covered mountains, of which the sight alone inclines one to shiver."[111]

In den darauf folgenden Tagebuchaufzeichnungen finden sich noch sehr viele Beobachtungen über die Eingeborenen eingestreut. Um jeden falschen Schluß aus seiner Schreibweise zu verhüten, macht er selber eigens aufmerksam und betont: „As there is much similarity in the habits of all the tribes above-mentioned who use canoes, and we know little of the Yacana [die Yamana],[112] I shall speak . . . of the Canoe Indians, as one body" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 143).

Will man demnach jene Mitteilungen herausgreifen, die sich bestimmt und ausschließlich auf die Yamana beziehen, kann man nicht umhin, den Reiseweg der "Beagle" genau zu verfolgen und dabei zu beachten, ob sich die Mannschaft im Gebiete dieses Indianerstammes oder in der Heimat der Halakwulup aufhält. Indes paßt folgendes Verhalten in gleicher Weise auf beide

[111] Ausführlich und zusammenfassend hat Fitz-Roy (b): 1—64 und (b): 311—317 die Wetterbedingungen jener Gebiete beschrieben.

[112] Seine Bedenken über die unzulängliche Schreibweise der befremdlich klingenden Worte und mancher Eigennamen hilft er nicht stärkt; zum mindesten kann man daraus ersehen, wie sehr er sich um möglichste Genauigkeit in all seinen Beobachtungen bemüht. Unumwunden bekennt er: „There is so much difficulty in deciding upon the orthography of words whose sounds are variously given by individuals even of the same tribe, and which, caught by ears of varying acuteness, are written down according to the pronunciation of different languages, that one may trace some connexion between the names Ky-es, Ky-yus; Kyuhuns or Kyuhus; Kokwiha, or Tekenica, and Kenecka. This last term is taken from Van Noort (Burney, vol. II, p. 215). Perhaps the country there called 'Cain' may be that inhabited by Jemmy Button's Gua-mers."

Schmerr: „When discovered by strangers, the instant impulse of a Fuegian family is to run off into the wood with their children, and such things as they can carry with them. After a short time, if nothing hostile is attempted by the intruders, and if they are not too numerous, the men return cautiously, making friendly signs, waving pieces of skins, rubbing and patting their bellies, and shouting. If all goes on quietly, the women frequently return, bringing with them the children; but they always leave the most valuable skins hidden in the bushes. This hasty concealment of and or other skins in the woods of visits from seamen,[100] who frequently robbed Fuegians families of every skin in their possession, before the natives understood the motives of their expeditions in boats into the interior waters of Tierra del Fuego. Sometimes nothing will induce a single individual of the family to appear; men, women and children hide in the thick woods, where it would be almost impossible to find them and do not show themselves again until the strangers are gone; but during the whole time of their concealment a watchful look-out is kept by them upon the motions of their unwelcome visitors.

Scarcity of food, and the facility with which they move from one place to another in their canoes, are, no doubt, the reasons why the Fuegians are always so dispersed among the islands in small family parties, why they never remain long in one place, and why a larger number are not seen many days in society. They never attempt to make use of the soil by any kind of culture; seals, birds, fish, and particularly shell-fish, being their principal subsistence; any one place, therefore, soon ceases to supply the wants of even one family; hence they are always migratory. In a few places, where the meeting of tides causes a constant supply of fish, especially, porpoises, and where the land is broken into multitudes of irregular inlets and rocks, whose shores afford an almost inexhaustible quantity of shell-fish, a few families may be found at one time, numbering altogether among them from twenty to forty souls; but even these approaches towards association are rare, and those very families are so migratory by nature, that they do not remain many months in such a spot, however productive it may be, but go wandering away among the numerous secluded inlets or sounds of their country, or repair to the outer sea-coast in search of seals, a dead whale, or fragments of some wrecked ship" (Fitz-Roy (a): 177).

Der englische Flottenführer, der ein offenes Auge für die merkwürdige Lebensart der Feuerländer besitzt, bemüht sich auch weiterhin, seine Erfahrungen und Beobachtungen treu und wahr niederzuschreiben. So gelingt es ihm, ein ziemlich vollständiges Bild von der gesamten gegenständlichen Kultur und täglichen Beschäftigung dieser Eingeborenen zu entwerfen, zwar nur in groben Zügen und in allgemein gehaltenen Andeutungen, doch immerhin im Wesentlichen unterrichtet. Was er über Religion und Geisterfurcht, über Seelenglaube und Bestattung der Toten, über gesellschaftliche und ehelichen Ein-richtungen, über Nahrungsverzehrung und Jagdwaffen, über Wohnung und Kleidung, endlich über Waffen, Werkzeuge und Geräthschaften aufgezeichnet hat, soll weiter unten in die eigentliche Abhandlung eingefügt werden. Auffallen dürfte es, wie nachdrücklich er für die bei den Yamana übliche Menschenfresserei eintritt, obwohl es, wie auch Capitan Dumont, sich dafür doch nur auf wenige, durchaus ungewöhnliche Ausnahmen der jugendlichen, von den nach England geführten Eingeborenen eximiren kann. In jedem Kapitel seiner Tagebücher finden sich noch manche für die Ziele des vorliegenden Werkes geeignete Mittheilungen; mehr Raum indes stellt es im 2. Bande der "Narrative" für all jene Ereignisse frei, die sich an die Rückkehr der drei Yamana aus Europa an ihren Landsleuten und an den allerdings mißglückte Einpflanzen einer englischen "Kolonisationsi" unserm MATTHEWS in ihr Gebiet knüpften.

Fitz-Roy (II: 285) setzte seine Schilderungen wirklich ab und zwar in „Jemmy's 'own land', which he called Woollya"; trotz mancher Bedenken hielt er nach dem englischen Kaufmann MATTHEWS bei den Eingeborenen zurück.

Eigenartig war das erste Zusammentreffen der drei aus Europa Heimkehrenden mit ihren Landsleuten nach langem Getrenntsein. Bei der Einfahrt in die Angostura Murray am 20. Januar 1833 „several natives were seen in this day's pull; but as Jemmy told us they were not his friends, and often made war upon his people, we held very little intercourse with them. YORK laughed heartily at the first we saw, calling them large monkeys; and JEMMY assured us they were not at all like his people, who were very good and very clean. FUEGIA was shocked and ashamed, she hid herself, and would not look at them a second time. It was interesting to observe the change which three years only had made in their ideas, and to notice how completely they had forgotten the appearance and habits of their former associates; for it turned out that Jemmy's own tribe was as inferior in every way to the worst of those whom he and York called 'monkeys — dirty — fiends — bad men'. We gave these 'Fuegians' to York, called them, some presents, and crossed over to the north side of the channel to be free from their importunities; but they followed us speedily".

Auf der Weiterfahrt „we passed along a tract of country where no natives were seen. Jemmy told us it was 'land between bad people and his friends'; (neutral-ground probably)". Kurz danach wurde „a small party of Tekeenica natives, Jemmy's friends" sichtbar. Die Sprache dieser Gruppe, „who were the first of Jemmy's own tribe whom we met, seemed softer and less guttural than those of the 'bad men' whom we had passed near the clay cliffs; and the people themselves seemed much better disposed, though as abject and degraded in outward appearance as any Fuegians I had ever seen". Hier erlebte Fitz-Roy (II: 294) einige merkwürdige Überraschungen und erfuhr manches über die feindlichen Einfälle der Selk'nam in das Yamanagebiet.

Als sich die kleine Flotte zur Weiterfahrt einrichtete, sah sie von allen Seiten die Kanus der Eingeborenen herankommen; um aber von ihnen, die mit JEMMY und YORK befreundet waren, nicht belästigt zu werden, eilte sie schnell davon. „In a very short time there were thirty or forty canoes in our train, each full of natives, each with a column of blue smoke rising from the fire amidships, and almost all the men in them shouting at the full power of their deep sonorous voices ... After a few hours (pulling hard to keep ahead of our train) we reached Woollya, and selected a clear space favourably situated for our encampment, landed, placed sentries, and made the various arrangements necessary for receiving the anticipated visits of some hundred natives." Ohne Verzug wurden dortselbst für MATTHEWS und seine drei indianischen Begleiter geräumige Blockhäuser errichtet, in denen sie bequem wohnen und ihre vielen Geschenke unterbringen konnten. JEMMY sah hier auch seine Mutter und Brüder wieder. Die Erzählung über das Verhalten und Schicksal der soeben Gelandeten möchte ich hier abbrechen und in anderem Zusammenhange später wieder aufnehmen.

Danach begab sich FITZ-ROY (a): 210 mit seinen beiden Booten durch die Angostura Murray in den westlichen Canal de Beagle zu neuen Forschungen. Öfters begegneten ihm größere und kleinere Gruppen von Eingeborenen, denen er regelmäßig auswich. Bis Cabo Desolación drang er vor und kehrte bald in östlicher Richtung zurück; überall machte er geographische Entdeckungen und benannte u. a. den "Darwin-Sound" nach seinem jungen, wissenschaftlichen Begleiter. Am 4. Februar 1833, „nearly opposite to Shingle Point, we met a large party of natives. All of them appeared in full dress, being bedaubed with red and white paint, and ornamented, after their fashion, with feathers and the down of geese. One of their women was noticed by several among us as being far from ill-looking: her features were regular, and, excepting a deficiency of hair on the eyebrow, and rather thick lips, the contour of her face was sufficiently good to have been mistaken for that of a handsome gipsy. What her figure might be, a loose linen garment, evidently one that had belonged to FUEGIA BASKET, prevented our noticing. The sight of this piece of linen, several bits of ribbon, and some scraps of red cloth, apparently quite recently obtained, made me feel very anxious about MATTHEWS and his party ... At daybreak next morning (6th Feb.) we were again hastening towards Woollya".

Die Überraschung und Enttäuschung war nicht gering. Angesichts der anscheinend bedrohlichen Haltung der Eingeborenen glaubte FITZ-ROY den hilflosen MATTHEWS in dieser Wildnis nicht zurücklassen zu dürfen. Letzterer fügte sich und begab sich auf das Boot. Eiligst wurden all seine Sachen verladen, ohne daß die Indianer zu Gewalttaten oder Räuberien schritten. Ergebnislos also endete der schöne, bestgemeinte Plan, unter der Anleitung und durch das Beispiel eines opfermutigen, selbstlosen Engländers die dortigen Eingeborenen zu einer bequemeren Lebensweise und höheren Gesittung zu führen.

Währenddessen lag die "Beagle" im Canal Gerre verankert. Dorthin steuerten nun die beiden Boote wieder zurück und fanden alles in bester Ord-sung. Indes schon nach zwei Tagen, am 10. Februar 1833, segelte sie abermals zu Vermessungen aus, durchquerten Bahia Nassau „and explored the western part of Pennemky Sound. Natives were seen here and there, but we had little intercourse with them" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 223). Noch einmal landete die Mannschaft für einige Stunden an der Küste von "Woollya" [Walaia], um nach dem Befinden der drei sechzehn aus Europa heimgebrachten Yamana zu schauen. Diese schienen sich, trotz einiger Mißhelligkeiten, bei ihren Landsleuten wieder zurechtgefunden zu haben. So nahmen Fitz-Roy, Matthews und die englischen Matrosen vom ihnen Abschied, kehrten in ihren Booten zur "Beagle" zurück und rüsteten sich zur Fahrt nach dem Norden. Am 21. Februar gingen sie unter Segel und kamen schon in der folgenden Nacht in der Bahia Buen Suceso die Anker werfen. Weil die Flotte dringend sich neu verproviantieren mußte, fuhr sie über die Falklandinseln nach Montevideo.

Noch war die umfangreiche Forschungsarbeit dieser englischen Schiffe im unbekannten inkognito Süden der Neuen Welt nicht beendet. Am 6. December 1833 aber, „with a supply of provisions and coals, sufficient for at least nine months, the 'Beagle' and her tender [the 'Adventure'] sailed together from Monte Video" (Fitz-Roy [a]: 314), abermals südwärts. Bei günstiger Witterung „on the 25th Feb. 1834, we anchored at the Hermite Islands, on the north-east side of Wollaston Island. Thence, on the 27th, we crossed Nassau Bay to Gower Sound, and the following day entered the Beagle Channel. The 1st of March passed in replenishing our wood and water at a river, where we had an opportunity of making acquaintance with some Tapoo-Tekwanika natives, who seemed not to have met white men before".

Am 5. März 1834 zeigte sich die "Beagle" vor der Walaia-Küste. Nach einigem Warten wurde das Kano des Jemmy Burton und der seines Bruders Tommy Burton sichtbar, die kurzig dem englischen Schiffe entgegenruderten. Das unverhoffte Wiedersehen der Freunde war herzlich. Jemmy erzählte die sonderbaren Vorgänge, die sich hierwelbst während der Abwesenheit der "Beagle" abgespielt hatten,[99] und begleitete Fitz-Roy an jene Stelle, wo vor einem Jahre die drei Blockhäuser aufgerichtet worden waren. Einige Kartoffeln schienen wirklich aufgegangen zu sein und wurden ausgegraben; von den anderen Pflanzungen war nichts mehr hier zu sehen. Besonders betrübend klang die Erzählung Jemmy's über das Verhalten seines früheren Begleiters Yoas, der ihm vieler Gegenstände beraubt hatte.

Ihrer unerwartet neue Entdeckung beunruhigte Fitz-Roy in seinem Entschlusse, nicht noch ein zweites Mal den zweifelhaften Versuch zu machen, Matthews als einzigen Europäer bei diesem Volke zurückzulassen. Und so gab er sich schweren Herzens mit der Hoffnung zufrieden, daß all sein Bemühen um die drei jugendlichen Fremdlinge, die er nach England geführt, dort in beste Pflege und Erziehung gegeben und später in die Heimat zurückgebracht hatte, für eine spätere Zeit nicht ganz vergeblich sein dürfte.

[99] In anderen Zusammenhängen sollen die wichtigeren Einzelheiten wiederholt werden.

Für immer nahm er damit Abschied von Jemmy und denen Yaghs. Am 9. März 1834 war die "Beagle" bereits vor den Falklandinseln und hat seitdem die Wogen der Kap-Hoorn-Gegend niemals mehr durchkreuzt.

In schiffsmoral Fitz-Roy's zwiblicher Mitteilungen sind, weil die einer frühen Zeit entstammen, in der die Tonnen westlicher europäischer Schiffe noch nicht beträchtlich beziffert waren, daß man doch nicht verkennen, daß sie an Genauigkeit und Vollständigkeit nichts zu wünschen übrig lassen. Die Bedingungen zu einer gründlichen Forschung waren eben noch nicht gegeben und die verlangenswerte wirkliche Schätzung der Eingeborenen trübte das ruhige Beurteilen wenigstens allzumenschlichen Tatsachen. Es ist von vorzüglich einbrechend, daß die Angaben der drei indianischen Gewährspersonen, deren in dieser jugendlichen Alter die volle Kenntnis der grossen Stammeseinrichtungen und die eingehende Beurteilung, die nur eine lange Lebenserfahrung zur Reife bringt, fehlten, nur sehr geringe Zuverlässigkeit hatten.[illegible] Von denen aber war Fitz-Roy (a): 181 fast vollständig abhängig; denn er bekennt: „I prefer relating all that I know of these tribes, in consequence of the intercourse carried on with them by the 'Beagle'; officers and myself, and the visit of Yaga, Jemmy, and Fuegia to England." Er verschweigt eine der größten Schwierigkeiten nicht, nämlich die Unmöglichkeit zu freien Gedankenaustausch und bekennt (a (c)): 180): „Of the Fuegian language we know but little, although three of the natives were so many months with us." Endlich bringen auch einige gute Zeichnungen wichtige Einzelheiten der Yaghs deutlich zur Darstellung. Diese wenigen Ausstellungen schmälern jedoch nun nicht die hochbedeutsamen Verdienste, die sich King und Fitz-Roy samt ihrer Mannschaft um die Geographie, Hydrographie und Meteorologie jener unwirtlichen und schwierigen Gebiete (S. 8) erworben haben, und die ihnen alle Zeiten lebend anerkennen wird.[illegible] [illegible] Sehr bezeichnend ist der Eindruck, den Fitz-Roy (a): 184) gewann, als jene Dinge nach langer Abwesenheit dem Engländischen Landsmann wieder gegenüber traten: „It was interesting to observe the change which these years only had made in their ideas, and to notice how completely they had forgotten the appearance and habits of their former associates."

lichen Gewässern der Kap Hoorn-Gegend und das Grausen in den sturmgepeitschten Wogen bleibt selten einem Seefahrer erspart.[133]

Ehe DARWIN seine Erlebnisse mit den dortigen Bewohnern schildert, erwähnt er (in [d]: 237) die drei „Feuerländer, welche wir an Bord hatten ... Die Eingeborenen wurden von einem Missionär R. MATTHEWS begleitet, über welchen, ebenso wie über die Eingeborenen, Capitän FITZ-ROY einen ausführlichen und ausgezeichneten Bericht veröffentlicht hat". Am Weihnachtsabend 1832 mußte die "Beagle" in Wigwam Cove, nahe dem Cap Hoorn, Schutz suchen und hier war es, wo DARWIN (d): 243 die ersten Spuren der Lebenshaltung dieser Eingeborenen sah. „Die Bucht erhielt ihren Namen 'Wigwam' von einigen Feuerländer-Wohnungen. Doch könnte jede Bucht in der Nähe mit gleichem Rechte so genannt werden. Die Einwohner, welche hauptsächlich von Muscheln leben, sind genöthigt, beständig ihren Aufenthaltsort zu wechseln; sie kehren aber nach Zwischenräumen zu denselben Stellen zurück, wie offenbar aus den Haufen alter Muscheln hervorgeht, die oft viele Tonnen im Gewicht betragen müssen ...

Der Wigwam der Feuerländer ist in Größe und Dimension einem Heuschober ähnlich. Er besteht einfach aus einigen wenigen abgebrochenen in die Erde gesteckten Ästen und ist an der einen Seite sehr unvollkommen mit ein paar Gras- und Binsenschichten bedeckt. Das Ganze kann nicht mehr als die Arbeit einer Stunde sein und wird nur für wenige Tage benutzt. In Goeree Road sah ich einen Ort, wo einer der nackten Leute geschlafen hatte: er bot absolut nicht mehr Schutz dar, als das Lager eines Hasen. Der Mann lebte offenbar allein für sich, und YORK MINSTER sagte, er sei ein sehr schlechter Mann, der wahrscheinlich irgend etwas gestohlen habe. An der Westküste sind indes die Wigwams im Ganzen besser, denn sie sind dort mit Robbenfellen bedeckt ...

Während wir eines Tages in der Nähe der Wollaston-Insel ans Land gingen, ruderten wir neben einem Canoe mit sechs Feuerländern. Es waren dies die verächtlichsten und elendesten Geschöpfe, die ich irgendwo gesehen habe. An der Ostküste haben die Eingeborenen, wie wir sie gesehen haben, „Doch hat auch das Gefühl der Erhabenheit, welches ... die waldbedeckten Berge des Feuerlandes in mir erregt haben, einen unauslöschlichen Eindruck auf meinen Geist gemacht. Der Anblick eines nackten Wilden in seinem Vaterlande ist ein Ereigniß, welches niemals wieder vergessen werden kann."

[133] Eine einzige Bemerkung aus den wiederholten Hinweisen DARWIN's mag hier genügen. Er erwähnt (in [e]: I, 223): „Der südlichste Teil des Feuerlandes ist ein entsetzlicher Ort; Sturm folgt auf Sturm und zwar in so kurzen Intervallen, daß es schwierig ist, nur irgend etwas auszuführen. Wir waren 23 Tage lang auf der Höhe von Cap Hoorn und konnten auf keine Weise nach Westen vorwärts kommen. Der letzte und entscheidende Sturm, ehe wir den Versuch aufgaben, war ganz außerordentlich schwer. Eine See zertrümmerte eines der Boote, und es war so viel Wasser auf dem Verdeck, daß es überall schwamm; beinahe alles Papier zum Trocknen der Pflanzen und die Hälfte der naturwissenschaftlichen Sammlung ist verdorben." An anderer Stelle (in [d]: 240—243) äußert er sich ausführlicher darüber.

Guanaco-Mäntel[124] und auf der Westküste besitzen sie Robbenfelle.[125] Unter diesen centralen Stämmen haben die Männer meist eine Otterhaut oder irgend einen schmalen Streifen ungefähr so groß wie ein Taschentuch, der kaum hinreicht, ihren Rücken bis hinab zu den Weichen zu bedecken. Er wird quer über die Brust durch Schnüre festgehalten und, je nachdem der Wind bläst, von einer Seite zur andern geschoben. Diese Feuerländer aber in dem Canoe waren völlig nackt, und selbst eine ganz erwachsene Frau war absolut nackt. Es regnete stark und das Süßwasser zusammen mit dem Spritzen von den Rudern rieselte an ihrem Körper hinab. An einem andern nicht weit entfernten Hafenplatze kam eines Tages eine Frau, welche ein vor kurzem geborenes Kind stillte, an die Seite des Schiffes und blieb dort aus bloßer Neugier, während die Schloßen herabfielen und auf ihrer nackten Brust, ebenso wie auf der Haut ihres nackten Säuglings tauten.

Diese armen elenden Geschöpfe waren in ihrem Wachstum verkümmert, ihre häßlichen Gesichter waren mit weißer Farbe beschmiert, ihre Haut schmutzig und fettig, ihre Haare verwirrt, ihre Stimme mißtönend und ihre Geberden heftig. Erblickt man solche Menschen, so kann man sich kaum zu dem Glauben bestimmen, daß sie unsere Mitgeschöpfe und Bewohner einer und derselben Welt sind ... Des Nachts schliefen fünf oder sechs nackte und kaum vor dem Winde und Regen dieses stürmischen Klimas geschützte Wesen auf der Erde wie Tiere zusammengekrümmt. So oft Ebbe ist, müssen sie Winter oder Sommer, Tag oder Nacht aufstehen, um Muscheln von den Felsen zu sammeln; und die Weiber tauchen entweder, um See-Igel zu sammeln, oder sitzen geduldig in ihren Canoes und schnellen mit einer mit einem Köder versehenen Schnur ohne irgendwelche Haken kleine Fische heraus. Wird eine Robbe getötet oder das treibende Aas eines Walfisches entdeckt, so gibt es ein Fest; und solche elende Nahrung wird nur durch einige wenige geschmacklose Beeren und Pilze gewürzt.

Sie leiden oft von Hungersnöten; ich hörte, wie Mr. Low, der Capitän eines Robbenjägers, der sehr genau mit den Eingeborenen des Landes bekannt war, eine merkwürdige Schilderung des Zustandes von einer Gesellschaft von hundertfünfzig Eingeborenen an der Westküste[126] gab, welche sehr mager und in großer Not waren. Eine Reihe von Stürmen verhinderte die Frauen, Muscheln von den Felsen zu sammeln, auch konnten sie nicht in Canoes ausfahren, um Robben zu fangen. Eine kleine Partie dieser Leute machte sich eines Morgens auf den Weg und die anderen Indianer erklärten ihm, daß sie sich auf eine viertägige Reise aufmachten, um Nahrung zu holen: bei ihrer Rückkehr ging Low hin, um sie zu treffen, und fand sie äußerst ermüdet: jeder trug ein großes viereckiges Stück fauligen Walfischspecks mit einem Loch in der Mitte, durch das sie ihren Kopf gesteckt hatten, gerade so wie die Gauchos ihren Poncho oder Mantel tragen. Sobald der Speck in einen Wigwam gebracht war, schnitt ein alter Mann dünne Scheibchen davon ab, murmelte ein paar Worte über sie, röstete sie eine Minute lang und verteilte sie dann an seine verhungerte Gesellschaft, welche während der ganzen Zeit ein tiefes Stillschweigen bewahrte. Mr. Low glaubte, daß, sobald ein Walfisch an das Ufer geworfen wird, die Eingeborenen große Stücke davon im Sande begraben als Hilfsvorrat in Zeiten der Hungersnot, und ein eingeborener Knabe, den wir an Bord hatten, fand einmal einen in dieser Weise begrabenen Vorrat.[107]

[125] Mir scheint es nicht unwahrscheinlich, daß diese Angabe sich auf die eigentlichen Halakwulup im westpatagonischen Inselgebiet bezieht.

[126] Aus dieser Ortsangabe wird ersichtlich, daß die folgende Schilderung fast sicher von den Halakwulup hergenommen ist. Doch stellten sich die gleichen Verhältnisse auch bei den Yamana ein. Daß diese letzteren ebenfalls der Menschenfresserei beschuldigt wurden, ist bekannt.

Sind die verschiedenen Stämme miteinander im Krieg, so sind sie Kannibalen. Nach den übereinstimmenden, aber völlig unabhängigen Zeugnissen des von Mr. Low mitgenommenen Knaben und Jemmy Button's ist es gewiß richtig, daß, wenn sie im Winter vom Hunger geplagt werden, sie eher ihre alten Weiber töten und verzehren, ehe sie ihre Hunde schlachten. Als der Knabe von Mr. Low gefragt wurde, warum sie dies täten, antwortete er: ‚Hunde fangen Ottern, alte Weiber nicht.' Dieser Knabe beschrieb die Art und Weise, in welcher sie durch Halten über Rauch und daher durch Ersticken getötet werden; er machte ihr Geschrei zum Scherz nach und beschrieb die Teile ihres Körpers, welche als die besten zum Essen betrachtet werden. So schrecklich ein derartiger Tod durch die Hand ihrer Freunde und Verwandten sein muß, so ist es doch noch peinlicher, an die Furcht der alten Weiber zu denken, wenn der Hunger anfängt zu drücken. Es wurde uns gesagt, daß sie häufig in die Berge davon laufen, daß sie aber von den Männern verfolgt und zu dem Schlachthaus an ihren eigenen Herd zurückgebracht werden.

Capitän Fitz-Roy konnte niemals sicher ermitteln, ob die Feuerländer irgend einen bestimmten Glauben an ein künftiges Leben haben. Sie begraben zuweilen ihre Toten in Höhlen und zuweilen in den Bergwäldern; wir wissen nicht, was für Ceremonien sie ausführen. Jemmy Button wollte keine Landvögel essen, weil sie todte Menschen äßen, sie erwähnen nicht einmal gern ihre todten Freunde. Wir haben keinen Grund zur Annahme, daß sie irgend eine Art religiösen Dienstes ausüben; obschon vielleicht das Murmeln des alten Mannes, ehe er den fauligen Speck seiner verhungerten Familie austheilte, etwas Derartiges sein mag. Jede Familie oder Stamm hat einen Zauberer oder Beschwörungsdoctor, dessen Geschäft wir niemals sicher ermitteln konnten. Jemmy glaubt an Träume, aber wie ich gesagt habe, nicht an den Teufel; ich glaube, daß unsere Feuerländer viel abergläubischer waren als einige von den Matrosen." Die Betätigung höherer Geisteskräfte erkennt Darwin (d): 246 diesen Eingeborenen demnach nicht zu: er hält ihr ganzes Wirtschaften für

Instinkthandlungen, obwohl er das Kanu als „ihre ingeniöseste Arbeit, so elend es ist", beurteilt.

Sechs Tage währte der Aufenthalt hier in Wigwam Cove wegen schlechten Wetters. Vom neuen Landu[illegible]latze im Canal Goree ruderte Fitz-Roy mit drei großen Booten und einer Schaluppe in den östlichen Ausgang des Canal de Beagle hinein, um seine drei indianischen Schützlinge in Wulaia an Land zu setzen (S. 94). „Am nächsten Tag (20. Jan. 1833) glitten wir auf der glatten Fläche mit unserer kleinen Flotte weiter und kamen in einen bewohnteren Bezirk. Wenige, wenn überhaupt einer, dieser Eingeborenen konnten jemals einen weißen Menschen gesehen haben. Sicherlich konnte nichts ihr Erstaunen beim Erscheinen der vier Boote übertreffen. Auf allen Punkten wurden Feuer entzündet, sowohl um unsere Aufmerksamkeit zu fesseln, als auch um die Neuigkeit weit und breit zu verbreiten. Einige der Männer liefen Meilen weit dem Ufer entlang. Ich werde niemals vergessen, wie wüst und wild eine Gruppe uns erschien: es erschienen plötzlich vier oder fünf Leute am Rand einer überhängenden Klippe; sie waren absolut nackt und ihr langes Haar hing um ihr Gesicht herum; sie hielten rohe Stöcke in ihren Händen und von der Erde aufspringend, schwangen sie ihre Arme um die Köpfe und stießen das widerlichste Geschrei aus.

Um die Mittagszeit landeten wir unter einer Gesellschaft Feuerländer. Anfangs waren sie nicht geneigt, freundlich zu sein, denn bis der Capitän an der Spitze der anderen Boote heranruderte, hielten sie ihre Schleudern in der Hand. Wir entzückten sie aber bald durch unbedeutende Geschenke, wie z. B. rotes Band, was sie um ihre Köpfe banden. Sie hatten unsere Zwiebacke gern: als aber einer der Wilden mit seinem Finger etwas von dem in Zinnbüchsen präservirten Fleisch berührte, was ich aß, und es weich und kalt fand, zeigte er so großen Widerwillen dagegen, wie ich vor faulendem Speck gezeigt haben würde. Jemmy war durch und durch beschämt von seinen Landsleuten und erklärte, sein eigener Stamm wäre hiervon ganz verschieden, worin er aber in unseliger Weise sich irrte. Es war ebenso leicht, diese Wilden zu amüsieren, als es schwer war, sie zufrieden zu stellen. Junge und alte, Männer und Kinder hörten nicht auf, das Wort 'Yammerschooner', was 'gib mir' bedeutet, zu wiederholen. Nachdem sie fast jeden Gegenstand, einen nach dem andern, selbst die Knöpfe an unseren Röcken bezeichnet und ihr Lieblingswort in so viel Ausdrucksweisen, als nur möglich, gesagt hatten, sprachen sie es dann in einem neutralen Sinn aus und wiederholten tonlos 'Yammerschooner'. Nachdem sie für jeden einzelnen Gegenstand sehr eifrig geyammerschoonert hatten, wiesen sie, einen sehr einfachen Kunstgriff brauchend, auf ihre jungen Frauen und kleinen Kinder, was soviel heißen sollte als: ‚Wenn ihr's mir nicht geben wollt, dann werdet ihr es doch denen da geben.' Am Abend waren wir genötigt, ... nicht weit von einem Truppe Eingeborener zu bivouakieren."

Danach wiederholt Darwin (d): 251, was Jemmy dem Kapitän Fitz-Roy über die gefürchteten "Oens-Männer" mitgeteilt hatte. Bei der Augostura Murray gingen die Boote vor Anker. „Des nachts schliefen wir dicht an der Verbindung des Ponsonby Sound mit dem Beagle-Canal. Eine kleine Familie von Feuerländern, welche in der Bucht lebte, war ruhig und harmlos, und vereinigte sich bald mit unserer Gesellschaft um ein prächtiges Feuer.

Während der Nacht hatte sich die Nachricht verbreitet und zeitig am Morgen (23. Jan. 1833) kam ein frischer Trupp an, welcher zu den Tekenika oder zu JEMMY's Stamm gehörte. Mehrere von ihnen waren so schnell gelaufen, daß ihre Nasen bluteten, und ihr Mund schäumte infolge der Schnelligkeit, mit der sie sprachen. Und mit ihren nackten, über und über mit Schwarz, Weiß und Rot beschmierten Körpern sahen sie aus wie so viele Dämonen, die miteinander gekämpft haben. Wir gingen dann (von zwölf Canoes, von denen jedes vier oder fünf Leute hielt, begleitet) weiter Ponsonby Sound hinab, nach dem Orte, wo der arme JEMMY erwartete, seine Mutter und Verwandten zu finden. Er hatte bereits gehört, daß sein Vater tot war; da er aber in Bezug hierauf einen 'Traum in seinem Kopfe' gehabt hatte, so schien ihm das nicht sehr am Herzen zu liegen; er tröstete sich wiederholt mit der sehr natürlichen Betrachtung: ‚Ich nicht helfen.' Er war nicht imstande, irgendwelche Einzelheiten in Bezug auf den Tod seines Vaters zu erfahren, da seine Verwandten nicht darüber sprechen wollten ...

Wie früher angeführt, beabsichtigte Capitän FITZ-ROY, YORK MINSTER und FUEGIA zu ihrem eigenen Stamm zu bringen; da sie aber den Wunsch aussprachen, hier zu bleiben und da der Fleck eigentümlich günstig war, entschloß Capitän FITZ-ROY, die ganze Gesellschaft mit Einschluß des Missionärs MATTHEWS ans Land zu setzen. Fünf Tage wurden darauf verwandt, ihnen drei Wigwams zu bauen, ihre Effekten zu landen, zwei Gärten zu graben und Samen zu säen.

Am nächsten Morgen nach unserer Ankunft fingen die Feuerländer an, hereinzuströmen, auch kamen YEMMY's Mutter und Bruder. YEMMY erkannte die Stentorstimme eines seiner Brüder schon in einer ungeheuren Entfernung. Die Begegnung war weniger interessant als zwischen einem frei auf das Feld gelassenen Pferde und einem alten Gefährten, dem es wieder zugesellt wird. Kein Zeichen von Zuneigung machte sich bemerklich; sie starrten einfach einander eine kurze Zeit an und die Mutter ging augenblicklich wieder fort, um nach ihrem Canoe zu sehen. Durch YORK hörten wir indes, daß die Mutter über den Verlust YEMMY's untröstlich gewesen sei und überall nach ihm gesucht habe, da sie glaubte, daß er uns, nachdem wir ihn in das Boot genommen hatten, bald wieder verlassen haben würde. Die Weiber zollten der FUEGIA viel Aufmerksamkeit und waren sehr freundlich mit ihr. Wir hatten bereits bemerkt, daß JEMMY beinahe seine Muttersprache vergessen hatte. Ich sollte meinen, es habe kaum ein anderes menschliches Wesen mit einem so kleinen Sprachvorrat gegeben als ihn, denn auch sein Englisch war sehr unvollkommen.

Während der nächsten drei Tage ging alles friedlich fort, in welcher Zeit eben die Gärten gegraben und Wigwams gebaut wurden. Wir schätzten die Zahl der Eingeborenen auf ungefähr hundert und zwanzig. Die Frauen arbeiteten hart, während die Männer den ganzen Tag lang herumlungerten und uns beobachteten. Sie baten um alles, was sie sahen, und stahlen, was sie konnten. Sie waren entzückt über unser Tanzen und Singen, und interessierten sich ganz besonders daran, uns in einem nahegelegenen Bach waschen zu sehen: allem anderen schenkten sie nicht viel Aufmerksamkeit, nicht einmal unseren Booten ... Am 27. Jan. 1833 verschwanden indes plötzlich alle Frauen und Kinder. Wir waren darüber etwas beunruhigt, da weder York noch Jenny die Ursache ausfindig machen konnten ... Matthews beschloß mit seiner gewöhnlichen ruhigen Stärke, bei den Feuerländern zu bleiben, welche an sich keine Unruhe zeigten; und so verließen wir sie denn, um ihre erste schreckliche Nacht zuzubringen. Bei unserer Rückkehr am Morgen waren wir sehr froh, sie alle ruhig und die Männer damit beschäftigt zu finden, von ihren Canoes aus Fische zu speeren ..."

Auf der Weiterfahrt erreichten die Boote unter Führung Fitz-Roy's am 29. Januar 1833 die Punta Divide, „wo sich der Beagle-Canal in zwei Arme teilt. Wir fuhren in den nördlichen [Brazo noroeste] ein. Die Szenerie wird hier selbst noch großartiger als vorher. Die hohen Berge an der nördlichen Seite bilden die granitische Achse oder das Rückgrat des Landes. An vielen Stellen erstrecken sich prachtvolle Gletscher von der Seite der Berge bis an den Rand des Wassers. Es ist kaum möglich, sich irgend etwas Schöneres vorzustellen, als das beryllartige Blau dieser Gletscher. Die vom Gletscher in das Wasser gefallenen Bruchstücke schwammen fort und der Canal mit seinen Eisbergen bot für eine Meile lang ein Miniaturbild des Polarmeeres dar". Selbst Darwin (d): 257 wurde von diesen Naturwundern überwältigt.

Als die kleine Flotille am 6. Februar 1833 nach Wulsia zurückgekehrt war und mit der eben eingerichteten neuen Siedlung ganz unerwartete Enttäuschungen erlebte, wie Fitz-Roy (a): 220 sie geschildert und Darwin (d): 259 sie wiederholt hat, war auch Matthews aller Mut entschwunden und er verließ diese Gegend.[128] Darwin erwähnt dann noch, abweichend von der Ansicht des Kapitäns Fitz-Roy: „Obschon unsere drei Feuerländer nur drei Jahre lang unter civilisierten Menschen gewesen waren, so bin ich doch sicher, sie würden gern ihre neue Lebensweise beibehalten haben; dies war aber offenbar unmöglich. Ich fürchte, es ist sogar sehr zweifelhaft, ob ihr Besuch ihnen von irgendwelchem Nutzen gewesen ist."

Weitere Einzelheiten über das Verhalten der Eingeborenen und über den Fortgang der Fahrt hat Fitz-Roy fast wörtlich mit Darwin übereinstimmend niedergeschrieben, sie brauchen nicht nochmals angeführt zu werden (S. 96). Was aus des letzteren Werken hier wiederholt wurde, verrät eine offensichtliche Geringschätzung der Eingeborenen und zwar aus einer sehr starken Voreingenommenheit heraus, die selbst eindeutige Tatsachen nach jener Richtung hin umbiegt. Diese Einstellung Darwin's (e): I, 223 kann man sogar aus einem ganz durchsichtigen Werturteile ableiten: denn er schreibt: „Die

Feuerländer leben in einem elenderen Zustande der Barbarei als ich jemals ein menschliches Wesen zu sehen erwartet hätte. Sie sind in diesem unbarmherzigen Clima absolut nackt, und ihre temporären Häuser sind denen gleich, wie sie Kinder im Sommer aus Baumzweigen sich bauen. Ich glaube nicht, daß irgend ein Schauspiel interessanter sein kann als der erste Anblick von Menschen in ihrer ursprünglichen Wildheit." Jeder Kritiker wird sich nun gegenüber dieser Beurteilung selber einzurichten wissen; ihm kommt vorteilhafterweise die spätere Meinungsänderung DARWIN's zur Hilfe. Darauf hier schon hinzuweisen scheint mir nötig, um von vornherein die Mitteilungen über seine Erlebnisse mit den Feuerländern in das rechte Licht zu rücken.

„Als JEMMY am 9. März 1833 die 'Beagle' verlassend das Land erreichte, zündete er ein Signalfeuer an, der Rauch stieg auf und sagte uns ein letztes und langes Lebewohl, als das Schiff auf dem Wege in das offene Meer hinaus war." Es vergingen einige Jahrzehnte und das in den 50er Jahren begonnene Wirken der Missionare aus der South American Missionary Society zeitigte seine ersten schönen Früchte. Früher hatte DARWIN (d): 263 noch geschrieben: „Ich glaube, in diesem äußersten Teile von Süd-America existiert der Mensch in einem niedrigeren Zustand der Veredelung, als in irgend einem anderen Theile der Welt." Obwohl die Arbeiten der Missionare inzwischen einen guten Verlauf genommen hatten, beurteilte DARWIN dieselben immer noch als gänzlich zwecklos. Der spätere Vice-Admiral B. J. SULIVAN, sein alter Freund und früherer Begleiter an Bord der "Beagle", der inzwischen mit jener Missionary Society in engere Verbindung getreten war und der den Fortgang des missionarischen Wirkens unter den Yamana genau verfolgte, ließ DARWIN die verschiedenen Berichte darüber nach und nach zukommen. So konnte es nicht ausbleiben, daß dieser sich nun endlich von der Unrichtigkeit seiner früheren Behauptungen überzeugte und für die Ehrenrettung der vielgeschmähten Feuerländer sowie für eine richtige Beurteilung ihrer geistigen Veranlagung eintrat.

Die öffentliche Meinung griff diese Sinnesänderung in lebhaften Erörterungen auf und es folgten sich allerhand Auseinandersetzungen deswegen. In übersichtlicher Kürze und Vollständigkeit sind die wichtigsten Vorkommnisse in einer Randbemerkung zu einem Briefe DARWIN's an SULIVAN, die dessen Sohn zum Verfasser hat, zusammengetragen. Ersterer hatte am 30. Juni 1870 von seinem Wohnsitze Down aus an seinen langjährigen Freund geschrieben: „. . . Ich hatte noch niemals ein Wort über den Erfolg der Mission im Feuerlande gehört. Es ist äußerst wunderbar und beschämt mich, denn ich hatte immer ein gänzliches Mißlingen prophezeit. Es ist ein großartiger Erfolg. Ich werde stolz darauf sein, wenn Ihr Committee es für passend hält, mich zum Ehrenmitgliede Ihrer Gesellschaft zu wählen . . ." (DARWIN [e]: III, 123). Diesem fügt der zweitälteste Sohn DARWIN's noch an: „Meines Vaters Zusammenhang mit der südamericanischen Mission, auf welchen im vorstehenden Brief Bezug genommen ist, hat Veranlassung zu einigen öffentlichen Bemerkungen gegeben und ist in gewisser Ausdehnung miß-verstanden worden. Der Erzbischof von Canterbury sagte in seiner Rede bei der Jahresversammlung der südamericanischen Missionsgesellschaft, am 21. April 1885, ‚daß die Gesellschaft die Aufmerksamkeit CHARLES DARWIN's erregt und ihn bei seiner Erforschung der Wunder des Reiches der Natur zu der Ueberzeugung geführt habe, daß es noch ein anderes Reich gebe, ebenso wunderbar und dauernder'" (DARWIN [e]: III, 124). Einige Erörterungen über diesen Gegenstand erschienen in den "Daily News" vom 23., 24. u. 29. April 1885.[129]

Auch schrieb Admiral Sir JAMES SULIVAN persönlich an dasselbe Journal und erklärte ausführlich: „Ihr Artikel in den 'Daily News' von gestern veranlaßt mich, eine correcte Darstellung des Zusammenhanges zwischen der südamericanischen Missions-Gesellschaft und Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, meinem alten Freunde und fünf Jahre lang meinem Schiffsgenossen zu geben. Ich habe in naher Verbindung mit der Gesellschaft gestanden von der Zeit von Captain ALLEN GARDINER's Tod, und Mr. DARWIN hatte oft gegen mich seine Ueberzeugung ausgedrückt, daß es gänzlich nutzlos sei, Missionäre zu einem solchen Volke von Wilden zu schicken wie die Feuerländer seien, wahrscheinlich die niedrigste von allen Menschenrassen. Ich hatte ihm immer erwidert, daß ich nicht an die Existenz menschlicher Wesen glaube, welche zu niedrig ständen um die einfache Botschaft des Evangeliums von Christus zu verstehen. Nach vielen Jahren, ich denke ungefähr 1869 [es scheint im Jahre 1867 gewesen zu sein], ich kann aber den Brief nicht finden, schrieb er mir, daß die neueren Berichte der Mission ihm bewiesen, daß er Unrecht und ich Recht gehabt hätte in Betreff unserer Schätzung des Characters der Eingeborenen und der Möglichkeit, ihnen durch Missionäre Guthes zu thun: er bat mich, der Gesellschaft einen beiliegenden Cheque auf 5. engl. Pfund zu schicken als ein Zeichen des Interesses, welches er an ihrem guten Werke nehme. Am 6. Juni 1871 schrieb er: ‚Ich freue mich sehr, so gute Berichte über die Feuerländer zu hören, es ist wunderbar!' Am 10. Juni 1879: ‚Der Fortschritt der Feuerländer ist wunderbar und wäre es nicht wirklich so gekommen, so würde es für mich ganz unglaublich gewesen sein.' Am 3. Januar 1880: ‚Ihre Auszüge [aus einem Journal] über die Feuerländer sind äußerst merkwürdig und haben mich sehr interessiert. Ich habe oft gesagt, daß der Fortschritt von Japan das größte Wunder der Welt wäre, ich erkläre aber, daß der Fortschritt der Feuerländer beinahe gleich wunderbar ist.' Am 20. März 1881: ‚Die Schilderung der Feuerländer hat nicht bloß mich, sondern meine ganze Familie interessirt. Es ist wahrhaft wunderbar, was Sie von Mr. BRIDGES über ihre Ehrlichkeit und ihre Sprache gehört haben. Ich würde sicherlich vorausgesagt haben, daß alle Missionäre der Welt das nicht hätten thun können, was gethan worden ist.' Am 1. Dezember 1881 schrieb er mir, als er mir seinen jährlichen Beitrag für die Waisenanstalt bei der Missionsstation schickte: ‚Nach dem [Missionary Journal] zu urtheilen scheint die Mission im Feuerlande einen wunderbar guten Fortgang zu nehmen.'[120]

[129] In den "Daily News" vom 24. April 1885 wird auch ein Brief DARWIN's an Kapitän PARKER SNOW erwähnt, in dem er ausdrücklich betonte: „Der Erfolg der Missionsniederlassung beweist in der Tat, daß ich eine ganz irrige Meinung über Natur und Fähigkeiten der Feuerländer gehabt habe."

Die unparteiische Anerkennung der Erfolge jener Missionare und die vornehme Art, mit der DARWIN seine frühere irrige Ansicht zurückgenommen hat, ist ein günstiges Zeugnis für sein ehrliches Wahrheitsstreben. Was nach kritischer Sichtung aus seinen Berichten zu weiterer Benützung für die Ethnographie der Yamana übernommen werden kann, läßt sich unschwer erraten.

W. H. B. WEBSTER: Im gleichen bedeutungsvollen Jahre 1829, da die Untersuchungsarbeiten des englischen Flottenführers KING sich ihrem Ende zuneigten, bahnte sich die "Chanticleer" mühsam, doch erfolgreich ihren Weg durch die gefährlichen Gewässer der Antarktis. Sie hatte Portsmouth am 21. April 1828 mit dem besonderen Auftrag verlassen, „to ascertain the true figure of the earth, by a series of pendulum experiments at various places in the northern and southern hemispheres".

Als sie, fast ein Jahr später, vor Deception Island die Anker lichtend das antarktische Gebiet verließ und wieder den feuerländischen Gewässern zusteuerte, lief sie westlich von Kap Hoorn in die Bahía San Francisco ein. „We continued our course into the bay, and entered the second opening on its western side, named St. Martin's Cove.[121] Here all the beauties of the wildest Alpine scenery burst upon our view. As we passed into the cove, a wigwam was discovered, the smoke from which was curling among the trees. Shortly after a canoe, with several of the Indians, was observed paddling out towards the vessel. They were apparently inclined to come on board, to which no encouragement was given, as they were likely to prove troublesome" (I, 173). Es war der 25. März 1829.

„During a few days after our arrival, we were much gratified with the company of some Fuegian people, as the natives of Tierra del Fuego are called. A friendly intercourse was opened between us and a party of them, whose wigwams we found at the bottom of the cove. The usual presents were made them of a few trinkets and stained glass beads, with which they were much pleased, and proceeded to ornament their persons. As it was our intention to remain in St. Martin's Cove some time, we made a point of conciliating these people, and keeping on as friendly terms with them as possible. We frequently paid visits to their habitations, carrying with us some articles of trifling value: gilt buttons seemed to attract their attention very much, and they expressed great delight when presented with them. Among other things we gave them some hatchets, and showed them their use. They received them, but did not seem to take much interest in learning their application to any useful purpose. A very little labour seemed to exhaust them; and instead of doing it themselves, they were continually applying to our men to cut wood for their fire. They would even ask them to launch their canoes, and appeared to possess neither the spirit of industry nor exertion; and in consequence of not employing themselves in pursuits which required exercise, they seemed to be weak and incapable of undergoing labour.

[120] Diese Angaben habe ich aus DARWIN (o): III, 122 genommen. Sie finden sich auch im MM: XXII, 54; 1888 und wurden unter dem Titel "DARWIN's Urteil über die Feuerländer" von Pfarrer NEUBERG im "Kosmos", Handweiser für Naturfreunde, Bd. VI, Heft 8; Stuttgart 1909 der deutschen Leserwelt abermals ins Gedächtnis gerufen. Besondere Beachtung verdient "Mr. CHARLES DARWIN's opinion in 1832 of the Fuegians, and in 1880 of the Society's Work in Tierra del Fuego", die in schöner Gegenüberstellung unter "Interesting Records" als Anhang zu MM: XVIII, 20; 1884 veröffentlicht wurde.

[121] Ausführliche hydrographische und naturkundliche Beobachtungen über diesen geschützten Ankerplatz hat Kapitän H. FOSTER aufgezeichnet; sie wurden als "Memoirs on St. Martin's Cove, April 1829" in WEBSTER: II, 265 veröffentlicht.

The Fuegian wigwam is probably one of the most wretched of this kind of structure. A few green boughs of trees is all that the Fuegian can find to construct the habitation which is to protect him from the cold, wet, and boisterous climate of Tierra del Fuego. It is of a circular form, generally not larger than will afford room for a family of five or six persons, who squat themselves round a fire in the middle in listless apathy. This miserable habitation boasts not the meanest or most common utensil, and the bare ground forms its floor. Here they sit, with occasionally a seal-skin covering thrown over their shoulders, and some times an apron of some animal's skin tied round their middle; but neither of these appear by any means to be indispensable articles of dress, and many are in a state of nudity; all suffering alike from the effects of smoke on their eyes. The dog, the faithful companion of man in every clime, lives on terms of the most intimate friendship with them, sharing alike their bed and board. The Fuegian dog is an animal of a good size, and of a better appearance than might be expected from the nature of his food. The animal bears considerable resemblance to a fox in his general appearance: he is very ferocious, and not unlike an Esquimaux dog.

In one of my visits to their wigwams, with the view of instructing them how to be useful to themselves and to each other, a red pocket-handkerchief attracted their attention. This I presented to the youngest female in the company, which consisted of five persons. The girl, to my great surprize, deliberately tore it into ribands, and began to ornament her hair with it; she also tied some pieces round her wrist, having previously offered me some dried fish in return for my present. We had given them fish-hooks, lines, knives, needles and thread, scissors etc. and I endeavoured to instruct them how to use the latter articles, so essential to the economy and manufacture of dress among ourselves. The Fuegians are decidedly a tractable and docile people, fully capable of receiving instruction: and I took no small pains in teaching one of the women the art of using a needle and thread to the best of my humble abilities in that line. I might have spared my trouble; for the woman on whom my pains had been bestowed, deliberately made a hole with the needle and then drew the thread out of it, and proceeded quietly to insert it into the hole the needle had made. This was the more provoking, because, in spite of all my instruction, she still persisted in doing it.

Those people betrayed great apathy and indifference at our appearance. In the course of our attempts to obtain a knowledge of their character and disposition, we found them uniformly mild and good-natured, with most frequently a smile on their countenance. There was nothing ferocious either in their manners or appearance, but at the same time we found no symptoms of fear or cowardice among them. They would scarcely listen to the sound of a flute, but they would join in a song, or rather endeavour to follow the air with their voices, and gave us the opportunity of hearing that they were soft and melodious. On our showing a glass to one of the women, after looking at herself in it, she rubbed it over her face and then laid it aside.

The Fuegian men are an indolent race of beings; they cultivate no ground, and like the women take little or no exercise. The riches of a Fuegian family consist of a canoe, a dog, and their fishing tackle. They are of a chubby appearance, generally well-conditioned, of moderate stature, but rather inclining to be short than otherwise. They have no beards, and only a few short hairs on their upper lip; they have dark glistening eyes, with long fine and soft black hair; their teeth are white and regular, and the calves of their legs are very small.

The Fuegian women are rather less in stature than the men; they are also stouter, and have slender wrists with rather small hands and handsome tapering fingers, which they use with a gracefulness not to be found elsewhere among their class in the scale of the creation. Their habits are simple and inoffensive; their general demeanour modest and becoming. They are remarkably quick in speech, and imitated our words frequently with considerable success, repeating what was said with great rapidity. They have a filthy habit of daubing soot and grease mixed together on their faces: they disfigure their legs with streaks of a white pigment, the principal ingredient of which is grease: they also anoint their hair with a mixture of grease and red ochre; all of which tends not a little to render the vicinity of their persons by no means desirable. They wear necklaces made of shells, the principal of which is a little red snail-shell; and their persons are also decorated with various bone ornaments strung together. The only emblem of cleanliness which we could discover was the jaw of a porpoise, for it appears that the minuteness and regularity of the teeth enable them to use it as a comb, a contrivance which cannot be considered but as highly creditable to these people. The children are in general potbellied, but good looking.

The women, as is the case with most other Indians, are the obsequious servants of the men, their idle lords and masters. They paddle the canoe and fish while the men indolently look on; in fact, the women perform all the laborious duties which belong properly to their male companions. The first canoe that came to us after our arrival was paddled by two women, while the men in her were idly looking at us.

The Fuegians subsist principally by fishing, and have recourse to a remarkable expedient to supply the place of a hook. They fasten a small limpet in its shell to the end of a line, which the fish readily swallows as bait. The greatest care is then taken by them not to displace the limpet from his stomach in drawing the fish gradually to the surface of the water; and when there, the woman watches a favourable moment, and with great dexterity, while she retains the fish by the line with one hand, seizes hold of it with the other and quickly lifts it into the canoe. It is evident that there is no little care required in this operation, and some degree of management is necessary to keep the limpet-shell, the substitute for the hook, in the possession of the fish; for, by any sudden jerk which the fish is likely to give, it would be very easily displaced, and he would find himself at liberty. The women, however, are particularly expert at this method of taking fish; and we were more than once amused by it. There are a vast number of limpets and muscles, on which they principally subsist, although they manage to catch a porpoise now and then, or a seal,' which affords them a temporary luxury. They live much on berries, and are sometimes so fortunate as to catch a few birds. In order to do this, the Indian secretes himself, and decoys them by imitating their notes, until they are sufficiently near to be within the range of his arrow.

The canoes of the Fuegians are constructed principally of the bark of the beech-tree wrapped and secured round a series of half-hoops of the wood of the same tree, which serve as ribs, and are placed at short distances apart. They are plastered with clay, which renders them heavy, although they are not more than nine feet in length. The upper sides of the canoe are kept together by means of three thwarts or cross pieces, and the persons in them are generally seated on the bottom. They never make use of a sail, but invariably propel them with paddles; a small fire is generally seen in the middle of them; and they use a little cup made of a peculiar flat sea-weed much resembling leather, for the purpose of baling the water out of it. The canoe constitutes the principal riches of a Fuegian family: it affords them the means of transporting themselves from one place to another, and also enables them to obtain the principal part of their food.

The only weapons we observed among these people were slings, bows and arrows. The latter are neatly made, and pointed with obsidian. Their bows and arrows are employed for the destruction of birds; warfare appears not to trouble these people; happily for them it has not reached their shores. They use a dried lichen as tinder, and procure fire by the friction of two pieces of pyrites, a fire-stone with which their country abounds. One night we fired some rockets for the purpose of obtaining difference of time, and the poor Indians were so alarmed by them, that they fled into the woods and stayed there the whole night. In fact, they were so alarmed, by them that they forsook us early the ensuing morning, and never returned again, imagining that we were in possession of an evil spirit which we could always let loose among them at pleasure" (I, 185).

CHARLES WILKES: Zu einer Weltumsegelung war die nordamerikanische Flotte unter dem Oberbefehl des Kapitäns WILKES im Jahre 1838 ausgezogen und erreichte Ende Februar 1839 die Bahia Orange am Ostufer der Peninsula Hardy. Der Flottenführer hat die eigenen Beobachtungen über die feuerländischen Eingeborenen ausführlicher dargelegt, als seine beiden Reisebegleiter COLVOCORESSES und JENKINS, die ebenfalls ihre Erlebnisse niedergeschrieben haben.[143] Bei Bewertung der folgenden Aufzeichnungen darf man nicht aus dem Auge verlieren, daß die Eingeborenen während der vorausgegangenen Jahrzehnte zwar noch sehr selten, aber immerhin doch einige Male mit den Weißen in Berührung gekommen waren. Der lange Bericht verliert trotzdem nicht an Bedeutung, weswegen ich ihn fast ungekürzt wiederhole.

„During our stay, we had, at various times, visits from the natives. They were all at first very shy, but after they found our friendly disposition towards them, they became more sociable and confiding.

Before our departure from Orange Harbour, a bark canoe came alongside, with an Indian, his squaw, and four children. The tribe to which they belonged is known by the name of the Petcherai Indians. They were entirely naked, with the exception of a small piece of sealskin, only sufficient to cover one shoulder, and which is generally worn on the side from which the wind blows, affording them some little shelter against its piercing influence.

They were not more than five feet high, of a light copper colour, which is much concealed by smut and dirt, particularly on their faces, which they mark vertically with charcoal. They have short faces, narrow foreheads, and high cheek-bones. Their eyes are small and usually black, the upper eyelids in the inner corner overlapping the under one, and bear a strong resemblance to those of the Chinese. Their nose is broad and flat, with wide-spread nostrils; mouth large; teeth white, large, and regular. The hair is long, lank, and black, hanging over the face, and is covered with white ashes, which gives them a hideous appearance. The whole face is compressed. Their bodies are remarkable from the great developement of the chest, shoulders, and vertebral column; their arms are long, and out of proportion; their legs small and ill made. There is in fact little difference between the size of the ankle and leg, and when standing, the skin at the knee hangs in a large loose fold. In some, the muscles of the leg appear almost wanting, and possess very little strength. This want of developement in the muscles of the legs is owing to their constant sitting posture, both in their huts and canoes. Their skin is sensibly colder than ours. It is impossible to fancy any thing in human nature more filthy. They are an ill-shapen and ugly race. They have little or no idea of the relative value of articles, even of those that one would suppose were of the utmost use to them, such as iron and glass-ware. A glass bottle broken into pieces, is valued as much as a knife. Red flannel, torn into strips, pleases them more than in the piece; they wound it around their heads, as a kind of turban, and it was amusing to see their satisfaction at this small acquisition.

The children were quite small, and nestled in the bottom of the canoe on some dry grass. The woman and eldest boy paddled the canoe, the man being employed to bale out the water and attend to the fire, which is always carried in the bottom of the canoe, on a few stones and ashes, which the water surrounds. Their canoes are constructed of bark, are very frail, and sewed with shreds of whalebone, sealskin, and twigs. They are sharp at both ends, and are kept in shape as well as strengthened by a number of stretchers lashed to the gunwale. These Indians seldom venture outside the kelp, by the aid of which they pull themselves along, and their paddles are so small as to be of little use in propelling their canoes, unless it is calm . . .

Their huts are generally found built close to the shore, at the head of some small bay, in a secluded spot, and sheltered from the prevailing winds. They are built of boughs or small trees, stuck in the earth, and brought together at the top, where they are firmly bound by bark, sedge, and twigs. Smaller branches are then interlaced, forming a tolerably compact wicker-work, and on this grass, turf, and bark are laid, making the hut quite warm, and impervious to the wind and snow, though not quite so to the rain. The usual dimensions of these huts are seven or eight feet in diameter, and about four of five feet in height. They have an oval hole to creep in it.[1] The fire is built in a small excavation in the middle of the hut. The floor is of clay, which has the appearance of having been well kneaded. The usual accompaniment of a hut is a conical pile of shells opposite the door, nearly as large as the hut itself.

These natives are never seen but in their huts or canoes. The impediments to their communication by land are great . . . They appear to live in families, and not in tribes, and do not seem to acknowledge any chief.

On the 11th of March three bark canoes arrived, containing four men, four women, and a girl about sixteen years old, four little boys and four infants, one of the latter about a week old, and quite naked. The thermometer was at 46° Fahrenheit. They had rude weapons, viz., slings to throw stones, three rude spears, pointed at the end with bone, and notched on one side with barbed teeth. With this they catch their fish, which are in great quantities among the kelp. Two of the natives were induced to come on board, after they had been alongside for upwards of an hour, and received many presents, for which they gave their spears, a dog,[100] and some of their rude native trinkets. They did not show or express surprise at any thing on board, except when seeing one of the carpenters engaged in boring a hole with a screw-auger through a plank, which would have been a long task for them. They were very talkative, smiling when spoken to, and often bursting into loud laughter, but instantly settling into their natural serious and sober cast.

[1] Daß hiermit eine kuppelförmige Hütte gemeint ist, wird aus dem besonderen Hinweis ersichtlich, den WILKES: I, 133 auf die davon abweichende Form im Osten des Yamana-Gebietes macht: „In a small cove on New Island, a different description of hut was seen by the officers of the 'Relief'. Not having met with any natives, it was not in their power to ascertain if it belonged to the same tribe. It was built of logs, with their upper ends leaning together in the form of a cone, and nearly circular at the base; the interstices were filled with grass, leaves, and earth, in which some grasses had taken root, and were growing." Und um jeden Zweifel auszuschließen fügt er an: „It is represented in the tail-piece." Diese ganze Schilderung stammt von CHAVOCOUNSES: 36 und wird von mir weiter unten (S. 117) mit deren eigenen Worten wiederholt werden.

They were found to be great mimics, both in gesture and sound, and would repeat any word of our language, with great correctness of pronunciation. Their imitations of sounds were truly astonishing.

Their mimicry became annoying, and precluded our getting at any of their words or ideas. It not only extended to words or sounds, but actions also, and was at times truly ridiculous. The usual manner of interrogating for names was quite unsuccessful. On pointing to the nose, for instance, they did the same. Any thing they saw done they would mimic, and with an extraordinary degree of accuracy. On these canoes approaching the ship, the principal one of the family, or chief, standing up in his canoe, made a harangue. He spoke in C natural, and did not vary his voice more than a semitone. The pitch of the voice of the female is an octave higher. Although they have been heard to shout quite loud, yet they cannot endure a noise. When the drum beat they invariably stopped their ears, until it ceased. On hearing a pistol or gun fired, they immediately did the same. They always speak to each other in a whisper. Their cautious manner and movements prove them to be a timid race. The men are exceedingly jealous of their women, and will not allow any one, if they can help it, to enter their huts, particulary boys.

The women were never suffered to come on board. They appeared modest in the presence of strangers. They never move from a sitting posture, or rather a squat, with their knees close together, reaching to their chin, their feet in contact and touching the lower part of the body. They are extremely ugly. Their hands and feet were small and well-shaped, and from appearance they are not accustomed to do any hard work. They appear very fond and seem careful of their young children, though on several occasions they offered them for sale for a trifle. They have their faces smutted all over, and it was thought from the hideous appearance of the females, produced in part by their being painted and smutted, that they had been disfigured by the men previous to coming alongside. It was remarked that when one of them saw herself in a looking-glass she burst into tears.

[100] Es soll nicht unerwähnt bleiben, daß Wilkes: I, 129 außergewöhnlich hohen Preis Hund von den Eingeborenen eintauschen konnte, während Ross: II, 385 dies nicht erreicht hat.

The men are employed in building the huts, obtaining food, and providing for their other wants. The women were generally seen paddling their canoes. When this party of natives left the ship and reached the shore, the women remained in their canoes, and the men began building their temporary huts: the little children were seen capering quite naked on the beach, although the thermometer was at 40° [Fahrenheit]. On the hut being finished, which occupied about an hour, the women went on shore to take possession of it. They all seemed quite happy and contented . . .

Towards evening, Messrs. Wallnan and Drayton visited their huts . . . On landing, one of the men seemed anxious to talk with them. He pointed to the ship, and tried to express many things by gestures; then pointed to the southeast, and then again to the ship, after which, clasping his hands, as in our mode of prayer, he said 'Elouh, Elouh', as though he thought we had come from God.

After a little time they gained admittance to the hut. The men creeping in first, squatted themselves directly in front of the hut to crack their bodies. The women were squatted three feet behind the men, the oldest in front nursing the infants.

After being in the hut Mr. Drayton endeavoured to call the attention of the man who had made signs to him before entering, to know whether they had any idea of a Supreme Being. The same man then put his hands together, repeating as before, 'Elouh, Elouh'. From his manner it was inferred that they had some idea of God or a Supreme Being.

Their mode of expressing friendship is by jumping up and down. They made Messrs. Wallnan and Drayton jump with them on the beach, before entering the hut, took hold of their arms, facing them, and jumping two or three inches from the ground, making them keep time to the following song:

Their food consists of limpets, mussels, and other shell-fish. Quantities of fish, and some seals, are now and then taken among the kelp, and with berries of various kinds, and wild celery, they do not want. They seldom cook their food much. The shellfish are detached from the shell by heat, and the fish are partly roasted in their skins, without being cleaned.

When on board, one of them was induced to sit at the dinner table, when, after a few lessons, he handled his knife and fork with much dexterity. He refused both spirits and wine, but was very fond of sweetened water. Salt provisions were not at all to his liking, but rice and plum pudding were agreeable to his taste, and he literally crammed them into his mouth. After his appetite had been satisfied, he was in great good humour, singing his 'Hey mek lek', dancing and laughing. His mimicry prevented any satisfactory inquiries being made of him relative to a vocabulary.

One of these natives remained on board for upwards of a week, and being washed and combed, he became two or three shades lighter in colour. Clothes were put on him. He was about twenty-three years of age, and was unwell the whole time he was on board, from eating such quantities of rice, etc. His astonishment was very great on attending divine service. The moment the chaplain began to read from the book, his eyes were riveted upon him, where they remained as long as he continued to read. At the end of the week he became dissatisfied, and was set on shore, and soon appeared naked again. It was observed on presents being made, that those who did not receive any began a sort of whining cry, putting on the most doleful-looking countenances imaginable.

They are much addicted to theft, if any opportunity offers. The night before they left the bay, they stole and cut up one of the wind sails, which had been scrubbed and hung up on shore to dry. Although we had no absolute proof of it, we are inclined to the belief that they bury their dead in caves."

Was WILKES: I, 125 bisher mitgeteilt hat, gilt für die Eingeborenen in der Bahia Orange und ihrer nächsten Umgebung. Am 29. März 1839 bewegte sich die Flotte durch den nördlichen Teil der Bahia Nassau, wo ihm (I, 146) andere Eingeborene entgegenkamen.

„We were here visited by a canoe with six natives: two old women, two young men, and two children. The two women were paddling, and the fire was burning in the usual place. They approached the vessel singing their rude song, 'Hey mek lek', and continued it until they came alongside. The expression of the younger ones was extremely prepossessing, evincing much intelligence and good humour. They ate ham and bread voraciously, distending their large mouths and showing a strong and beautiful set of teeth. A few strips of red flannel distributed among them produced great pleasure; they tied it around their heads as a sort of turban. Knowing they were fond of music, I had the fife played, the only instrument we could muster. They seemed much struck with the sound. The vessel at this time was under way, and no presents could persuade them to continue any longer with us ... We found them also extremely imitative, repeating over our words and mimicking our motions. They were all quite naked.

I have seldom seen so happy a group. They were extremely lively and cheerful, and any thing but miserable, if we could have avoided contrasting their condition with our own.

The colour of the young men was a pale, and of the old a dark copper colour. Their heads were covered with ashes, but their exterior left a pleasing impression. Contentment was pictured in their countenances and actions, and produced a moral effect that will long be remembered."

Nicht überflüssig scheint es mir, den mit obigem Berichte wörtlichend übereinstimmenden aus der Feder des Lieutenants Colvocoresses, der zur Mannschaft WILKES' gehörte, ohne Kürzung sofort anzufügen.

GEORGE MUSALAS COLVOCORESSES: Als Mitglied der nordamerikanischen Flotte des Kommandanten CHARLES WILKES hat sich auch Lieutenant Colvocoresses an der Weltumseglung in den Jahren 1838 bis 1842 beteiligt. Sehr knapp berichtet er über die Eingeborenen der Isla Grande, die als kleine Gruppe von vierzehn Männern in der Bahia Buen Suceso zwischen dem 22. und 24. Januar 1839 ihm unter die Augen kamen. Auf der Weiterfahrt traf er mit den gleichen Familien der Yamana zusammen, die auch WILKES und JENKINS in jenem südlichen Gewässern beobachtet haben (S. 112).[*]

In kurzgefaßter Erzählweise führt Colvocoresses: 36 aus: „On the 24th we quitted Good Success Bay ... On the 25th, at 5. P. M., anchored off north-eastern side of New Island. On the following morning, after breakfast, we visited the shore. We saw no human beings, but found near the beach a hut, which bore many traces of being inhabited. It contained a large number of muscle-shells, which looked fresh, a part of a seal-skin, and a large heap of ashes. We also observed that the ground about the entrance was hard and destitute of vegetation. The hut was constructed of logs, the lower ends of which were spread round so as to form nearly a perfect circle, while the upper ends leaned against each other.'[*] The interstices were filled with earth and grass. In the centre was a hole, about two feet in circumference, for the smoke to pass through. The entrance was from the west, and was about three feet in height and two feet wide. We had not time to examine much of the interior of the island, but that which did come under our observation presented a scene which we did not expect to witness in so high a latitude. There was no abundance of vegetation, and much more advanced than any which we saw at Good Success Bay . . .

[*] Zum wissenschaftlichen Stabe der Expeditionsteilnehmer gehörte auch CHARLES PEARSON, der den Teil "The races of man" als Vol. IX des vom Kommandanten CHARLES WILKES geleiteten umfangreichen Reisebericht geschrieben hat. Er selber ist keinen einzigen Yamana unmittelbar gewesen, wie seine eigenen Worte (pag. 18) beweisen: „In February, 1839, the 'Vincennes' came to anchor in Orange Harbour; and on the day of our arrival, a small canoe made its appearance, coming from the direction of the isle of Cape Horn, which was nearly in sight. I was on shore at the time; and before I could reach the ship's side, the canoe departed, without giving me a distinct view of the occupants. During the nine following days, that elapsed before the sailing of the 'Relief', no other natives made their appearance; and nevertheless, I landed at different points almost every day, and extended my walks as far as six miles inland, the whole country appeared to be a solitude. Sometimes, however, in following the coast, I would come upon a deserted hut ... After the sailing of the 'Relief', the natives made their appearance more frequently; and from oral descriptions, and the drawings of the artists, I was enabled to satisfy myself of the physical identity with our Northern aborigines." Sein Werk beschreibt ich also hier nicht weiter an berücksichtigen.

Visited [Jan. 27] a hut [in a harbor 55° 20' 30" S, 67° 27' 00" w] in which was found a knife and a piece of Guernsey frock; the knife was originally a part of an iron-hoop . . .

On the following day we quitted the harbor above referred to, and coasted along in search of Orange Bay. Passed a number of islands, which answered to the description given of those in the vicinity of Orange Bay by Captain Kane. At 6 P.M., came to in a large, beautiful bay; it was nearly circular in shape, and was bounded on all sides with undulating hills, covered with evergreen foliage, to their very summits.

We had scarcely hitch the anchor when a canoe, with five natives, three men, a woman and child, came alongside. Upon invitation two of the men came on board without manifesting the slightest hesitation or distrust, and we were not a little surprised to find them so entirely different from those we had seen at Good Success Bay. They spoke an entirely different language, were of a low stature, ill-shaped, and wore their hair long. So great, indeed, was the difference that we could no longer doubt that those seen at Good Success were Patagonians, and had in all probability come there in quest of game; while these were the real Terra del Fuegians.

They were not more than five feet high, of light copper-color, which was much concealed by sweat and dirt; indeed, it would be impossible to imagine anything in human nature more filthy and disgusting. They had short faces, narrow foreheads, and high cheekbones. The hair was long, lank and black, hanging over the face, and was covered with ashes. Their bodies were remarkable, for the great development of the chest and shoulders; their arms were long and out of proportion; their legs were small and very much bowed. The woman was young, but no better-looking than the men. She was seated at one end of the canoe, and appeared to take an equal share with the men in the labors of the paddle. We invited her on board repeatedly, but she would not venture; doubtless she was afraid of offending the men, who are very jealous. The child had an interesting countenance, and was I should judge, about three years of age, though it was still in arms. It was attired in the same manner as the rest; a piece of sealskin, about a foot square, tied around its waist, being all the poor little thing had on to protect it against one of the coldest days that we had yet experienced.

Our two friends appeared to be much pleased with their visit; their countenances and manner plainly indicated the pleasure which they felt on seeing so many new objects. When about to leave, we made them some presents in the way of clothes, with which they all appeared to be greatly pleased, and insisted upon giving us in return some bows and arrows. It was very amusing to see them in their new dress; they moved about with amazing affectation of dignity, and gave themselves a thousand consequential airs.

Their imitation of sounds was truly astonishing; we tried them with the Flute and guitar, and they followed the sounds accurately. They were also found to be great mimics in action; anything they saw, they could mimic, and with an extraordinary degree of accuracy. They were very talkative, and often burst into a loud laughter when with each other; but whenever they discovered that we were watching them, they looked as grave as judges, and said but little. We also observed that they spoke to each other in a whisper.

Their arms consisted of bows, arrows, and spears. They use the latter for killing the seal, which is found in great abundance in all the bays, and which they esteem as an excellent food.

At an early hour next day another canoe, with seven natives, came alongside, and asked permission to come on board, but finding it could not be granted on early in the day, they paddled off again, and we saw no more of them.

In the afternoon we visited the shore, and very soon fell in with the natives, who came on board on the day of our arrival. They immediately commenced jumping up and down, which is their mode of expressing friendship. One of them, who had a pair of pantaloons given him, had them torn round his neck, and another had the skirt of his coat cut off; the reason he assigned for doing so was that they were in his way. Their hut was constructed after the manner of that we saw at New Island, and bore quite a neat and comfortable appearance. The ground was swept clean, and in the centre a large fire was burning, over which hung a string of fish. The other articles which it contained were some shells, which were carefully laid upon some clean leaves, and the blanket we had given to the woman on the previous day. They seldom cook their food much. The shell-fish are detached from their shell by heat, and the fish are partly roasted in their skins without being cleaned. It was evident that not withstanding our long ignorance of these people, we had not gained their confidence; for, on seeing us approach the hut, the women fled with her child, nor could we prevail upon the men to come here to return....”

„On the morning after our arrival [at Orange Bay] a canoe with six natives, five men and one woman, came off to the ship, bringing with them spear-heads and necklaces made of shells, which they readily exchanged for cotton handkerchiefs and pieces of iron. They were invited to come on board, but at first only would venture; this was a young man about nineteen years of age, and rather good-looking. They were evidently of the same race as those we had seen at Bahia Harbour; they spoke the same language, and resembled them in their features and dress. The woman was old and extremely ugly, and as unlike in her appearance as any of the men. She declined coming on board. Her face was painted black and red in vertical lines, and she wore a necklace made of shells; her posture while she remained in the boat was that of a squat. Their canoe was made of strips of bark, sewed together, and strengthened by ribs and planks; it was about twenty-five feet long and [illegible] feet wide. The blades of the paddles were so narrow as to be of a very little use in a sea way. The bottom of the canoe was covered with a layer of clay, upon which a fire was kept burning. It would seem from the great care they appear to take of their fire, that, when extinguished, it is no easy matter for them to rekindle it.

When this party left the ship, they employed themselves for several hours in fishing amongst the kelp, and then they pulled up towards the head of the bay where their hut was located, and which was found to be quite differently constructed from any we had previously seen. It was built of boughs, leaves, and reeds, in shape it resembled a beehive,[17] and was impervious to wind and snow. The entrance was low and ornamented. The floor was formed of clay, and in the centre was an excavation which contained the fire.

January 21st 1839. Mr. C. with six seamen, took possession of Sweet Island, for the purpose of making observations on the tide. He met there several of the natives who had visited the ship; they were not gathering berries of which we had grown here in great abundance, and has a very pleasant flavor, its color is bright red.[18]

„Where near the end of the lake we saw a canoe and there were standing near it, one of them approached us unarmed, and without the least appearance of fear, pointing out the most convenient spot for us to land, for the surf was heavy on the beach, and continually calling out 'Tamana Cayna', words which have been differently interpreted by Captain FitzRoy and Mr. Darwin. I am fully persuaded the former is right in considering them to be an expression of welcome, for the man could hardly be calling to us to give him any thing, when we were so distant from him that his voice was at times scarcely audible; nor when we landed did they hold out their hands.

as if in expectation of receiving any present from us. They were perfectly naked, with the exception of a small otter skin thrown over their shoulders, which greatly surprised us, for the ground was still thinly covered with snow. Their women and children they had probably sent out of the way when they saw us approaching; and there was not an article of any kind to be seen in their miserable 'wigwam'. We stayed a short time with them to establish a friendly confidence, and at parting they again shouted to us 'Yamma Coyna', which we adopted as a symbol of friendship. They embarked in their canoe soon after we left the shore ..."

Zu allerhand genauen Beobachtungen, beispielsweise über die verschiedenen Arten von Speeren, bot sich hier gute Gelegenheit und Ross: II, 303 stellt sie in folgenden Zeilen zusammen: „During our stay in St. Martin's Cove we had frequent visits from the natives: they came in small parties, and always took up their quarters in the wigwam at the head of the Cove, which seemed to be a kind of joint property. It was a most miserable shelter from the inclement weather of this period of the year; but so inured to it are these people that it was not unusual to see them walking knee-deep in the snow on some of the bitterest days, without any covering beyond a small otter skin over the shoulders, reaching about half way down the back. The Fuegians are truly described as the most abject and miserable race of human beings ...

Overawed by our superior numbers, they were kept in good order, with the exception of a few trifling instances of petty theft. They are admirable mimics, and were fond of the company of our people, singing and dancing with them, and entering into every kind of fun, for which seamen are so famous; and it was both amusing and interesting to witness their attempts to repeat the words and tunes of their songs, which they accomplished with a wonderful degree of facility. Landing one morning unexpectedly, I found our people teaching them to wash their faces; but the soap making their eyes smart, their ablutions were afterwards confined to the feet and hands: they then powdered their hair with flour, and decorated them with ridiculous ornaments, the natives greatly enjoying their altered appearance, brightened in no small degree, by the present of a complete suit of clothes each, and many useful articles they got on board the ship: they went away in the evening rich and happy.

The greatest number we saw at one time amounted to on more than fifteen. They were living together like one family, near the beach in Joachim Bay, and the parties which visited us generally consisted of three men, two women, and two or three children. The men came on board the ships without hesitation, but the women were never allowed to leave the canoe, and employed themselves diving for sea eggs, or picking up limpets, which are their principal food.

The only weapons we saw in their possession were spears of three kinds . . . They were of various sizes, according to the purpose to which they were applied, and to suit the power and size of the person using them. The largest was a beech wood staff, nine feet long and four inches in circumference, with a strong bone head, thirteen inches long, quite straight, and tapered to a fine point: the bone head, which was fitted into a socket at the heavier end of the spear, was secured by a strong seal skin thong, about a foot from each end of the spear, and used only for the destruction of the largest kind of seals. The bone head, when struck into the animal, trips out of the socket and acts as a toggle, whilst the released staff performs the part of a buoy.

Another spear, longer and lighter than the above, stained with red ochre, and armed with a barbed bone head, finely pointed, but without any seal skin thong attached, was probably employed against the smaller kinds of seals, or perhaps in warlike meetings, for the first party we met had spears of this nature concealed in the wood.

The third kind of spear was hardly five feet long, and proportionably slender, armed with a bone head with seventeen notches, increasing in size from the point to the heel, securely fixed to the spear by a lashing of seal skin, and probably used for killing birds.[140]

In one of the canoes that came alongside the ship, we observed three arrows of very rude make, pointed with obsidian, which they were unwilling to part with,[141] and the bow they kept carefully concealed. In the same canoe was a white dog, which they were so much afraid of losing that I could not prevail upon them to let me see it. This party were strangers; and, on landing at the head of the cove, they were received in silence, and with a solemn countenance, by our first friends. They walked up to the wigwam, and seated themselves in a circle round the fire, without speaking a word or manifesting any expression of satisfaction or otherwise, at meeting. The women, as usual, remained in charge of the canoe, and in about an hour they all left the harbour. They had come from one of the neighbouring islands, and were in a more filthy state than any we had before seen; their bodies and heads being smeared with red ochre, mixed with oil or grease of intolerable smell . . .

They are an indolent race, throwing the labour of paddling the canoes and collecting shell-fish upon the women. Their conduct throughout the whole period of our stay was peaceable and inoffensive, and their cheerfulness and good temper rendered their presence agreeable to us rather than otherwise; and, from the number of useful presents they received in the shape of knives, axes, saws, and all kinds of carpenters' tools, fishing-lines, hooks, and a great variety of other articles, I trust our visit will not have been without considerable benefit to them.

Their language is most difficult and unpronounceable, so that we could only communicate with each other by signs, and of course could not gain any knowledge of their religious ideas . . .

They do not entertain that objection to having their hair cut, which Captain King mentions of the Fuegians in Fortescue Bay.[142] After reading that anecdote I thought it right to proceed with caution to induce them to let my coxswain cut a lock from off some of our visitors; on presenting each of them with some hair they had seen him cut off my head, they did not make the least objection to his cutting theirs and giving it to me; and before we left the harbour, nearly all of them ad their long dirty hair removed, and expressed much satisfaction at their short crop, which greatly improved their appearance."

Manche wertvolle Ergänzung erfährt diese immerhin ausführliche Beschreibung durch die Eigenbeobachtungen eines Offiziers des Ross'schen Geschwaders, die hier sogleich angeschlossen werden.

ROBERT M'CORMICK: Auf drei ausgedehnten und bedeutungsvollen Reisen hatte sich dieser englische Seeoffizier eine reiche Erfahrung gesammelt, so daß er dem Flottenführer J. C. Ross auf der neuen Reise um die Welt (S. 120) ein wertvoller Begleiter war. Die drei Schiffe fuhren am 19. September 1839 von England ab. Nach einem kurzen Aufenthalt bei den Falklandsinseln warfen sie Anker am 20. September 1842, also genau drei Jahre nach Abschied vom heimatlichen Hafen, in nächster Nähe des Kap Hoorn, nämlich in St. Martin's Cove, am östlichen Ufer der Isla Hermite.

Die selbständigen Mitteilungen M'Cormick's: (I, 303) über das Benehmen der wenigen Eingeborenen an jenen Gestaden enthalten einige brauchbare Einzelheiten, die es verdienen, neben den Erfahrungen des Flottenführers Ross, hier wiederholt zu werden. Darin heißt es: „The morning was fine; both captains landed before breakfast to select a spot for the observatory. I could see from the ship the smoke curling up from the native hut or wigwam, and five of the Fuegians on the beach, all naked, with the exception of a seal-skin mat thrown over one shoulder, the shoulder to windward. They shouted for us to come on shore, and exhibited no appearance whatever of fear or astonishment. Their canoe was lying on the shingle beach. The weather in the afternoon became overcast with snow squalls . . .

I landed for the first time at eight a. m. [21. Sept. 1842] on the shores of Tierra del Fuego in the boat taking the observatory on shore. Three of the natives met us as we landed, saluting us with their customary expression, whatever it meant; the words were 'Yammer skooner'. I shook hands with them all round, giving each an anchor-button from my uniform jacket. In their canoe I saw the white pigment with which they smear themselves over. I went to the wigwam, a dome-shaped hut,[143] about the size and form of an ordinary haycook, formed by a number of branches of trees driven into the ground and forming a circle, having the ends brought together at the top, and the interstices filled in very rudely with the smaller branches, leaving a small opening fronting the beach as a doorway. In the centre of the interior a few embers were still smouldering on the bare ground; a bag made of the skin of the steamer-duck, having the feathers inside, and a piece of the skin lay in one corner; from the roof was suspended a calabash-shaped bottle made of kelp, near which stood two spears with barbed bone heads, and on the ground lay four pieces of sticks tied together at their ends by means of rushes, the whole forming an oblong square, the use of which I could form no notion of.

Whilst I was examining the spears, the youngest of the three Fuegians, a youth of about seventeen perhaps, entered the wigwam, and I struck a barter with him for one of them, giving him half a dozen anchor-buttons from my jacket in exchange, with which he appeared to be highly satisfied. He had a goodnatured expression of countenance."

Der 22. September 1842 war „a fine, mild, sunny day. At nine a. m. a canoe containing six Fuegians, three of them men, two children, and one woman, came round the north head into the cove. They first went alongside the 'Terror', and then paddled towards us. Two of the men came on board, the oldest remaining with the woman and children in the canoe. One of those on board had several necklaces, and a fillet bound round his head, and the hair smeared over with the white pigment, giving him the appearance of being powdered. He had a mat over one shoulder in the usual fashion, and, with the exception of this, naked as he was born; his face was streaked transversely with bars of some brown pigment. They made very significant signs for something to eat, and accompanied by their stereotyped expression of 'Yammer skooner', which probably meant 'Give me'; so I gave them some biscuit, which they ate readily enough. In the centre of the canoe was a fire placed on some clay.

In the after-part of the canoe lay four or five spears, near them the old man was seated, his face barred with black pigment. In the bows the woman reclined with a paddle in her hand, and a young child in her lap; near her lay an old rush basket or two and a spear-head. I handed her a few anchor buttons, and part of a gilt percussion-cap case for the basket and the spear-head. The cap case seemed especially to take her fancy, for she at once suspended it round the child's neck. In the bottom of the canoe lay a pile of firewood, with some rabbits and upland geese they had got from the 'Terror', and under which a dog had ensconced himself out of sight.

Their coarse, black hair, daubed over with the white pigment, contrasted strangely with their dark, copper-coloured skins, all smeared with paint, which together with their very crooked, spindle-like, ill-shaped lower extremities, gave them no very prepossessing aspect. All these defects, however, were counterbalanced by their good natured, inoffensive manner, and singular talent for mimicry, repeating every word spoken in the most clear and distinct imitation. On leaving us they paddled towards the wigwam containing the cove family of natives, but their meeting seemed one of a very apathetic character: not a word appeared to be exchanged between them. The woman and children did not land at all, never leaving the canoe. About noon they paddled round the north headland, the way they came, and were soon afterwards followed by all the party from the wigwam in their own canoe, leaving the cove wholly to ourselves; I heard the dog barking on shore before they left.

On Saturday, the 24th, the two canoes returned to the cove about eight a. m. with six men, four women, and four children, but left again at one p. m., after calling alongside both ships. Weather overcast, with drizzling rain . . .

Sunday, 6th [Nov.] Captain Ross to-day brought on board with him the two stranger natives I saw last evening. They walked about the decks dancing and singing and eating biscuit, seemingly quite happy. The captain gave them two small saws and some fish-hooks, and I gave them a knife and some buttons, of which they are exceedingly fond. One of them in return took a fillet of beads from his head and presented me with it. I measured their heights; one stood five feet one inch, and the other four feet ten inches, and they were the bestlooking we have seen. They left the cove this evening" (I, 303).

Gelegentlich sah M'Cormick während seines Verweilens in jenem Hafen noch den einen und anderen Eingeborenen, ohne sich näher mit ihnen einzulassen. Auch an ihren Hütten ging er vorbei. Jedoch über seine oben wiederholten Eindrücke hinaus hat er nichts niedergeschrieben.

WILLIAM PARKER SNOW: Um das Jahr 1855 bot sich diesem „late commander of the mission yacht 'Allen Gardiner'" wiederholt Gelegenheit, kleinere Gruppen von Yamana an verschiedenen Stellen (Isla Picton, Isla Lennox, Canal de Beagle und Wulaia) zu beobachten. Sein Zusammentreffen mit ihnen war immer nur zufällig und der Verkehr mit ihnen stets kurz. Erwägungen religiöser Art waren mitbestimmend bei seinem Entschlusse zur Fahrt nach dem fernen Süden Amerikas,[144] wo Kapitän ALLEN GARDINER samt seinen Begleitern, ehe er sein edles Werk unter den Eingeborenen beginnen konnte, des Hungertodes gestorben war. Daher auch als Einleitung die "brief history of Captain GARDINER's Missionary Labours" und die im Reiseberichte oft wiederkehrenden Hinweise auf missionarisches Wirken überhaupt. Die Gesamtdarstellung hält sich im leichten, ansprechenden Lesertone.[145]

Snow (a): I, 4 war sich von vornherein bewußt, wie verschiedentlich die Eingeborenen von dem und jenem europäischen Besucher beurteilt werden. „Of the inhabitants, their character and habits have been variously represented. Some voyagers speak of them as being among the very lowest of the human race, others give them a more favourable position. Some assert their character to be a compound of stupidity, indifference, and inactivity. But what I found them to be will appear in this narative. I may, however, here observe, that in the accounts given I find that much of what is said arises, as I imagine, from a slight or a longer acquaintance with them, as the case may be" (Snow [a]: I, 4).

Das Unternehmen wurde von der Patagonian Missionary Society eingeleitet, und zwar für ein zivilisatorisch-missionarisches Ziel; deshalb hatte man zur Bemannung „no one but strictly religious men and belonging to the Church" zugelassen, denen sich ein eigener Katechist anschloß.[146] Einen fertigen Missionar jetzt schon mitzuschicken, ließ sich nicht ermöglichen, (Snow [a]: I, 22), auch rechnete man mit einem nur kurzen Verweilen des Schiffes dortselbst.[147] Am 24. Oktober 1854 fuhr die "Allen Gardiner" aus.

[144] Anderswo (b): 261 schreibt er: „My particular object was to get acquainted with the natives and try to discover JEMMY BUTTON."

[145] Auch COOPER meint, „his account is sympathetic and seems to be careful and exact as far as it goes".

[146] Beim "Farewell Meeting" am 15. Oktober 1854 erhielt der Kapitän u. a. noch folgende Weisungen: „As the 'Allen Gardiner' is a mission yacht, the Committee direct that she should be employed only in such wise as you may justly consider likely to promote the interest of the objects in view, namely, the instruction and civilization of the natives of South America. You must ever hold yourself in readiness to carry the missionaries to Tierra del Fuego and Patagonia, for the purpose of visiting the natives, and to aid them in intercourse with such; and to bring back to the station whatever people they may induce to accompany them. The Committee expect that you will be also ready to help the party on shore with your counsel and personal exertions, and with the employment of your crew, whenever the necessities of the vessel can dispense with them, and the mission party ashore requires such additional strength. It is considered desirable, as soon as the station is somewhat arranged, and the clergymen and catechist, or one of them, can accompany you, to proceed to Woollya, in Navarin Island, to search for JEMMY BUTTON."

[147] „The visit of the vessel was but short in Tierra del Fuego, and nothing in the way of teaching the natives could be attempted by persons wholly ignorant of their language" (VSA: XIII, 79; 1866).

Nach längerem Aufenthalte bei den Falklandinseln mußte das Schiff zweimal nach Montevideo steuern und war jedesmal bald wieder zur Stelle. Am 11. Oktober 1855 endlich versuchte man eine Fahrt in die Kap Hoorn-Gegend. Dem Andenken des Kapitäns ALLEN GARDINER und seiner heldenmütigen Begleiter wurde über ihrem Grabe im Puerto Español an einem Baume eine Gedenktafel befestigt, sowie eine kurze religiöse Feier gewidmet. Wenige Tage später warf die "Allen Gardiner" in Banner Cove am Nordufer der Isla Picton wieder Anker. Hier sah SNOW (a): I, 324 die ersten Yamana-Leute. „We had no sooner made all fast, and stowed the sails, before a canoe was observed approaching us from the long arm of the cove running to the southward; and ere the natives could be well made out their stentorian voices were heard as if quite near, shouting 'Yamma Scoona! Yamma Scoona!' In a few moments more (for they paddled very swiftly) they were alongside.

There were three men and two women in the canoe, and all of them gesticulating and shouting with great vehemence, except one of the women, who seemed to be more quiet than the rest. Frothing at the mouth, and making rapid motions with their arms, they at first appeared as if they were savagely indignant at our having violated the quiet of their native waters; but in a few moments we had them on the most friendly terms, laughing and mimicking whatever we did. They were fine, powerful-looking men, each in a state of savage nudity, and though shaggy as regards their uncombed hair, and otherwise repulsive, I could not help being greatly surprised at finding them so superior to what I had been led to expect the Fuegians really were. As regards the women I was particularly struck with some peculiarities which showed — savage and degraded as they otherwise might be — a certain degree of modesty and decorum exceedingly gratifying to witness; nor had I afterwards occasion to lessen this feeling of my mind in reference to them.[148] The men, though in the primitive garb I have described, had no notion of its being repugnant to us, or that it was at all singular. On permission being given they leaped on board, and were speedily clothed with some old apparel belonging to us. My wife gave each of the women part of a coloured shawl, and their childish expressions of delight afforded us great satisfaction. As it was important that this their first visit to us should give them a favourable impression, I did everything I could think of to create such an impression, and not without success.

They had but few things worth bartering for, as memorials of our visit — bone spears, rush baskets, slings, a skin that DAUT-A-WAIE had with him, and put on when he came on board, were among those I obtained. They were very fair and honest in their dealings with us; and when in the canoe they invariably handed me the article I made them understand I wanted, when giving a glass necklace, beads, or buttons for it expressly. They first received the, to them, valuable goods from me, and then handed me up what was expected in exchange. On one occasion there was misconception about an article, and they immediately returned me what I had just bestowed, which of course I again gave them, if only for their honourable dealing. Nor would one take what was intended for another, but if a button or trinket was meant for a particular person, it was passed on to him or her without delay. All these things I noticed on their first visit to us, and it gave such a favourable impression of them, that I could not help feeling greatly delighted. Towards sunset I made signs that it was time to go to bed, and soon comprehending me, they departed with many friendly expressions, and much good humour.

Thus ended this our first day amongst the haunts of these dreaded savages! And how truly gratifying it had been to me I need hardly mention. I was amazed! And even now I cannot help looking back to it with wonder! There was a total absence of everything that could make us afraid of them; and to express in words all that I experienced of delight and joy at this friendly meeting would be more than I can fitly do."

Am nächsten Tage fuhr Snow (a): I, 334 in einem Boote die Küste ab. Von ferne entdeckte er eine indianische Einzelfamilie, der er sich erst nach langem Zaudern und unter allerlei Befürchtungen näherte. Als er ans Ufer gesprungen war, sah er sich augenblicklich von den Eingeborenen umringt. Diese aber zeigten sich sehr gutmütig und begleiteten ihn zum Lagerplatze, der sich im Hintergrunde befand. „Their wigwam a good sized one, was close to where I was seated, and I could perceive a large fire in the middle of it, the smoke from which hung heavily inside, or came slowly through an opening left at the top. Their small, sharp, ferret-like dogs were exceedingly troublesome; but the men who had visited the ship on the preceding day, seeing how I was annoyed, drove the animals away, though they quickly returned to bark at the stranger. Seeing the natives were friendly, . . . I made signs to those around me, collected them in a circle, and knelt down, and uttered aloud a brief and earnest prayer to Almighty God that he would bring these poor creatures to a knowledge of Him. During this brief act of devotion, the natives were quiet and observant in a remarkable manner, and seemed as if they after my using the word, their cessation from the hitherto incessant Yamma Scoona, and their kneeling down as I knelt, struck me as if they had a sense of what addressing the Deity was. However, when I had concluded, and taught them to say after me in a quiet, reverent manner, 'God', pointing at the same time to the sky faintly seen beween the trees, I moved from my position, and allowed them again to use their tongues freely as before . . .

It was enough; I had won their hearts, even before I had bought their good-will with the trinkets that I now began to give. To the women and children I gave first, and then finding they wished me to go inside their wigwam, where some of the more aged were seated, I did so; and there in a place pointed out to me as more free from the smoke, and with the principal portion of the family, twenty-two in number, squatted in a circle around,

I soon got myself entirely into their good graces, and in less than a quarter of an hour from the time I jumped out of the boat uncertain what would be the issue, I was upon the most friendly terms with them all ... Some of the women and girls were marked with red and black ochre, and one young woman, who would have been really handsome if washed and clothed, seemed as if in mourning, with her face so blackened. All the females wore girdles around their bodies, and some had skins on their shoulders and about the waist. The men, too, had painted marks about them ...

I found in the woods two canoes they were building, but no endeavour of mine to purchase one of them proved successful. They appeared to be well made, of the bark of the tree, having ribs of stout and strong pliable twigs, and stretched open by sticks thrown across from the upper edges. On the water they carried a fire in the canoe, which was fixed upon a bed of earth, and attended to by the women. There was a space left as a sort of well in the bottom, and one man was always using a small calabash to bale the water out. Here on shore, as in their canoe, I noticed signs of delicacy and propriety on the part of all the females, which struck me as most remarkable.

As it was now our dinner hour, ... I departed from them, making signs that we would soon return; but some of them speedily followed us, and one canoe was alongside the ship when, in the afternoon, I prepared with my wife to pay them another visit. For particular reasons I gave orders that no canoes were to be allowed close alongside whenever I was absent; and on this occasion I called upon our Fuegian friends to follow me in the boat. This they did; and bidding them give me their line made of grass, I gave them a tow. And now behold, what was here occurring in Banner Cove! The ship quietly at anchor, and one of the boats gliding swiftly over the water, pulling after it a native canoe filled with the poor savages, men and women, all of whom were screeching with delight and child-like pleasure; no could we refrain from a game of play between two lots of grown-up children than a first day's intercourse between the Christian inhabitants of a highly-civilised land and the wild denizens of a distant region not far from the southern pole. The laugh, however, was soon changed; for owing to their being unable to comprehend about the rope, and fastening it to the bows instead of well towards the midship part of their canoe, they were propelled along somewhat crab-like, first to their astonishment, and then to their alarm. The fat woman was very earnest to be cast off; accordingly I let them adrift, and then preceded them to the vicinity of their wigwam.

On landing again, men, women, children, and dogs, received us with the usual noise, and my wife and I walked to their encampment amidst a perfect din, expressive of pleasure at our arrival; the men hugging me (rather too closely on account of their want of cleanliness), and the women, surrounding and in loud tones maquisce-ing my wife, as they made signs of glad welcome. The young women and children all made a great deal of my wife — their eyes expressing their friendly feelings. They admired her apparel, and when she gave a red shawl and dress to the fat woman (to whom the rest seemed to defer), their Cutta-cuttas knew no bounds. But the showy trinkets, beads, and ornaments were their greatest delight; and to show us that nothing of what we had before given them was destroyed, all the presents were brought out, and each individual selected and put on what belonged to him or her, the pie-a-ninnies receiving the articles which had been given for them. In the wigwam, which we were again invited to enter, the women and children were this time assembled alone, one old man excepted. They squatted down in a peculiar way, and left a vacant place, which was the clearest from smoke, for my wife and myself to occupy; but we preferred standing.

While inside I had an opportunity of counting their number, the men being close by the door outside. I found this family to consist of two old women and two old men; four young women, say from 16 to 20 years of age; two girls about 14; four young and middle-aged men; with six grown-up boys and two infants. I could see nothing of what they lived upon, except heaps of mussel and limpet shells; but I afterwards came across some of their edible fungus.

After stopping with them for an hour or so, during which time my wife had much ingratiated herself with the women — especially the mothers, who were pleased with the way in which we patted and took notice of their children — we left the wigwam." Bald hatte sich ein ungezwungener freundschaftlicher Verkehr des Ehepaares Snow (a): I, 336—341 mit den Eingeborenen entwickelt. „They were always very glad to see my wife, and whenever I went alone invariably asked for her by signs and words ... A laugh was created among us on one occasion by the fat old woman, who, on being asked by the catechist for a piece of the food she was eating, actually pulled a bit out of her mouth, as a sailor would his quid, and offered it to him. As may be imagined, it was shudderingly declined. They appeared to have no idea of cleanliness, for a dirtier set of individuals I have rarely met with; and I imagine they never attempt to wash themselves ..."

Wertvoll ist ein Hinweis auf die Körpergröße. „As regards the stature of these natives, I can only say that I found it different, both at Banner Cove, Lennox Island, and Beagle Channel, to what I had expected They were robust-looking, and of the middle height, as the measurement I took of one or two showed me [5 feet 4 inches; 5 feet 3½ inches, average]. Their legs are the most diminutive portion of their frames" (Snow [a]: I, 346).

Nochmals wird die Form und Bauart der Wohnhütten erwähnt: „Their wigwams are not only well built, and of good size, but display some taste and ingenuity — primitive though such may be. The last wigwam made by them was about ten feet in diameter. The ground was sunk into a hollow of some inches below the surface; stout poles of a tapering form are placed with their thickest ends in a circle on the ground, and their points, meeting at the top, are bound together and then covered with grass — apertures being left for the smoke and a doorway. This doorway, in the wigwam I am speaking of, was made to look something like an arch by a curved piece of timber which had been selected for the purpose, and made the entrance appear like the letter h. In this wigwam the whole party took up their abode, apparently sleeping on tufts of grass — many of which I noticed inside, hanging up to dry.

At this new wigwam I one day found the whole family, having apparently moved here from the old place I had seen them in on the first and second days of my visit. Here, the girl ANUNCIATA seemed to be even more attractive than before; whether she thought herself a belle or not I am unable to say, but certainly she did not attempt any vain display. Nevertheless she seemed in this new abode, where there was less dinginess and smoke, considerably more interesting than when we first noticed her. She was, as I have already said, a rather handsome girl of, as I should imagine, about fifteen years old. She had brilliant dark eyes, with a fairer countenance than the rest, soft and agreeable features, and a particularly reserved and modest deportment. Her limbs were well formed; and had she been dressed, or even properly washed, I have no doubt she would have been considered as entitled to the name of a beauty. She won our hearts in particular — I speak of myself and wife — by her naive manner, her quiet attention to what we said, her gentle ways, ready desire to learn, and the evident wish she had to keep some sort of garment about her when amongst strangers. But all the women were alike as regarded that deportment which, whether amongst civilised or savage, always tends to elevate their character more, and enhance their claims to our respect."

Eine beachtenswerte Beobachtung fügt SNOW (a): I, 349 hier ein: „They were very fond of their children, and any notice we took of the little ones always gave them pleasure. This I observed on my first visit; and it was, in addition to firearms in my breast coat-pocket, one of the means I was prepared to use, had there been occasion when I went alone amongst them. A child in my arms was, I considered, a guard against any sudden attack upon me, if they loved their offsprings as most savage tribes do. But I also noticed that their dogs claimed a large share of affection, as well as the children. Indeed, it has been said that they will not hesitate, when pressed with hunger, to first sacrifice the old women, and then the second wives, before the dogs will be attacked — but of this I have no proof.

They did not appear to know the use of tobacco or pipes, nor understand the gun, though they comprehended that by some means I managed to deprive the birds I brought them of life. I took care never to fire unless sure of my aim, and this convinced them of my power to insure death. Neither music nor fire makes them express any wonder. Late at night they go fishing; and some mornings, at low water, I have seen them hunting for shell fish. They were always delighted with my whistling, dancing, and singing amongst them — all speedily imitating and joining with me in the fun; and undoubtedly it was a strange sight, as I know some of my crew amazingly thought, to see me capering round and round a circle made by united hands of myself and a dozen of those savages, men, women, and children, the latter in particular screaming with joy and laughter. But many of my crew could not understand my motives, nor what led me to do it. Those who have been far afield amidst wild tribes, will readily comprehend them.

I found the Fuegians in this place remarkably quick in catching our words, and uttering them tolerably well; and this led me to again consider that here, amongst them, ought to have been the mission station, not in the Falkland Islands" (Snow [a]: I, 351).

Etwa eine Woche hatte sich Snow bei diesem kleinen Lager in Banner Cove auf Isla Picton aufgehalten. Am 29. Oktober 1855 steuerte er auf die Wulnin-Gegend zu, wo er JEMMY BURTON zu finden hoffte. Erst nach vielen Bedenken, trotz dringlicher Warnungen von verschiedenen Seiten[100] her, hat er sich zu dieser Fahrt entschlossen. „Snowstorms, showers, and squalls now came on in rapid succession; and soon the hills and surrounding scenery were covered with a mantle of white, very different to the look they presented in the early morning." So ging Snow (a): I, 361 bei Isla Lennox vor Anker.

Bald kamen zwei Männer und zwei Frauen heran. „If I had thought well of the appearance of the natives in Banner Cove, I had still more reason to think well of those here; for without the smallest exaggeration, I consider two of the men we met with were really very fine specimens of the human race. Like the Picton islanders they yelled as if trying to force the words into our heads; and like them, also, they soon became very friendly, with us. I gave them a few trifles and before dark they returned on shore. We remained at this place part of two days. I found only one wigwam on the main island where I landed, and its occupants were the two men and their wives, with the three children that had visited us on board. I stopped some short time with them ... I now crossed over to a small island, where I observed more smoke. There I found another solitary family, consisting of one man, his old blind mother, and three boys. This wigwam was prettily situated in a small valley, surrounded by evergreens. This man was the other individual I have spoken of as being much different to the notion we have of the Fuegians. He was erect, powerful, tolerably well proportioned, and showed signs of possessing great physical strength. Like all his brethren, he wore nothing round him, and shirt I afterwards gave him I have reason to believe was torn up and divided fairly. Two of the boys in this family [100] Snow (a): I, 356 beruft sich auf einen Brief des "Committee of the Mission Society" und erwähnt darum: „Lastly, it was the doubt, as I was cautioned, of numerous natives who could surround us with a hundred canoes at once, and if caught in a storm and our sails were to split we should probably never be heard of any more; while if becalmed or at anchor, the number of the natives would make our position very dangerous'. Thus Woollya, though in some respects desirable to reach, was in others a place that required from me a great deal of consideration about visiting." Aus diesen und anderen Mitteilungen ist ersichtlich, welch unüberwindlicher Schrecken vor den feuerländischen Eingeborenen viele Kreise Europas beherrschte.

willingly came off to the ship in our boat, their father himself taking them to the beach, and leaving them with us. One of them was a shrewd knowing lad of about 14, the other a pretty looking little fellow of about 6 years old. They remained with us that afternoon, and received some presents and trifling articles to clothe them. But I could not induce them to stay. There was everywhere a great repugnance shown to our having possession of the children after a certain length of time. One of these began to cry bitterly; and my wife had much trouble in attempting to pacify the little fellow, the father on shore shouting and making signs for us to return his children; I therefore landed them, and they were much pleased to get to their home again."

Nach einem vergeblichen Versuche, die Bahía Nassau zu erreichen, lief die "Allen Gardiner" in den Canal de Beagle ein. Weiter westlich, „canoes on both sides the channel shot out from behind some craggy corner or sheltered nook (and there were many such places, and apparently pretty ones too), and endeavoured to overtake us, making signs that we should stop, and shouting with all their might. It was evident that many of them, if not all, had never seen a ship or strangers like us before. Astonishment was depicted on their features; and one or two amongst them even ceased from their common yamma scooma" (Snow [a]: II, 11).

Je mehr sich das Schiff der Angostura Murray näherte, um so zahlreicher wurden die Kanus, die von allen Seiten herankamen. „In these canoes were several rather robust men, and one or two women. The latter had the same peculiarities about them as those at Banner Cove, except that it struck me their breasts were more elongated ... I bartered with them for whatsoever they had for disposal, giving buttons and ribbons for bone heads, necklaces, and spears. While they were alongside, a sunfish passed, and our visitors immediately speared it, and threw it from their spear on to the deck for us. And though they tried to take bits of iron, ringbolts, or anything else that struck their eye and was within their grasp, yet the same honesty in bartering was evinced here as at Banner Cove. The men, however, were not at all to be despised ... After some short consultation together, the men all got into one canoe, and, sending the women off in another, began, through the two old men, to clamorously demand something from us. Their noise, and the stunning effect it had, made me try to stop it by outdoing them; and I therefore took the speaking trumpet, and made a much greater noise than they. This had the desired effect. From a daring vociferous cry, they fell to laughing, and seemed pleased that I had made myself on a par with them — becoming, afterwards, quite as talkative, but not quite so bold.

Those on the other side of the ship and under the counter were the reverse. They had but little to say, were apparently living in their astonishment, and had a ready and pleasant smile whenever I looked over the side at them. They had all come from the south of the channel, Navarin Island, and, from their having nothing to say to the others, I imagine they were of a totally different tribe" (Snow [a]: II, 12).

Ohne Aufenthalt wurde Angostura Murray erreicht. Unweit der Isla Button ruderten zwei Kanus auf die "Allen Gardiner" zu, und, wie durch ein Wunder, ertönte aus einem derselben der laute Ruf: „Jan-mes Button, me!" Die Überraschung war auf beiden Seiten unsagbar groß. Snow suchte sogleich Jemmy zu überreden, daß er auf sein Schiff käme; denn er wollte ihn gewinnen und zugleich vorbereiten für eine spätere Christianisierung der eigenen Landsleute. Doch weder er noch seine nächsten Verwandten wollten ihre Heimat verlassen![100] Obwohl Snow seine Hoffnungen enttäuscht sah, ließ er trotzdem die natürlichen Rechte jener Eingeborenen ungeschmälert und betont: „Savages they may be: degraded, miserable, wretched beings! But they have hearts as well as we; and their way of thinking may not be the same as ours on the question. Let us then go to them; not inveigle them to us."

In der Morgenfrühe des nächsten Tages hatte sich Jemmy mit etwa hundert seiner Landsleute wieder eingefunden und Snow (a): II, 45 befürchtete, doch gänzlich grundlos, einen Überfall.

„Jemmy, when he got on board, was dressed as he had left us on the previous evening, but looking more hideous and deplorable than I could have imagined. He had evidently lain down in his clothes upon the earth, — a light red clayey substance as it appeared, — and covered his new pink-striped shirt with some of the soil. He was dirty, and, by contrast, with garments on like ourselves, more wretched than his companions. However, I soon gave him the things I had selected; and then requested him to have his wife and daughter on board, that Mrs. Snow might bestow something upon them. There was some slight hesitation on their part about this. Mrs. Button evidently did not like to come; but at last, mounting the ladder, and, assisted by her husband, she got on deck, and, with her daughter, soon went below into the cabin.

I here observed the same womanly delicacy as I had noticed at Banner Cove. She seemed to be shy about coming from her canoe, where she had been squatted in the usual way, and evidently did not like mounting a ladder, crossing over the bulwarks, and appearing amongst strangers. And similar to this was the daughter, though in a less degree. They were both without a single rag of covering upon them, except the mother, who had the smallest fraction of a badge ... However, in a few moments after they had gone below, my wife had clothed them, and then, with Jemmy, I descended to the cabin, and we had another talk together."

Da schlechtes Wetter drohte, mußte der Kapitän die Anker lichten lassen. Sein Abschied von Jemmy und dessen Landsleuten fiel kurz aus. Die "Allen Gardiner" wandte sich südwärts, erreichte, trotz schwerer See, die Wollaston-Gruppe, fuhr um das Kap Horn herum, wo Rauch und menschliche Wesen vom Deck aus gesichtet wurden, und ging an der früheren Landungsstelle auf Isla Lennox vor Anker. Ohne weiteren Zwischenaufenthalt und ohne erneut mit Eingeborenen zusammenzutreffen lief die "Allen Gardiner" in Puerto Stanley auf den Falkland-Inseln ein.

Über seine Erfolge war Snow (a): II, 102 sehr erfreut und seine Genugtuung wurde noch durch die Zufriedenheit gesteigert, die das Committee of the Mission Society dem wackeren Kapitän aussprach. „Thus ended the 'Allen Gardiner's' first visit to Tierra del Fuego."

Seitdem verblieb W. P. Snow noch einige Zeit in Diensten der Patagonian Missionary Society als Kapitän des Missionsschiffes. Wegen gewisser Unstimmigkeiten schied er aus. So warm er zwar für die Verchristlichung der Feuerländer begeistert war, konnte er doch die Absicht der Patagonian Missionary Society, die Eingeborenen nach den Falkland-Inseln zu verpflanzen, nicht billigen.[101] Die Erfahrungen der Missionare in der Folgezeit haben seiner Beurteilung überzeugend Recht gegeben. Was er im letzten Teile seines Werkes über Pläne zur Gründung einer Mission auf Isla Keppel erwähnt, kann hier übergangen werden.

Nachdem Snow (b): 261 den Befehl über die "Allen Gardiner" niedergelegt hatte, kehrte er nach England zurück. In einem Vortrage, den er vor der Ethnological Society of London i. J. 1861 hielt, faßte er seine Erfahrungen mit den Yamana kurz zusammen. Dabei betonte er: „In speaking of these savages, I cannot help saying that I do not consider them so degraded as many persons do. I look from effect to cause, and thus trace their present condition to the nature of circumstances." Er steht somit als der mutige Mann da, der es in der Mitte des XIX. Jahrhunderts als erster gewagt hat, die Feuerländer etwas besser als halbtierische Wesen einzuschätzen.

Mit diesem Berichte schließe ich den älteren Abschnitt in der Geschichte der Yamana-Forschung ab. Was ihm ein besonderes Gepräge verleiht ist das sehr seltene und immer nur kurzfristige Zusammentreffen von Indianern mit Weißen. In Wirklichkeit sind es ja doch nicht einmal zehn Expeditionsschiffe, die in der langen Zeit von mehr als zweihundert Jahren ihre Erlebnisse mit den Eingeborenen in die damalige Kulturwelt mitbrachten. Sie haben die Kulturform der Yamana nicht zu ändern vermocht, weswegen die Darstellungen aus dieser langen Periode, zwar zahlenmäßig gering, ein ungetrübtes Bild unverfälschter Ursprünglichkeit aufrollen.

b. Forschungen seit Eröffnung der Mission

Der Kap Hoorn-Archipel wurde seit seiner Entdeckung von den europäischen Seeleuten gefürchtet und gemieden. Vom Jahre 1616 an, da der holländische Flottenführer Schouten jenem südlichsten Felsen seinen Namen gegeben hatte, bis zu den umständlichen Vermessungen in dem von King und Fitz-Roy entdeckten Canal de Beagle haben selten Schiffe die unruhigen Gewässer jener Gegend befahren. Nur die wenigsten von ihnen haben sich für einige Stunden oder Tage mit den dortigen Eingeborenen abgegeben. Trotzdem genügten diese spärlichen und kurzen Zusammenkünfte, daß letztere von den Europäern einen ersten Eindruck und für das Europäertum etwas Sinn bekamen. Doch waren es bloß einzelne Personen oder einzelne Familien, die im Verlaufe langer Jahrzehnte und meist für ein einziges Mal in ihrem Leben mit jenen europäischen Fremdlingen ganz vorübergehend etwas zu tun bekamen. Ein nennenswerter Einfluß ist von diesen auf sie nicht ausgegangen.

Mit Beginn des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts trat hierin eine Wendung ein. Der englische Kapitän Robert Fitz-Roy wurde, nachdem er die äußeren Lebensverhältnisse der Yamana kennengelernt hatte, von der edlen Absicht beseelt, den ganzen Stamm kulturell zu heben. Er wählte vier jugendliche Eingeborene aus, die er nach England führte, um sie hier ausbilden zu lassen. Zu ihrer erzieherischen Förderung wurde tatsächlich das Beste getan, damit ihr Aufenthalt in Europa nutzbringend ausfiele (S. 88). Als sie später in ihre Heimat zurückgebracht worden waren, gingen sie in ihrem Volke wieder unter. Nachweislich haben sie ihre Stammesgenossen nicht merklich gehoben und die aufgewandten Mühen sind wohl ihnen persönlich, nicht aber einem größeren Kreise ihrer Umgebung zugute gekommen (S. 96).

Zweifelsohne durch den Versuch des Fitz-Roy angeregt, entschloß sich wenige Jahre später ein anderer englischer Seemann, der vielgenannte Allen Gardiner, zur ersten Gründung einer Missionsstation unter den Feuerländern, weil er den verlassensten Eingeborenen Südamerikas einige Hilfe bringen wollte. Zwar scheiterte sein von ihm persönlich geleitetes Unternehmen: denn er und seine heldenhaften Begleiter besiegelten es mit dem Tode. Trotzdem sollte sein Gedanke und Plan bald danach doch Wirklichkeit werden. In England bildete sich eine bereits von Allen Gardiner angestrebte Missionsgesellschaft, die ihr Hauptaugenmerk auf die südlichsten Bewohner des Feuerlandes richtete und ihre besten Kräfte dafür zur Verfügung stellte. Im Februar 1855 wurde die erste Missionsstation auf der Isla Keppel in der westlichen Falkland-Gruppe gegründet. Nach mancherlei Erfahrungen und einigen empfindlichen Enttäuschungen eröffnete man Anfang 1869 eine neue Niederlassung in Ushuaia, inmitten des Yamana-Gebietes, von wo aus später noch weitere Versuche zu kleineren Gründungen gemacht wurden. Ununterbrochen waren mehrere Personen, die näher oder entfernter dem Verbande der South American Missionary Society angehörten, im Missionsdienste für die Yamana tätig, bis diese letzteren an Kopfzahl sich so sehr verringert hatten, daß die Missionare im Jahre 1916 ihr Werk endgültig aufgaben.[102]

[102] Die Geschichte der anglikanischen Missionstätigkeit wird anzugsweise weiter unten dargestellt werden, inzwischen sei verwiesen auf die ziemlich vollständigen Abhandlungen von Mazel, Pinzano und Mazel und Serrano, die als beste Quellen gelten. Vgl. auch Martial: 216.

Mit dem Eindringen der Missionare ins Heimatgebiet der Yamana[154] erfolgte ein tiefer Einschnitt in dem bisherigen Ablauf ihres Stammeslebens und es vollzog sich die große Wendung zur Abkehr von ihrem uralten, durch die Jahrhunderte unverfälscht bewahrten Erbgut ihrer Väter. Das besondere Ziel der Missionare war es, die bisherige Daseinsform und die geistige Verfassung der Eingeborenen gründlich umzugestalten, sowie aus ihnen selber ganz andere Menschen zu bilden. Ihre Absichten und Pläne setzten sie mit bestimmter Entschiedenheit und zäher Ausdauer durch, ließen sich weder von manchen Mißerfolgen wankend machen noch bei Enttäuschungen entmutigen, ja regten unermüdlich die Hände für ihr Werk, je mehr sich ihre Hoffnungen zu verwirklichen schienen. Die Missionare also waren es hier, die bewußt auf eine Umbildung der feuerländischen Kultur hinarbeiteten.

Der Einsatz so vieler und wirksamer Mittel mußte endlich denn doch das äußere Bild der Lebenshaltung unserer Yamana, je länger je mehr, verändern. Ihnen wurden im Laufe der Zeit auch viele neue Bedürfnisse und Wünsche anerzogen, deren Erfüllung sie nach und nach sogar mit Einsatz ihrer Körperkraft und Arbeit anstrebten. Das führte sie in den jüngsten Jahrzehnten schließlich auch in eine Geistesrichtung hinein, die offensichtlich von dem, was bei den früheren Geschlechtern herrschend und maßgebend gewesen war, abwich. Eine innere Umgestaltung dieser Feuerländer zum moralisch Besseren und zum geistig Höheren haben die Missionare zwar angestrebt. Daß sie dabei erfolglos geblieben sind, gereicht ihnen wahrhaftig nicht zum Vorwurf; denn die Bedingungen auf Seiten der Eingeborenen zu einer wirksamen Beeinflussung waren außerordentlich ungünstig, überdies besaßen sie von alterher ihre eigenen hohen sittlichen Werte, die ihrem Menschtum vollauf genügten. Zweifelsohne hat die Mission es erreicht, daß neuerdings einzelne Personen aus dem Yamana-Volke ihrer ursprünglichen Kultur etwas entfremdet wurden und es hätte noch eines Aufwandes von vielen Jahrzehnten bedurft, ehe diese Menschen alle in die Vorteile der europäischen Kultur hineingewachsen wären und ehe ihre Verchristlichung sie auch innerlich erfaßt hätte. Die erforderlich lange Zeit hierfür war ihnen nicht vergönnt; denn alles Unheil, das die verheerende Begleitschaft des Europäertums bildet, ergoß sich auch über sie und überlieferte ihr ganzes Volkstum samt seinen einst zahlreichen Trägern einem vorschnellen Untergange.

Bald nachdem sich die Missionare in Ushuaia niedergelassen hatten, strömten andere Europäer in jenes Inselreich ein. Zunächst die Goldgräber, die zwar viele Landstriche überfluteten, die aber nach einer kurzen Frist von wenigen Jahren von dort gänzlich wieder verschwanden. Anders die Farmer, denen es um eine dauernde Ansiedlung in jenen Gebieten, die sich in etwa zur Viehzucht oder zur Anlage von Sägewerken eigneten, zu tun war. Thomas [154] Auf der Isla Grande war es ein Mitglied der gleichen anglikanischen Missionsgesellschaft, Thomas Bumgarn, der vom Canal de Beagle aus eine erste Annäherung an die Selk'nam zustande gebracht und damit ein Einfallstor für die vielen nachströmenden Weißen geöffnet hat (Bd. I, 42).

Bennett hat das Verdienst, von den Falkland-Inseln die ersten Schafe an den Canal de Beagle gebracht und deren Zucht hierher verpflanzt zu haben. Sein Beispiel hat andere Wagemutige zu gleichen und ähnlichen Unternehmungen angereifert, so daß gegenwärtig alle ertragfähigen Flächen, sogar bis zu den südlichsten Inseln hinunter, von den Weißen besetzt sind (S. 4).

Während diese Entwicklung abläuft, werden die Eingeborenen nach und nach zurückgedrängt, ja bis auf die außenliegenden Inseln und Wasserarme abgetrieben. Allerlei Äußerlichkeiten haben sie als Gewohnheitseinrichtungen bei den Fremden beobachtet und trügerisch nach ihrer Zweckbedeutung erfaßt. Dies und jenes gewöhnten sie sich selber schließlich auch an und hüllten dafür manches Unheimliche ein.

Die Missionare, vor allem Dowson, Stirling und Bennett, treten in den nach unerfüllbaren Kulturbeute der Yamana ein. Auf ihre Anregung und unter ihren Augen vollzog sich langsam die Wandlung bei einzelnen Personen. Über das Ursprüngliche und über die Neuerungen vermachten sie in ihren Schriften die beste Auskunft zu geben, aus ihrer Erfahrung haben fast alle späteren Besucher des Canal de Beagle reichlich geschöpft. Ein beachtenswertes Kennzeichen dieser neueren Zeit in der Geschichte der Yamana-Forschung ist es, daß sie bis vor etwa 25 Jahren vollständig von den Berichten der Missionare beherrscht wird. Sogar Hyades bezeugt sich in seinen zergliederten Veröffentlichungen immer wieder auf Bennett. Was Wunder also, wenn in den Mitteilungen von dem und jenem Reisenden gewisse Gedankengänge und Auffassungen genau wiederkehren, bestimmte Einzelheiten sich wiederholen, gleichgerichtete Werturteile betont werden und das so sich weite Gebiet des Geistigen nicht nur kaum notdürftig angedeutet, sondern mit einigen dürren Worten teils abgetan teils völlig verzerrt dargestellt wird. Wirklich zuverlässig sind die wenigen Mitteilungen, die dieser und jener Reisende den Brüdern Lawrence verdankt. Letzterer kennen die Yamana von Grund auf und sind in ihrem Urteil streng sachlich. Den übrigen Ansiedlern und Seebuten gelten die Indianer insgesamt nicht mehr wie eine überflüssige, unliebsame Bande, die man sich je weiter je lieber fortwünscht; ihr Urteil ist gänzlich wertlos und nicht selten bewußt gefälscht.

Gegenüber so mancher unrichtigen und unvollständigen, einseitig übertriebenen und unangebrachten Bewertung der Einzelgebiete aus dem Gesamtbereich der feuerländischen Kultur, je nach den verschiedenen Quellen, erwächst dem Kritiker eine schwere Aufgabe. Dieser wird er nur so leichter genügen können, je mehr er selber in den äußeren Bestandteil und in die gesamte Geisteserfassung jener Indianer eingedrungen ist. In den folgenden Zeilen werden die Arbeiten jener Reisenden kurz besprochen, die über unsere Yamana etwas Neuenswertes veröffentlicht haben; darin nehmen die häufigen Mitteilungen der Missionare einen bevorzugten Platz ein. Die kritische Erörterung von Einzelangaben erfolgt erst später im Text, nämlich bei Gegenüberstellung verschiedener Quellen oder als Stützen anderer Behauptungen.

Als Heinze sich Ende 1861 mit einer Familie in die "Alten Gardens" von Kirkdale nach England übersiedelte, wurden ihm dennoch [illegible] Heinze die gesamten Angelegenheiten der Eingeborenen anvertraut und diese [illegible] Jahre für [illegible] Jahre [illegible] und je besser er ihre Sprache verstand, desto geschätzter lernte er die auch kennen.

Heinze lernte beim Studium der Tonga eine ganz eigenartige Bildgleichkeit und eine wortmäßigkeiten Fleiß. Seine Adoptivmutter Rev. F. Heinze hatte ihm durch ein gutes Beispiel gegeben. Die am 4. Oktober 1859 war der besonnene Gesamtbestand [illegible] Vokabeln auf ein Tonnend angewachsen. Daß er bei der Niederschrift von verdorrten auf mögliches Genauigkeit bemühte, gibt er am 23. Januar 1859 ausdrücklich an: „The system I follow is that of A. Ellis, commonly called phonetic" (VP, VII, 20; 1860). Diese wortmäßige Verschreibung, hauptsächlich die Verständlichkeit durch die Übersetzung einer [illegible] phonetischen Systems, ähnlich Heinze für seine Sprachstudien [illegible]. Von einem Jahre [illegible] Umfang seiner Aufzeichnungen an, [illegible] er in seinem Briefen den [illegible] mitgeteilt. Am 13. September 1862 schreibt er beispielsweise: „I have today finished a new vocabulary of Fanqion, and have reason to think it is generally correct."[illegible] Nach [illegible] einem Jahre, am 24. August 1862, schreibt er „[illegible] upwards of 7000 words in the dictionary .... I hope soon to be able to send you a grammar and dictionary of this language" (VM; XI, 27; 1864). Die Arbeit war, wie leicht einsehbar, hart und [illegible]. Am 16. September 1864 beklagte er sich: „Their language is horribly corrupt, and though improved often, yet the habit is so strong that they overcome it very slowly."

Für wenige Monate unterbrach er seinen Aufenthalt auf den Fidschi-Inseln, um sich am Dreifaltigkeitsseminar 1865 in London zum Diakon weihen zu lassen. Kaum nach seiner Rückkehr, nämlich am die Wende von 1865/66, verlegte man den Hauptsitz der englischen Mission von Lifu [illegible] nach Uiduma, dem Hauptsitz im [illegible] Tonga-Gebiete, und [illegible] Heinze zum Superintendent. Volle [illegible] Jahre seiner arbeitsreichen Laufbahn sollte Heinze diesen Amt verwalten.

[illegible] „Heinze [illegible] the Tongans by his knowledge of their language." [illegible] „Les paroles [illegible] par les [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

In seinen Bemühungen um genaue Kenntnis dieser feuerländischen Sprache ließ er nicht nach. In seinen Briefen weist er gelegentlich darauf hin und äußert sich am 19. September 1877 ausführlicher.[102] Welche Fortschritte er im Laufe der Jahre machte, drückt er in bestimmten, ständig anwachsenden Zahlen für die zusammengetragenen Vokabeln aus. Am 1. April 1880 behauptet er schließlich: Die Yamana-Sprache „has a considerable compass of words, at least 30.000, which was ample for the people who spoke it when we found them".

Seitdem nahm diese überraschend hohe Zahl, gleichsam als Gradmesser für den Reichtum der Sprache, ihren Weg in Bücher und Zeitschriften verschiedener Art; denn sie erregte berechtigtes Aufsehen gegenüber der außerordentlich einfachen Kulturform dieser Feuerländer, über welch letztere ins besonderen DARWIN ein unverdient geringschätziges Urteil abgegeben hatte. Sechs Jahre später nennt BRIDGES eine noch höhere, von ihm selber errechnete Zahl und sagt: „My dictionary of Yahgan has 1081 pages, each averaging 30 words which multiplied make 32,430 words. In forming this work it was not my object to multiply labours." Diese wenigen Mitteilungen beweisen zweifelsohne eine ganz ungewöhnliche Arbeitszähigkeit; denn Verbesserungen und Ergänzungen nahmen eben kein Ende.

Aus der Feder des Rev. TH. BRIDGES liegen drei zusammenfassende größere Manuskripte bestehend aus Vokabeln und Wortverbindungen der Yamana-Sprache[103] vor, außerdem noch kürzere Abhandlungen über einzelne Teile aus der Grammatik.[104] Nicht genug damit, hat er sogar einige Übersetzungen geliefert, nämlich vom Lukas-Evangelium, von der Apostelgeschichte und vom Johannes-Evangelium, die er zum Gebrauch der Indianer drucken

[102] „My chief occupation apart from my regular duties ... has been the thorough sifting of many words (Yahgan), which I was not quite sure of, and the thorough examination of a portion of my latest dictionary, with a view to the writing a standard one of the Yahgan from it, and also, yet chiefly to perfect my own knowledge of this wonderful language. JOHN MANSO is my valuable assistant in this work, and for the past month I have been seated with him at least 4½ hours a day. I write up each day if possible what we go through, and I find on comparing what we have done with what remains to be done that this work will occupy me at least 7 months uninterruptedly at the rate of 50 hours steady work a week in revising and copying. I realise that I shall thus speedily perfect my knowledge in Yahgan. I find the standard will contain at least 15.000 words, simple and compound, and I could even double this number if I put down every combination" (MM: XII, 31; 1878).

[103] In einer eigenen Abhandlung habe ich (gg): 171 die Aufeinanderfolge dieser drei Manuskripte festgestellt und gleichzeitig wahrscheinlich gemacht, daß eine andere Niederschrift des umfangreichen Wörterbuches nicht vorhanden ist.

[104] Vgl. hierzu die drei kurzen Mitteilungen von M. GUSINDE: Unveröffentlichte Dokumente über die Feuerländer; "Ethnologischer Anzeiger", Jhrg I, Heft 4, S. 274—277; Stuttgart 1927. Ferner: Die Manuskripte über die Yamana-Sprache des Pastors THOMAS BRIDGES; ibidem, Jhrg. I, Heft 5, S. 371; 1928. Endlich: Kurze Notiz über das Yamana-Wörterbuch-Manuskript des Rev. T. BRIDGES; ibidem, Jhrg I, Heft 6, S. 210; 1928. Ergänzende Bemerkungen finden sich in GUSINDE (gg): 177 und (hh): 188.

ließ, ohne daß sein Name genannt ist.[165] Legt man all diese Stücke zusammen, so steht man staunend vor einer gewaltigen Arbeit, die BRIDGES neben seinen zeitraubenden Verpflichtungen als Missionar und als Superintendant des ganzen Unternehmens überwältigt hat.[166]

Auf das Wörterbuch-Manuskript waren, seitdem FREDERICK A. COOK es nach Europa gebracht hatte, die Augen vieler Sprachwissenschaftler gerichtet. Ein wechselreiches Geschick war ihm beschieden, da es durch mehrere Hände ging. Zwei Versuche, dasselbe drucken zu lassen, erst in London und dann in Brüssel, blieben aus diesem und jenem Grunde schon in den ersten Anfängen stecken. Weil es an sich einen unschätzbar hohen wissenschaftlichen Wert darstellt und weil es eine glückliche Ergänzung zu der hier vorliegenden Monographie über die Yamana abgibt, habe ich mit entschiedenem Kraftaufwand dieses umfangreiche Werk endlich doch aus dem Drucke heben können, dank der unumgänglichen Unterstützung, zu der die Kinder des Rev. TH. BRIDGES hochherzig sich entschlossen hatten und dank der fleißigen Hilfe, die Dr. F. HESTERMANN mir dabei geleistet hat.[167]

Die aufmerksame Beschäftigung mit der Sprache, weit mehr aber noch der jahrzehntelange engste Umgang mit den Yamana vermittelte diesem Missionar auch eine Fülle von Einzelkenntnissen der Lebensart und Gebrauchsgegenstände, der Sitten und Gebräuche, der Vorstellungen und Gedankengänge jener Eingeborenen. Er hat sie tatsächlich gut in seinen Briefen, im Wörterbuch und in einigen besonderen Aufsätzen angebracht. Ein aufmerksamer Leser wird bald merken, wie BRIDGES' Wissen allmählich anwuchs und wie seine Beurteilung des gleichen Dinges im Laufe der Jahre sich klärte. Demnach sind in seinen älteren Berichten die Angaben über alles Augenfällige um so zuverlässiger und wertvoller, als damals eine fremde Beeinflussung noch nicht Platz gegriffen hatte; hingegen gewährleisten die neueren

[167] Die vollständige Geschichte dieses Yamana-Wörterbuches, von seinen ersten Anfängen bis zum fertigen Druck, hat GUSINDE (gg): 159 und (hh): 179 zusammengestellt. Auch BARCLAY hat sich ausführlich darüber in BD: IX ausgesprochen. Dieses Werk liegt nun vor und ist betitelt: "Yamana-English, a Dictionary of the speech of Tierra del Fuego", by the Reverend THOMAS BRIDGES, Superintendant of the South American Missionary Society in Tierra del Fuego from 1870 to 1887; edited by Dr. FERDINAND HESTERMANN and Dr. MARTIN GUSINDE; printed for private circulation only. XXIV and 664 pgs. Mödling 1933.

Mitteilungen über die gesellschaftlichen Einrichtungen und über das eigentliche Geistesleben die meiste Sicherheit oder höhere Wahrscheinlichkeit.[100]

Bei Bewertung dieser Quellen darf man nicht aus dem Auge verlieren, daß BRIDGES niemals eine gründliche Bildung genossen, nicht einmal den vollständigen Lehrgang einer Volksschule durchgemacht hat. Außerdem wuchs er auf und verbrachte sein ganzes Leben in einem ungewöhnlich engen Kreise. Beide Umstände haben von Grund auf und richtunggebend seine geistige Verfassung bestimmt, was aus seinen vielen Briefen ganz deutlich zu ersehen ist. Eine stark betonte Engherzigkeit, die zur empfindlichen Unduldsamkeit bei Dingen sich steigerte, die ihm auf seiten der Eingeborenen nicht genehm waren oder die er nicht verstand, wird von letzteren ihm auch heute noch nachgesagt. Weiter unten erst kann es im einzelnen dargestellt werden, mit welcher Voreingenommenheit er alles Einheimische als niedrig und wertlos oder als verderblich und unsittlich einschätzte, wie hart er sogar Einrichtungen und Gewohnheiten aburteilend verdammte, die, wie beispielsweise ihre Jugendweihe, offensichtlich hohe erzieherische und sittliche Werte enthalten. Er besaß nicht genügend geistige Selbständigkeit, um etwas Wertvolles oder Lobwürdiges bei den Yámana zu sehen und anzuerkennen. Daher die düsteren, unfreundlichen Farben, mit denen er gewohnheitsmäßig die Teilgebiete aus der Yamana-Kultur zeichnete, daher die schroffe, unduldsame Art, mit der er alles Einheimische mit der Wurzel auszureißen bestrebt war.

Als Persönlichkeit war er, wie kaum anders aus dem Gesagten zu erwarten ist, bei den Eingeborenen nicht beliebt; viele mieden ihn wegen seines herrischen Auftretens und blieben der Mission fern, um nicht ihre überlieferten, gehaltvollen kulturellen Einrichtungen aufgeben zu müssen. Die meisten der bejahrten Leute bewahrten sich ihren gesunden Sinn für den Wert des guten Alten und gaben es auf übles Bereden oder verständnisloses Beschimpfen hin nicht preis. Je mehr sie sich überzeugen mußten, daß BRIDGES für ihr eigenes Empfinden und Fühlen, für alles, was ihnen lieb und teuer war, nicht nur kein Wohlwollen, sondern offensichtlich Widerwillen empfand und betonte, um so mehr verschlossen sie vor ihm viele ihrer Gebräuche, um so strenger verbargen sie vor ihm ihre religiösen und mythologischen Anschauungen. Auffällig ist es ja, wie kärglich wenig sich gerade hiervon in den umfangreichen Aufzeichnungen BRIDGES' findet. Weil dieser Missionar den Feuerländern seelisch nicht nahegekommen ist, hat sein Wirken nicht den Erfolg aufzuweisen, daß sie innerlich vom Christentum erfaßt worden wären.

Kurz muß noch erwähnt werden, daß die anglikanischen Missionare nach ihren ersten sichtbaren Erfolgen bei den Yamana glaubten, auch die benachbarten Selk'nam in ihren Einflußbereich einbeziehen zu müssen. Zur gleichen Zeit setzten nämlich ernsthafte Versuche gewissenloser Europäer ein, weite Landstriche auf der Isla Grande von den Indianern mit Feuerwaffen rücksichtslos zu säubern. Vorerst war es den Missionaren darum zu tun, den hilflosen Eingeborenen sicheren Schutz zu bieten. Im Januar 1878 durchquerten Bischof STIRLING und Rev. BRIDGES mit ihren Begleitern den nordwestlichen Teil der Isla Grande (MM: XII, 102; 1878). Vier Jahre später brachten zwei andere Versuche, mit den Selk'nam am östlichen Ausgange des Canal de Beagle zusammenzutreffen, keine Erfolge. Wohl aber lief bald danach ein dritter Versuch gut aus. Nochmals begab sich BRIDGES im Juli 1885 zum Nordufer der Isla Grande; doch mit den bereits sehr geängstigten und erschreckten Selk'nam konnte er keine Verbindung bekommen. Von weiteren Annäherungsversuchen der anglikanischen Missionare an diese Eingeborenen findet sich nichts in den Berichten.[169]

Gegen Ende 1886 unternahm BRIDGES die ersten Schritte, um sich von der South American Missionary Society zu verabschieden. Er verschaffte sich das argentinische Bürgerrecht und erwarb ein größeres Landstück auf dem Nordufer des östlichen Canal de Beagle. Nach seiner Entlassung aus jenem Missionsverbande[170] richtete er unter Aufwand vieler Mühe seine eigene Farm ein und lebte als Gutsbesitzer nur noch seinen Geschäften.[171] Die Verbindung mit den Yamana hat er nicht nur nicht aufgegeben, sondern zog letztere sogar viel heran und gab ihnen Beschäftigung auf seiner Farm. Am Manuskript seines Wörterbuches hat er nicht mehr weitergearbeitet, wohl aber noch Kleinigkeiten in das seiner Grammatik nachgetragen. Nach einem arbeitsreichen Jahrzehnt auf seiner Farm bei Puerto Harberton begab er sich schwer erkrankt nach dem Norden und starb auf der Rückfahrt von Buenos Aires am 28. April 1898 gegenüber dem Cabo de Corrientes. Seine wissenschaftlichen Arbeiten sind für immer mit dem Namen der südlichen Feuerländer unzertrennlich verknüpft.

Zum Nachfolger BRIDGES' in der Superintendancy wurde Rev. JOHN LAWRENCE bestimmt, sein langjähriger Mitarbeiter in Ushuaia. Als dieser sein Amt antrat, hatte der Verfall des Yamana-Volkes samt ihrer kulturellen Eigenart bereits eingesetzt und steuerte seitdem unaufhaltsam der völligen Auflösung zu. LAWRENCE hat dem Volkstum dieser Feuerländer wenig Auf-

[169] Ausführlich sind die Bemühungen dieser Missionare um die Bewohner der Isla Grande in Bd. I, 46 geschildert worden. Dort werden auch die verschiedenen Quellenschriften genannt.

[170] Sein Austritt veranlaßte verschiedene Gerüchte. Ihrerseits gab die South American Missionary Society bekannt: „Feeling that this enterprise [der Erwerb einer eigenen Farm] is scarcely compatible with the purely Missionary work of the Society, Mr. BRIDGES tendered his resignation, and the Committee have felt bound to accept it, although they did so with much regret, recalling the essential services which he has rendered." Bei dieser Gelegenheit wird ihm das ehrenvolle Zeugnis nicht versagt, daß „Mr. BRIDGES' career has been so unique that all missionary societies have learnt to honour his name" (MM: XXI, 127; 1897).

merksamkeit geschenkt, obwohl er ihre Sprache beherrschte; nur einzelne Kleinigkeiten aus seinen Briefen wird der Ethnologe verwenden können. Er erfreute sich einer ungewöhnlich aufrichtigen Hochschätzung bei den alten Indianern, die ihn oft und gern in Punta Remolino besuchten. Im Oktober 1932 ist er gestorben. Mit einer zweimaligen Unterbrechung von einigen Monaten hat er sechzig Jahre am Canal de Beagle zugebracht.

Seitdem auch LAWRENCE wegen seines hohen Alters aus dem tätigen Missionsdienst ausgeschieden war, führte Rev. JOHN WILLIAMS bis 1916 an der Mündung des Rio Douglas die Betreuung der kleinen Herde weiter. Er hat die Yamana-Sprache gut gelernt und ließ im Druck ein dünnes Heftchen von Gebeten erscheinen, das er in einer zweiten Auflage[172] sehr erweiterte. Da die Eingeborenen bereits viele Äußerlichkeiten von den Europäern übernommen hatten, schrieb er nichts über ihre Lebensweise und Anschauungen.

Man muß jenen anglikanischen Missionaren das ehrenvolle Zeugnis ausstellen, daß sie durch ihre zahlreichen Briefe und durch einige Schriften unsere Yamana weiten Kreisen in Europa bekannt gemacht haben. Im besondern werden die Ethnologen und Sprachforscher ihnen alle wissenschaftlich verwertbaren Mitteilungen und Aufzeichnungen aufrichtig danken.

ENRICO H. GIGLIOLI: Zwar hat sich dieser junge Marinelieutenant am Viaggio intorno al globo della reale pirocorvetta italiana "Magenta" in den Jahren von 1865 bis 1868 beteiligt und die Magellan-Straße dabei durchquert, doch gilt als sozusagen sicher, daß er keines einzigen Yamana ansichtig geworden ist. Aus seiner Feder stammt eine Beschreibung verschiedener Gerätschaften dieses Feuerländerstammes, die nicht in allen Teilen zuverlässig ist.

GIACOMO BOVE: Auf die ursprünglichen Forschungspläne in den antarktischen Gewässern dieses italienischen Marineoffiziers hier näher einzugehen, läßt sich nicht rechtfertigen. Darüber enthalten genug die "Informes preliminares presentados a S. S. E. E. los Ministros del Interior y de Guerra y Marina de la República Argentina". Seinem Unternehmen wurde das Schiff "Cabo de Hornos" zur Verfügung gestellt, das der Kapitän PIEDRABUENA befehligte. Außer BOVE befanden sich der Geologe LOVISATO, der Zoologe VINCIGUERRA, der Botaniker SPEGAZZINI und der Lieutenant G. RONCAGLI an Bord.[173]

Am 25. Dezember 1881 verließ das Fahrzeug den Hafen von Montevideo, lief erst in Santa Cruz, dann bei den Staaten Inseln und endlich in Punta

[172] Es ist überschrieben: Oración matutina y vespertina, Colectas (Yahgan). 107 Seiten, Größe 11 × 14 cm, herausgegeben von der S. Am. Missionary Society, London [1907].

[173] Vgl. BOVE (g) über Organisation dieses Unternehmens, über Begleiter, Reiseweg und Ergebnisse. Auch hat er darüber eine briefliche Mitteilung an HYADES geschickt, welche dieser (k): 619 veröffentlichte. Als gute Ergänzung erweist sich JUAN M. NEGUERA: Conferencia sobre la expedición a los mares australes y Tierra del Fuego realizada por el capitán BOVE; im "Boletín del Instituto Geográfico Argentino", tomo V, p. 147—165; Buenos Aires 1884.

Aronas an. Hier trennten sich die Expeditionsmitglieder und zerstreuten sich auf kleineren Schiffen nach verschiedenen Richtungen. Bove erlitt bei der Bahia Sloggett mit seinem Schooner "San José" am 31. Mai 1882 einen schweren Schiffbruch.[174] Am 5. Mai wurde ein Boot nach Ushuaia geschickt. Ehe das Missionsschiff "Allen Gardiner" zu Hilfe kam, hatten sich bei den Verunglückten am 9. Juni einige stattliche Selk'nam eingefunden, deren ganzes Äußere auf jene einen überraschenden Eindruck machte. Auf der Missionsstation Ushuaia fanden jene Schiffbrüchigen die beste Aufnahme, wofür später die italienische Regierung offiziell dankte (MM: XVII, 30; 1883). Am 1. September 1882 traf Bove wieder in Buenos Aires ein.

Ein zweites Mal verweilte er vom Februar bis April 1884 in feuerländischen Gewässern. Dabei lernte er die dortigen geographischen Bedingungen des Archipels und die kulturellen Eigenheiten der Yamana besser kennen. Er (d): 288 hebt eigens hervor: „Il breve tempo da me passato tra gli Alacaluf e gli Ona, non mi concede di parlare dettagliatamente di essi. I segnenti cenni sopra i Fuegini dovranno quindi considerarsi come appartenenti ai Yagan, tra cui sono stabiliti i missionari, e dai quali io ottenni gran parte delle informazioni da me raccolte in queste brevi pagine."[175] In der Tat sind es nur wenige Mitteilungen, die Bove gemacht hat; sie scheinen nur umfangreicher zu sein, weil seine kurzen Aufsätze als wörtliche Übersetzungen in italienischer, spanischer, englischer und deutscher Sprache veröffentlicht worden sind. Auch er verdankt die meisten seiner Angaben den Missionaren. Jene wenigen Ergänzungen, die er von sich aus angefügt hat, widersprechen den übereinstimmenden Beobachtungen anderer zuverlässiger Reisender offensichtlich. Viel Vertrauen erwecken seine Mitteilungen demzufolge nicht.[176]

Später wurde Bove von der italienischen Regierung zu Forschungen an den Congo-Fluß geschickt. Im Januar 1887 nahm er seinen Abschied von der italienischen Marine und endete durch Selbstmord am 14. September 1887.[177]

CARLOS SPEGAZZINI war Bove's Begleiter auf dessen erster Reise. Neben botanischen Arbeiten, denen er sich fleißig widmete, beobachtete er in jenen wenigen Wochen auch die Eingeborenen. Selbstverständlich machte er sich die Erfahrungen und Mitteilungen der Missionare zu eigen. Viele völkerkundliche Einzelheiten brachte er nicht zustande, dafür fehlte es an Zeit. In einem öffentlichen Vortrage zu Buenos Aires am 12. Oktober 1882 hebt er trotzdem nachdrücklich hervor: „Todo lo que communico, fué observado por mí, o se refiere a datos de personas dignas de fé; no os aseguro, sin [174] Dieser erregte Szene schildert Bove (c): 99 sehr ausführlich. Anonym: 223 bietet sie in deutscher Übersetzung.

[175] Das wiederholt sich bei Bove: Fuegia and the Fuegians, in MM: XVIII, 187; 1884.

[176] Auf seine geographischen Berichte vor allem bezieht sich Holmberg's (a): 12 Empfehlung: „Recomiendo a quien tenga que estudiar nuestro lejano Sud, el conocimiento de la obra de Bove."

[177] Vgl. den kurzen Nachruf im "Boletin del Instituto Geográfico Argentino"; tomo VIII, p. 225; Buenos Aires 1887.

embargo, que no incurra en algún error, por el espacio de tiempo relativamente cierto, que permanecí entre ellos, y por las dificultades que se me presentaban para entenderlos y hacerme entender de ellos." Auch legt er (a): 164 Wert auf den Nachweis, noch „indios que no han sufrido ninguna influencia civilizadora" angetroffen zu haben. Unvergleichlich wertvoller indes sind seine botanischen Beobachtungen und Sammlungen, hat er doch ein Herbarium mit 1108 Species und Varietäten zusammengestellt.[177] Aus seiner Feder ist endlich eine lange Reihe von Yamana-Wörtern und Redewendungen erflossen, sogar eine vergleichende Wortliste des Selk'nam und Yamana mit italienischer Übersetzung; doch sind diese Dinge bislang noch nicht veröffentlicht worden.[177]

DOMINGO LOVISATO: Dieser gute Beobachter ging vom 1. Mai bis 17. Juni 1882 dem geologischen Aufbau des Feuerlandes nach. Mehr Möglichkeiten, die dortigen Eingeborenen kennen zu lernen, als seine Begleiter Bove und Spegazzini, hatte er nicht. Auch gab er (b): 132 sich unumwunden Rechenschaft über die Notwendigkeit, deren Sprache zu verstehen und wies auf die bedenklichen Fehler in der Schilderung der feuerländischen Indianer durch King und Fitz-Roy hin, die auf unzuverlässige Dolmetscher angewiesen waren. Lovisato's besonderes Verdienst ist die gute Beschreibung einiger alltäglicher Gegenstände aus dem Besitze unserer Yamana.

MISSION SCIENTIFIQUE du CAP HORN: Mit diesem Namen bleibt eine unschätzbar wertvolle ethnographische Leistung im Feuerlande für immer verknüpft. Das Hauptziel dieses Unternehmens waren genaue, nach einheitlichem Plane durchgeführte meteorologische und erdmagnetische Beobachtungen, auf Grund internationaler Übereinkunft und zwar für die Zeit vom 1. September 1882 bis zum gleichen Tage 1883. Frankreich hatte sich entschlossen, eine derartige Beobachtungsstation in der Kap Hoorn-Gegend einzurichten. Dem Kommandanten Martial wurden die allgemeine Leitung und die hydrographische Untersuchung anvertraut, der Schiffsarzt Paul D. Hyades zu anthropologisch-ethnographischen und Dr. Hahn zu naturkundlichen, im besonderen geologischen Beobachtungen auserseien. Ein Stab von Helfern stand ihnen zur Seite. Die französische Regierung stellte die Fregatte "La Romanche" zur Verfügung und wünschte, daß noch genaue Vermessungen und Sondierungen vorgenommen würden. Mit bester und reichlicher Ausrüstung verließ das Schiff den Hafen von Cherbourg am 17. Juli 1882 und ging am 6. September dieses Jahres zu jenem Punkte, der für die Untersuchungen erwählt worden war, in der Bahia Orange vor Anker.

Am 26. September begannen die regelmäßigen Beobachtungen, zu denen auch der Venus-Durchgang am 6. Dezember 1882 zählte. Während sich die einzelnen Forscher ihrer Sonderaufgabe widmeten,[100] befuhr die "La Romanche" den Canal de Beagle und viele seiner Nebenarme; dabei wurden 2470 km Küste untersucht. Auf Grund dessen erfuhr die bis dahin geltende Marinekarte tiefgreifende Änderungen, die Ancot: 275 leicht ersichtlich eingetragen hat. Hahn (e): 341 sammelte eifrig Pflanzen und Tiere. Rückblikkend auf seine eigene Arbeit sagte er: „Pendant toute une année nous n'avons cessé de réunir des observations et des collections, et nous espérons que, au point de vue de l'Histoire naturelle des regions magellaniques, l'expédition de la 'Romanche' aura donné d'utiles résultats."

Die nächste Nachbarschaft der Beobachtungsstation hat zwar auch Hyades nach Pflanzen und Tieren abgesucht, sein Hauptaugenmerk war jedoch auf die Eingeborenen gerichtet. Über das erste Zusammentreffen mit ihnen sagt er (g): 2 nur: „Schon bei der Ankunft des Schiffes sah man an verschiedenen Küstenpunkten Rauch aufsteigen und am folgenden Morgen kamen ein paar aus Rinde erbaute Piroguen, jede eine Familie enthaltend, langsam, um Lebensmittel und besonders Schiffszwieback gegen die geringen Erzeugnisse ihrer Industrie, Halsbänder aus Knochen oder aus kleinen Muschelschalen, Harpunenspitzen und dergleichen einzutauschen. Sie erschienen nicht im geringsten erschreckt oder beunruhigt: Tabak und Branntwein waren ihnen noch unbekannt, alte Kleider nahmen sie wohl, aber in erster Linie stand ihr Sinn auf Eßbarem." Später gestand er (ibidem): „Es ist nicht gerade leicht, den Eindruck genau in Worte zu fassen, welchen die erste Begegnung mit diesen sonderbaren Geschöpfen auf uns machte. Wohl hatten wir während der langen Überfahrt alles zusammengelesen, was frühere Besucher, wie Wedgell, Fitz-Roy, Darwin, Wilkes über die Feuerländer geschrieben und nach der übereinstimmenden Aussage aller hielten wir sie für die erbärmlichsten, am niedrigsten stehenden Bewohner unseres Erdballes. Nun kamen sie an Bord ohne das geringste Mißtrauen, Männer, Weiber und Kinder, nackt vom Scheitel bis zu Sohle oder höchstens mit einer erbärmlichen Otterhaut oder Robbenhaut über den Schultern und wir mühten uns ab, an ihnen die charakteristischen Züge zu finden, welche wir nach den Beschreibungen erwarteten. Was uns am meisten wunderte, war, daß wir kein Wort von ihrer Sprache verstanden, obwohl wir die Vokabularien der Alikhoolyp (Alaculoof bei Bumgez) und der Tekinika bei Fitz-Roy sehr eifrig studiert hatten."

[100] Den Reiseweg beschreibt Ancot umständlich. Seinerseits schildert Hahn (e) die Fahrt der "Romanche" im ganzen Archipel bis zu den Falklandinseln, sowie seine Beobachtungen über die Pflanzen- und Tierwelt. Von Hyades (d) und (g) endlich werden die reichen ethnographischen Ergebnisse eng zusammengefaßt. Eine gute Abbildung in Ancot: 273 zeigt die Anlage der Beobachtungsstation in Bahia Orange. Allgemeine Bemerkungen über die Expeditionsmitglieder und über die verschiedenen Arbeitsziele macht Martial: Physique du Globe: Rapport sur l'expédition française du cap Horn: "Comptes rendus de l'Académie des sciences"; tome 97, p. 1117—1120; Paris 1883.

Am 11. November lief das Missionsschiff "Allen Gardiner" in der Bahía Orange ein, an dessen Bord sich auch Rev. Thomas Bridges befand. Dieser bat Hyades um seine ärztliche Hilfe, weil unter den Eingeborenen in Ushuaia eine fieberhafte Krankheit ausgebrochen war, die arge Verheerungen anrichtete. So kam letzterer in Beziehung mit Bridges, der ihn in seinen völkerkundlichen Forschungen[181] richtunggebend gefördert hat. Immer und immer wieder beruft sich Hyades, besonders in seinem Hauptwerke, auf jenen Missionar.

Das Arbeiten mit diesen Eingeborenen selber war nicht leicht, wie er (g): 39 bald erfuhr. „Im längeren Verkehr mit den Franzosen legten die Feuerländer wohl nach und nach einen Teil der ursprünglichen Scheu und Zurückhaltung ab, aber sie blieben durchaus ihren alten Sitten getreu und zeigten nicht die geringste Lust, etwas von den Fremden zu lernen. Nur zur Essenszeit kamen die benachbarten Familien regelmäßig und hockten vor dem Stationsgebäude nieder, um die Überbleibsel in Empfang zu nehmen ... Die Bevölkerung wechselt übrigens ziemlich rasch; länger als zwei Monate hielt kaum eine Familie in der Nähe der Fremden aus, trotz der gebotenen Vorteile, es schien sie eine Art Heimweh nach ihrem herumschweifenden ungebundenen Leben zu ergreifen und sie verschwanden ohne Abschied, um alsbald durch andere ersetzt zu werden. Dreißig bis vierzig Individuen lagerten gewöhnlich in der Nähe der Station, und, als nach Verlauf der ersten paar Monate die Franzosen eine gewisse Anzahl der gebräuchlichsten Worte gelernt hatten, entwickelte sich mit denselben auch ein einigermaßen freundschaftliches Verhältnis. Einzelne ließen sich sogar zu Dienstleistungen herbei; halfen beim Wegebau und trugen Holz, doch schien ihnen das nicht recht zu gefallen und man konnte sie auf sie rechnen; große Ansprüche machten sie freilich auch nicht dafür und mit einigen Brocken Brot oder Zwieback waren sie jederzeit zufrieden. Nur einer oder zwei blieben der Station treu und entschlossen sich zu regelmäßigen Arbeiten." Freilich war es eine starke Behinderung auf beiden Seiten, daß man sich durch die Sprache nicht verständigen konnte.

Von diesem allerdings sehr bedeutungsvollen Umstande abgesehen, befand sich Hyades in den bestmöglichen Forschungsbedingungen; denn die Eingeborenen dort im Süden führten ihr Leben von ehedem ohne erkennbare fremde Einflüsse. Nicht wenige hat er (f): 552 zu Gesicht bekommen. „A la baie Orange, après avoir appris les mots usuels de la langue indigène, j'ai observé, dans de très bonnes conditions pour leur étude complète, 120 individus de tout âge et des deux sexes qui ont séjourné plus ou moins longtemps immédiatement à côté de la mission scientifique française, en menant la vie de parfaits sauvages, sans que notre voisinage parut en rien influencer leurs coutumes ou leurs moeurs." Auch versichert er (d): 305, daß einige Familien, „provenant des environs, dans un rayon de 40 à 50 kilomètres, venaient successivement à la Mission par groupes de deux ou trois familles qui passaient près de nous plusieurs jours et quelquefois plusieurs semaines. Très souvent nous avons vu revenir d'anciens visiteurs après une absence plus ou moins longue."

[181] Ausdrücklich entschuldigt sich Hyades (j): 148 und erklärt, „comment il ne m'est pas arrivé de demander à la Société des instructions ethnologiques spéciales sur les recherches à faire au Cap Horn".

Das lange Zusammensein mit so vielen Eingeborenen — ob es nun 120 waren oder knapp 150, wie HYADES (j): 150 an anderer Stelle erwähnt — hat es den Franzosen ermöglicht, das Wirtschaftsleben der Yamana genau zu beobachten und eine vollständige Sammlung ihrer Gebrauchsgegenstände zustande zu bringen. Leider fehlten ihnen die erforderlichen Sprachkenntnisse, um die gesellschaftlichen Einrichtungen und das reiche Geistesleben aufzuhellen. Sie alle, im besonderen HYADES, bemühten sich um eine gerechte Würdigung all des Fremdartigen, dem sie gegenüberstanden; ganz entschieden nahmen sie Stellung gegen die falschen Behauptungen von Menschenfresserei oder geistiger Minderwertigkeit dieser Feuerländer.

Die anthropologischen Beobachtungen wurden zu eingehenden anatomischen Untersuchungen erweitert. Gewiß, HYADES (c): 142 und (d): 306 hebt hervor, daß es ihm ein Leichtes gewesen ist, „prendre un très grand nombre de mesures anthropologiques, de moulages, de photographies. Hommes et femmes se prêtaient avée complaisance à toutes ses recherches". Doch darf ich nicht verschweigen, daß mir gegenüber, also nach etwa vierzig Jahren noch, die älteren Leute sich über Gipsabdrücke, die von den Geschlechtsteilen einiger junger Frauenspersonen gemacht worden waren, höchst empört geäußert haben. Auch das Benehmen einzelner Hilfspersonen aus jener Expedition hat wiederholt schweren Anstoß bei den Eingeborenen hervorgerufen. Die Einzelheiten, welche mir erzählt worden sind, übergehe ich hier. Aber man trifft, wie ich betonen möchte, bei vielen primitiven Völkern mehr Schamgefühl und reineres sittliches Empfinden, als bei manchem Europäer, der zu ihnen kommt.

Sogar fünf Leichen in Alkohol konnten nach Paris befördert werden. Bei seinen sprachlichen Aufzeichnungen hat HYADES aus den Manuskripten des Rev. TH. BRIDGES geschöpft, aber viel auch selber gesammelt.[102] Kurze Angaben macht er sogar über die Halakwulup, weil eine Frau dieses Stammes damals in der Bahía Orange lebte; nicht aber über die Selk'nam, mit denen die Franzosen keine Verbindung bekommen konnten.[103]

Obwohl HYADES (f): 552 sich bemühte, in seinem Urteil gerecht zu sein, war er nicht frei von Voreingenommenheit. Nach dem langen Verweilen der "La Romanche" in jenen Gewässern schrieb er: Die Yamana „ont conservé à la baie Orange les mêmes habitudes et les mêmes moeurs: s'il pouvait maintenant les revoir en passant, le regretté DARWIN porterait sur eux le même jugement sévère; je ne doute pas non plus que s'il était resté en 1832 au milieu de ces sauvages une année entière, comme nous venons de le faire, il n'eut présenté sur leur compte une appréciation moins rigoureuse".

[102] Vgl. HYADES (q): 280. Nach GUSINDE (gg): 165 hatte BRIDGES drei Jahre vorher die letzte Niederschrift seines Yamana-English Dictionary beendet.

[103] Mißmutig äußert sich HAMY (e): 340 hierzu: „Malgré notre vif désir de faire ample connaissance avec eux, nous n'avons pu les voir de près."

Stellt man das gesamte Ergebnis der MISSION SCIENTIFIQUE zusammen, so wird man die ausgedehnte wissenschaftliche Leistung mit Recht bewundern. Außerordentlich wertvoll ist es, daß durch sie die Volkseigenheiten der Yamana zu einer Zeit sichergestellt worden sind, da sie noch ihre unverfälschte, ursprüngliche Reinheit besaßen.

JOHN RANDOLPH SPEARS: Dieser von einer nordamerikanischen Zeitung ausgesandte Berichterstatter hat sich anfang 1891, vom Norden der Isla Grande kommend, nur zwei Tage in Ushuaia aufgehalten, ohne anderwärts mit unseren Eingeborenen näher bekannt zu werden. Anscheinend hat ihn die Absicht geleitet, die geschäftliche Ausbeute des Landes und besonders der Goldwäschereien zu beobachten.

Für seine harten, teilweise sehr vorwurfsvollen Urteile über die Missionstätigkeit der Anglikaner und im besonderen über das Verhalten des damaligen Superintendant THOMAS BRIDGES gegen die Eingeborenen bleibt er persönlich verantwortlich. Wie COOPER: 129 meint, sind seine ethnographischen Angaben, „it seems, based chiefly if not entirely on good written sources".

ALEJANDRO CAÑAS PINOCHET: Einem gelegentlichen Hinweis entnehme ich, daß der genannte Verfasser im Sommer 1894/95 das Feuerland bereist hat. Nirgends erwähnt er, wie lange er sich dort aufgehalten und welche Stellen er besucht hat; nur einmal spricht er ganz flüchtig über seine Fahrt zur Isla Dawson. In seiner langen Abhandlung vermißt man die deutliche Scheidung der drei feuerländischen Stämme voneinander. Wie er zu dem Stoffe, den er vorlegt, gelangt ist, sagt er: 331 selber: „Nosotros que hemos visitado la Tierra del Fuego, que hemos estado en medio de esos indios, que hemos recogido datos e informaciones de personas serias y conocedoras de ellos, porque han podido observarlos por mucho tiempo de cerca, estamos en situación de decir la verdad, y de describir a esos naturales tal cual son y al través de relaciones, en las cuales si se halla alguna verdad, es la falta casi absoluta de verdad."

Seine Beschreibung des dinglichen Kulturbesitzes der Feuerländer ist gut, alles Weitere aber lückenhaft und unbestimmt. Die zwei Tafeln mit der Unterschrift "Grupos de indios onas: hombres y mujeres" und "Grupo de mujeres onas" stellen nachweislich Indianer des Chaco an der Nordwestgrenze von Argentinien dar.

Anerkennenswert ist das redliche Bemühen dieses Verfassers; denn seine Absicht war es, „a describir a los fueguinos, sin otro interés que el de pintarlos bajo su verdadero aspecto, bajo su verdadera faz". Zweifelsohne hat sein Aufsatz zu einer unvoreingenommenen Beurteilung der Feuerländer vonseiten einzelner leidenschaftsloser, überlegender Leser beigetragen. Doch bietet er nichts Neues über das hinaus, was bis dahin schon durch andere Reisende veröffentlicht worden war.

OTTO NORDENSKJOELD: Zunächst in einer vorläufigen Mitteilung über sein Forschungsunternehmen hat NORDENSKJOELD (f): 212, der bekannte schwedische Geograph erklärt: „In der Absicht, vergleichende Untersuchungen zwischen dem Norden und dem südlichsten bewohnten Teil der Erde anzustellen, legte ich im Jahre 1894 der Stockholmer Geographischen Gesellschaft den Plan einer wissenschaftlichen Expedition nach den Magellanländern vor und fand auch für die Sache so viel Interesse, daß schon im folgenden Jahre von Schweden eine derartige Expedition ausgehen konnte, an welcher ich nebst den Herren DUSEN (als Botaniker) und Dr. ODLIN (als Zoologe) teilgenommen habe. Im November 1895 machten wir [von Buenos Aires aus] an Bord eines argentinischen Kriegsdampfers die Reise nach dem Feuerlande ... Nach 14 tägiger Reise landeten wir in der Bucht von San Sebastián." Von hier aus versuchten diese Schweden erst einen Streifzug durch den nördlichen Teil der Isla Grande und dann einen anderen bis zum Fuße der Kordillere im Süden. Nach mühsamer Forschungsarbeit von etwa zehn Wochen in jener Gebirgsgegend erreichten sie Ushuaia, „die wichtigste Ortschaft in dieser Zone, Hauptstation der englischen Mission und Residenz des Gouverneurs des argentinischen Territoriums Tierra del Fuego. Sie hat etwa ein paar Hundert Bewohner: Regierungsbeamte, Deportierte und Leute, die unter den in der Umgebung lebenden Kolonisten und Goldgräbern einige Geschäfte treiben" (in [f]: 215).

NORDENSKJOELD und seine Begleiter verfolgten andere wissenschaftliche Ziele, weswegen sie sich eingehender Untersuchung der Yamana nicht widmen konnten. Deren Kopfzahl allerdings schätzte der Expeditionsführer damals auf etwa 300. Auch läßt er es sich angelegen sein, die irrigen Behauptungen DARWIN's über diese Eingeborenen zurückzuweisen, ohne zu leugnen „la miserable vida que llevan, tal vez más miserable que la de ninguna otra raza del jénero humano ... Todo el que conozca la vida de esos hombres podrá convencerse de que son más dignos de compasión que de desprecio". Schließlich nennt er (e): 163 noch „otras circunstancias que dan la prueba positiva de que no son faltos de intelijencia". Den englischen Missionaren vorwiegend dankt er seine Kenntnisse von den Lebensverhältnissen der Indianer.

Es waren eben ausschließlich geologische und geographische, botanische und zoologische Beobachtungen, denen diese schwedischen Fachleute sich gewidmet haben. Ihnen ist eine bedeutende Aufhellung der landschaftlichen Bedingungen jener fernen Gegend geglückt und ihre Abhandlungen sind wirklich grundlegend.[124] Im besonderen maßgebend für die Besiedlung des südlichsten Amerika durch den Menschen sind die geologischen Ergebnisse:

[124] Vgl. die zahlreichen Einzeluntersuchungen, veröffentlicht von OTTO NORDENSKJOELD: Wissenschaftliche Ergebnisse der schwedischen Expedition nach den Magellanländern 1895—1897; 3 Bände, Stockholm (o. J.).

denn „die gemachten Sammlungen von Tier- und Pflanzenversteinerungen deuten auf ein Klima der Tertiärzeit hin, das e t w a s, aber nicht viel wärmer war als das jetzige. Nachher trat eine Eiszeit ein. Das Eis hat die Feuerlandinsel fast vollständig bedeckt und die Magellanstraße ausgefüllt, ist aber nördlich von 52° S. Br. nirgends nach der jetzigen atlantischen Meeresküste vorgedrungen. Es könnte scheinen als ob diese verhältnismäßig geringe Ausbreitung den Beobachtungen widerspreche, welche in den subtropischen Gebirgsgegenden gemacht wurden. Wahrscheinlich hat sie aber mit einer allgemeinen Landsenkung in Verbindung gestanden, und das damalige Festland war vielleicht noch viel nördlicher vollständig eisbedeckt. Als die Glacialzeit aufhörte, lag das Feuerland nur etwa 60 m niedriger als jetzt. Es hat sich nachher gehoben, aber jetzt scheint die Erhebung unbedeutend zu sein oder gar nicht stattzufinden". Dieser Tatbestand, weil noch ungeklärt, kann leider bei Beurteilung der alten Muschelhügel nicht verwertet werden. Auch hat NORDENSKJOELD (f) als erster m. W. eine genaue geologische Karte vom Feuerland entworfen.

EXPEDITION der "BELGICA": Auf ihrer Fahrt zum südlichen Eismeer ging anfangs Dezember 1897 die "Belgica" in Punta Arenas vor Anker. Sie lag hier vierzehn Tage, „in welcher Zeit die Vorräte ergänzt und das Schiff wieder vollkommen in Stand gesetzt wurde, während wir die Umgebung durchstreiften" (COOK [d]: 81). Am Abend des 21. Dezember legte das Schiff im Hafen von Ushuaia an. „Am folgenden Morgen gingen wir nach dem Frühstück an Land. Die Art unseres Auftretens war vom anthropologischen Standpunkt aus interessant ... Den Herren JOHN LAWRENC und THOMAS BRIDGES sind wir für ihre wertvolle Unterstützung bei unserer Indianerforschung zu lebhaftem Dank verpflichtet." Unmittelbar danach kündigt COOK (d): 86 an, „die anthropologischen Beobachtungen, Messungen und Sprachforschungen sollen in einer eigenen Publikation veröffentlicht werden". Auf diese wird man vergeblich warten!

An der Erforschung der Yamana haben sich die Mitglieder der "Belgica" nicht ansehnlich beteiligt. Insofern nur verdient dieses Unternehmen erwähnt zu werden, als COOK, nach Rückkehr der "Belgica" zur Magellan-Straße, wo die Expedition sich auflöste und jedes Mitglied nach eigenem Plane einige Beobachtungen weiterführte, das Manuskript des Yamana-Wörterbuches aus der Feder des kurz vorher verstorbenen Rev. T. BRIDGES von der Witwe übernahm und nach Europa brachte. Wie sich das Schicksal dieses Werkes in späterer Zeit gestaltete, ist auf S. 143 nachzulesen.[105]

[105] Die genauen Einzelheiten finden sich bei GUSINDE (gg): 170 zusammengetragen. Daß aus der Feder COOK's die angekündigte Veröffentlichung nicht mehr zu erwarten ist, hat mir G. LECOMTE, der damalige Kapitän der "Belgica", vor nicht langer Zeit zuverlässig mitgeteilt (Bd. I, 58). Ursprünglich hatte nämlich COOK, was LECOMTE: 220 seinerzeit bestätigte, folgende Arbeiten in Aussicht gestellt: Medical Report, Report upon the Ones, A Yahgan grammar and dictionary.

Am 3. Januar 1898 fuhr die "Belgica" in östlicher Richtung weiter und gegenüber Puerto Harberton lief sie auf ein Riff.[106] Als es heller Morgen wurde, erschien LUCAS BRIDGES mit einigen Indianern und bot seine Hilfe an. COOK ging ans Land. Nach einigen Stunden hob sich das Schiff wieder und war gerettet. Am folgenden Tage fuhr die "Belgica" weiter. Auch bei dieser Gelegenheit konnte COOK keine nennenswerten Beobachtungen machen.

JOSÉ J. ALVAREZ: Im leichten Stil der Unterhaltungsschriftstellerei, die nur dem Leser mit einigen Neuigkeiten die Zeit vertreiben will, ist das kleine Büchlein dieses FRAY MOCHO gehalten. Alle Seiten des Lebens und Treibens im Feuerlande werden in kurzen Strichen gezeichnet, die Mühen der Ansiedler, die Anstrengungen der Goldgräber, die Arbeiten der Missionare und die Eigenart der Eingeborenen knapp dargestellt. Doch fehlt jener Redeweise der bestimmte Ausdruck und die scharfe Umrißlinie. Als verläßliche Quelle kommt dieses Werkchen nicht in Frage. Sein Verfasser scheint anfangs 1898 in sehr kurzen Wochen das Feuerland durcheilt zu haben, bestimmte Zeitangaben fehlen.

JERMÁN WIEGHARDT: Dieser deutsche, seinerzeit in Santiago de Chile tätige Lehrer, den ich persönlich dort kennengelernt habe, gibt nirgendwo genaue Hinweise über seinen Aufenthalt im Feuerlande. Aus einem kurzen Worte geht hervor, daß er im Jahre 1896 dort gereist ist.[107] Anscheinend hat er nur einige leicht erreichbare Siedlungen der Europäer und die Goldwäschereien besucht, wirkliche Verbindung mit den Eingeborenen hat er indes nicht angeknüpft.

Sein Aufsatz enthält keine neuen Entdeckungen. Er erweist sich vielmehr vom Anfang bis zum Ende als eine Blütenlese aus neueren Reisewerken, denen ganze Abschnitte wörtlich entnommen sind, doch ohne die mindeste Quellenangabe. Die meisten seiner Zeilen hat WIEGHARDT aus BOVE und HYADES herausgeholt und sich, wohl aus Unkenntnis des Stoffes, der eigenen Beurteilung enthalten. Seine einzige Abhandlung: El territorio de Magallanes, tomo VI; Indijenas fueguinos i patagones, primera parte, sowie die beiden Heftchen: Estudios sobre la Jeolojía del Territorio de Magallanes (Santiago 1904) wurden in Santiago bald als wortgetreue Abschreiberei erkannt und gewürdigt.

W. S. BARCLAY: Im Januar und Februar 1902 weilte dieser Reisende als Gast auf der Farm der Geschwister BRIDGES am östlichen Canal de Beagle. Seine Kenntnis von den dortigen Feuerländern verdankt er fast restlos den Mitteilungen, die LUCAS BRIDGES ihm gemacht hat. Auf der Isla Grande ist er (a): 62 mit ROBERTO DABBENE (a): 3 und mit CARLOS GALLARDO zusammengetroffen, in deren Gesellschaft er eine kurze Strecke durchquert hat.

[106] COOK (d): 106 schildert diesen Unfall kurz, LEZENAYE: 54 aber sehr ausführlich.

[107] In seinen Estudios sobre la Jeologia del Territorio de Magallanes, primera entrega (Santiago 1904), schreibt er pág. 11 nur: „Cuando en 1896 visité a Lennox e islas adyacentes..."

Von Fred Lawrence erfuhr ich noch, daß Barclay sich auch einige Tage in Ushuaia aufgehalten, hier aber keinen Verkehr mit den Yamana angestrebt, sondern sich mit Photographieren viel beschäftigt hat. Lawrence war wiederholt sein Begleiter bei kurzen Ausflügen in die Umgebung von Ushuaia und später auf der Fahrt nach Punta Arenas. Auffällig gerecht und sachlich beurteilt Barclay (d): 130 manche ernste Mängel in der Arbeitsweise der Missionare, aus welchen den Eingeborenen zuweilen schwerer Schaden erwachsen ist.

Auf dieser Reise nahmen die freundschaftlichen Beziehungen Barclay's zur Familie Bridges ihren Anfang, die seitdem weiterhin unterhalten worden sind. Hieraus erklärt es sich, daß er von ihr aufgefordert wurde, zum Yamana-English Dictionary des Rev. Thomas Bridges eine längere Vorrede zu schreiben (S. 143).

ROBERTO DABBENE: Als Begleiter des Carlos Callardo (Bd. I, 59) hat der genannte Ornithologe in den wenigen Wochen vom 19. Januar bis 26. Februar 1902 den langen Weg von Montevideo über die Isla Grande zu den Falkland- und Staaten Inseln und von da über Isla Dawson nach Punta Arenas zurückgelegt.

Zu völkerkundlichen Untersuchungen fehlte es an Zeit und Gelegenheit. Später ließ er zwei Aufsätze erscheinen, in denen er den Sitten und Gebräuchen der Yamana einen breiten Raum gewährt. Doch legt er (b): 168 darin nicht ausschließlich Eigenbeobachtungen vor, sondern macht eine Zusammenstellung, „reuniendo algunas observaciones personales a los numerosos datos suministrados por los distintos viajeros que han visitado el archipiélago fueguino". Erfreulich ist immerhin sein Bemühen um gerechte und verständige Beurteilung der Eingeborenen und ihrer Einrichtungen. Er gesteht (a): 78 auch ein, daß „la mayor parte de estos datos sobre las costumbres de los indios me fueron suministrados por mi apreciado amigo y compañero de viaje Sr. W. S. Barclay, el cual a su vez los obtuvo del señor Lucas Bridges". Dieser Hinweis betrifft hauptsächlich Mitteilungen über die Selk'nam.

CHARLES W. FURLONG: Den Lesern seiner kurzen Aufsätze, die etwa ein Dutzend ausmachen und in verschiedenen Zeitschriften erschienen sind, stellt sich dieser nordamerikanische Oberst als „Artist, Author, Scientist and Explorer" vor. Im Sommer 1907/08 durchquerte er die Isla Grande und besuchte mehrere Punkte am Canal de Beagle in etwa drei Monaten. Hast und Eile trieb ihn voran, für gründliche Kleinarbeit blieb ihm keine Gelegenheit.

Was ihm die Brüder Bridges über die Selk'nam und die Brüder Lawrence über die Yamana mitgeteilt haben,[188] verquickt er mit den eigenen Erkundigungen. Seine Effekthascherei[189] ist durchsichtig und Einzelbeobach-

[188] Auch Coursen: 90 betont: „Many of his cultural data are, moreover, derived verbally from the very best first-hand authorities, the Lawrence and Bridges brothers."

[189] Hierher gehört seine (r): 182 Behauptung: „While ethnic work has been done by an tungen verallgemeinert er, harmlose Vorkommnisse und Alltäglichkeiten deutet er als Abenteuer oder drohende Gefahren. Beispielsweise hat der Indianer SELKNAM weder auf FUEGINO (a): 345 noch auf sonst jemand einen Angriff geplant, als er das Messer zu seinem Gürtel wieder in die richtige Lage brachte. Eine arge Übertreibung ist es, wenn er (b): 127 behauptet, daß schiffbrüchige „sailors have managed to enter the archipelago only to be brutally butchered by the Fuegians. It is no enviable lot to be found by them defenceless in any of the innumerable out-of-the-way places of their habitat".

Die Eingeborenen haben ihn mir als ungeduldig im allgemeinen und als stürmisch bei seinen Fragen geschildert.[109] Als er vom alten CHAMLER einen Gesichtsabdruck in Gips machen wollte, ging er dabei unvorsichtig vor, daß jener Indianer fürchtete zu ersticken. Seitdem hat sich kein Yamana mehr zu ähnlichen Versuchen bereitgestellt. Die selbstbewußte Redeweise dieses Reisenden könnte leichtgläubige Leser irreführen.[110]

ANTONIO COJAZZI: Das Werk dieses Schriftstellers aus dem Salesianerorden erschien fast gleichzeitig mit CARLOS GALLARDO's: LOS ONAS. Bekanntlich (Bd. I, 61) hat TONELLI „brevemente nell 1910" die Isla Grande besucht und wohl auch die Yamana gestreift. Seine eigenen Beobachtungen sind in des erstgenannten Verfassers Werk mit früheren Aufzeichnungen der Salesianermissionare vereinigt worden. Dort heißt es u. a. auch: „Finora i Salesiani non hanno un vero centro stabile di missione fra questi Indi; però un missionario ogni anno fa un' escursione dall' isola grande ad Harberton ed isola Navarino, istruendo gli Indi che incontra; ad Ushuaia risiede permanentem e un sacerdote salesiano, il quale ha l'occasione di istruire questi Indi quando si recano alla capitale per gli scambi coi civilizzati" (COJAZZI: 105). Wer die bis dahin nicht bekannten Einzelheiten, die dieses Werk enthält, entdeckt hat, wird an keiner Stelle angegeben.

ALBERTO DE AGOSTINI: Im Südosten der Isla Grande hat dieser bekannte italienische Forscher, Priester der Salesianer-Genossenschaft Don Bosco's, als erster einige herrliche Fjorde entdeckt und manche schwierige Bergspitzen erstiegen. Ihm sind künstlerisch hochwertige photographische Aufnahmen und eine verbesserte geographische Karte von Magallanes zu danken. Er hat somit einen bedeutenden Anteil an der wissenschaftlichen Aufhellung jenes Gebietes in neuester Zeit.

occasional scientist or explorer along the coasts, it fell to my lot to be the first to pass through certain interior sections of their country alone with Onas . . ." Tatsache ist, daß er von LUCAS BRIDGES sowohl Führer als auch Pferde erhalten und auf den längst bekannten Reisewegen die Isla Grande durchquert hat.

[109] Über seinen kurzen Aufenthalt auf der Farm Rio Douglas sagt er (b): 130 bezeichnend: „My time was entirely occupied in close study of these Indians, and leaving no stone unturned in acquiring information and data of this all but vanished people."

[110] Manche Angaben in seinen ersten Veröffentlichungen hatten schon im "Globus", Bd. 96, S. 228 (Braunschweig 1909) berechtigten Widerspruch hervorgerufen.

Kurze Monate war er zunächst in Ushuaia angestellt, wo er vorübergehend mit den Yamana in Berührung gekommen ist. Weit eingehender hat er im Sommer 1910 und 1913, sowie auf einer späteren Reise im Sommer 1922/23 die Selk'nam beobachtet. Zu seiner kursen Beschreibung der Eingeborenen hat er geschöpft aus „den eigenen persönlichen Beobachtungen und genauen Bezeugungen der Salesianer Missionäre Borgatello, Zenone und Beauvoir" (Bd. I, 61).

Keine Bucherscheinung der letzten Zeit hat das Feuerland in solch farbenprächtiger Naturwahrheit zur Darstellung gebracht, wie sein Originalwerk in italienischer Sprache, an dessen glänzende Ausstattung die deutsche Ausgabe nicht heranreicht.[192]

Ein anderer Italiener namens G. B. de Gasperi hat sich an dem Forschungsunternehmen des Dr Agostini zur Cordillera de Darwin von Januar bis März 1913 beteiligt. Die von ihm veröffentlichten kursen statistischen Angaben über die Volksbewegung der feuerländischen Indianer verdankt er den Mitteilungen von E. A. Zwank und Lucas Bridges.

JOSÉ E. RODRIGUEZ: Aus einzelnen Angaben im Büchlein: Riquezas y Bellezas Australes (Buenos Aires 1921) ist zu entnehmen, daß sein Verfasser im Sommer 1920/21 das Feuerland eilig durchquert hat. Seine Mitteilungen über die Selk'nam sowohl wie über die Yamana sind weiter nichts als das oft wiederholte, oberflächliche Gerede von Leuten, die sich hoch erhaben dünken über die „miserable existencia de los últimos seres humanos (yaganes) que habitan una zona conceptuada por todos los viajeros como imposible de sustentar la vida" (pg. 315).

Ein besonderer Abschnitt: Apuntes referentes a los indios de Tierra del Fuego (pags 315—335) ist von Percival A. Reynolds eigens für dieses Büchlein am 15. Februar 1920 geliefert worden. Er erweist sich als sachlich und inhaltsreich; denn der Verfasser ist Schwiegersohn des Rev. Thomas Bridges und hat lange Zeit auf der Farm Vismonte bei Rio del Fuego zugebracht. Die Mitteilungen über die Selk'nam sind unvergleichlich ausgedehnter als die über unsere Yamana.

Der genannte argentinische Oberst hat in diesem Werkchen auch vier Photographien von Selk'nam-Indianer eingefügt, die ich auf meiner ersten Reise aufgenommen und von denen ich Abzüge den Indianern auf meiner zweiten Reise geschenkt habe. Wie ich in Erfahrung bringen konnte, hat er diese Bilder für je einen argentinischen Peso den Indianern abgekauft und sie dann in seinem Büchlein veröffentlicht, ohne aber daran zu denken, die Herkunft derselben anzudeuten.

[192] Vgl. meine Besprechung dieses Werkes und seine Erwiderung im "Anthropos", XX, 368; 1925 und XXI, 718; 1926. Gleichzeitig sei hingewiesen auf seinen Aufsatz in der "Rivista Illustr. della Esposizione Missionaria Vaticana"; anno II, Nr. 26, p. 812; Roma 1925. Endlich auf: Turismo argentino nella Terra del Fuoco, in "Le vie d'Italia e dell' America Latina"; anno XXX, nro 2, Febbraio 1924.

MILCIADES A. VIGNATI: Zu Beginn des Jahres 1921 hat dieser argentinische Ethnologe die Muschelhaufen auf der Ostküste der Isla Grande und in der Umgebung von Ushuaia als erster gründlich untersucht. Die Gerätschaften, die er persönlich eingesammelt hat, sind von ihm nachher mit anderen, die früher schon nach Buenos Aires gelangt waren, ausführlich beschrieben worden. Jene Muschelhaufen reichen zumindest bis kurz vor den Eindringen der ersten Europäer in den Kap Hoorn-Archipel zurück und „el carácter del contenido arqueológico de los conchales difiere tan en absoluto de lo que se ha descrito hasta ahora como propio de los aborígenes fueguinos, que la simple comparación evidencia que aquellos pertenecen a una época anterior libre de toda influencia exótica". So beurteilt er (c): 142 zusammenfassend seine Ergebnisse.

Weitere Grabungen würden wichtige Aufschlüsse über die Vorgeschichte der ersten Besiedler des untersten Südamerika vermitteln. Zumindest konnte dieser Forscher (b): 5 bereits jetzt feststellen, „que las pirnas provenientes de los conchales fueguinos, no obstante la indiscutible arcaicidad de sus formas, pueden englobarse, en conjunto, dentro del instrumental patagónico. Surge, así, nuevamente, el problema del parentesco étnico que se debe asignar a los indios fueguinos en relación a las demás tribus del sur". Seine Untersuchungen werden teilweise ergänzt durch jene, die Lovenor an anderen Muschelhaufen nur drei Jahre später durchgeführt hat.

SAMUEL K. LOTHROP: Kurz nachdem ich selber im März 1924 das Feuerland nach meinem vierten Aufenthalte verlassen hatte, kam dieser nordamerikanische Ethnologe an, nämlich im November des gleichen Jahres. Von Punta Arenas begab er sich in Begleitung des GONZALOS BEMOSS nur Farm am Rio del Fuego und erbeutete seiner ersten Aufmerksamkeit den Selk'nam in zwei Lagern am Lago Fagnano. In Puerto Harberton (a): 238 „we were entertained by Captain and Mrs. SOUNES NEILSON and Mrs. Jane LOMBARD for several weeks. Accompanied at times by Captain NEILSON and Mr. Ernest FOGELSAT we travelled in the boat to visit Ushuaia, Remolino, Puerto Magellanes [sic?], Puerto Eufrosia, and other points on Navarin island; also Cable island, Picton island, and Cambaceres bay. As a result we came into contact with almost all the surviving Yahgan Indians and obtained a collection which includes practically everything listed by Dr. COOPER, as well as other objects as yet not described in print. In addition we imported nearly eighty ancient canoe-skins, thus obtaining a small archaeological collection".

Insgesamt drei Monate, nur Sommerzeit 1924/25, hat Lovenor (b): 11 im Feuerlande verbracht und dabei sich hauptsächlich um eine möglichst vollständige Sammlung der Gebrauchsgegenstände der Selk'nam und der Yamana bemüht. In seinem Hauptwerk hat er sie gut beschrieben, hingegen den geistigen Besitz derselben nur kurz abgehandelt. Er gibt dafür folgende Begründung an: „Although the studies of COOPER and KOOPMAN had not then appeared in print, I was told that they had worked chiefly on the religion, initiation ceremonies, folklore and linguistics." Nun, in sehr kurzer Zeit hätte er wirklich nicht mehr leisten können, als was er tatsächlich [illegible] hat. Da er die bedeutendsten früheren Quellen gut ausgewertet hat, wurde sein Werk zur besten zusammenfassenden Darstellung der Ethnographie der Sek'ana und Tanana.

BALDWIN SPENCER: Erst als die Tokmanbriefe veröffentlicht wurde, ist in europäischen Kreisen bekannt geworden, daß dieser verdiente Australienforscher in seinem hohen Alter noch eine Reise nach dem Feuerlande unternommen hatte. Aus dem Tagebuch, das er geführt hat und das bald nach seinem Hinscheiden veröffentlicht wurde, ist eingesehen das besondere wissenschaftliche Ziel ersichtlich, dem er durch diese Unternehmung zustrebte.

Er verließ London am 17. Februar 1929 und traf in Punta Arenas mit Gustav Wanzow, dem Sohne des noch lebenden, bisher englischsprechenden Missionars Juan Wanzow (1.11.94) zusammen, in dessen Begleitung er am 4. Mai seiner nächsten Reise. Nach vier Tagen landete er in Ushuaia. Am nächsten Abend war er bereits auf der Farm Sta Douglas. Kurz Wanzows hatte drei Indianer Gamen mit Familie von der Isla Hoste herum und Swanson-M begann sofort Heil auszuhagen; doch dieser weigte sich „positively disturbed to discuss any important matters, so said nothing about this". Auch im Verlauf der folgenden Wochen bestand Swanson's hauptsächlichste Arbeitens im Bringen von vier Eingeborenen und deren Familienmitgliedern, mit denen er vielfältig zusammenwohnt.

Mit Gamen machte er eine üble Erfahrung, die er 71 vollbewahrigt verallgemeinerte: „It looks much as if the only way to get anything out of the natives nowadays is by giving them drink." Nachdem dieser Indianer unserem Forscher dem Wiener Gesellschaft gebietet hatte, entfernte er sich wieder und ging sich nach Isla Hoste zurück. Während der ganzen Zeit war er mit seiner Familie von Swanson 71 vollständig beköstigt und am Schluß auch mit 190 ausbezahlt worden. Schon diese wenigen Angaben zeigen, wie mühsam und kostspielig die Forschung gegenwärtig bei den Tanana ist; trotz dieser Opfer [illegible] das Ergebnis meist spärlich aus.

Seit seinem Eintreffen durchfuhr, also seit 9. Mai, [illegible] sich Swanson [illegible] Schwierigkeiten. Schwierig gestaltete er sich nicht, ja [illegible] auf den gegenüberliegenden Ufer, auf Westkünste der Isla Hoste an der Ansiedlung Murray. Die letzten Zeilen trug er am 10. Juli in sein Tagebuch ein. Wie seine Begleiterin Miss Hamerton mitteilt, ist er in der Nacht vom 13. zum 14. Juli 1929 an [illegible] einsamen Stelle gestorben.

Mit gewöhnlich erscheint es unbegreiflich, warum dieser erfahrene Forscher gerade zur strengsten Winterzeit nach Feuerland gekommen ist. Er war nicht mehr jung, hatte er doch auf jenen Insel am 22. Juni nach seinem

 Seine vorsichtige ging so: [illegible] bei seinen Arbeitsbesuchen von Miss Hamerton mit dieser sah: „The Professor has no faith in these half-civilized young Tokgans, and will accept nothing until he has talked with some of the old men."

[illegible] Gebrauchsanweisungen, die [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Um die letzten Reste der südwestlichen Feuerländer nach den Forderungen der neuzeitlichen Völkerkunde zu untersuchen, schien daher Eile geboten zu sein. Möglicherweise verdanken wir, Bedeutende Nachrichten von dem neuzeitlichen Eingeborenen jener Eingeborenen überzeugen sich mit 1911. In diesem Jahre war ich nach Chile gekommen und hatte von Anfang an jede Gelegenheit und besonders Aufmerksamkeit gewendet.

Trotz unserem, was in Mitteilungen und Gerüchten englischerseits und erfahrungsweise, sondern Nachrichtenbriefe über die Neuerlöffnung und Gedeutung von Schul-Farmen eine unverkennbar deutliche Sprache, neuerer Erfolgen gelten es als besonderen Glücksfall, ein einzelnes Kind mit Feuerländern vom Dampfer aus beobachtet zu haben, immer mehrere endlich bei uns von Daten in den Zeitungen von Punta Arenas und in dem Monatsblatt der Salesianer-Missionare; letzteres hatten zwei Jahrzehnte vorher eine regelmäßige Tätigkeit unter den Yahgan und Halakwulup eingeführt. Sogar das offizielle South American Missionary Magazine beschäftigte sich auf keine Nachrichten über die Familie der letzten letzten Missionare Lorenzen und Wilkens, ohne weiter auch der Eingeborenen zu gedenken; es gab 1916 sogar den endgültigen Abschluß der missionarischen Wirkung unter den Yamana öffentlich bekannt.

Sehr enttäuschend war es, wenn ich immer und immer wieder von Leuten, die den Süden bereist hatten, erfahren mußte, die Eingeborenen zählten nur noch noch wenigen und hätten ihre frühere Lebensweise längst aufgegeben; was einige von ihnen noch beibehalten hätten, erschöpfe in der Vergleichung mit dem Europäerum als widerliches Zerrbild und sei selber schon durch Alkoholgenuß und Unsittlichkeit gänzlich ungesund geworden. Gegenüber den stets gleichbleibenden Urteilen über die Lage der wenigen indianischen Überlebenden und gegenüber dem unbegreiflichen Sachverhalt, daß europäische Siedlungen bereits das ganze Feuerland beherrschen, erschien noch mir unerhört die Langsamkeit Fahrt nach Innern Süden als unnütz und zwecklos.

Im Jahre 1911 hatte ich von einer Reise durch das weite Gebiet der chilenischen Araukanen eine reiche Sammlung ihrer Gebrauchsgegenstände zum Museo de Etnologia y Antropologia in Santiago mitgebracht. Dabei kam mir bildlich zum Bewußtsein, wie wenig bis dahin die Eingeborenen im südlichen Chile bekannt waren und daß sie verschiedig Abstämmigkeit noch nicht unterscheidet worden sind. Das gesamte, im Jahre 1912 durch meinen ersten Chef Dr. Max Uhle eingeleitete und seit 1916 durch Dr. Aureliano Oyarzun weitergeführte Museo hatte es sich zur Aufgabe gestellt, den gesamten prähistorischen Kulturkreis der in chilenischen Grenzen ansässigen Eingeborenen zu umfassen. Hierbei hätten die Feuerländer um so weniger fehlen dürfen, da gerade sie als Träger dieser eigentümlichen Kulturform einen bedeutsamen Platz im geschichtlichen Werden des südamerikanischen Völkerbildes einnehmen. Ingesamtlicher Dinge, so sagte ich mir, würden bestimmt, trotz der verhältnismäßigen Lebensverhältnisse, noch in dem Hinder sein, die so unserm und unbedeutenen der Süden weit sein. Außerdem glaubte ich anthropologischer Messungen und ethnologischer Beobachtungen durchführen. Diese erachtete ich als um so notwendiger, weil diesbezüglich nur sehr bescheidene Versuche vorlagen; sie wurden um so dringender gefordert, weil die Feuerländer wegen ihrer Stellung zu anderen südamerikanischen Völkerschaften vermutlich auch ihre besonderen Rasseneigenheiten entwickelt hatten.

Gewiß, es lagen Veröffentlichungen über diesen und jenen Stamm mehr oder weniger reichlich vor.[204] Einige von ihnen erschienen als sehr wertvoll und durchaus zuverlässig, angefangen von den Mitteilungen jener Seeleute, die als erste Europäer die Magellan-Straße befuhren und jener der "Nassauischen Flotte", die mit den südlichsten Feuerländern die ersten Beziehungen angeknüpft hatten (S.51). Bei mühsamer Auswertung der Quellen konnte man ein verhältnismäßig vollständiges Bild der Wirtschaftsform jener Eingeborenen zusammenstellen, überdies einige Grundzüge ihres Gesellschaftslebens erkennen. Daß sie aber auch ihren besonderen geistigen Besitzstand aufzuweisen hätten, mochte dieser immerhin sehr gering sein, durfte man, trotz DARWIN's anderslautenden Behauptungen, mit gutem Recht vermuten. Nie konnte ich mich der Ahnung ganz erwehren, daß im Gedächtnis einiger alter Leute zumindest noch wenige Bruchstücke der religiösen und mythologischen Vorstellungen ihres Volkes sich erhalten haben dürften, die unbedingt gerettet werden mußten; denn wenn europäischer Einfluß auch das äußere Bild der Lebensform eines primitiven Volkes schnell abzufärben imstande ist, bleibt die Seele der Eingeborenen noch lange in der Vorstellungswelt ihres Volkes verwurzelt.

Diese Erwägungen und einige Rücksichten rein persönlicher Natur bestimmten mich schließlich, die Vorbereitungen zu einer Reise nach dem Feuerlande entschieden zu betreiben. Zumindest konnte ich über die Lage der Eingeborenen und über die Möglichkeit, sie nach dieser oder jener Richtung zu erforschen, endgültig Klarheit schaffen.

Was an wertvollen und brauchbaren Berichten über die Feuerländer bislang vorlag, war der Feder solcher Personen erflossen, die verschiedener Nationalität angehörten, hingegen stieß ich nur sehr vereinzelt auf chilenische Quellen. Berechtigterweise erwartete man allgemein, daß chilenische Kreise sich an der Aufhellung des Kulturbildes der Feuerländer beteiligen, weil letztere, ausgenommen den östlichen Teil der Isla Grande, innerhalb der politischen Grenzen des Freistaates Chile beheimatet sind. Jenen Erwartungen entsprach schließlich die chilenische Regierung und im besonderen die Leitung des Museo de Etnologia y Antropologia in Santiago dadurch, daß sie das ausgedehnte und langwierige Forschungsunternehmen mir anvertraut und durch ihre hilfsbereite Unterstützung zu einem ergebnisreichen Erfolge geführt hat.

Bereits im Bd. I, 62 habe ich die Grundgedanken, die mich bei meinen Forschungen geleitet, und die Arbeitsweise, die ich eingehalten habe, mit reichlicher Ausführlichkeit dargelegt. Somit kann ich mich im Folgenden darauf beschränken, den tatsächlichen Ablauf meines Unternehmens bei den Yamana in knapper Form zu berichten. Unvermeidlich werde ich dann und wann mein Arbeiten unter den Selk'nam und Halakwulup streifen müssen.

[204] Die große Menge von Abhandlungen über die Feuerländer, die JOSE M. CORREA in seiner Analytical and Critical Bibliography of the Tribes of Tierra del Fuego (Washington 1917) bis dahin fast vollständig zusammengetragen hat, überrascht auf den ersten Blick. Aber der Wert einer jeden derselben ist sehr unterschiedlich.

Wenn ich heute, von einer gesicherten Stelle aus, an die beschwerlichen Reisen und an die mühevollen Anstrengungen zurückdenke, gleichzeitig aber auch den Umfang und Gehalt dessen überblicke, was sie mir eingetragen haben, so fühle ich mich reichlichst entlohnt. Herzlich danke ich allen, die an meinen Reisewegen gestanden und mich durch ihre aufrichtige Hilfsbereitschaft auf diese oder jene Weise wirksam gefördert haben.

1. Meine erste Reise

Mit frohen Hoffnungen verließ ich in der Nacht zum 8. Dezember 1918 den Hafen Valparaiso im Dampfer "Magallanes". Selbstverständlich war es nicht meine Absicht, im fernen Süden unbekannte Landstriche zu entdecken oder neue Indianerstämme aufzuspüren. Die landschaftlichen Bedingungen der feuerländischen Inselwelt waren damals hinlänglich bekannt, obwohl im gebirgigen Südwesten der Isla Grande einige Strecken noch auf ein genaues Vermessen warteten. Mein ganzes Bemühen zielte darauf ab, möglichst viel vom Kulturgut jener wenigen Feuerländer zu retten, die als letzte Vertreter ihres einst starken Volkes übriggeblieben waren: denn ich wünschte die Lücken in früheren Berichten auszufüllen und manche Ungenauigkeiten richtig zu stellen.

Da ich diese Forschung im Auftrage der chilenischen Regierung ausführte, waren mir von vornherein bedeutende Erleichterungen und ansehnliche Förderungen sicher. Nicht nur die behördlichen Personen haben mich tatkräftig überall unterstützt, ich konnte mich auch vertrauensvoll an private Unternehmer und beliebige Ansiedler wenden, die sich zur Mithilfe an meinen Plänen stets bereit gezeigt haben. Wer in jenen Gebieten ansässig ist, kennt aus eigener Erfahrung die vielen Nöte und Bedrängnisse, in die ein Einzelreisender ganz unverhofft gerät; er leistet schnell und gern Hilfe, weil alle, die im gleichen Raume aufeinander angewiesen sind, von einem stark betonten Gemeinschaftgefühl beseelt werden.

Obwohl die geringen Mittel, über die ich verfügte, mir kaum eine andere Wahl gelassen hätten, so war es doch von vornherein mein überzeugter Entschluß, auf einen eigentlichen Begleiter zu verzichten und die Lager bzw. die Hütten jener Eingeborenen ganz allein zu besuchen. Letztere sind scheu und mißtrauisch gegen jeden Fremden; sie geraten in Angst, wenn mehrere ihnen entgegentreten, dir, wie es meistens sich ereignet, schwer bewaffnet sind. Was die Feuerländer an gemeinsten Gewalttätigkeiten von den Europäern erfahren haben, war keinem ehrlich denkenden Menschen, der darnach sich ein wenig umsah, unbekannt geblieben. Was Wunder, wenn die Eingeborenen, nach den übelsten Erlebnissen mit den Europäern, aufs Höchste eingeschüch-tret waren und jedem Fremden mit stärkstem Argwohn begegneten. Eben um sie von dieser Haltung abzubringen und ihnen von vornherein den Weg zum Vertrauen zu eröffnen, glaubte ich ganz allein in ihre Gemeinschaft eintreten zu sollen. Ein unzweideutiger Beweis meines Vertrauens auf ihre Menschenfreundlichkeit und liebevolle Behandlung lag offensichtlich darin, daß ich sorglos vor sie hintrat und sonder Furcht mich ihnen überließ, mochten sie ein geschlossenes Lager bilden oder als Einzelfamilien die Wildnis durchqueren. Tatsächlich, es ist eine sehr wirksame Empfehlung, wenn man ganz allein und ohne die gefürchteten Feuerwaffen sich ihnen nähert; jeder Argwohn fällt innerhalb weniger Tage, wenn man, unbekümmert um den Lebensunterhalt und um die persönliche Sicherheit, in den Ablauf ihres Tageswerkes sich einstellt und sich ganz in die Abhängigkeit von ihnen begibt.

Für die Forschung selber erfließen aus diesen Voraussetzungen unschätzbare Vorteile. Hat der fremde Gast mit einer für seine Arbeit unerläßlich notwendigen Einfühlungsgabe sich im Alltag der Indianer schnell zurechtgefunden und deren ganzes äußeres Gebaren tunlichst so weit übernommen, daß er sonderlich gar nicht mehr auffällt, sondern wie ein Mitläufer reibungslos ihrem Verbande eingegliedert erscheint, eröffnet sich von diesem Augenblicke an die Möglichkeit zu einer einwandfreien, ergebnisreichen Forschung. Jeder einzelne Indianer gibt sich unbeengt und hemmungslos, im Familienkreise wickelt sich der Wirtschaftsbetrieb ohne Behinderung ab, die Äußerungen des Gemeinschaftslebens erfolgen so natürlich, als wäre der Fremde überhaupt nicht anwesend. Eine solch vollständige Eingliederung in Sein und Leben des fremden Volkes, das nur kleine Gruppen bildet und meist sogar in alleinstehende Familien aufgelöst ist, gelingt nur dem Einzelforscher. Als solcher ist er nämlich ganz und gar auf die wenigen Eingeborenen seiner nächsten Umgebung angewiesen, wird von ihnen schärfstens beobachtet, hat nicht einmal die Möglichkeit zu einem kurzen Gedankenaustausch mit Seinesgleichen und bleibt den Eingeborenen, wie diese sehr bald fühlen, wehrlos ausgeliefert. Diese Hilflosigkeit kommt dem Forscher zugute, wenn er sie auszunützen versteht; die Eingeborenen werden sie von sich aus niemals zu Übergriffen gegen dessen Freiheit mißbrauchen. Daß die Indianer zuweilen auch ihre Forderungen an den Weißen stellen, dem sie durch lange Wochen Tag und Nacht für unausgesetztes Fragen und für allerhand Dienstleistungen zur Verfügung stehen, und daß sie dabei, in ihrem Unverstand, sich zuweilen von merkwürdigen Werturteilen leiten lassen, befremdet einen erfahrenen Reisenden nicht.

Die soeben bezeichnete Lage zwingt ihn unausweichlich, sich wegwerfender Urteile über das, was er sieht und erlebt, zu enthalten und den Eingeborenen selber als vollwertigen Menschen zu begegnen, vor allem auf dem Gebiete der geschlechtlichen Sittlichkeit eine blanke Untadelhaftigkeit zu beweisen. Man darf eben nie aus dem Auge verlieren, daß auch jeder "Wilde" sein Rechtsurteil und Ehrgefühl immer bei sich trägt; er läßt es, ohne mehr oder weniger schwer gekränkt zu werden, nicht verletzen, auch nicht von einem Europäer, welchem gegenüber er nur in bestimmter Richtung ein Minderwertigkeitsbewußtsein verspürt. Weiters soll man nie übersehen, daß ihre Gebräuche viel sinnvoller und manche Einrichtungen weit zweckdienlicher sind, als es auf den ersten Anblick scheint. Vertieft man sich nämlich dahinein, wird man zuweilen sogar zur eigenen Beschämung wahrnehmen, wie die hohe Erfahrungsweisheit und die genaueste Beobachtung mehrerer Geschlechter am Zustandekommen von dem und jenem mitgeholfen haben. Endlich sei auf einen Umstand hingewiesen, der eine noch stärkere Wirkungskraft als die beiden genannten Rücksichten besitzt. Vor allem was Sitte oder Gewohnheit ist oder was die Vorväter überliefert haben und als Stammesbrauch gilt, zeigt die Volksgemeinschaft der Primitiven und jeder Einzelne von ihnen eine unbegrenzte Ehrfurcht und gesteigerte Hochachtung. Falls ein Fremder es sich herausnimmt, darüber zu spötteln oder nur verächtlich zu reden, hat er für immer die Gunst jener Leute, zu denen er gekommen ist, verspielt.[106] Der Wohlerzogenheit jener Wilden ist es zu danken, daß mancher Europäer, trotz schwerer Verunglimpfung, deren er sich durch sein unvorsichtiges Benehmen schuldig gemacht hat, mit heiler Haut davonkommt; einzelne Völker schlagen schnell zu und mancher dieser heißspornigen Eindringlinge hat es allein sich selber zuzuschreiben, daß er umgebracht worden ist.

Die Erörterungen in diesem Sinne weiterzuführen ist hier nicht der Ort. Als aufrichtiger Freund meiner Indianer will ich unumwunden eingestehen, daß ich zuweilen in flammenden Zorn geraten bin, wenn ich Zeuge war, mit welch hochnäsigem Protzertum hohle Dummköpfe die indianischen Sitten und Gebräuche beredet haben, mit welch angequälter Großsprecherei sie die geistige Veranlagung und charakterliche Befähigung der Eingeborenen heruntersetzen sich bemühten, mit welch ekelhafter Selbstüberhebung, hinter der sich gemeinste Lüsternheit verbarg, sie die unbesiegbare geschlechtliche Sittlichkeit standhafter Frauen und Mädchen begiferten. Eine Frage an jene Leute, woher sie das Recht zu dergleichen erniedrigenden Urteilen und zu ihrer wegwerfenden Behandlung der Eingeborenen nähmen, wäre von ihnen unbeantwortet geblieben; denn nur eßockdummer Eigendünkel, der sich unter Eingeborenen ohne Kontrolle zu sein glaubt, ist solch bedauerlicher Entgleisungen fähig. Mir aber wird, um die positive Seite hervorzukehren, jeder Forscher darin beistimmen, daß er die größten Erfolge immer dann erzielte, wenn er sich bemüht hat, den Primitiven in jeder Weise gerecht zu werden. Ganz besonders aber dann, wenn er trachtete, sie niemals in ihrer Hochschätzung für alles, was ihnen heilig und wert ist, zu verletzen.

[106] Auf bestimmte Einzelheiten hier einzugehen lohnt sich nicht. Ist es doch erwiesen, daß Rev. Thomas Bennett während seiner jahrzehntelangen Missionstätigkeit kein wahres Verständnis für die Lebensform der Yamana, noch viel weniger den rechten Sinn für ihre geistige Veranlagung und für den Inhalt ihrer gesamten Überlieferung zu erkennen gegeben hat. Eben weil ihm die Einfühlung in die Seele dieser Feuerländer ganz und gar abging, haben sich letztere ihm innerlich kaum in etwa geöffnet. Unter seinem starken Einfluß wurden auch die übrigen Missionare in der seelischen Annäherung an die Eingeborenen behindert. Welchen Erfolg demnach das gesamte Missionswerk erzielt hat, ist nunmehr zu erraten.

Nach glücklicher Fahrt durch das westpatagonische Inselgebiet landete ich in Punta Arenas. Von den gastfreundlichen Salesianerpatres bin ich in all meinen Bestrebungen während meines ganzen Aufenthaltes in Magellanes tatkräftig gefördert worden. Infolge eines Streiks der Hafenarbeiter mußte ich, um keine empfindliche Einbuße an Zeit zu erleiden, meinen ursprünglichen Arbeitsplan ein wenig ändern, fand aber bald Gelegenheit, auf die Isla Grande zu kommen, wo ich mehrere Wochen bei den Selk'nam mit gutem Erfolg beschäftigt war (Bd. I, 68). Ein kleiner Unfall zwang mich, meine Untersuchungen bei ihnen vorschnell abzubrechen. In nächster Nähe vom Indianerlager am Lago Fagnano arbeitete damals vorübergehend eine argentinische Vermessungskommission; diese rüstete sich eben, das Gebirge im Süden zu überschreiten, um zu den Canal de Beagle zu gelangen. Mein gesundheitliches Befinden war zwar ernstlich gefährdet, doch hatte ich einige Gewähr, in jener großen Gesellschaft den beschwerlichen Ritt wagen zu dürfen. Die schweren Anstrengungen durch ganze elf Stunden trieben allerdings das Fieber immer höher und in bedenklichem Zustande am späten Abend des 18. Februar 1919 erreichte ich schließlich die Häuser der Farm bei Puerto Harberton. Das ist der Grundbesitz, den Rev. THOMAS BRIDGES nach seinem Ausscheiden aus der South American Missionary Society erworben und eingerichtet hatte. Wer die Kordillere in nördlicher oder südlicher Richtung überqueren will, kommt unvermeidlich hier durch; denn von hier aus hat seinerzeit der genannte BRIDGES, im Einverständnis mit der argentinischen Regierung, den einzigen Reitweg nach Norden angelegt.

Was ich auf dieser Farm fand war nicht nur eine gewisse Bequemlichkeit, sondern weit darüber hinaus auch eine verständnisvolle Pflege. Ich mußte unweigerlich zurückbleiben, während jene argentinische Kommission bereits am nächsten Tage abzog. Mit hohem Fieber blieb ich ans Bett gefesselt. Bald trat Besserung ein und am fünften Tage konnte ich aufstehen. Mühsam nur bewegte ich mich, gestützt auf zwei Stöcke, benützte aber die Abwesenheit von Mischlingen und Weißen an jenem Sonntage, um mit einem chilenischen Arbeiter an einer nicht weit abliegenden Stelle das Skelett eines jugendlichen Yamana und den Schädel eines älteren Indianers zu heben. Die sorgfältige Pflege, die mir der norwegische Kapitän SOLVEIG NIELSEN im Verein mit seiner liebenswürdigen Gattin durch jene sechs Tage gewidmet hat, werde ich stets in dankbarer Erinnerung bewahren.

Wie man in jenen Gegenden nicht nur vom hörbat unbeständigen Wetter, sondern auch von allerlei Zufällen abhängig ist, so bot sich mir ganz unerwartet in aller Morgenfrühe des 24. Februar die günstige Gelegenheit, in einem kleinen Kutter nach Ushuaia zu fahren. Nichts hätte mir mehr erwünscht sein können als diese einladende Bequemlichkeit. Der Weg zu Pferde ist sogar für einen tüchtigen Reiter ermüdend und lästig, während man vom kleinen Fahrzeuge aus die herrliche Landschaft mit ihren wechselreichen Umrissen und Farben unbeschwert genießt und in weniger als der halben Zeit das Ziel erreicht.

An jenem Morgen war der östliche Canal de Beagle spiegelglatt und ein fast wolkenfreier Himmel wölbte sich darüber. Begeistert deutete ich diese wunderschöne Wirklichkeit als verheißungsvolles Vorzeichen für ein ergebnisreiches Arbeiten unter den Yamana, in deren frostiger Heimat ich mich bereits befand. Noch war ich keines einzigen von ihnen ansichtig geworden. Wohl aber haben die ausgedehnten Muschelhaufen an den vielgewundenen Ufern der Bahía Harberton meine Aufmerksamkeit auf sich gezogen; darin herumzugraben war ich leider behindert. Während der Fahrt fielen mir andere, nicht minder mächtige Muschelhaufen an den Ufern der Isla Gable und noch viele kleinere wie größere zu beiden Seiten des Canal de Beagle auf.

Nach reichlich zwei Stunden wurde Puerto Remolino sichtbar, wo heute die Familie des ehemaligen Missionars Rev. JOHN LAWRENCE, ein langjähriger Mitarbeiter des Rev. THOMAS BRIDGES und sein Nachfolger in der Superintendancy, eine Schaf-Farm und ein Sägewerk besitzt. An dieser Stätte durfte ich keinesfalls vorbeifahren; denn sie ist seit vielen Jahren ein Sammelpunkt der Eingeborenen. Sie wissen sich hier nicht nur sicher vor allen Unbilden und Übergriffen, die sie durch gewissenlose Europäer erfahren, sie werden auch bestens unterstützt und reichlich beschenkt, erhalten gelegentlich Arbeit auf der Farm und erledigen manche Aufträge, für die sie mit Lebensmitteln oder Bargeld entlohnt werden. Im wahrsten und weitesten Sinne des Wortes ist Punta Remolino für sie eine Zufluchtstätte und eine immer fließende Quelle bei ihren vielen Bedürfnissen. Später sollte ich das alles überzeugend erfahren. Längst war mir bekannt, wie oft die Familie LAWRENCE früheren Reisenden eine erhoffte Verbindung mit den Eingeborenen ermöglicht hat; ihre Hilfsbereitschaft ist dort im Feuerlande weit und breit bekannt. Also betrat ich zuversichtlich ihr Haus.

Schon bei meinem ersten Besuche hätten meine Pläne und Ziele, die ich kurz darlegte, kaum mit mehr Verständnis und mit tiefer empfundener Anteilnahme aufgenommen werden können. Leider nur wenige Stunden durfte ich hier verweilen, da die übrigen Reisenden Ushuaia noch bei Tageslicht erreichen wollten; der leichte Südwestwind hatte sich inzwischen bedrohlich verstärkt. Als ich von der freundlichen Familie LAWRENCE kurzen Abschied nahm, sicherte sie mir die bestmögliche Aufnahme zu; ich versprach, in wenigen Tagen zurückzukommen.

Beim Verlassen des Hauses begegnete ich drei Erwachsenen. Das waren die ersten Yamana, die ich sah. FRED LAWRENCE nannte mir ihre Namen und zeichnete mit einigen Worten ihren Charakter. Auf den ersten Eindruck hin, den sie auf mich machten, kam ich mir völlig ratlos vor. Diese drei Personen waren tatsächlich himmelweit von jener Vorstellung verschieden, die ich mir bereits in meinen Jugendjahren auf Grund von CHARLES DARWIN's "Reise eines Naturforschers um die Welt" gebildet hatte. Menschenwürdig sahen sie aus. Sie steckten in schmutzigen, überweiten Kleidungsstücken, die ihnen am Körper schlaff herumhingen und die sie eher verunstalteten als zierten. Gesicht und Haltung aber stimmten zu den Bildern, die in reicher Auswahl von der Mission Scheppersque du Cap Horn veröffentlicht worden sind; ihr scheues Wesen und der mißtrauische Blick waren echt indianisch. Ich starrte diese Menschen an, während sie vorübereilten, wie versteinert stand ich da. Erst ein lauter Ruf des Kapitäns aus dem Kutter heraus löste mich von dieser Stelle und ich eilte zum Fahrzeug. Bald werde ich doch wieder an diesem Orte sein, dachte ich; also fiel mir die Trennung nicht schwer. Jene Gestalten schwanden mir nicht mehr aus dem Gedächtnis und während der Weiterfahrt ließ ich mir vom Führer des kleinen Kutters, trotz unruhiger See, andauernd über die Yamana erzählen. Nach reichlich zwei Stunden landeten wir in Ushuaia.

Glücklicherweise konnte ich bereits nach zwei Tagen mit Hilfe eines Stockes fast unauffällig herumgehen. Sogleich machte ich dem argentinischen Gouverneur meinen Besuch, legte ihm meine Pläne vor und erreichte leicht die Erfüllung meiner besonderen Bitten. Nachdem ich das große Gefängnis besichtigt hatte, begegnete ich auf der einzigen breiten Straße dieser kleinen Ortschaft nahe dem Strande einem bejahrten Indianer, der mit seiner Frau eben an Land gestiegen war. Alfredo hieß er, der liebe Alte, wirklich ein Stück verkörperter Yamana-Überlieferung! Wir sind ein Jahr später miteinander sehr vertraut geworden und unter seiner strengen Leitung habe ich bei diesem Indianerstamme meine erste Jugendweihe erlebt. Den nächsten Vormittag verbrachte ich auf der kleinen Halbinsel, die durch viele Jahre der Mittelpunkt der anglikanischen Missionstätigkeit gewesen war. Damals hatten sich hier viele Eingeborene nacheinander zusammengefunden. Gegenwärtig trifft man hier nichts mehr von den ehemaligen Gebäuden an, wohl aber Handwerkereinrichtungen, eine Schlächterei und einige Wirtschaftsräume, die kürzlich erst errichtet wurden. Keiner der heutigen Yamana betritt mehr diese Halbinsel, liegt doch hier der Friedhof der ehemaligen Missionsstation, durch den jeder abermals an das rasche Hinschwinden seines Volkes schmerzlich erinnert würde. Wenige Tage später zählte ich die letzten Reste und fand kaum noch sechzig reinblütige Yamana.[104]

In Ushuaia hielt es mich nicht länger; denn zuverlässige Mitteilungen über die Indianer hätte ich doch nicht so reichlich sammeln können, daß ein ausgedehnter Aufenthalt sich rechtfertigen ließe. Obwohl ich nur mühsam meinen kranken Fuß gebrauchen konnte, besorgte ich mir entschlossen ein Pferd und ritt wieder nach Punta Remolino. Sieben Stunden war ich unterwegs. Der beschwerliche Reitweg verläuft eng am Nordufer des Canal de Beagle durch wirren Waldbestand; er war durch starken Regenfall in der letzten Nacht sehr aufgeweicht worden und streckenweise gefährlich. Doch bildet er die einzige Verbindung zu Lande zwischen den genannten Punkten.

Die Aufnahme im Hause der Familie Lawrence war so herzlich, daß ich mich von Anfang an wie daheim fühlte. Ein nettes, bequemes Zimmer erhielt ich angewiesen, in dem ich all meine Sachen für die geplante Forschungs-arbeit zurechtlegte. Sofort nahm ich engere Fühlung mit den einzelnen Mitgliedern dieser Familie. Der ehrwürdige Rev. John Lawrence sah auf eine fünfzigjährige Missionsarbeit im Dienste dieser Eingeborenen zurück. Sein zweitältester Sohn Fred war neben ihnen aufgewachsen und hatte zeitlebens die engste Berührung mit ihnen. Etwa zwanzig Jahre lebte er schon in glücklicher Ehe mit Nelly, einer Yamana von reinstem Blute, die in ihrem ganzen Wesen und Denken die Eigenart ihres Volkes ausdrückte. Bei ihren sechs Kindern, mehr bei den drei älteren Mädchen als bei den drei jüngeren Knaben, überwiegt der Indianertypus um vieles. Das Yamana sprachen sie von Kindesbeinen auf und verkehrten darin regelmäßig mit ihrer Mutter, während sie mit ihrem Vater meistens englisch redeten. Jedoch kannten sie von den Gebräuchen der Eingeborenen nur das alltäglich Augenfällige. Der jüngere Bruder Alberto Lawrence hat sich mit Einzelheiten der Yamana-Kultur nicht abgegeben, verstand aber die Sprache. Ganz hervorragend ist in allem Martin Lawrence, der älteste der drei Brüder beschlagen, der mir schon in Ushuaia sehr behilflich gewesen war. Bald fühlte ich heraus, wie bestimmt meine Fragen beantwortet wurden und wie ergebnisreich alle Erkundigungen ausfielen. Mit den örtlichen Bedingungen machte ich mich schnell vertraut. Einige einfache Bretterhäuschen mit Wellblechdach, in kurzem Abstande das eine vom andern, schlossen sich landeinwärts an die Hauptgebäude an und bildeten zwei Reihen, zwischen denen ein breiter Fahrweg verlief.

Als ich in Punta Remolino eintraf, waren bloß sechs ältere Yamana anwesend. Die Schafschur war längst vorüber und unmittelbar danach hatten sich alle Familien, die dabei beschäftigt gewesen waren, wieder in die entfernteren Kanäle zurückgezogen. Jene wenigen suchte ich unverzüglich auf und Fred Lawrence bemühte sich in den ersten Tagen, mich immer besser bei ihnen einzuführen. Mit dem blinden Whaits, nach Ansicht des John Lawrence der älteste aller Yamana, und mit seiner Frau hatte ich mich bald angefreundet. Zusehends legten auch die anderen ihre Scheu und ihr noch größeres Befremden ab, weil ich in ausgesucht zutraulicher Form, die sie bislang von den Weißen nicht gewohnt waren, mit ihnen verkehrte. Ganz offen hat mir Whaits das eingestanden. Ob aus Genugtuung und Freude darüber oder ob aus einem anderen Grunde, ich weiß es nicht, zeigte sich dieser gute Alte ungewöhnlich redselig, wenn ich auf mythologische Vorstellungen zu sprechen kam. Er deckte mir Dinge auf, die in früheren Reiseberichten nicht einmal angedeutet worden waren, und ich kam Einzelheiten auf die Spur, die ich mit gutem Ergebnis später verfolgt habe. Bei den ersten anthropologischen Untersuchungen stieß ich auf keinen Widerstand.

Einer anderen Kulturform, als jener der Selk'nam, die ich soeben verlassen hatte, stand ich hier gegenüber! Das fühlte ich deutlich bereits in den ersten Tagen. Wichtiger indes und bedeutungsvoller für ein ergebnisreiches Arbeiten war die Überzeugung davon, wie so ganz verschieden von den Bewohnern der Isla Grande diese Yamana behandelt sein wollten. Nicht geringe Mühe mußte ich, aus der Empfindungswelt der Selk'nam kommend, aufbieten, um mich auf die Voraussetzungen für das Vertrauen dieser Eingeborenen umzustellen. Die richtige Art der Annäherung und des Umganges mit ihnen fand ich schließlich heraus. Wäre mir diesmal kein weiterer Erfolg beschieden gewesen, ich erachtete ihn viel höher und bedeutsamer für die spätere Forschung als diese oder jene Mitteilung.

Von einem Tage zum andern erfaßte ich es deutlicher, daß Punta Remolino der günstigste Platz ist, an dem ich zuverlässig die Untersuchung der Yamana durchführen könnte. Daß sich noch vieles aus dem Kulturleben dieses Volkes würde herausarbeiten lassen, erschloß ich aus vielen Anzeichen. Endlich liebäugelte ich mit der Hoffnung, die Grundgedanken des Volkstums der beiden anderen feuerländischen Stämme um so bestimmter und sicherer erfassen zu können, nachdem ich einmal die vollauf erlebt hätte, von denen das gesamte Kulturgut der Yamana getragen wird. Die zuletzt genannte Erwägung hat mich entscheidend bei meinem Arbeitsplane bestimmt, auf sie führe ich den reichen endgültigen Erfolg zurück. Auf Forschungsreisen kommt man wiederholt in die Zwangslage, so oder so zu wählen; das Glück muß einem hold sein, damit man sich dorthin wendet, wo der größere Erfolg liegt.

Tatsächlich hat mich das Glück außergewöhnlich dadurch begünstigt, daß es mich mit Nelly Lawrence zusammenführte. Diese Frau war ganz Feuerländerin: ihr Äußeres zeigte die typischen Eigenheiten ihrer Rasse und am Kulturgute ihres Volkes hing sie mit jeder Faser ihres Herzens. Ich weiß selber nicht, wie es gekommen ist, daß sie mir von Anfang an mit ganz besonderer Gewogenheit gegenübertrat: oft habe ich beobachtet, daß sie vor europäischen Gästen der Regel nach eine scheue Zurückhaltung zu erkennen gibt. Sobald sie mein aufrichtiges Bemühen um das unverfälschte Erbgut ihrer Väter durchschaut hatte, galt ihr keine Anstrengung zu schwer, um mir alles zu gewähren und jedwedes zu verschaffen, was mich fördern konnte; auch bot sie ihren ganzen Einfluß vor ihren Landsleuten und vor ihrem Gatten auf, um alles Wünschenswerte mich wissen und erleben zu lassen. Dieser regsamen und klugen Frau sei es aufrichtig gedankt, daß ich bei Erforschung der Yamana unerwartet schöne Erfolge erzielt habe.

Die erste Fühlungnahme mit den Yamana und die Anfangsarbeiten waren gelungen, mein Entschluß, hier abermals einzusetzen, stand fest. Die gastfreundliche und hilfsbereite Familie Lawrence lud mich zu einem neuen Besuche im nächsten Sommer ein, im besonderen sicherte mir Nelly, in ihrer stillbescheidenen aber bestimmten Art, ihre tatkräftige Mithilfe zu. Nachdrücklich stellte sie mir in Aussicht, eine große Zahl ihrer Landsleute zusammenzurufen, damit ich sie alle insgesamt sehen und kennenlernen könnte. Wichtige Erkundigungen zog ich noch ein und erbat mir mancherlei Erklärungen, die ich bei den Vorkehrungen zur nächsten Reise berücksichtigen wollte, um gut gerüstet hier wieder auf dem Plane zu erscheinen. Als ich Abschied nahm, sah ich bereits einen guten Teil meiner Hoffnungen für den nächsten Sommer erfüllt, dafür bürgten mir die vertrauensvollen Worte, mit denen die Familie Lawrence zur baldigen Rückkehr einlud.

Ein längeres Verweilen hier in Punta Remolino oder an einer anderen Stelle des Kap Hoorn-Archipels hätte nur geringen Erfolg gehabt; denn die einzelnen Indianerfamilien hatten sich überallhin verloren und jede war willens, den Winter eben dort zu verbringen, wo sie von ihm überrascht würde. Auch die wenigen Personen, denen ich hier zufällig begegnete, waren nur zu kurzem Besuche abgestiegen. Der Frühsommer ist die Zeit, da die Yamana-Familien sich im Canal de Beagle sammeln. Wir standen bereits am Ende des Sommers. Demnach mußte ich nächstes Jahr bedeutend früher zur Stelle sein, dann würde ich die Mehrzahl von ihnen antreffen.

Den Heimweg nahm ich über Ushuaia nach Punta Arenas. Auf der Fahrt durch den westlichen Canal de Beagle bin ich keinem einzigen Feuerländer begegnet. Von einem Besuch der schwer zugänglichen Halakwulup mußte ich diesmal absehen, denn meine Zeit war um. Zumindest hatte ich in den vergangenen Wochen einen oberflächlichen Überblick über die heutige Daseinsweise der Selk'nam und Yamana gewonnen, auf Grund dessen mir die Fortführung der Forschung als lohnend erschien. In großen Umrissen lag mein Arbeitsplan bereits fest, nämlich im nächsten Frühsommer bei den Yamana mit ganzer Kraft einzusetzen, unbekümmert darum, ob mir noch Zeit und Gelegenheit zu einem Besuche bei den Selk'nam und Halakwulup übrig bliebe. Auf dieses Ziel waren während der folgenden Monate in Santiago alle Vorbereitungen der nächsten Reise gerichtet.[197]

2. Meine zweite Reise

Wo immer sich Gelegenheit bot, war ich seit meiner Rückkehr aus dem Feuerlande bemüht, über die Lebensverhältnisse der dortigen Eingeborenen aufklärend zu berichten. Tief eingewurzelte Anschauungen ließen sich selbstredend nicht so bald austilgen und mancherorts brachte man meiner Darstellung sogar Mißtrauen entgegen. Nicht selten beurteilte man mich als einen, den die Schwärmerei für das Indianertum gänzlich blind für die Tatsache ihrer Minderwertigkeit gemacht hätte. Einzelne sogar erachteten meine Zukunftspläne nach wie vor als zwecklose Geldverschwendung und unverantwortlichen Zeitverlust. Immer deutlicher kam es mir zum Bewußtsein, daß ich erst eine erdrückende Fülle von Beobachtungen und Beweisen heimbringen müßte, ehe in weiteren Kreisen eine gerechte Beurteilung der Feuerländer sich durchsetzen würde. Manche vergebliche Bemühungen und sogar bittere Enttäuschungen überwand ich im Hinblick auf die aussichtsreichen Möglichkeiten der Forschung und ließ mich in den Vorarbeiten für einen nächsten Besuch des Feuerlandes nicht aufhalten.

[197] Viele Einzelheiten aus meiner ersten Reise, auch solche, die unsere Yamana betreffen, sind in Bd. I, 89 und in Gusinde (a): 31 und (b): [18] zusammengetragen.

In diesem Berichte wie auch in den folgenden über meinen Aufenthalt im Feuerlande sind Schilderungen der Landschaft und der Wetterbedingungen bewußt vermieden worden. Nur der allgemeine Verlauf der Forschung sollte in großen Zügen gezeichnet werden, um das Verständnis für meine Arbeitsweise und für die Ergebnisse im allgemeinen zu vermitteln.

Drückend war die Sorge um die erforderlichen Mittel. Wie in Argentinien so traf man mehr noch in Chile gerade damals umfangreiche Vorbereitungen zur Feier der 400. Wiederkehr des Entdeckungstages der Magellan-Straße. Auf diesen Anlaß wies ich in chilenischen Kreisen nachdrücklich hin und erinnerte an die Pflicht, daß die im Magellan-Gebiet beheimatete Indianergruppe nun endlich, kurz vor ihrem Untergange, erschöpfend erforscht und daß ihr Kulturgut für die Geschichte Chiles gerettet werden müßte. In den maßgebenden Kreisen fand mein Vorschlag verständnisvollen Widerhall. Abermals übertrug mir das Ministerio de Instrucción Pública die Forschungsreise nach dem Süden und versprach, einen Teil der Kosten zu decken. Wieder war es der Hochwürdigste Herr Erzbischof von Santiago Don CRESCENTE ERRAZURIZ sowie eine kleine Gruppe von gebildeten Chilenen, die mich ausreichend mit Geldmitteln versahen.

Am 5. Dezember 1919 fuhr ich zum zweiten Male hinaus ins Feuerland. Der Küstendampfer "Chiloé" brachte mich nach Punta Arenas, das ich nach drei Tagen bereits mit der Escampavia (Aufklärerschiff) "Yelcho" der chilenischen Marine wieder verließ. Sie steuerte auf die Halbinsel Brecknock zu. Ausgerechnet bogen wir bei diesem gefährlichen Felsen in den stillen Canal de Beagle an einem der 10 Tage des Jahres — wie die Seeleute sich auszudrücken pflegen — ein, an denen die immer tosende See sich glättet und ein wolkenfreier Himmel sich spiegelt. Ich fragte nicht, ob ich dazu berechtigt wäre, ich tat einfach so, als wäre die Gunst jenes Tages ein Schicksalswink für eine gedeihliche Forschung! Glänzender Sonnenschein war über die prachtvolle Gletscherwelt im Brazo Noroeste ausgegossen, an der wir ruhig vorbeiglitten. Als die "Yelcho" in Ushuaia für einige Stunden vor Anker ging, waren wir wieder außer Bereich der überwältigenden Allmacht einer unberührten Natur.

In der Angostura Murray an Wulaia vorbei fahrend widmete ich einige Minuten der Erinnerung an das Blutbad vor genau fünfzig Jahren, am 6. Nov. 1859, in dem der Missionar G. PHILLIPS und die Mannschaft der "Allen Gardiner", insgesamt acht Personen, einen gewaltsamen Tod gefunden hatten.[100]

Auf der Weiterfahrt wurden die nebelhaften Umrisse der Islas Wollaston immer bestimmter. Langgezogene schwere Wellen rollten vom Süden herauf, daß unsere kleine "Yelcho" mühsam stampfte. Da und dort lagen zertrümmerte Schiffskörper und geknickte Masten herum. Die wildzerzausten Buchen wandten sich vom eiskalten Südwinde ab. Alles war in tiefgrauen Nebel gehüllt. Im Heulen des Sturmes glaubte man die Stimmen vieler Toten zu hören, all jener Eingeborenen, die noch vor wenigen Jahrzehnten dieses Inselreich bevölkert hatten und heute nicht mehr sind. Menschenleer sind die Küsten und Buchten, die Inseln und Wasserarme. Es schaudert einem in dieser Gegend!

Am Abend des 22. Dezember 1919 fuhren wir in die Mündung des Rio Douglas ein und wurden vom Verwalter dieser Farm Señor SCHILLING freundlich begrüßt. Der Pächter selber, Señor CARLOS CROOKE, befand sich ebenfalls an Bord. Er hatte vor zwei Jahren diese Farm vom Rev. JOHN WILLIAMS übernommen. Dieser hat bekanntlich als der letzte der anglikanischen Missionare hier seine Tätigkeit bis zum Jahre 1916 weitergeführt, nämlich bis die South American Missionary Society endgültig dieses Arbeitsfeld aufließ. Einige bescheidene Gebäude, die vordem für die Indianer aufgerichtet worden waren, standen noch. Der kleine Friedhof lag etwas abseits, ihn hielt seit Jahren niemand instand. Merkwürdigerweise hatten sich diesen Sommer keine Yamana hier eingefunden. Nach Gründen dafür zu suchen dürfte kaum zu einem Ergebnis führen; denn sie sind in ihren Entschließungen nicht minder unberechenbar als die Witterung in ihrer Heimat.

Den günstigen Vorteil der langen Tage nützte ich zunächst zu Arbeiten auf dem Friedhof aus, wo 30 Indianer beerdigt lagen, ein jeder in einer einfachen Kiste als Sarg. Die Bodenbedingungen waren derart, daß alle Särge unter Wasser standen, weswegen die Skelettreste sich gänzlich aufgelöst hatten und nicht mehr gehoben werden konnten.

Nachher fand ich Gelegenheit bis zur Isla Bertrand vorzudringen und ein gutes Stück am Südwestufer der Isla Navarino entlang zu laufen. Überall begegnet man größeren oder kleineren Muschelhaufen, die es laut verkünden, daß viele Familien sich durch manche Jahrhunderte an diesen Stellen vorübergehend niedergelassen hatten.

Durch Herrn SCHILLING wurde ich auf einen unvollendeten Einbaum aufmerksam gemacht, der südlich von den Gebäulichkeiten und etwa 700 m von der Küste entfernt im Walde lag. Zumindest zwanzig Jahre dürfte keine Hand mehr an ihm gearbeitet haben, so deutliche Anzeichen der Zerstörung durch die Witterung trug das feste Buchenholz. Durch Feuer ist er ausgehöhlt worden und nur das eine schmale Ende stand offen. Die Wände waren, weil erst ein wenig bearbeitet, noch sehr dick. Eine europäische Eisenaxt hatte man verwendet. Dieses Stück, das den Übergang vom Rindenkanu zum flachen Boote der allerjüngsten Zeit bildete, ließ ich von den Matrosen an die Küste schleifen und an Bord der "Yelcho" bringen. Heute wird es im Museo Histórico de Chile zu Santiago aufbewahrt.

Zufällig brachte ich in Erfahrung, daß kürzlich eine ansehnliche Gruppe von Eingeborenen in Punta Remolino zusammengekommen sei. Deshalb verzichtete ich auf die Überfahrt in die Bahia Tekenika, an deren Ufer vorübergehend eine Niederlassung von anglikanischen Missionaren bedient worden war. Mehr als Grabungen auf dem Friedhofe und in den Muschelhaufen hätte ich dort sowieso nicht ausführen können. Ob sie erfolgreich gewesen wären? Viel mehr durfte ich mir vom Zusammensein mit den Indianern selber versprechen. Deshalb ließ ich mich gegen Mittag des 26. Dezember nach Punta Remolino überführen, von wo die "Yelcho" zu ihrem Ausgangshafen Punta Arenas zurückkehrte.

Indianerfamilien hatte sich nahe den Wirtschaftsgebäuden eingerichtet. Gleich am ersten Tage eröffnete mir die gute NELLY, daß sie zeitig genug nach ihren Landsleuten ausgeschickt und daß sie selber mit ihnen auf mich gewartet hätte. Sie ließ mir nicht einmal Zeit, meine Sachen auszupacken und mich in dem Zimmerchen, das mir schon im vergangenen Jahre angewiesen worden war, etwas einzurichten; es drängte sie, mich durch die einzelnen Hütten zu führen und mit den Indianern bekannt zu machen. Diese gaben vor mir weder Scheu noch Befremden zu erkennen; denn ich kam ja in NELLY's Begleitung. Sicherlich erkundigte sich jeder noch gar manchen Dingen, über die NELLY ihnen Auskunft gab. Ob alles, was sie erklärte, der Wirklichkeit entsprach, weiß ich nicht; denn sie unterhielten sich in ihrer Sprache, die ich nicht verstand. Wir gingen also von einer Hütte zur anderen, in jeder redete man kurz über mich und dabei lernte ich die ganze Indianersiedlung kennen.

Als am Abend die Mehrzahl der Männer sich in ALFREDO's Hütte zusammengefunden hatte, trat auch ich ohne Umschweife ein und setzte mich unverfroren in ihren Kreis; jenen Alten begrüßte ich herzlich und überlaut, weil wir uns ja schon vor einem Jahre in Ushuaia begegnet waren (S. 169). Sogleich begann ich damit, von meiner Reise zu erzählen und zwar in leichtem Spanisch, so daß die meisten bequem folgen konnten. Ich ließ sie wissen, daß ich lange bei ihnen zu bleiben beabsichtigte, weil ich sie alle sehr gern hätte. Endlich zeigte ich ihnen Photographien von der Landschaft, von den Selk'nam und von ihren eigenen Landsleuten, die ich im vergangenen Jahre aufgenommen hatte. So vertraulich und selbstverständlich ging es in jenem Kreis her, als wäre ich ihnen seit langem bekannt. Um wie viel leichter als die mißtrauischen Selk'nam sind doch diese Yamana zu gewinnen! Das war eine wertvolle Erfahrung, die ich gleich am ersten Tage machte. Nach Mitternacht erst gingen wir auseinander.

Seitdem verbrachte ich tagtäglich mehrere Stunden in der Gesellschaft dieser Leute. Zuweilen begleitete mich NELLY zu den Frauen, die am Feuer ihrer Hütte saßen, und die sich doppelt lebhaft benahmen, zumindest redseliger zeigten, wenn sie dabei war. Ihnen hatte es NELLY eindringlich beigebracht, daß sie mich über alles und jedes belehren, mir ihre Gerätschaften und Gebrauchsgegenstände zeigen, ihre Arbeiten und Beschäftigungen erklären, die früheren Einrichtungen und die Lebensweise der Vorfahren schildern. Also brauchte ich nach den ersten Tagen, in denen die Frauen und Männer ihre leichte Zurückhaltung ablegten, nur irgendwo mich hinzustellen oder herzudrängen, schon fingen sie von selber mit ihren Erklärungen und Beschreibungen an. Je mehr ich mich darüber freute und je begieriger ich aufhorchte, um so geschäftiger schilderten sie und um so eindringlicher erklärten sie mir, was sich gerade bot. Schnelle Fortschritte machte ich in dem Verständnis für ihr ganzes Wirtschaftsleben und viele aus ihren gesellschaftlichen Einrichtungen beobachtete ich tagtäglich. Einige Leute standen mir immer zur Verfügung; ich brauchte ja nur ihre Hütten zu betreten, wo sie jedesmal mich gern sahen. Mit sorgender Aufmerksamkeit schaute NELLY oft zu. Sie erkun-digte sich, ohne daß ich es merkte, bei einigen ihr ergebenen Indianerinnen, was mir erzählt und gezeigt worden war. Anschließend daran beriet sie mit ihnen, was ich noch wissen und erfahren müßte. Wirklich, sie war dauernd hinter ihren Landsleuten her, daß ich über alles und jedes, was sie ihr eigen nennen, genau und ausführlich unterrichtet würde. Günstigere Forschungsbedingungen brauchte ich mir nicht zu wünschen.

Die ersten zwei Wochen füllte ich mit unmittelbaren Beobachtungen sowie mit Fragen nach dem und jenem aus. Überdies begleitete ich die Indianerinnen an den Strand, wo sie Muscheln suchten, und in ihren flachen Kähnen auf den Kanal hinaus, wo sie Fische fingen und Krebse aufspießten. So machte ich mich mit der tagtäglichen Beschäftigung einer Yamana-Frau sehr vertraut. Hingegen bot sich vorderhand weniger Gelegenheit, die Verpflichtungen der Männer gut zu beobachten; denn sie waren durch die Schafschur in Anspruch genommen. Am Sonntag und an regnerischen Tagen allerdings blieben sie sich selbst überlassen und dann hielt ich mich zu ihnen. Wann immer einige etwas unternahmen, was ich noch nicht mitgemacht hatte, schloß ich mich ihnen an. Dabei sah ich, wie sie die Seelöwen auf dem Lande beschleichen und zur Strecke bringen, wie sie diese Tiere von ihrem Boote aus anlocken und harpunieren, wie sie die verschiedenen Seevögel im Wasser töten und den Fischotter erlegen. Eines Nachts begleitete ich sie beim Scharbenfang an einer Felswand nahe Puerto Brown. Die Zeit von einem Samstagmittag bis zum späten Sonntagabend verbrachte ich mit elf Indianern in Puerto Róbalo; dabei suchten wir die Muschelhügel nach alten Gerätschaften ab. Hier stellten sie geschickt auch ein großes Fischnetz, das wir von der Farm mitgebracht hatten, und machten einen ergiebigen Fang. Was immer sich bot, machte ich mit: denn ich wollte das gesamte Wirtschaften dieser Indianer erleben und ihr Arbeiten mit eigener Hand erproben. Dadurch bewahrte ich sie vor dem lästigen Fragen: zu ergänzenden Erklärungen, die man sich erbittet, sind die Indianer gern bereit. Eines Abends sagte mir der alte Alfredo unvermittelt: „Wie merkwürdig tun doch die Weißen, daß sie bei allem, was sie an uns hier sehen, immer wieder fragen: Warum? — Je nun, bei uns ist eben alles so, wie es ist; deshalb fragt niemand von uns: Warum ist dieses so und jenes so!"

Die Yamana hatten sich nicht nur an meinen ungezwungenen Verkehr gewöhnt, ich war ihnen allmählich auch lieb geworden. Regelmäßig verbrachte ich den Tag in Gesellschaft der Frauen und Kinder, abends suchte ich den Kreis der Männer auf. Diese traten am liebsten in Alfredo's Hütte zusammen. Ergab es sich aber, daß ich in einer anderen Hütte mich niederließ, kamen die Männer wie gewohnheitsmäßig dorthin nach.

Eine Zeitlang hatten sie mich nun schon mit ihren mythologischen Vorstellungen vertraut gemacht, als eines Abends bei der üblichen Ansprache, anschließend an eine bestimmte Mythe, das Wort čiḱyus fiel. Als ich dessen Bedeutung erfahren wollte, wirkte meine Bitte höchst eigenartig. Jeder hüllte sich in befremdliches Schweigen und nahm eine Haltung ein, als wäre jenes Wort überhaupt nicht gefallen; aus dem Benehmen der ganzen Runde mußte ich schließen, daß hier aus Unachtsamkeit etwas ausgeplaudert worden und ein Name gefallen war, der nie hätte verraten werden dürfen. In dieser peinlichen Lage wagte ich nicht mehr zu reden, noch viel weniger nach dem Sinn des Wortes čiḱ̯ɣuɣ zu forschen; der Faden unserer bislangen flüssigen, angeregten Unterhaltung war plötzlich zerrissen und jedermann vermied es ängstlich, ihn nochmals aufzugreifen. Lange starrte jeder schweigend vor sich hin; auf ihren Mienen las ich einen stillen Vorwurf gegen jenen, den die Vorsicht um Wahrung eines bedeutsamen Geheimnisses verlassen hatte. Als plötzlich draußen einige Hunde mit lautem Kläffen sich ins Fell gerieten, sprangen die Männer mit betont übereilter Erregung auf, als müßten sie ein großes Unheil verhüten! Der Bann der peinlichen Lage war plötzlich gelöst und jeder ging ganz verstohlen in seine Hütte zurück. Ich selber wagte es nicht, jemanden anzusprechen.

In dieser Nacht mied mich der Schlaf bis in die frühen Morgenstunden. Ruhelos warf ich mich auf meinem Lager hin und her; denn ich erkannte deutlich genug, daß ich mit dem Worte čiḱ̯ɣuɣ einer Sache auf die Spur gekommen war, der ich nachgehen mußte. Wie gequält überlegte ich, welcher Weg mich am sichersten dorthin führen könnte; denn aus den Männern etwas herauszupressen schien mir, nach ihrem Benehmen am Abend zu urteilen, ganz aussichtslos. NELLY galt mir schließlich als die einzige, auf die ich meine Hoffnung setzte. Wie aber sollte ich mich ihr mit dieser Angelegenheit nähern, da durch meine Frage auch sie möglicherweise in größte Verlegenheit geraten könnte? Und wenn es sich gar um einen Gegenstand handelte, den Frauen nicht wissen dürfen? Erst am anderen Morgen kam ich zu einem bestimmten Entschluß. Wo immer ich ihr begegnete, zeigte ich eine jammervolle Miene, daß sie unwillkürlich auf eine ungewöhnlich mißliche Stimmung oder auf ein schauerliches Unglück bei mir schließen mußte. Zwei Tage hielt sie diesen meinen Anblick aus; am dritten endlich näherte sie sich mir in ihrer schlichten, wohlwollenden Art mit der leisen Frage, ob ich krank wäre. „Ja je", erwiderte ich ihr mit zaghafter Stimme, „sehr krank bin ich, und zwar im Gemüte!" Mitleidig machte sie mir Mut und versprach, mir zu helfen. Zwar redete sie sanft und etwas unbestimmt; aber nach erster Frauenweise lag ein deutlich fühlbares Fragen darin. Da sagte ich ihr ohne Umschweife: „Am vorvorgestrigen Abend saß ich mit den Männern zusammen. Außerordentlich Schönes haben sie mir von den Yamana der früheren Zeit erzählt. Ich hörte zum ersten Male vom čiḱ̯ɣuɣ. Sicherlich ist das etwas ganz besonders Schönes! Doch als ich die Männer darüber befragte, biß jeder auf seine Lippen und verriet mir nicht eine Silbe ... Eben deshalb bin ich so traurig! ... Seitdem ich hier weile, haben mir Frauen und Männer unvergleichlich herrliche Dinge der Yamana von ehedem erzählt; aber über čiḱ̯ɣuɣ verraten sie mir nichts. Das kann ich nicht länger ertragen! Ich bin sehr traurig!" Mit ruhigen Augen schaute NELLY mich an und in ihren Blicken las ich, daß sie richtig mit mir fühlte. Da sie sich sogleich entfernte, ohne ein Wort zu sagen, hatte ich die Gewißheit, sie wird mich bald aus meiner Lage befreien. Ihre genaue Art war mir längst bekannt. So brauchte ich jetzt nur abzuwarten, was sie in die Wege leiten würde.

Seit einigen Tagen hatte ich mich jeden Nachmittag regelmäßig mit den alten Frauen zusammengefunden. Meistens gesellte sich auch NELLY zu uns. Auf die Mythen nämlich bin ich aufmerksam geworden, die dieser Stamm als kostbares Erbgut durch viele Geschlechter gehütet hat. Die alte JOLLA, ALENEO's Frau, kannte die meisten und wußte sie am besten zu erzählen; darüber war man sich allgemein einig. Jedoch war sie des Spanisch nur wenig mächtig und ich somit auf eine gute, verläßliche Hilfskraft angewiesen. Bevor ich mich an FRED LAWRENCE wandte, damit er mir in dieser wichtigen Sache mit seinem Rate behilflich sei, hatte NELLY von ihm bereits erwirkt, daß ihr Bruder CALEUMAN zu meiner Verfügung stünde, so lange ich ihn benötigte. Er war ein gewechter, junger Mann und beherrschte sich des Spanisch mit Leichtigkeit; manche altertümliche Wendungen des Yaména waren ihm weniger vertraut und einige ganz unbekannt, hier half NELLY selber aus. Zusammen waren es vier Personen, mit denen ich eine möglichst wörtliche Übersetzung der alten Erzählungen zustande brachte. Standesgemäß nahm wir einen Tag um den andern beisammen und dabei gewann ich den reichen Mythenschatz der Yaména. Auf den beiden folgenden Reisen suchte ich wohl darnach weiter; wirklich Neues über das hinaus, was ich diesmal zusammengetragen hatte, fand ich nicht mehr, abgesehen von kurzen Ergänzungen und belanglosen Einzelheiten. Als besonders wertvoll beurteile ich den mannigfaltigen Erzählungsstoff, der die Person der beiden Ypéley und ihrer Schwester umkleidet. Der jüngste dieser drei Geschwister nimmt die Stelle eines Kulturheros ein, wie Kanayip in der Vorstellung der Selk'nam.[100]

Vier Tage, nachdem ich NELLY wegen des Wortes Ajéyaga angesprochen hatte, saß ich wieder mit ihr im Kreise ihrer Frauen. Von der Schwester der beiden Ypéley war die Rede gewesen und nach einer kurzen Pause fügte sie an: „Die Erzählungen, die wir in diesen Tagen wiederholt haben, wurden den im Rollstuhl sitzenden Kindern eigentlich erst während des Ajéyaga bekannt gemacht. Von den Ypéley-Geschwistern spricht man ihnen vorher niemals; die Mädchen allerdings, entsühnt ihrer ersten Menstruation, erfahren davon einen geringen Teil. Zum Ajéyaga kommen die Familien reihenweise zusammen; dann werden alle Knaben und Mädchen, die den Rollstuhl erreicht haben, eingeführt. Eine harte Schule[101] ist es für sie. Nachher gelten sie als Erwachsene und dürfen sich verheiraten. Das Ajéyaga ist das Schlimmste, was wir haben. Ich selber möchte es wieder einmal erleben; wir langen haben wir es nicht mehr wiederholt. Wir werden es in nächster Zeit abhalten und es auch dir zeigen!" Ihre Worte klangen mir wie eine bestimmte Zusicherung.

[100] Vgl. die Gegenüberstellung dieser mythologischen Gestalten in Gusinde (II).

[101] Dieses Wort, dessen Inhalt NELLY vom Schulkameradin auf der Missionsstation gut kannte, verwendete auch andere Yaména für jene Zeremonie. Ich schildert darnach einen auf einer gebrauchen Jugendschule und habe mich dazu nicht geäußert.

Deshalb sprach ich ihr meine Freude darüber aus, daß sie es mir ermöglichen wollte, das Schönste von dem, was ihre Landsleute besitzen, zu erleben. Am nächsten Sonntag konnte ich unbemerkt beobachten, wie FRED LAWRENCE den um ihn versammelten Männern während zwei Stunden nachdrücklich zuredete. Bald darauf kam er zu mir und erklärte ausführlich, daß er die Männer aufgefordert habe, unmittelbar nach Beendigung der Schafschur die čiſ̌ŋgo-Feier zu veranstalten und den Wunsch seiner Gattin NELLY zu erfüllen, mich daran teilnehmen zu lassen. Nach langem Widerstreben hatte er deren Bereitwilligkeit hierfür erreicht. Was mich betrifft, forderten die Männer, ich müßte als eigentlicher Prüfling jene Veranstaltung mitmachen. Ohne Zaudern versprach ich ihm, diese Bedingung zu erfüllen; denn ich durfte mir die Gelegenheit, eine Jugendweihe zu erleben, selbst unter schwersten Opfern nicht entgehen lassen. Am Nachmittag verhandelte FRED LAWRENCE abermals mit den alten Indianern, die jetzt sich ruhiger benahmen, weil ich auf ihre Forderung eingegangen war.[101]

Durch NELLY wurden nun auch die Frauen mit jenem Plane vertraut gemacht. Sie sorgte in ihrer stillen, aber sichtlichen Regsamkeit, daß ihre Landsleute die erforderliche geistige Verfassung für jene Feier anstrebten und sich sofort darauf einrichteten. „Je mehr Leute beisammen sind, um so schöner ist es!" hatte mir NELLY wiederholt versichert. So war es ihr auch darum zu tun, alle Familien in Punta Remolino zurückzuhalten. Als die tüchtigen Arbeiten der Schafschur beendet waren, wirkte FRED LAWRENCE nochmals auf die Indianer ein, daß sie ohne Zeitverlust mit der čiſ̌ŋgo-Feier beginnen sollten. Da er ihnen so viele Hammel zusicherte, als sie währenddessen benötigen würden, war ihnen die letzte Ausflucht versperrt und es lebte stark auch in ihnen die Freude an jener Veranstaltung wieder auf.

Eifrig rührten sie die Hände zum Bau der Großen Hütte, die sie nahe den Wirtschaftsgebäuden aufrichteten. Lieber wäre es ihnen gewesen, auf eine einsame Insel zu ziehen, um von vornherein vor jeder Störung durch Fremde sicher zu sein; aber sie wollten und mußten NELLY berücksichtigen, die sich zu beteiligen wünschte und ihnen auf eine abgelegene Stelle nicht hätte folgen können. Kaum waren die entfernteren und näheren Vorbereitungen beendet, als eines Abends, genau wie die beiden anderen Prüflinge, auch ich mich in die Große Hütte einführen lassen mußte. Darin verbrachte ich allerdings nur zehn Tage, lernte aber in dieser kurzen Zeit den ganzen Verlauf der Feier genau kennen und erlebte sie vollständig. Eine harte Probe war sie für mich, weil ich alle Anstrengungen und Einschränkungen, denen die eigentlichen Prüflinge unterliegen, ausnahmslos auch über mich ergehen lassen mußte. Ungemein schmerzlich empfand ich es, daß es mir während der ganzen Zeit verboten blieb, schriftliche Aufzeichnungen zu machen und Fragen zu stellen, galt doch für mich die gleiche strenge Ordnung, die jeden indianischen Prüfling verpflichtet, regungslos zu sitzen und mit niemandem zu reden. Aus dem Großhäuptling trug ich zwar nach Abschluß der Feier in meine Tagebücher der meinte nach, konnte aber über vieles keine Auskunft erhalten, weil diese Feuerländer außerhalb der Großen Hütte über den Verlauf des Ajiyaga nicht redeten. Trotzdem freute ich mich des seltenen Glückes, als erster Europäer dieser geheimen Veranstaltung beiwohnen zu dürfen. Mit diesem Erfolge allein war der Aufwand an Zeit und Geld der ganzen Reise vollauf gerechtfertigt.

Von der Entkräftung, die mir jene sechs Tage in der Großen Hütte eingebracht hatten, erholte ich mich schnell. Die einzelnen Indianerfamilien hielt es hier in Puntas Arenas nicht länger zurück. Eine wie die andere nahm bald Abschied und machte sich davon. Gleichzeitig damit entschwand mir die Möglichkeit zu weiteren Beobachtungen und Erkundigungen. Vergeblich hätte ich mich bemüht, einen Großteil von ihnen zurückzuhalten; mehrere Wochen waren sie bereits fortgewesen und der Wanderetrieb regte sich in ihnen wieder sehr stark. Für die Mühen und Umstände, die es mir machte, nochmals hierher zurückzukehren, hatten sie kein Verständnis. Aufrichtig wünschten sie mir, ich möchte mich im nächsten Sommer abermals bei ihnen einfinden, dann würden sie mir weiter zur Verfügung stehen. Die älteren Männer riefen im besonderen, ich möchte die Jugendweihe ein zweites Mal über mich ergehen lassen, um mir die Berechtigung zur Teilnahme an der geheimen Männerfeier zu erwerben. Sie gaben mir, voller Freude über den günstigen Verlauf der Jugendweihe, ihr eigenes begeistertes Verlangen nach dem hier zu verstehen, das seit langem nicht mehr wiederholt worden war. Aus ihrer neuerwachten Stimmung heraus versprachen sie mir noch mancherlei andere Dinge und ihre Angehörigen klangen so überzeugend, daß ich ihnen meiner Rückkehr für Ende dieses Jahres 1920 versicherte. Wir schieden voneinander in der frohen Hoffnung auf ein baldiges Wiedersehen.

Eine Genugtuungsempfindung erfüllte ich, wenn ich freudig in aller Offenlichkeit anerkenne, daß mein reicher Erfolg auf dieser zweiten Reise fast ganz dem Eingreifen von NEGRI und Pater LAWRENCE zu danken ist. Hätten sie jenen starken Druck auf die Yaganes, denen diese sich schwerlich entziehen konnten, nicht ausgeübt, wäre die Ajiyaga-Feier niemals zustande gekommen und mir die Teilnahme nicht möglich geworden. Überaus war es mir gelungen, eine ansehnliche Zahl von Gebrauchsgegenständen und Werkzeugen der Yaganes zusammenzutragen. Von hohem Wert ist ein Kindskorb, den auf meine vorjährigen Bitten Pater LAWRENCE von einer Frau hatte anfertigen lassen und den er für das Museo de Etnología y Antropología in Santiago bestimmte. Dieses Stück ist das letzte seiner Art, das ein größerer Meister hergestellt hat, dessen schon damals war, von Frauen abgesehen, kein Yaganes mehr zu diesem Kunstwerk fähig. In einer geschützten, seichten Lagune hat man es mir bis zu meiner Wiederkehr aufbewahrt, um verschiedene Einwendungen und verhängnisvolle Verwirrungen zu vermeiden. Selbstverständlich hielt ich es mir nicht entgehen, durch einige Fahrten auf dem Canal de Beagle hinaus zu unternehmen, um auch selber zu erfahren, welches hohe Unsicherheits- und schwankende Gleichgewichtsgefühl man empfindet, wenn man in einem derart leichten und

Ophrwirk war seine Aufmerksamkeit bei den Yamana und viele Überredungen hat er gebraucht, mich an dem Unternehmen und an den [illegible] Transporten zu gewinnen, der von Seinen Körper und von Seine Fähigkeiten ausströmen. Hinsichtlich dessen war das Arbeiten unter ihm weit angenehmer als unter den Selk'nam. Bei letzteren jedoch war die Lebensführung viel bescheidener und die einförmige Kost kam einer harten Entbehrung gleich. Freundlichen und zugänglicher sind die Yamana auch in den Unwirtlichkeiten, in der sie sich befinden, die Bescheidenheit, mit der sie mir gefallen haben, werde ich ihnen jederzeit herzlich danken.

Während ich nur Alacalufe rüstete, überlegte ich durch einige Tage meine Arbeitsweise und die Ergebnisse. Ein guter Griff war es bestimmt, daß ich mir unter bei den Yamana den Eindrücken in die Gesinnung und Denkweise der Familiäder verschaffen hatte. Dieser Vorsprung half mir dabei, den verschlossenen Selk'nam näher zu kommen und auch sie in ihrem Innersten zu verstehen. Die Familie Lawrence zeigte sich für alle von der aufgebotenen Hilfe reichlich entlohnt, angesichts der vollen Gewinnung, die mir dieser zweite Aufenthalt verschafft hatte. Für eine spätere Rückkehr hat sie mir erneut ihre Hilfe und Unterstützung zu. Puerto Bremdlau verließ ich in der sicheren Überzeugung, daß ich bald wiederkommen würde.

Den Weg zu den Selk'nam legte ich diesmal in umgekehrter Richtung zurück, nämlich von Puerto Bremdlau zurückzu nach Puerto Harberton, von dort nach Harberton über den Gebirge zu den Lago Fagnano und dann weiter zum nördlichen Lager der Selk'nam an der Mündung des Río del Fuego. Von hier wandte ich mich über die katholische Missionsstation der Salesianer am Río Chico zurückzu in den Hafen der Isla Grande zur Estancia Viamia, über den Ober der Bahía Inútil entlang und erreichte schließlich die kleine Ortschaft Porvenir, von wo ich nach Puerto Arenas übersetzte. Für kurze Zeit eilte ich noch in die Gegend von Ultima Esperanza[] und schiffte mich am 26. Februar in Puerto Arenas endlich zur Rückfahrt nach dem Norden ein. Damit endete meine zweite Feuerlandreise, während welcher ich den Hauptteil der Zeit den Yamana gewidmet habe.[]

3. Dritte Reise gemeinsam mit W. Lawrence

Bislang hatte ich mich überall im Magellanes-Gebiet um vielfältige Angaben über die Bahnverbindungen bemüht, denn ich hoch es für notwendig, möglichst bald auch mit diesen die weiten Reisebeziehungen auszubauen. Im umgekehrten [*] Im anderen Teile habe ich über meinen Besuch in jener bretonischen Mission berichtet, nämlich in Abs. 100 und in dem Aufsatz: Estudio acerca de la cuenca del Seno Última Esperanza, Patagonia austral, "Revista Chilena de Historia Natural", tomo XXV, p. 200–219, Santiago 1921.

[] Ausführlich wurden die Ergebnisse dieser Reise im Bd I, 90 und in Sonnen-Abs. 100 dargelegt, dem offiziellen Bericht an das Ministerio de Instrucción Pública de Chile.

[illegible] und die Schulmeister, gegenwärtig jedoch haben sie sich fast ausschließlich im nördlichen Teile der Kanäle zwischen der Magellanstraße und dem Golfo de Peñas auf.[illegible] Um dieses sehr so komplexe und mit dieser langsamen verbunden zu bleiben, wäre es ein empfehlenswertes gewesen, in einem eigenen Fahrzeug die einzelnen Wasserstraßen zu durchfahren und sie in allen Bähen und Winkeln aufzuschließen; doch für eine solch langwierige Unternehmung fehlten mir die Mittel.

Mitte 1959 hatten mich die ungarischen Forscher F. Baumann und C. Hanzer mit dem Plane vertraut gemacht, einen nahezuunbekannten Teil der patagonischen Zentralcordillere nahe dem Innen Chiles, nämlich das St. Valentin-Massiv zu erreichen. Der bedeutsamen Arbeitszeit fällt sich gut mit dem von mir geplanten Besuche der Gletscherwelt vereinigen. Eine übereinkünft dem Indem Ministerium de la Marina de Chile einen amtlichen Beschluß mit der Bitte, es möchte man für diese doppelte Forschung ein geeignetes Schiff zur Verfügung stellen. Der Gesuch wurde günstig verbeschieden und man die Ausrüstung gebaute, wie bisherige Mitte Dezember abfahren. Eine unvorhergesehene Notwendigkeit zwang die Marinebehörde beider, das für uns bestimmte Schiff plötzlich anderweitig zu verwenden. Wir erhielten zwar bald durch und ohne Zeitverlust ein anderes Schiff zugewiesen; da dieses aber bedeutend kleiner war, blieb mir keine andere Wahl, als meine Studienaufenthalte kürzen aufzugeben. Der Gesamte hatte bereits begonnen, daß ich mich auf einen anderen Beispielen nicht mehr einrichten konnte. So verzichtete ich in diesem Sommer auf einen Besuch bei den Franciscanern und schloß mich jenen beiden ungarischen Forschern an deren geographischen Unternehmen an.[illegible]

Kaum war ich von der vorübergegangenen Konferenz in Mitte 1961 nach Santiago zurückgekehrt, als ich meiner Verbindungen für eine dritte Reise in den Tamaya wieder aufnahm. Diesmal waren erneut Schwierigkeiten zu überwinden, denn eine außergewöhnliche Finanznot nahm mir jede Hoffnung auf Unterstützung vonseiten der chilenischen Regierung. Allerdings erhielt ich mir den dreimaligen Aufbau zur Weiterführung meiner ethnographischen und sprachwissenschaftlichen Arbeiten im Franchado. Wieder war es der Hochverdiente Herr Erzbischof von Santiago, Don Caesarino Sanchez, der bereitwillig mir aus der Verlegenheit half und die erforderlichen Mittel zur Reise spendete. Das war es vorallem deswegen so wichtig, daß durch eine weitere Erforschung der Franciscaner die letzten Vorgeschichte Chiles noch offener Lücken sich schlüssen.

Um diese Zeit hatte ich Herrn P. Wenceslao Sanzano S.J.D., den verdienstvollen Begründer der "Antiquen" in St. Gabriel-Stiftung bei Wien, über Da er gegen Ende 1911 den Gedanken an eine Reise nach Nordamerika [illegible], bot ich ihm, auf Anregung meines Direktors Dr. Arnoldi [illegible], an einem Besuche nach Chile mit; gleichzeitig erlitt ich ihm [illegible], sich an meiner dritten Fahrt an den Feuerländern beteiligen zu wollen. Diese Einladung übertrug er auf Herrn P. Wilhelm Kaerner S.V.D., meinen Gehilfen und Studiengenossen, der sich auch bald bei mir einfand. Mit Rücksicht auf das erste ich den dreijährigen Erlaubnis [illegible] und traf Vorsorge, daß unsere meinen Zeit auf die Tonnen verwendet würde, wo [illegible] auch viel zu tun übrig geblieben war. Der Aufenthalt in Punta Arenas und an anderen Stellen am Canal de Beagle ist gänzlich gefahrlos, [illegible] wenig Gelegenheit zu besonders bemerkenswerten Anstrengungen. Mit den [illegible] Feuerländern hatte ich mich bisher so gut angefreundet, daß ich [illegible] Gelegenheit darauf bauen durfte, sie würden auch meinen Begleiter [illegible] wollen [illegible].

Nachdem P. Kaerner in Santiago eingetroffen war, benutzten wir Ende Dezember in Puerto Montt den Dampfer zur Fahrt nach dem Süden. Gegen meinen Vorgesetzten überzeugte ich die gesamten Reisekosten und hat alles auf, damit auch dem dritten Forschungsgenossen von Nutzen wäre. Auf der mehrtägigen Fahrt erhielt ich [illegible] meiner bisherigen Ergebnisse und Erfahrungen, um gewissermaßen die Untersuchungen erfolgreich weiterführen zu können. Bei unserer fast täglichen Ausspracht gab er mir wertvolle Anregungen, für die ich hier noch öffentlich danken möchte. Unsere Zusammenarbeit ist angenehm verlaufen und hat ein günstiges Gesamtergebnis eingebracht.

Die Bekleidung in Punta Arenas kannten mich von früher. Da ich selbst mit den Verhältnissen hinreichend vertraut war, hielt sich alles so einfach, daß wir unverzüglich weiterfahren konnten. Die Brüder Lovegren hatte ich seitig gesagt verständigt und tatsächlich erwarteten uns in Ushuaia der Kutter "Cordillera", der uns sofort nach Punta Bonaldo brachte. Mit der gleichen Gastlichkeit, die ich früher erfahren hatte, hielt diese bekanntschaftige Familie diesmal uns beide willkommen. Nur allerdings empfahl mir einen anderen Vorwand wählen, weil ich im vergangenen Sommer angeblichen war. Als ich mich bei meinen lieben Indianern erkennen ließ, fragten auch sie fast wie gewohnt, warum ich sie im letzten Jahre, entgegen meinem Versprechen, im Stiche gelassen hatte! Mehrere Familien waren hier! beisammen und das hielt meiner lieben Freunde auch andere überzeugen; dadurch konnte auch sie in gemeinsamer Gesinnung und wir feierten das Wiedersehen in aller Form.

Bald hatten wir uns abermals miteinander geeinigt; ich verhandelte in dem Hause und wurde mich in dem Kreis so selbstverständlich, als gehörte ich schon lange zu ihnen. Mein Begleiter hielt sich zag an mich und wiegand wegen einem Einwand, wenn er dawäll mitzog. Ingenieurlichen Bedenken und Bedenken begegnete ich von vornherein bereits dadurch, daß ich ihm zu allem mitnahm, wie wenn er unzertrennlich mit mir verbunden wäre.

Wieder brachten es die äußeren Umstände mit sich, daß wir tagsüber fast ganz die Indianerinnen beobachteten und uns mit ihnen unterhielten. Am Abend, nach ihrer Arbeit auf der Farm, sammelten sich die Männer in dieser oder jener Hütte und hockten um das Feuer herum; nun traten wir in ihren Kreis ein. Bei dem diesjährigen Aufenthalt waren zwar noch einige Ergänzungen aus dem Wirtschaftsleben nachzutragen, hauptsächlich aber mußten bedeutsame Einzelheiten aus der allgemeinen Gesellschaftsordnung sichergestellt werden. Unauffällig, aber zielbewußt lenkte ich bei passender Gelegenheit auf die Jugendweihe hinüber, um herauszufühlen, ob diese Leute sie jetzt wieder abhalten würden. Später sprach ich es offen aus, daß ich gekommen wäre, um die geheime Männerfeier zu sehen, und daß ich die dazu erforderliche Vorbedingung gern erfüllen würde, nämlich ein zweites Mal als Prüfling in die Jugendweihe einzutreten.

Mit dem gleichen Erfolge wie auf meiner vorigen Reise trug ich auch diesmal meine besonderen Wünsche zunächst der immer hilfsbereiten Nelly vor: denn sie hatte es längst erfaßt, wie sehr ich jede Einzelheit aus dem Erbgut ihres Volkes schätzte. Sie selber hegte den sehnlichsten Wunsch, daß alles und jedes, was sie so hoch wertete, durch mich bei den Weißen bekannt würde. Nicht der geheimen Männerfeier wegen verwendete sie sich bei ihren bejahrten Landsleuten, sondern wegen ihrer besonderen Vorliebe für die Jugendweihe allein, an der sie teilzunehmen plante; sie drängte also, daß letztere wiederholt würde. Gar nicht lange dauerte es, bis in der Allgemeinheit die Absicht, das ziẽ̃ɣus abzuhalten, handgreifliche Form annahm. Doch nicht mehr in Punta Remolino, das etwas ungünstig lag, sondern in dem geschützten Puerto Mejillones sollte es stattfinden. Meinerseits hatte ich zugesichert, für Lebensmittel, zumal für Mehl und Hammel zu sorgen. Daß an die Jugendweihe sogleich die geheime Männerfeier sich anschließen würde, klang aus den Unterhaltungen mit den führenden Alten wie selbstverständlich. Das Hauptziel der diesjährigen Reise schien also gesichert.

Während des ganzen Januar wurden die Männer tagsüber durch Arbeiten bei der Schafschur oder beim Wegebau in Anspruch genommen. Wir blieben demnach bei unserer Beobachtung und Aussprache größtenteils auf die Frauen angewiesen. Ihnen ist es zu danken, daß wir zu unserer eigenen Überraschung tiefen Einblick in die religiösen Anschauungen dieses Stammes erhielten, der seit langem bekanntlich als Musterbeispiel einer völlig religionslosen Menschengruppe mit Aufdringlichkeit vorgeführt worden war. Außerdem halfen sie bei Erkundigungen nach der Sprache und im besonderen bei der genauen Bestimmung der Sprachlaute. Vier Dialekten innerhalb des Yamana kamen wir auf die Spur, die ich im nächsten Jahre richtiger auf fünf erweiterte und für die ich die genauen geographischen Grenzen zeichnete. An den langen Abenden unterhielten wir uns selbstverständlich allein mit den Männern, die zwar von ihrem Tagewerk ermüdet, aber zu leichten Aussprachen gern bereit waren.

Voraussichtlich für zwölf Tage waren diese Indianer noch auf der Farm beschäftigt und die Frauen wünschten sich inzwischen auf die bevorstehende Jugendweihe unbehindert vorzubereiten. Schnell entschloß ich mich, diese kurze Zeitspanne mit einem Besuch der Selk'nam auszufüllen; denn die guten Beziehungen zu ihnen durfte ich nicht erkalten lassen, wollte ich meine früher aufgenommenen Arbeiten gelegentlich zu einem erfolgreichen Abschluß bringen. Auch lag mir daran, meinen Begleiter mit diesem feuerländischen Stamme wenigstens vorübergehend bekannt zu machen.

Bereitwilligst stellte uns Fred Lawrence zwei Führer und die Pferde zur Verfügung. Am Morgen des 1. Februar brachen wir auf und schlugen die Richtung nach Puerto Harberton ein. Von dort überquerte ich zum dritten Male das Gebirge. In dem mir bekannten Lager am Lago Fagnano trafen wir nur einige Selk'nam an, unter ihnen war mein lieber Freund Ventura. Leider konnten wir uns nur kurze Zeit bei ihm aufhalten, trotz der Freude, die das Wiedersehen ihm bereitete. Unzweideutig ließ ich ihn wissen, daß ich möglicherweise mit beginnendem Winter, sicherlich aber im nächsten Sommer zu einem längeren Aufenthalt zurückkommen würde. Damit schieden wir voneinander. Auf der Farmabteilung Nueva Harberton, zum Grundbesitz der Geschwister Bridges gehörig, waren viele Selk'nam-Männer vereinigt, die hier große Viehherden zusammentrieben. Einige gute Bekannte begrüßte ich herzlich und wechselte mit ihnen freundliche Worte.

Am nächsten Tage ritten wir weiter, um die Hauptgebäude der Farm Vismonte an der Mündung des Río del Fuego noch vor Abend des 4. Februar zu erreichen. Groß war unsere Enttäuschung, als wir in dem früher dichtbevölkerten Lager nur fünf Familien antrafen (Gusinde [c]: 100). Zu wertvollen Beobachtungen und kleineren, vornehmlich sprachlichen Arbeiten bot sich trotzdem gute Gelegenheit. Schließlich traten wir am 11. Februar den Rückweg an, um bei unserem Yamana nicht zu spät einzutreffen (Koppers [a]: 23).

Während sie ihre Farmarbeiten in Punta Remolino abschlossen, sammelte ich die Lebensmittel und Geschenke, sorgte auch für gute Stimmung durch Tabak, den ich unter die Männer, und durch begehrte Gebrauchsgegenstände, die ich unter die Frauen verteilte, und regelte das Geschäftliche mit Fred Lawrence. Erst im letzten Augenblick klugerweise ließ Nellay uns wissen, daß sie sich nicht sofort uns anschließen könnte und später nachkommen würde.

In der Morgenfrühe des 1. März wurden alle Habseligkeiten der Indianer, unser eigenes bescheidenes Gepäck und schließlich die reiche Menge an Lebensmitteln auf den Kutter "Garibaldi" verladen, wir alle stiegen ein und fuhren quer über den Canal de Beagle zum Puerto Mejillones auf dem Nordufer der Isla Navarino. Unverzüglich begannen die Vorbereitungen zur Jugendweihe. Beim freundlichen Perno, dem die Leitung dieser Veranstaltung zufiel, hatte ich es nach einigem Zureden erreicht, daß mein Begleiter unter den gleichen Bedingungen wie ich daran teilnehmen durfte. Wer zum zweiten Male als Prüfling das čiêyuys über sich ergehen läßt, wird nicht mehr zu den Strengheiten verpflichtet, denen er bei der ersten Jugendweihe unterliegt. Demzufolge hinderte mich jetzt niemand daran, schriftliche Aufzeichnungen zu machen und gelegentlich mit leiser Stimme um einige Erklärungen zu bitten; diesmal war es mir ein Leichtes, den gesamten Verlauf der Feier ununterbrochen auf dem Papier festzuhalten. Solch bedeutsamer Vorteil, der mir vor zwei Jahren versagt war, kam sofort auch meinem Begleiter zugute. Mit lebhafterer Anteilnahme als vordem wickelte sich dieses čifzuus ab, was sich wohl daraus erklärt, daß mehr Leute beisammen und alle ungestört unter sich waren.

Mit großer Genugtuung schloß man diese Feier am Abend des 6. März ab, um sogleich zum kloo überzuleiten. Als es wirklich begann, sahen wir uns am Ziele des diesjährigen Arbeitsplanes. Eine kegelförmige Hütte war eigens aufgerichtet worden. Die einzelnen Geisterauftritte liefen genau so ab, wie es bei diesen Indianern ehedem üblich war. Einzelne Szenen allerdings mußten sie sich vorher ernstlich überlegen; denn seit drei Jahrzehnten wiederholten sie jetzt erst wieder einmal dieses Fest. Jüngere Männer, die es zum ersten Male erlebten, empfanden dabei eine außerordentliche Freude; doch auch die Alten vergnügten sich mit großer Lust. Am 12. März schlossen auch diese Veranstaltungen.

Für kleinere Arbeiten boten sich in den folgenden Tagen günstige Gelegenheiten und manche Erklärungen zu jenen beiden geheimen Feiern wurden nachgetragen. Phonographische Aufnahmen fielen gut aus und auch meine Pflanzensammlung erweiterte sich ganz ansehnlich. Am 17. März verließen wir Puerto Mejillones, diese kleine indianische Siedlung, in den flachen Booten unserer Eingeborenen.

In Punta Remolino mußten wir der lieben NELLY ausführlich über alles berichten, was sich in Puerto Mejillones abgewickelt hatte. Sie empfand eine unaussprechliche Freude über unsere eigene Genugtuung und Zufriedenheit. Die Yamana selber zerstreuten sich am gleichen Tage, da wir abzogen, in den vielverschlungenen Wasserarmen ihrer Heimat.

Trotz günstiger Aussichten einer Weiterführung der Forschung bei den Selk'nam (Bd. I, 101) rüsteten wir zur Heimreise und verpackten die umfangreichen Sammlungen. Auf meine Bitte an die chilenische Marinebehörde in Punta Arenas holte uns der Minenleger "Orompello" am 7. April in Punta Remolino ab. Mit herzlichem Dank schieden wir von der gastfreundlichen Familie LAWRENCE und von unseren Yamana. Überraschend reichen Erfolg nahmen wir auch von dieser Reise mit nach Hause. In Punta Arenas fanden wir sofort Anschluß zur Rückkehr nach Santiago.[1]

4. Meine letzte Reise

In den verflossenen Jahren hatte ich auf drei Besuchen bei den Yamana eine wahre Fülle ihres Kulturgutes gehoben, so daß alle Wesensteile ihrer Wirtschaftsform, ihrer Gesellschaftsordnung und ihres Geisteslebens als bekannt vorlagen. Kleine Lücken blieben trotzdem offen; denn man könnte von Jahr zu Jahr immer neue Nebensächlichkeiten aufdecken, die das Gesamtbild vervollständigen und erweitern. Unausweichlich aber mußte ich einer bedeutsamen Einrichtung nachspüren, deren Auswirkungen die Seelenverfassung des ganzen Stammes beherrscht, nämlich der sogenannten Medizinmannschule. Bei den Selk'nam hatte ich früher eine weit umfangreichere Arbeit noch unerledigt gelassen; im besonderen hoffte ich es zu erreichen, ihre geheime Männerfeier zu sehen und ihren Mythenschatz mir anzueignen, der, nach meinen Erfahrungen bei den Yamana, hier kaum geringer sein dürfte. Schließlich oblag mir noch, die vielseitige Untersuchung der Halakwulup in Angriff zu nehmen, von denen ich bislang nur einige sprachliche Beobachtungen aufgezeichnet hatte. Allerdings war ich jetzt endlich über ihre geographische Verbreitung im westpatagonischen Inselgebiet und über jene wenigen Stellen, an denen Einzelfamilien vorübergehend lagern, hinreichend sicher unterrichtet. Für eine neue Reise fehlte es also nicht an Arbeit, um unsere Kenntnis von den Kulturverhältnissen der drei feuerländischen Gruppen zu vervollständigen.

Mache man mir keine Vorwürfe, daß dieses Forschungsunternehmen sich sehr in die Länge zog. Mit Schwierigkeiten ganz eigener Art hat die gründliche Untersuchung eines Nomadenstammes zu ringen; diese steigern sich, wenn derselbe in Einzelfamilien aufgelöst ist, von denen eine jede sich in unzugängliche Wasserarme verliert. Der aufmerksame Forscher fühlt es bald heraus, daß alle Ergebnisse unzuverlässig bleiben, wenn er sich mit dem Befragen und Beobachten nur dieser und jener Personen oder Familie zufrieden gibt. Sie allein werden ebensowenig imstande sein, ihm die ganze Fülle des Stammesgutes zu übermitteln.

Eine Tatsache ist es, deren forschungsmethodischer Wert nicht hoch genug veranschlagt werden kann und dem ich auf meinen Reisen oft begegnet bin, daß Einzelpersonen, die dem weißen Forscher allein gegenüber stehen, bei ihren Aussagen sich nicht nur unsicher fühlen, sondern es auch wirklich sind. Sie können sich meist nur sehr schwer auf Fragen, die häufig ungeschickt gefaßt sind und unvermittelt ihnen vorgelegt werden, gar nicht so bestimmt und so schnell einstellen, daß sie zu einer verläßlichen Antwort fähig wären: aber da man sie drängt und wenigstens irgend etwas herauszupressen versucht, reden sie schließlich kurzerhand dies oder das daher, sich selber kaum ihrer Worte klar bewußt. Sind jedoch mehrere beisammen und läßt der fremde Besucher eine Frage fallen, beteiligen sich alle Anwesenden an der Lösung, wenigstens in ihren Überlegungen, sie tauschen ihre Ansichten aus und einigen sich auf eine einzige Antwort, die wirklichen Wert besitzt. Nicht minder bedeutsam ist der andere Umstand, daß der Forscher sich das Vertrauen eines ansehnlichen Teiles der primitiven Bevölkerung erwerben haben muß, wenn er geheime Veranstaltungen erleben will. Gegen seine Zulassung wehrt sich von vornherein der starke Widerstand einer überwiegenden Mehrheit, die umstimmen einzelner Stammesmitglieder nicht einmal wagen, viel weniger erreichen. Geraume Zeit braucht es offensichtlich, bis der günstige Eindruck, den der Europäer auf einen kleinen Teil des Volkes gemacht hat, sich so nachdrücklich herumspricht, daß auch viele andere das Verlangen spüren, ihn kennenzulernen. Erst wenn er die Mehrheit des Stammes für sich gewonnen hat, kann er damit rechnen, bei einer vorerst den Eingeborenen selber günstigen Gelegenheit zu den gemeinschaftlichen Feiern zugelassen und mit den streng gehüteten Kultgütern vertraut gemacht zu werden.

So ließ ich nach jeder der drei ersten Reisen vom Herbst zum Frühjahr diese Eingeborenen beider Stämme sich in ihren Gedanken und Unterhaltungen mit dem beschäftigen, was wir gemeinsam gerodet, getan und erlebt hatten. Vom ersten Zusammentreffen an war es mein aufrichtiges Bemühen, sie zu verstehen, ihnen vollauf gerecht zu werden und sie nicht im mindesten zu verletzen, am allerwenigsten ihre Einrichtungen, in des Wortes weiterem Sinne, in Lächerlichkeit oder mindere Bewertung zu zerren. Für diese Art der Behandlung haben die Primitiven insgesamt ein überaus feines Empfinden und danach richten auch sie ihr Verhalten gegen den Europäer ein.

Während sie ihre Erfahrungen und Urteile für sich allein überdachten und in ihrer Stammesgemeinschaft weitertrugen, blieb auch mir Zeit und Ruhe, in deren Geistesverfassung und charakterliche Anlagen, in deren Vorzüge und Schwächen, in deren Gedankenfolge und Handlungsweise mich einzufühlen. Immer wieder überlegte ich, wie diese anscheinend von uns weit abstehenden Menschen am schnellsten und sichersten zu gewinnen wären. Die Wirklichkeit überzeugte mich, daß genau die gleichen Kräfte, die in europäischen Verhältnissen wirken, auch bei den "Wilden" rasch zu gutem Erfolge führten; denn ganze Menschen sind auch sie und darüber hinaus naturwahr. Vornehme Würdigung des Fremdartigen und feines Gefühl für die Umgangsformen mit diesen einfachen, aber aufgeschlossenen und empfindsamen Menschen benötigen eine gewisse Entwicklungszeit; diese lag für mich zwischen den einzelnen Reisen, in der ich die letzten Erlebnisse überdachte und auswertete, um das richtige Vorgehen beim nächsten Besuch einzuschlagen. Auch das Vorgehen muß gelernt werden, mag man noch so glückliche Veranlagung besitzen. Wem aber diese sogar fehlt, der soll lieber daheim bleiben.

Auf ein ganzes Jahr richtete ich mich ein. Das Ministerio de Instrucción Pública de Chile gewährte mir den erforderlichen Urlaub und gute Freunde stellten die Mittel bei. Besonderen Dank bin ich auch meinen Gönnern schuldig, die mich von meinen Verpflichtungen im Liceo Alemán zu Santiago entbunden haben, sowie meinem Direktor, Herrn Dr. Adelbert Grabow, der mich während der Vorbereitungen tatkräftig unterstützt hat.

Zunächst wollte ich bei den Yamana längeren Aufenthalt nehmen, die während der Monate Januar und Februar sich in ansehnlicher Zahl auf der Farm Punta Arenas zu sammeln pflegen. Vor Beginn des Winters würde es an der Zeit sein, das Gebirge in nördlicher Richtung zu überschreiten, um in den langen Wintermonaten bei den Selk'nam die geheime Männerfeier mitzumachen. Im Frühjahr oder beginnenden Sommer könnte ich endlich versuchen, in den westpatagonischen Kanälen den Halakwulup nahezutreten. Nach diesen großen Linien habe ich meine vierte und letzte Feuerlandreise wirklich durchgeführt.

Im Dezember 1922 nahm ich von Santiago wieder Abschied und eilte auf dem kürzesten Wege nach Punta Arenas. Dank dem liebenswürdigen Entgegenkommender chilenischen Hafenbehörden und dem freundlichen Kapitän der "Cap Polonio" konnte ich schon nach zwei Tagen an Bord dieses Luxusdampfers nach Ushuaia weiterfahren. Hier stieg ich sofort in das einfache Fahrzeug einer Yamana-Familie und überwand mit einem einzigen Sprunge den ungeheuren technischen Aufstieg vom Indianerkanu zum Wunderwerk der neuzeitlichen Schiffsbaukunst. Ohne Verzug begab ich mich nach Punta Remolino; denn in Ushuaia findet sich nur in langen Zeitabständen die eine und andere Yamana-Familie ein. Auf der Farm der Familie LAWRENCE wurde ich wieder als lieber Gast aufgenommen und sofort fühlte ich mich wie zu Hause.

Wenige Indianer nur waren anwesend, aber die Nachricht von meinem Eintreffen verbreitete sich schnell und in knapp zwei Wochen liefen in Puerto Mejillones etwa fünfzig Leute zusammen. Eine sichtbare Freude und helle Begeisterung, mich wiederzusehen, hatte sie erfaßt. Gern kamen sie herbei: denn die Vereinigung vieler, so gering auch die Zahl der noch Überlebenden war, bot jedem Einzelnen reichliche Genugtuung bei den gemeinschaftlichen Spielen und bei dem ergiebigen Gedankenaustausch. Ungeduldig hatten sie auch in diesem Sommer auf mich gewartet. Eine Woche lang beschäftigte ich mich in Puerto Remolino damit, die Ereignisse der letzten neun Monate aufzunehmen, sowie reichliche Lebensmittel, Geschenke und Andenken für die Indianer zusammenzustellen. Damit übersiedelte ich nach Puerto Mejillones, wo ich mit hellem Jubel von der gesamten feuerländischen Gesellschaft empfangen wurde.

Denn war ich mir bewußt, daß dieser Besuch mein letzter sein würde. Den kleinen Rest dieses Stammes noch einmal hier zu versammeln, bemühte ich mich von Anfang an. Etwa sechs Personen streiften auf den Wollastoninseln mit einigen Robbenschlägern herum und nach ihnen sandte ich eigens ein Boot aus; leider gelang es nicht sie aus der Abhängigkeit von jenen Europäern zu befreien. Von ihnen und wenigen Einzelpersonen samt Mischlingen abgesehen waren alle Yamana um mich vereinigt; ihre Gesamtzahl reichte damals nicht mehr an 70 heran. Oft erschauderte ich beim Anblick dieser Handvoll von Menschen, denen als Überbleibsel eines vielhundertköpfigen gesunden Volkes das grausige Schicksal nur noch wenige Lebensjahre gewährte!

Auf der vorigen Reise, nach dem erfreulichen Verlauf der kina-Feier, hatten die ältesten Männer mir in Aussicht gestellt, zum ldima-yékomuš zusammenzutreten. Ihre anderen beiden großen Veranstaltungen, nämlich die Jugendweihe čiźzous und die geheime Männerfeier kina hatte ich bereits erlebt. Jene einzigartige Versammlung wollten sie mir nicht vorenthalten, damit, wie sie sagten, „ich alles Schöne erführe, was sie besitzen"! Im Verlauf der folgenden Wochen bekam ich es wiederholt zu spüren, wie der und jener aus innerem Drange mir Ergänzungen und Erklärungen nachtrug, gleichsam um sich nicht etwa einer Pflichtverletzung schuldig zu machen.

Als wichtigstes Ziel stand auf meinem diesjährigen Reiseplane die Anteilnahme am Ídima-yékamui, das man passend mit Medizinmannschule umschreibt. Als ich mit meinem Ansuchen an die alten Männer herantrat und nachdrücklich die drei eigentlichen yékamui anging, zeigten sie sich mutlos und sehr zaghaft. Sie redeten sich dahin aus, daß die Zeit der tüchtigen, mächtigen yékamui längst vorüber wäre, daß sie selber nur sehr kleine Medizinmänner abgäben, daß sie endlich sich unfähig wüßten zu den überraschenden Künsten und unerreichbaren Proben, mit denen ihre Vorgänger im Amte alle Leute in Staunen gesetzt hätten. Gutwillig und wohlmeinend waren sie, das fühlte ich aus ihren Worten heraus; deshalb sagte ich ihnen sehr bestimmt und entschieden: „Tut, was ihr könnt! Jedenfalls verlange ich nicht zu viel, wenn ich wünsche, daß ihr zusammentretet und mit der Unterweisung der Prüflinge beginnt. Dabei braucht ihr keine besonderen Kunststücke vorzuführen! Ich gebe mich gern mit dem zufrieden, was ihr zeigen werdet; das läßt sich bestimmt machen. Wer der beste yékamui ist, das will ich am Schluß der Veranstaltung entscheiden, nachdem ich alles erfahren und einen jeden beobachtet habe. Mir kommt es darauf an zu sehen, wie die Teilnehmer in der Ídima-Hütte leben und was den Prüflingen gelehrt wird, genau nach dem Brauch der Alten!" Damit hatte ich ihnen alle Mutlosigkeit genommen und gleichzeitig ihren Ehrgeiz angestachelt; es wurde ihnen leicht ums Herz und ihr Entschluß war bald reif. Der eine nach dem anderen verließ diesen Platz, wo wir verhandelt hatten, suchte seine Hütte auf und griff zur Axt, die er sich aufschulterte. Im Walde wählten sie passende Stämme aus, legten sie um und schleppten sie herbei. An der Stelle, an der im letzten Sommer die kina-Hütte gestanden hatte, errichteten sie die gleiche kegelförmige Hütte. Ohne Verzug begann das Ídima-yékamui, das ich in all seinen Teilen beobachten konnte. Meinen feuerländischen Freunden werde ich es zeitlebens aufrichtig danken, daß sie mir die seltene Auszeichnung gewährt haben, in der Schule ihrer Medizinmänner[297] gesessen zu haben.

Mehrere Tage nach Abschluß dessen ereignete sich ein Todesfall, der die Aufmerksamkeit aller Leute, wie üblich, vollauf in Anspruch nahm. Die Frau des alten THOMAS, die seit Jahren an einem schmerzlichen Unterleibsleiden gelitten hatte, starb. Weil viele Leute anwesend waren, ergab es sich von selber, daß sie zur gemeinschaftlichen Totenfeier yamalaiemdjna zusammentraten. Auch mich lud man dazu ein. Mit einer Naturhaftigkeit, der ich noch nie begegnet war, ließen sie ihren schmerzlichen Empfindungen freien Lauf, ohne Menschenfurcht und ohne Verschämtheit; mit einer fast alltäglichen Selbstverständlichkeit wandten sie sich, einer nach dem anderen, mit Gebeten und Drohungen an ihre Gottheit Watagindwu. Hierbei erlebte ich wirklich ihr religiöses Bewußtsein und schaute ihre religiöse Betätigung. Eine unschätzbar wertvolle Ergänzung zu den Mitteilungen über die Religion dieses Volkes vom Jahre vorher brachte mir dieses Ereignis.

Manche Einzelheiten sammelte ich noch ein, Unklarheiten aus den früheren Besuchen stellte ich richtig, an Gebrauchsgegenständen und Pflanzen erwarb ich, was mir noch fehlte. Nun wollte ich meine Forschung bei den Yamana endgültig beschließen. Wieder hatte ich zwei Monate auf Isla Navarino verweilt, ausschließlich umgeben von diesen Feuerländern. Ein strenger Winter hatte sich bereits angekündigt, darum durfte ich meinen Ritt ins Innere der Isla Grande nicht weiter hinausschieben. In voller Überzeugung, daß ich Bedeutsame Ereignisse bei Fortsetzung meiner Arbeit hier nicht mehr erreichen könnte, weil alles erschöpft zu sein schien, richtete ich mich auf den Abschied ein. Die alten Leute versicherten mir wiederholt, daß sie alles erzählt und jedes gezeigt hätten, was ihnen durch die Vorfahren überliefert worden war. Sie hatten mich nicht betrogen, so viel Ehrlichkeit mußte ich ihnen zutrauen. Mit Wehmut trennten wir uns; denn sie sowohl wie ich selber wußten und fühlten es, wir würden uns nicht mehr wiedersehen!

Während ich auf einem flachen Kahn, der dem alten SANTIAGO gehörte, den Canal de Beagle in der Richtung auf Punta Remolino durchquerte, überdachte ich das traurige Lebensschicksal dieses Volkes, das, wie so manches andere, im Verlauf eines halben Jahrhunderts durch das Europäertum an den Rand des baldigen Unterganges getrieben worden ist.

Auf der Farm der Brüder LAWRENCE rüstete ich mich unverzüglich für den Ritt zum Lago Fagnano. Die Zeit drängte; denn auf dem Gebirge, das ich nun abermals überqueren mußte, lag bereits Schnee. Das Wetter zeigte sich günstig und obwohl die Gipfel vereist waren, erreichte ich das kleine Lager der Selk'nam auf der anderen Seite. Bei ihnen blieb ich, erlebte die geheime Männerfeier und erwarb eine schöne Sammlung von Mythen. Als ich mit geschwächter Gesundheit Mitte Juli, im strengsten Winter, von ihnen mich trennte, geriet ich beim Überschreiten des Gebirges in ernste Lebensgefahr. Dem wackeren Tom danke ich es, daß ich mich heute noch des Daseins erfreue (Bd. I, 116, Abb. 10).[100]

Am Canal de Beagle bin ich keinem Yamana mehr begegnet, wohl aber unterhielt ich mich noch oft und lange mit NELLY. Für sie war jeder meiner Besuche ein Ereignis besonderer Art. Beim letzten Abschied beteuerte sie mir, daß sie nun ruhiger das schwere Los ihres Volkes in dem frohen Bewußtsein trage, alle meine Beobachtungen, die ich in einem umfangreichen Buche zu zusammenzustellen beabsichtige, werden auf ewige Zeiten eine Ehrenrettung für ihre vielgeschmähten Landsleute sein! Ihr versprach ich damals, daß ich dieses Werk auf das beste auszustatten plane. Leider hat sie dessen Erscheinen nicht mehr erlebt.

Noch einmal wiederhole ich es laut, daß ich den überraschend reichen Erfolg meiner vier Reisen der großzügigen Unterstützung und unschätzbar wertvollen Mithilfe der Familie LAWRENCE und im besonderen der nimmermüden NELLY verdanke. Die gründliche Kenntnis der feuerländischen Kultur, die ich mir bei den Yamana erworben habe, erwies sich bald als eine glückliche Vorbedingung für die Forschungsarbeit bei den Selk'nam und Halakwulup. Damit, daß ich hier angefangen habe, erhielt ich die günstige Richtung für mein ganzes Unternehmen.[199]

Mit nächster Gelegenheit fuhr ich in Begleitung von MARTIN LAWRENCE nach Punta Arenas zurück, wo ich am 7. September 1923 landete. Nach zwei Wochen brachte mich die Escampavía "Piloto Sibhold" der chilenischen Marine in das Gebiet der Halakwulup, wo ich einige Monate zubrachte. Nach einem kurzen Besuch des Tehuelche-Lagers am Fuße der argentinischen Kordillere kam ich wieder nach Punta Arenas. Hier verpackte und verschiffte ich die reichhaltigen Sammlungen.

Mit aufrichtigem Dank gegen die chilenischen und argentinischen Behörden, die gastfreundlichen Patres des Salesianerordens und viele hilfbereite Privatleute verließ ich das Magallanes-Gebiet und traf Mitte April 1924 in Santiago ein. Auf ein ergebnisreiches Forschen schaue ich mit Genugtuung zurück und das Feuerland wird mir ein unauslöschliches Erlebnis bleiben.

C. Die Yamana einst und jetzt

Die als "Nassauische Flotte" bekannte holländische Expedition unter dem Befehle des Admirals L'HERMITE hatte im Februar 1624 in der Bahía Nassau einige Bewohner des Kap Hoorn-Archipels kennengelernt und in einem blutigen Überfall sogar einige Matrosen verloren; sie hat auch von jenen "Wilden" die ersten Nachrichten in Europa verbreitet (S. 50). Bis zum Beginn des XIX. Jahrhunderts sind nur selten die Mannschaften europäischer Schiffe mit den dort beheimateten Eingeborenen in Verbindung getreten. Seitdem um das Jahr 1850 die anglikanische Mission sich ihrer angenommen hatte, steigerten sich die bis dahin sehr lückenhaften Kenntnisse von ihrer völkischen und rassischen Eigenart, von ihren Sitten und Gewohnheiten, von ihrer Sprache und geistigen Verfassung. Dafür gebühret jenen Missionaren reichlichster Dank; denn durch ihre ersten Arbeiten und zahlreichen Beobachtungen wurde für die Forschungen in späterer Zeit, für das restlose Erfassen des gesamten Kulturbesitzes jenes Indianerstammes der Grund gelegt.

[199] Allgemeine Angaben über meine Arbeitsweise, sind niedergelegt, außer in den bereits genannten Quellen, in Gusinde (c): 186 und (h): [34].

Während früher jene ferne Inselwelt allgemein gefürchtet und gemieden wurde, setzten mit den 80er Jahren die ersten Versuche europäischer Ansiedlung ein; diese führten im Laufe der nächsten Jahrzehnte dahin, daß nach und nach alle verwertbaren Landstriche von den Fremdlingen besetzt und die früheren Besitzer beinahe gedrängt wurden. Die anglikanische Mission hat eine ausgedehnte Tätigkeit entfaltet und es von vornherein darauf abgesehen, den ganzen Stamm zu erfassen. Je leichter aber, von ihr unbewußt vorbereitet, das Europäertum sich dort entfalten konnte, um so mehr Nachteile und Schäden erwuchsen daraus für die Eingeborenen.

Von allem Fremdartigen, das ihnen gewollt oder ungewollt angetragen wurde, müssen die eingeschleppten Seuchen als erste Ursache einer verheerenden Vernichtung genannt werden. Andere Umstände, obgleich jeder für sich von geringerer Wirkungskraft war, haben, zusammengerechnet und in Verbindung mit den Krankheiten, einen Angriff von solch entsetzlicher Wirkung auf die Lebenskraft des Yamana-Volkes geführt, daß von ihm heute nur noch eine Handvoll Vertreter übrig geblieben ist. Während durch die vereinzelten Besuche europäischer Schiffe in den früheren Jahrhunderten die Wohlfahrt und Volksgesundheit jener Indianer keinen Schaden gelitten hatten, ist es den letzten acht Jahrzehnten vorbehalten geblieben, sie bis auf einen kleinen Rest aufzureiben. Wer den geschichtlichen Verlauf aller Geschehnisse nachprüft, wird unumwunden zugeben: Wäre das Europäertum in jenen entfernten Erdenwinkel nie vorgedrungen, die Feuerländer hätten zwar auf ihrer dürftigen Lebenshaltung und den sehr einfachen Gebrauchsgegenständen verharrt, aber ihre unveränderte Volkseinheit würde noch heute mit unterhöhlenem Lebenswillen über die Machtentfaltung aller unfreundlichen Naturkräfte ihrer Heimat obsiegen. Die Warnungen lauter Stimmen aus den letzten drei Jahrzehnten, den Untergang der Feuerländer hintanzuhalten, sind von den berufenen Stellen überhört worden. Bald hat die letzte Lebensstunde eines Volkes geschlagen, dessen Kulturform als eine der ersten auf amerikanischen Boden vorgefunden worden war und die ihre bedeutsamsten Bestandteile fast unverändert in der rauhen feuerländischen Umgebung durch Jahrhunderte so lange erhalten hatte, bis das Europäertum ihm den Todesstoß versetzte.

Nachdem ich zu Beginn des Jahres 1924 die noch verwahrten Kulturgüter bei den letzten Überlebenden des Yamana-Volkes gesammelt und für die Wissenschaft gerettet hatte, schloß ich meine Forschungen ab. Genau dreihundert Jahre waren bis dahin verflossen, seitdem diesen Feuerländern in der Volkskraft ihrer unversehrten Urwüchsigkeit die ersten Europäer sich genähert und auch gegenübergestellt hatten.

a. Stammesname

Von vielen Stellen der Erde ist es bekannt, daß der eigentliche Stammesname einer bestimmten Volksgruppe, erst lange nachdem man mit ihr selber vertraut geworden war, eindeutig festgelegt wurde. Diese Erscheinung, die ene von den Selk'nam her noch in frischem Gedächtnis ist (Bd. I, 121), wiederholt sich auch bei den Yamana. Die Seefahrer der älteren Zeit hielten sich durchgängig an die von MAGALLANES gewählte Benennung und waren zweifelsohne im Recht, wenn sie die Bewohner des Kap Hoorn-Archipels ganz allgemein als "Feuerländer" ansahen.[110] D. ihnen durchgängig eine scharfe Beobachtungsgabe eigen war, versuchten sie nach gewissen äußeren Merkmalen und auffälligen Unterschieden die Eigenart der jeweiligen Gegend und die Abweichungen der Bewohner des einen Bezirkes vom anderen hervorzuheben. Meist benannten sie jene Völkerschaften in Anlehnung an den Namen der geographischen Örtlichkeit. Zuweilen gaben selbst geringfügige Verschiedenheiten der einen Gruppe von der nachbarlichen jenen Seeleuten schon Veranlassung, die Zusammengehörigkeit beider zum gleichen Volke in Zweifel zu ziehen. Was an Benennungen, die als eigentliche Stammesnamen gedacht waren, von ihnen für die Bewohner dieser südlichsten Inselwelt aufgestellt worden ist, sind durchgehends Ableitungen vom Namen des jeweiligen Wohnortes dieser und jener Gruppe.

Als erster hat FITZ-ROY (a): 132 eine bestimmte Namengebung für die heute als Yamana bekannten Eingeborenen versucht. Im Zuge der Abgrenzung der verschiedenen Völkerstämme am späteren Ende Südamerikas erwähnt er, daß „westward of these people [gemeint sind seine Yacana-kunny or foot people, teilweise die eigentlichen Selk'nam[111]], separated from them by a ridge of mountains, was a tribe called Kay-dnie, Kay-yus, or Kay-es". Das gilt offensichtlich zunächst für die westlichen Yamana,[112] wenn nicht gar für die Mehrheit dieses Stammes, und dürfte nach Auffassung des englischen [illegible] für die Bewohner der südlichen Inseln des Feuerlandes sein.

Doch mag ein besonderer Anlaß zum baldigen Abweichen von dieser Bezeichnung ausschlaggebend gewesen sein; denn FITZ-ROY verbessert sich selber und bemerkt, daß südlich von den eben erwähnten Yacana „is the tribe formerly called Kay-ahnu, now probably the Tekeenica".[113] Dieser letzte Ausdruck ist es nun, der von vielen späteren Schriftstellern bis in die neueste Zeit hinein übernommen und gebraucht wurde, und zwar entweder ausschließ-

[110] Vgl. hierzu die Ausführungen und Quellenschriften in Bd. I, 22, ferner bei KOENIGSWALD: 110 und bei GUSINDE (b): 38.

[111] Vgl. "Hoga Sudoro de la parte central del continente sudamericano", angin. V. PAZZIS. Diese Karte wurde wiedergegeben durch PRATENAM (b) und verbessert durch LOMNAM-NEWCOMB (b): 18. Eine ausführliche Begründung findet sich bei LOMNAM-NEWCOMB (d): 209. Daß auch dieser hinzu diese Bezeichnung beibehalten war, ersieht man aus SERRANO (a): 176.

[112] Allerdings beschränkt LOMNAM-NEWCOMB (b): 18 diesen Namen nach den Gewässern in seiner Karte auf die südlichsten Bereiche.

[113] Von diesen Stämmen der südlichen FITZ-ROY (a): 137 auch eine ausführliche Schilderung, in der er ihre Heimat genauer umgrenzt und die folgendermaßen beginnt: „The Tekeenica nations of the south-eastern portion of Tierra del Fuego, are low of stature, ill-looking, and badly proportioned." Demnach meint er mit seinem "Tekeenica" die südlichere Gruppe der Feuerländer.

lich zur Bezeichnung der südlichsten Yamana-Gruppe oder teilweise auch als Benennung des gesamten Yamana-Stammes. Viele Jahre mußten erst verstreichen, bevor die richtige Bedeutung dieses seltsamen Wortes, das FITZ-ROY (a): 137 selber als eigentliche Stammesbezeichnung aufgefaßt hatte, klargestellt wurde. Wie er zu jener Wortbildung gekommen ist, erzählt BRIDGES (h): 207 ausführlich. Als nämlich FITZ-ROY sich auf einer Erkundigungsfahrt durch den Kanal "Putrusia" [Putrusája[115]] befand, fragte er „a un muchacho aborigen, llamado JEMMY BUTTON, el nombre del estrecho. No comprendió la pregunta y dijo en su propia lengua: Tekianaka, con lo cual quería decir que le era un sitio desconocido. Teci significa 'ver', y Tekianaca quiere decir 'extraño, no visto antes'". Diese Antwort des Indianerjünglings, die FITZ-ROY nicht verstanden hat, gab er selber als eigentlichen Stammesnamen[116] an die Nachwelt weiter.

Nicht nur von ihm wurde er benutzt, sondern er wurde auf Grund seines eigenen Vorgehens auch bald Allgemeingut der Europäer. Noch bei HYADES (j): 149 beispielsweise, etwa fünfzig Jahre später, liest man: „On connaît suffisamment l'habitat, la zone de distribution de ces Tekeniha, qui se trouvent depuis les parages du cap Horn au sud, jusqu' au centre du canal du Beagle." Zweifelsohne besitzt die letztgenannte Benennung gegenüber der ersteren ebensowenig Berechtigung.

Eine zweite, ebenfalls von FITZ-ROY vorgeschlagene Stammesbezeichnung, "Yappú" bezw. "Yappoos", fand indes nirgendwo Anklang. Offensichtlich ablehnend klingen die Worte, mit denen BRIDGES (h): 207 sich äußert: „Yappú viene de aiapuk [áipuɣ], una nutria.[117] Ninguno de estos términos [Tekiniha, Yappúa] es conocido por los yahganes."[117]

Demgegenüber verschaffte sich eine andere Benennung, die allerdings nur rein äußerlich der eigentlichen Stammesbezeichnung nahe kam, überall Eingang.[118] Wieder war es THOMAS BRIDGES, der, nachdem er die Be-[115] Das ist der einheimische Name für das Gebiet, welches heute als "Bahía Tekeniha" in die Landkarten eingezeichnet wird. MARTIAL: 209 schreibt "Pontoursoya".

[116] So wiederholt HYADES (q): 14, daß die südlichste Abteilung der feuerländischen Indianer „a été appelée Téhéniha par FITZ-ROY, dans l'idée erronée que Téhéniha ou Téhiniha était le nom indigène d'une grande baie de l'île Hoste". Die gleiche Begründung bringen DARWIN (b): 169, LEHMANN-NITSCHE (b): 17, LOTHARIO (b): 97, MARTIAL: 209 u. a.

[117] LEHMANN-NITSCHE (b): 19 vermutet, hinweisend auf die Mitteilungen von FITZ-ROY (a): 183, 203, daß „Japu es apodo dado por los Alakaluf a los Yámana, en general". Mir scheint dies unwahrscheinlich; doch ist sicher, daß die Halakwalup für Fischotter eine andere Bezeichnung besitzen.

[117] Die von verschiedenen Beobachtern angegebenen Stammesnamen für die Yamana haben BARROS ARANA (b): I, 39, HYADES (j): 149 und LOTA (b): 56, neuerdings FERLOUNI (r): 176 und CORTESI: 2 zusammengestellt.

[118] Diesen Unterschied betont HYADES (j): 150 folgendermaßen: „C'est le directeur actuel de la mission anglaise du canal de Beagle, qui leur a donné le nom d'Yahgan, lequel a sur le mot Tekeniha, qui n'avait aucune réalité de sens, l'avantage de désigner une localité (détroit de Murray ou Murray's Narrows), dans le nom indigène est Yahgo, et dans le voisinage de laquelle il y a une certaine agglomération de Fuégiens."

nennung für die südlichste und mittlere Yamana-Gruppe "Tekesnika" in ihren wahren Sinn aufgeklärt hatte, das Wort "Yahgan" als Eigennamen für den ganzen Stamm, also für das südlichste Volk der Feuerländer, vorschlug. Er selber gesteht dies ein: „Los yahganes fueron así llamados por mi por un distrito central llamado Yahga" (BRIDGES [h]: 207).[219] Das bestätigt der Missionar ASPINALL: 270 ausdrücklich: „Der Stamm, unter welchem die Mission Ushuaia gegründet wurde, hat von Rev. BRIDGES den Namen Jahganen erhalten, nach einer von ihm frequentierten Lokalität südlich vom Beagle Kanal."

Die Wahl dieser Benennung ist in weitem Maße willkürlich.[220] Bei den Yamana heißt die am Ostende liegende Nordspitze der Isla Hoste yége oder yike yiike und die von dorther genau nach Süden sich erstreckende Angostura Murray yégan aiége oder yikan aiéike. Weil nun diese Gegend im Herzen des Yamana-Gebietes liegt und weil BRIDGES — allerdings irrtümlicherweise — hier das Zusammenströmen vieler Einzelfamilien aus allen Richtungen vermutet hatte,[221] deshalb benannte er darnach den ganzen Stamm mit "Yahgan".[222] In der gleichen Richtung liegt auch der Umstand, den allein ELLIS: 36 namhaft gemacht hat: „The language is called Yaugan because Yauga is a district in the centre of the land, and the dialect spoken by the people inhabiting it, is that which Mr. BRIDGES has learned, and which he considers to be the best standard, because it is central, and differs less from the extremes than they do from each other. The name Yaugans includes all the Yaugan — speaking people who occupy both shores of the Beagle Channel and the shores of all the islands south of it. But the natives do not use the term."[223] Einerlei nun, was BRIDGES bewogen haben mag, er war in jener Zeit der einzige Sachkenner und deshalb tonangebend; auch bediente er selber sich überall dieses Indianer-

[220] Der Versuch FUMAGAL's (c): 176, dieses Vorgehen durch Hinweis auf die Namengebung, die bei den Yamana üblich ist, zu rechtfertigen, kann nicht als stichhaltig gelten. Er schreibt: „Bridges called them 'Yahgan', wisely adopting, in the case of a tribe, a custom applied by them to individuals, for their names mostly are taken from the place of birth." Die Entstehung des Stammesnamens geht ganz anders als die eines Personennamens vor sich.

[221] HYADES (q): 14 wiederholt, daß „le terme de Yahgan [fut] décrété, dit M. Bridges, du nom indigène des passes de Murray, entre le canal du Beagle et la baie Pasaoubay, lieu de réunion d'un grand nombre de familles indigènes, aujourd'hui éparses ou disparues". Vgl. LAGRANGE-NEUGRIS (h): 12, der dieses Wort mit "Canal chico" übersetzt. Das ist deshalb nicht zutreffend, weil Yagan ein Eigenname ist; das Wort yaha allerdings bedeutet: klein.

[222] Von BRIDGES selber wurde BOVE (o): 136 darüber unterrichtet, der erläuternde berichtet: „Bove Nauru erhielten die Yagan von dem Kanale Jagamembaga, welcher die Insel Ualle (Navarin) von Uoin (Hoste) trennt und den Mittelpunkt der bewohnten Gebiete dieses Teiles von Feuerland bildet." Vgl. BOVE (o): 135, CABAO P.: 324, CAGNONI: 104, SIMMERS (k): 170, ELLIS: 36, FUMAGAL (j): 3 und (c): 176, GIUSSANI (h): 72, HYADES (q): 14 u. a.

worten. Zwar erfuhr es durch andere bald geringe Abänderungen in der Schreibweise, man findet Yagan, Yaghan, Jagan, Jahagan u. ähnl. m.; von fast allen Schriftstellern jedoch wurde es beibehalten und gebraucht. Trotz allem läßt sich nicht verhehlen, daß Bancroft mit dem Hinweis auf die Gegend um yágan ukúku [die Angostura Murray] bewußt oder unbewußt einen guten Griff getan hat. Dieselbe nimmt wirklich die Mitte des ganzen Yamana-Gebietes ein und um diese Zentralgruppe mit eigenem Dialekt lagern sich die vier anderen Dialektgruppen, die damals von Bancroft in ihrer Selbständigkeit innerhalb bestimmter Grenzen noch nicht deutlich genug erkannt worden waren.[144]

Sogar heutigentage ist diese Benennung überall noch so geläufig, daß unscheinend die einzig richtige Stammesbezeichnung Yámana sich nicht durchzusetzen vermag. Kein geringerer als Bancroft selber hat den letztgenannten Ausdruck zuerst bekanntgegeben. In einer seiner späteren Abhandlungen äußerte er sich ausführlich: „Esta palabra yámana aplicada especialmente a la humanidad, es altamente significativa, pues expresa la idea de que el hombre es la forma más elevada de la vida. Esta palabra, en efecto, significa vivo; como sustantivo quiere decir vida, y como verbo vivir, revelar la vida o la salud." (Bancroft [b]: 207) Die Allgemeinbedeutung des Wortes Yámana im Sinne von menschliches Wesen, Mensch, Volk, ist durch spätere Forschung sichergestellt worden.[145]

In einem mehr einschränkenden Sinne betrachten sich jene Eingeborenen als die eigentlichen Yamana, so daß das Wort Yámana so viel wie unser Volk, wir bedeutet. Insofern bewerten sie sich selber, in unverkennbar egozentrischer Einstellung, als die wirklichen Menschen, die nur gleichen Volkscharakter zusammengeschlossen sind und die vergleichsweise Nachbarvölkern getrennt dastehen. Durch diese Namensgebung betonen sie auch gleichzeitig ihren Unterschied von den nicht-menschlichen Wesen, also von Lebewesen aus dem Tierreiche und aus ihrer Geisterwelt.[146]

[144] Näheres Hinweise auf diese Verhältnisse liegen vor bei Gusinde (d): 12, (k): 13 und (n): 1018.

[145] Bove (c): 156 schreibt: „Sie selbst legen sich den Namen Jamana (menschliches Wesen) bei." Bancroft: 200 wiederholt: „Los Yaméanos entre el Cabo de Hornos y la isla Grande se llaman a sí mismos simplemente yamana (hombres) como la nueva Ipsalanata nuestra nueva nacionaes." Wenig Beachtung hat sein Ausdruck gefunden: „Llamándose entre sí mismos vivos (dichos. Pero el vocablo Bancroft prefiere llamarlos yahgan que corresponde la palabra yágois (habitar)." Nicht in allen Teilen zutreffend ist, was Bacon: 36 ausführt: „They call themselves simply Yamana or Man, and their language Yámana' bóochs or Man's Talon. Yámana literally means sound, whole, healthy, well, living, and yámana to live, be living, recover life or health, recover after sickness, or to heal or a wound ...." Estudios Bryant (g): 11, „Se nomo que los Yahgan se denominan á sus mismos es que traqué de su dialecto que entre paréntesis sus yamana, qui significa hombres, individuos, gente". In gleichem Sinne äußern sich Cucurpe: 11, Dyemerre (h): 138, Fenzelaw (o): 176, Lemaire-Simonin (d): 238, Lawrance (h): 24, Gusinde (d): 136, Platzmann (a): 25 u. a. m.

[146] Diese Deutung teilt Bove (c): 155 in folgender Weise: „Entre ellos se llaman Jamana y hacia este nombre se sienten por los otros como superiores."

Nichts scheint deshalb so allseitig gerechtfertigt, als das einheimische Wort Yámana ganz ausschließlich zur Bezeichnung dieses südlichsten Feuerländerstammes zu verwenden. Im vorliegenden Werke geschieht es jedenfalls, wie ich dieserhalb auch in früheren Schriften folgerichtig mir gleich publiziert hin.[97]

Der Vollständigkeit halber bleibt schließlich noch zu erwähnen, daß einige Reisende zu Beginn des XIX. Jahrhunderts jene Eingeborenen nach dem Rufe yamanáhna betitelt haben, mit welchem letztere eben jeden Fremden bis zum Überdrusse anzusprechen pflegten. Diesen Anweg schlugen jene Europäer in Ermangelung einer sicheren Stammesbezeichnung ein; unbewußt wohl auch deshalb, weil das ununterbrochene Wiederholen des gleichen Wortes auf sie sehr belästigend wirkte. Man vermutete hinter ihm den Sinn: „Sei gütig, sei freigebig!" Gusinde: 362 und Martial: 30 sagen mit Hyades (q): 314 dafür: „Seyes généreux." Als Stammesname jedoch kommt dieses Wort ernstlich nicht in Betracht.

Rasmussen Feuerländer ist der einzige, dem wir entnehmen, daß den bei Isla Waterman im Dezember 1774 angetroffenen „wenigen Eingeborenen öfters das Wort 'Yrschrill' aus dem Munde kam" (Vgl. James Cook (b): 182). Die dortigen Indianer gehören zweifelsohne zu den Yamana und auch nur von dieser kleinen Gruppe wird berichtet, daß sie dieses Ruf angewendet haben. Ist der Ursprung dieses Wortes von vornherein unklar,[98] so bleibt m. E. als nächstliegende Möglichkeit, daß es sich von den südlichsten Halakwulup bis zu den westlichen bzw. südwestlichen Yamana verbreitet hat. Weil es aus früherer Zeit nur ein einziges Mal erwähnt wird und die von mir befragten Indianer es gar nicht kannten, ist zweifelsohne der Schluß berechtigt, daß der Ursprung dieses Wortes nicht hier im Yamana-Gebiete zu suchen sei (S. 57).

An dieser Stelle läßt sich passend einfügen, daß unsere Eingeborenen gleichzeitig mit den benachbarten Halakwulup als "Kanu-Indianer" und auch als "Wasserbewohner" bezeichnet werden, im Gegensatz zu den Selk'nam auf der Isla Grande, die man "Fuß-Indianer"[99] nennt. Beide Worte wollen und können keine Stammesnamen sein; sie geben nur schlaglichtartig die Grundform der Wirtschaft dieser und jener Gruppe, wodurch sie sich in auffallender Weise voneinander unterscheiden, zu erkennen.

[97] Die zahlreichen Quellenschriften, aus denen die verschiedenen Bezeichnungen der Stämme der Yamana zu entnehmen sind, hat Gusinde-I zusammengestellt. Vgl. auch Gusinde (b): 74.

[98] Die Fremdenanrede, welche von den Halakwulup der Selk'nam verwendet wird, trägt den gleichen Namen (Bd. I, 386). Auf Grund dieses ist der Erklärungsversuch von Gusinde (g): 29 unternommen worden. Vgl. auch die Bemerkungen Lamanon-Fleurieu's (d): 56.

[99] Bekanntlich nennen diese Ureinwohnerinnen von Feuerland (a): 132, Spöhr bei Bessere (1836: 137, 112, 1840) sie übersetzen, der "Ausdruck ist Fuß-Indianer" schreibt, auch bei Bulnes (Bd. I, 16, 1911) ist "Fuß-Indianer" (1896: 117, 182, 1919) bezeichnet er die Selk'nam (Bd. I, 16, 1911) als "Fuß-Indianer".

5. Stammesgruppen

Angesichts der zu allen Zeiten geringen Kopfzahl des gesamten Yamana-Volkes verzichtet man heute meist auf Aufteilung in Stammesgruppen, indem wird man bei Berücksichtigung der örtlichen Bedingungen seiner Heimat einen anderen bekennen. Innerhalb des langgestreckten Inselbereiches, den sie in ihrem geschichtlichen Einbruchsraum durchquerten, hat Mutter Natur selber da und dort hindernde Schranken aufgerichtet. Bekanntlich suchten sie auch Gegenhin den Südwestfuß der Isla Grande ab, ohne bis zur entwickelteren Lennox-Straße weiterzufahren. Nach Süden und Südwesten wagten sie sich über die Felsengeröller des Kap Horn und der Isla Hermite kaum je hinaus. Im Westen gehört Ihnen der letzte Ausläufer der Brookneck-Halbinsel eindringlich Halt; denn um ihn herumzufahren ist nur an dem einen oder anderen Tage des Jahres, an dem die dort immer bewegte See sich für wenige Stunden glättet, möglich. Was in dem umgrenzbaren Dreieck zwischen den genannten drei Eckpfeilern an Wasserarmen und Kanälen, an Eilanden und Inseln liegt, stand für den Aufenthalt der Kanus und für die Bärenjäger der Yamana offen.

Ebensowenig wie die einen spezifischen Stammesnamen gebraucht haben und sich mit Nachdruck eben nur als die Yámana, als die Menschen hier in diesem Gebiete bezeichnen, besitzen sie einen eigenen Namen für das Land, das ihnen zur Heimat geworden ist. Geographisch lassen sich leicht fünf Bezirke unterscheiden, in denen bestimmten Gruppen sich auch die gleiche Zahl von Dialektgruppen gebildet hat. Diese Bezirke wurden und werden durch Wasserläufe und durch Bergzüge der Landschaft voneinander abgesperrt, was jede einzelne zwingt, für sich allein zu stehen. Auf Grund dessen haben sich wenige Eigenheiten ausgebildet, die einer jede von ihrer unmittelbaren Nachbarin gemeinsam besitzen. Von allen gegenseitigen Abweichungen sind offensichtlich die dialektischen am größten. Demnach bestehe eine Aufteilung des gesamten Stammes einzig und allein nach den fünf Dialektgruppen zu Recht, die entsteht zu werden verdient. Aus Dialektmitteln dieses sind frühere anthropologischen Vermerke aufzuzeichnen wurden, die deshalb hier nicht ganz übergangen werden dürfen, weil sie zur Klarstellung mancher Verhältnisse heimatmäßig geeignet sind.

1. Die fünf Dialektgruppen

Die Inselwelt innerhalb des andern geschlossenen weitgegegenseitigen Umfängnisses Bild auf den ersten Blick ihre unterschiedlichen Gliederung erkennen. Die besonderen landschaftlichen Eigenart einer jeden der fünf Bezirke mag geringfügig und belanglos erscheinen; sie genügen vielleicht, um einige

 Im gleichen Sinne schreibt Gusinde (S. 172) daß „Brookneck Peninsula was a remarkable barrier to intercommunication between these two tribes (Yamana and Shiskwabapi). With an overall crowd of about hundred days of rain and snow and the other sixty-five sun pleasant, according to Emil Lumen the weather side of the bounding cliffs of Brookneck Peninsula was something which only the most daring or hardy ventured, and it was impossible for these canoe men to pass over the barren, mountainous summits beyond".

Sonderformen in das Kulturbild jeder einzelnen Gruppe einzufügen. Man erkennt darin die Auswirkung der unterschiedlichen Umwelt einer jeden Zone auf ihre jeweiligen Bewohner. Das unvermeidliche Abgeschlossensein der einzelnen Stammesgruppen voneinander hat am deutlichsten und tiefsten die Sprache beeinflußt und zur Entfaltung von den fünf Dialekten geführt.

Eine jede besitzt ihre auf geographischen Bedingungen begründete Selbständigkeit und deutlich erkennbare Eigenart. Von allen übrigen Inseln sondert sich auffällig die abgerundete Gesamtheit der Islas Wollaston ab. Überdies ist der von Südosten und von Südwesten her offene, breite Zugang zur Bahía Nassau nur selten gefahrlos zu überqueren. Die Wollaston-Bewohner bilden die Südgruppe der Yamana und heißen Yáhthinjáin, Yáhuidmalin, das Wort Yáhthin bedeutet Gruppe am mehreren Inseln bestehend. Die Genannten werden von den übrigen Landsleuten als besonders wild und gefährlich geschildert, ihnen ist auch die Mehrzahl schiffbrüchiger Europäer in die Hände gefallen. Gerade nahe dem Kap Horn sind so manche menschliche Fahrzeuge gestrandet, Wind und Wellen haben wiederholt Schiffstrümmer und verunglückte Seeleute gegen seine steilen Felsinseln getrieben. Zweifelsohne ist dieser und jener Europäer von den Eingeborenen umgebracht worden, den Anlaß zur Plünderung ganzer Schiffe wird man in jedem Einzelfalle nicht mehr mit Gewißheit ausfindig machen können. Das alles hat man jener südlichsten Yamana-Gruppe — und gleichzeitig damit ihren ganzen Stamm — auch bei den Europäern in sehr schlechter Beurteilung gestellt. Daß die Wollaston-Leute im allgemeinen eine charakterlich und sittlich niedrigere Stellung als die anderen Gruppen ihres Volkes eingenommen hätten, läßt sich zwar nicht erweisen; aber es ist nun einmal Tatsache, daß eine unbestimmte Furcht und eine unbegründete Abneigung sie verbindet mit der Gesamtgruppe, im Urteil der übrigen Landsleute, in dunklerem Lichte geschaut hat, als sie wirklich verdienten.

Wiederholt wurde mir gesagt, auf Isla L'Hermite hätte eine lange Reihe von Geschlechtern ohne das bekannte Kano gelebt. Erst im April 1922 erfuhr ich vom alten Pamu, wie es dazu gekommen ist, daß jene Leute das unentbehrliche notwendige Fahrzeug entbehren mußten. Die Bewohner der Isla L'Hermite waren mit ihren Nachbarn, den südlichen Wollaston-Leuten, in Streit geraten und ihrer Kanos beraubt worden. Mehreren Geschlechtern war es seitdem unmöglich, auf anderen Inseln überzusetzen, wo sie sich geeignete Rindenstücke hätten erwerben können. Denn da die Bäume auf Isla L'Hermite weniger gut gedeihen und nur in geringer Größe sich entwickeln, fehlt dort die für den Kanobau passende Rinde. Wiederholtemal waren sie darauf angewiesen, am Strande zu jagen und zu sammeln. Als nach längerer Zeit endlich einige Nachbarn sich auf Isla L'Hermite einfanden, ermöglichten sie es den dortigen Bewohnern wieder zu Fahrzeugen zu gelangen.[*]

[*] Entsprechendes sind die Worte gemäßen, wenn Fitz-Roy (a): 187 sagt: „Some of the families of this roving division of the Tekenika have no canoes, living constantly at a distance from the shore, and subsisting upon berries, birds-eggs, gleanings, and birds. The bows and arrows of these men are longer and heavier, and they have some very fine dogs, which Jenes Gebiet der Yamana, das sich nördlich der Isla Wellington, vom Längengrade 67° 30' bis zur La Maire-Straße erstreckt, gehört der Ona-gruppe, dem Indianerstamm. Das Indian, Indian bedeutet der Ona, entspricht. Es umfaßt die östliche Küste der Isla Navarino, angefangen vom Westrande der Bahía Windhund, verläuft am Canal Goree bis etwa zum Puerto Leiva auf dem Nordrande der gleichnamigen Insel. Außerdem das diesem Hafen gegenüberliegende Nordufer des Canal de Beagle bis zum Estrecho de Lemaire, einschließlich der Isla Gable, Isla Picton, Isla Nueva und Isla Lennox, sowie der benachbarten kleineren Inseln. Die östliche Ausdehnung der Ona-Yamana an die Bewohner der Isla Grande, wieso es zum Haus oder Sch'kaus, hatte nicht nur Verkehrsfolgen, sondern auch Handlungsmuster verursachende Gedankenfolgen zur Folge (Bd. I, 138). Hieraus Umstande muß man es zuschreiben, daß die Onaten sich von ihren übrigen Landsleuten weit abgesondert haben. Bemerkenswert ist, daß ihr Wohnsitz genau auf den Punkt fällt, bis zu welchem die Sch'kaus kam. Haus verzichtet sich am Canal de Beagle nach Westen vorgewagt haben. Daß die Onaten ein durchschnittlicher Körperwuchs die anderen Yamana-Gruppen überragten und daß sie zwischen mit Bogen und Pfeil ausgerüstet waren, bedarf nach den ohne genauere Anführungen weiterer Erklärung nicht mehr. Bildes aber hat den Anfall dazu, daß sie von ihren übrigen Stammesgenossen besonders gefürchtet wurden.

Vielen von der allgemeinen Furcht der übrigen Yamana-Gruppen vor den bedrohenden Sch'kaus mag unterwegs auf die Onaten übertragen worden sein, die sich dessenthalb in einiger Selbstüberhebung den Stolz und Zornesbeiwort übertragen fühlten. Vorzugsweise Überfälle pflegt auf diese Weise erklärt sich nun Glaubens zu den fast cosmopolitic Volk der Oldyamaiten. Mit unverhohlener Angst verfolgen sich die Leute der nördlichen und westlichen Gegenden auch heute immer noch von einem urbrüdigen Volke vom Schlage und von der Eigenart der Sch'kaus (vgl. Bd. I, 122 den Wort gibus, nördlich, gibus yámanas, Nordleute, d. h. Sch'kaus), das vor Jungerer Zeit im Innern der Isla Navarino gelebt haben soll. Es waren starke, kräftige, bedrohenden Menschen, ganz gleich den Sch'kaus, die sehr gewandt als alleinige Waffe ihre Bogen und Pfeile führten und sich in großer Menge aus Gummiwäldern einhüllten. Ihr Gesicht und ihr Körper, so weit es unbedeckt blieb, war ganz schwarz. Obwohl dieses Volk im Innern der Isla Navarino lebte, wagten sich mehrere Männer einst den Ufern an den Strand von, um einmalige Familien der Yamana zu überfallen und zu bestehlen. Eines Nachts, unter bei Wahrheit, hatten sie wieder die geringe Zahl der dort aufgeschlagenen Hütten überrumpelt und die Insassen getötet. Dabei gelang es einem Mädchen zu entkommen und sich vor den Mördern zu verbergen; aus seinem Versteck hörte es, wie diese sich unterhielten und was sie planten, weil sie in der Sprache der Yamana redeten. Als die Mörder wieder abgezogen waren, berichtete das Mädchen von Sah jene visiten Männer gestehen, wir haben uns gewiß nicht geschämt? Wir wollen hier nicht länger bleiben, wir gehen sofort weg und werden uns an einem sicheren Ort verstecken." Darüber beiten die Männer jene noch mehr und die beiden Frauen schämten sich. Sie eilgerten nicht, nahmen ihre Sachen, bestiegen schnell ihre Kamele und verbrten sie nächsten Stadt. Hier mußten sie sich im Dunkel der Wüste eine kleine, unscheinbige Hütte und bleiben sich verdingen.

Kurzer Zeit, nachdem jene beiden Weiber abgeführen waren, begaben sich die Leute im Lager dort zur Nachtruhe nieder. Doch war es nicht bald geworden um andere Morgen, als schon einige Männer und Weiber in aller Eile zur Zeit kamen, wo die beiden Frauen ihre Hütte heimlich aufgeschlagen hatten. Augenscheinlich und voller Scheuchen verkündeten sie diesen, daß mehrere viele gaste und starke Männer heimlich sich zum Lager hereingeschlichen und diesen einen mitgenommen. Unerhört heimlich hatten mit wenigen von diesen war es gelungen, hinüber zu entweichen und sich zu retten. Die engten jene beiden Frauen: „Das waren eben jene Männer, die wir am letzten Abend dort eben auf den Kamelen gesehen hatten, eben die Leute im Lager wollten es nun nicht glauben?

Nach zwei Tagen lehrten diese beiden Frauen mit den anderen Leuten, die hinüber sich geflüchtet hatten, heimlich zu ihrem früheren Lagerplatz zurück. Hier sahen sie all die Leichen ihrer Verwandten und Freunde herumliegen, sämtliches Besitztum war geraubt oder niedergebrannt. Sie weinten sie alle sehr. Sie engten sich jene: „Das waren jene Männer gewesen, die vor vierzehn Jahren, Frauen, herbeiholten, wandten, vergaben. Wie haben jene Weiber nicht glauben wollen und haben sie engen angeschrie?"

Der Ort, an dem Tamanna Abschiedlos wurden waren, heißt: Dawaiba (Ort), im Tuaz de Sanna Bana, kam vor der eigentlichen Augustinus Mission. Aber seit der Zeit hat man dort nie mehr jene Männer in größerer Anzahl gesehen."

Wiederholt bezeugte Gaumen, daß niemand an der Wahrheit dieser Begebenheit zweifle, die einzelne Leute der Ulâd-Sulaim-Leute dort diesem berichtet wurden waren. Geschichtlich hat sich auch der alte Wunsch wie eigenen Erlebnisse bestätigt. Es ist von gewisser Zeit gewesen um das Jahr 1900 durch den Tuaren der Ida Nawaiten gewandert. Plötzlich erblickte er von großer Entfernung zwei starke Männer jener Ersählerin Volkes. Diese blieben auf der Stelle, als sie seiner ansichtig wurden, stehen. Schnell er sich diesen näheren wollte, verschwanden beide in einem Versteck. Eilgst ging er seinen Wegen weiter und wandte nicht beachtigt. — Selbstverständlich habe ich Wunsch in seinem Glauben bestanden. Daß er einer Arbeitsübertragung erlegen war, bewirkt allein schon eine Bekanntgang, die mir der alte Tuaren gemacht hatte. Dieser versicherte nämlich, daß kein Tuaren es selber auf die Welt kam — vor 70 bis 80 Jahren, also zwischen 1850 und 1860 —, der Ersten Mann der Ulâd-Sulaim-Leute verschwunden und seitdem Leiner von diesen mehr gesehen worden wäre.

Aus der geschilderten Entwicklung geht mit großer Sicherheit hervor, daß die Ukhsymphos kein selbständiges Volk waren, daß vielmehr wohl verschiedenartige, wirkliche Überfälle der Gebiete, und in der Folgezeit Furcht und Angst vor den gleichen Geschehnissen, im Glauben der Zentralgruppe des ungeschulte Volk auf der Isla Navarino geschaffen haben. Daß sich ebenfalls dort eine größere Zahl von Menschen aufhielt, verhinderte die natürlichen Bedingungen; denn in geringer Entfernung von allen Küsten erhebt sich ein steiler Gebirgszug, der auf etwa 1300 m Höhe jedweden Bewuchs verliert und von da an den nackten Stein zeigt. Wegen dieser geologischen Bildung der Isla Navarino fehlt es dort im Sommer, auch wegen der sich anhäufenden gewaltigen Schneemassen im Winter, an jedweden Jagdtieren ganz und gar.

Die Sage vom Volke der Ukhsymphos mag folgendermaßen entstanden sein: Eine kleine Anzahl von Gelbsten drang weiter in das Gebiet der mittleren Yamana mit dickischen Abkömmen vor. Da sie neuerlich neuhen sich der Mittel zum Gemeinwohlen bedienten, begnen sie sich dieselben jetzt erst recht zu und, um nicht erkannt zu werden, bemalten sie sich den ganzen Körper mit Rückbildsmerkmale. Bogen und Pfeile wollten sie geschickt zu handhaben. Nach diesen Vorbereitungen erhielten sich etwa sechs oder acht Männer an den Lager dieser Nachbarn heran. Ihre Frauen und Kinder pflegten sie weit entfernt zurückzulassen, aber dieses dient wirklicher Absicht mitzunehmen. Vielleicht hatten sie von keine Wiggamp von den Belgen die einigen Sachen zusammengestellt, sich ein ganzes Stück, versteckte geschlichen und nahe dem fremden Lager durch Wirkung dieser Kleidung und Waffen, sowie durch Bemalen ihrer Körpers sich für den Überfall vorbereitet. Dann führten sie den geplanten Anschlag auf Leute aus, die ahnungslos in ihren Hütten saßen und auf eine unvorbereitete Verteidigung nicht vorbereitet waren. Daß diese Kinder ihre Opfer niederwarfen, lag in ihrem Plane, um von diesen nicht etwa erkannt und entlarvt zu werden. Was an brauchbaren Gegenständen sie nicht wegschleppen konnten, zerstörten sie durch Feuer. Bei diesen Vorgängen verkamen sie immer oder zumindest fast unerkannt. Deshalb erhielten sie ihre Kindesweise lange Zeit erfolgreich weiter. — Das dürfte der einzige Wahrheitskern jener Geschichte von den Ukhsymphos sein.

Man erinnert sich noch, daß jene Kinder einst ahnungslos am Südufer der Isla Navarino erhielten, hier aber von vielen Yamana überrascht und umgebracht wurden wären; mit jener Zeit habe man keinen von ihnen mehr wahrgenommen. Wenn sich dies zweigent haben soll und wer dabei beteiligt gewesen sei, weiß niemand.

Den ohne vorgeschlossen Gut-Lesenen ist die mittlere oder Zentralgruppe der Yamana bewohnt. Ihre Gegenzone liegt kaum vor der Isla Gable; Punta Divide, an der sich der Canal de Beagle in den nordwestlichen und in den südwestlichen Arm (Brazo Noberto und Brazo navarino) spaltet, bildet die Westgrenze. Sie gehören die beiden Ufer des Canal de Beagle, ferner nach Süden bis die Ausgrenzen Murray mit dem Estero Pomondy, einschließlich der Inseln Navarin und Hiber-Edwards, und endlich der Westufer der Isla Navarino bis hinunter zur Bahía Douglas mit der ihr vorgelagerten Isla Button. Den natürlichen Mittelpunkt dieser Landschaft bildet offensichtlich die Ushuaia-Gegend. Nach allen Seiten hin sind die Grenzen dieses Bezirkes deutlich bestimmt. Als allgemeine Bezeichnung für die Zentralgruppe der Yamana benutzt man Wáhinčgla. Daneben gibt es noch eine besondere Benennung für die Bewohner des ganzen langen Nordufers des Canal de Beagle, nämlich Wéjemančgla, bzw. Wéjemandéjalinančgla; für die Leute an der Bahía Lapataia Lapatéjalinančgla, für jene in der Ushuaia-Gegend Ushuéjalinančgla, für jene um die Bahía Yendegaia Yendegéjalinančgla, für die Bewohner der Angostura Murray Yagaingandéjalinančgla bzw. Yagandéjalinančgla und Yáhalanančgla; für die Bewohner des Estero Ponsonby Agéjalinančgla. Diese Benennungen sind Wortbildungen mit den geographischen Bezeichnungen für jeden einzelnen Bezirk.

Zwischen Punta Divide und dem äußersten Vorsprung der Halbinsel Brecknock, also in einer Ausdehnung von wenig mehr als drei Breitengraden, bewegt sich die W e s t g r u p p e der Yamana. Bis zu die sturmgepeitschten, außenliegenden Inseln dringen sie nur selten vor; wohl aber befahren sie die Bahía Cook bis nahe zu dem Cabo Kekhlao auf der Halbinsel Clouet herum, halten sich indes den Außenküsten der Inseln Londonderry fern. Als die Inalumčgla, seltener Inalumandéjalinančgla bezeichnet man sie. Von den anderen Stammesgruppen werden sie gefürchtet, wohl deshalb, weil man sie den gefährlichen Halakwulup teilweise verbündet glaubt, teilweise sogar für diese hält.

An fünfter Stelle endlich ist die S ü d w e s t g r u p p e, die der Halamčgla zu nennen. Ihr gehört die ausgedehnte Inselwelt, die sich vom Cabo Kekhlao in der Bahía Cook zum Cabo Falso de Hornos und von da bis hinauf zum Südrande der Isla Milne-Edwards gegenüber der Bahía Douglas erstreckt. Von diesen Eingeborenen ist bekannt, daß sie sich bis zu die außenliegenden Inseln im Süden vorwagen. Um das Cabo Falso de Hornos sind sie wohl nie herumgefahren, dafür aber benützen sie an schmalen Stellen zweier sich nahelegender Buchten kurze Landübergänge, auf denen sie ihre Kanoe mitschleifen. Die Leute an der Halbinsel Hardy sind als die Ufyérapančgla, die am Seno Año Nuevo und westlich davon als die Hatuwéjalinančgla bekannt. Endlich gehören noch zur Südwestgruppe die Leute am Südufer der Isla Navarino, angefangen vom südlichen Ausgange der Bahía Douglas bis zum Westrande der Bahía Windhond, die Wanaiggančgla, die nur wenige zählen. Von anderen Mitgliedern der gleichen Südwestgruppe findet sich äußerst selten eine Familie an dieser ungeschützten Navarino-Küste ein, weil sie nur spärlichen Holzbestand und wenige Seetiere aufweist, mag auch die Jagd auf Guanacos hier immer ergiebig sein.

Aus den beiden erstgenannten Benennungen geht hervor, daß die weitverzweigte Südwestgruppe in zwei Abteilungen zerfällt, und zwar infolge der naturbedingten Verhältnisse. Die Hatuwéjalinančgla verkehren zwischen dem Ostrande der südlichen Bahía Cook und dem Seno Año Nuevo. Hinter den vielen Inseln, zumal im Seno Año Nuevo selber, bietet sich ihnen ein günstiger Aufenthalt; hier finden sie sicheren Schutz gegen Stürme und Meeresströmungen sowie reichliche Nahrungsmittel. Offensichtlich weniger glücklich sind die Ufyárugumájala gestellt, die nördlich der Peninsula Hardy die weite Bahía Nassau vor sich sehen und südlich von dieser Halbinsel bis zur Isla Duperré am Osteingang zum Seno Año Nuevo nur spärliche Deckung finden. Beide Abteilungen dieser Südwestgruppe verkehren seit alterher nur wenig miteinander. Von den Westleuten aber bleiben sie scharf getrennt; denn es wäre ein gefährliches Wagnis, die offene Bahía Cook zu überqueren, an deren Ostufer immer eine starke Dünung hochgeht.

Sucht man nach den Gründen dieser Aufteilung des Yamana-Stammes in fünf Gruppen, so geben allein die tiefen Einschnitte des Ozeans in die langgezogene Inselwelt eine ausreichende Antwort. Höchstens an dem und jenem Tage während des Jahres, wenn überhaupt einmal, ist es für die Bewohner des Wollaston-Archipels möglich, die offene, breite See zu den Südleuten oder gar zu den Ostleuten hin zu überqueren. Die gleichen Behinderungen stellen sich zwischen die Süd- und Westleute. Wenn die Zentralgruppe sich bei Punta Divide gegen die Westleute und vor Isla Gable gegen die Ostleute abschließt, so dürfte dafür eine gesellschaftliche Rücksicht maßgebend sein: denn sie betrachtet jene als den Halakwulup verbündet und diese als im Verkehr mit den gefürchteten Selk'nam stehend.

Infolge der immerwährenden Absperrung der einen Gruppe von der anderen bildeten sich dialektische Verschiedenheiten heraus, die da und dort einen größeren oder geringeren Grad erreicht haben. Nur die sprachliche Abweichung der Hatawáijalájala von den Ufyárugumájala ist so gering, daß man beide in die eine Südwestabteilung zusammenschließen muß. Somit bleiben fünf Sprachgruppen bestehen.

Auf der Dialektentwicklung also beruht der eigentliche und tiefgehende Unterschied, welcher jede der geographisch getrennten Abteilungen deutlich kennzeichnet. Demnach ist man nur berechtigt, von fünf Dialektgruppen zu sprechen;[232] die Abweichungen nämlich der einen von der anderen wirtschaftlicher und gesellschaftlicher Art sind gegenüber den sprachlichen unbedeutend und nebensächlich. Einige wenige seien hier genannt. Am auffälligsten ist der Gebrauch von Bogen und Pfeil sowie von Mänteln aus Guanacofellen bei den Ostleuten; diese weisen im Durchschnitt überdies eine etwas höhere Körpergröße auf, wohl wegen vereinzelter Heiraten mit Selk'nam. Die Wollaston-Leute nähren sich von Muscheln, die an ihren Inseln eine außerordentliche Größe erreichen, weit mehr, als die Leute im Zentrum, die [232] Thomas Bridges, der sich mit jahrzehntelangem Eifer der Erforschung der Yamana-Sprache erfolgreich gewidmet hat, stieß schon ziemlich früh auf die bestehenden dialektischen Unterschiede (Vgl. seinen Brief vom 26. August 1863, in VSA: XI, 27; 1864), doch ist er in seinen vielen schriftlichen Mitteilungen weder zu einer genauen Aufstellung der Zahl noch zu einer deutlichen geographischen Abgrenzung der Gruppen gelangt. Erst mit der wertvollen Hilfe von Fred Lawrence und seiner Gattin Nellie ist mir dies anläßlich 1923 gelungen (Vgl. Gusinde [d]: 17), was weiter unten nochmals zur Sprache kommen wird.

eifriger den Vögeln und Seesäugetieren nachjagen. Die Yamana im Westen bevorzugen neben den großen Krabben noch die Seigel, welch letztere im Gebiete der Ostleute sehr spärlich sind. Neben all dem stößt man noch auf geringe Unterschiede in der Kleidung, insofern die Zentralgruppe die Felle von Seelöwen leichter erreicht, während von den Leuten des Südens, Südwestens und Westens die schöneren Felle vom Seehär und vom Fischotter, die sie sich bequem zu verschaffen wissen, bevorzugt werden.

Demungeachtet fühlen alle Abteilungen eine gewisse Zusammengehörigkeit und betrachten sich als ein selbständiges Volk. Tatsächlich fehlt es nicht am Wechselverkehr einzelner Familien aus verschiedenen Gruppen, so sehr derselbe auch auf außergewöhnliche Anlässe und sehr seltene Gelegenheiten beschränkt bleibt. Innerhalb der Grenzen der eigenen Abteilung erfreut sich jeder selbstverständlich uneingeschränkter Bewegungsfreiheit, wo er nach Belieben jagen und fischen, landen und wohnen kann. Die naturgegebenen Behinderungen und das bewußte Absperren des Verkehrs der Vertreter aus diesem und jenem Gebiete sind nicht überall gleich. Das Westufer der Halbinsel Cloué beispielsweise wird sehr gefürchtet; deshalb kommen die Westleute mit den Haturáialinájala äußerst selten in Berührung, mögen sie auch noch so oft im Brazo suroeste bis zu dessen Einmündung in die Bahía Cook vordringen. Den letztgenannten Inalumájala fehlt zudem ein allzüglicher Antrieb, ihr engeres Heimatgebiet zu verlassen, wo sie reichliche Nahrung und allen weiteren Bedarf für einen gesicherten Lebensunterhalt finden; sie stehen sich vergleichsweise in jeder Hinsicht weit besser als die übrigen Teile ihres Volkes. Am schlechtesten kommen zweifelsohne die Yéikálinájala weg, die dem unaufhaltsamen, wüsten Toben der Naturgewalten nach allen Seiten hin schutzlos ausgesetzt sind. Selten nur landen Kanus an der langgezogenen Südküste der Isla Navarino; denn obwohl die Jagd auf zahlreiche Guanaqos dorthin einladet, fehlt jeder Schutz gegen die offene Bahía Nassau.

Geschichtlich steht fest; daß die Abgeschlossenheit der einzelnen Gruppen gegeneinander vor einigen Jahrzehnten zur Gründung einer eigenen Missionsstation in der Bahía Tekenika zwang. Weil nämlich die Bewohner der Wollaston-Inseln und der Südwestgegend unentwegt den Missionaren in Ushuaia fernblieben, sahen sich die letzteren gezwungen, jene Eingeborenen in ihrer engeren Heimat aufzusuchen. Die Mehrzahl der wenigen heute noch lebenden Yamana entstammen dem Süden und Südwesten.

Die hier dargelegte Aufteilung des Yamana-Stammes in fünf Dialektgruppen mit eigenen Grenzen verdanke ich vorwiegend Franz Lawrence[] und meinen zu seiner Mitteilungen sich anschließenden Aussprachen mit seiner Gattin Nelly und mit älteren Eingeborenen während meines vierten Aufent-[] Gleichfalls macht Lawrence (b): 130 auf diese fünf dialektisch geschiedenen Abteilungen mit ihrer geographischen Lagerung aufmerksam und beruft sich dabei auf den nämlichen Franz Lawrence, den er etwa ein Jahr nach meinem Weggange dorthin bringt hat. Seine Angaben allerdings lassen viel an Genauigkeit zu wünschen übrig. Vgl. "Antiquity of the Yahgan dialects" in Lawrence (b): 1-6.

halten darstellbar i. J. 1922. Bereits zu Anfang 1922, nachdem erstmalig Koppers (a): 19 eine eigener Beobachtung auf dialektische Verschiedenheiten im Yamana gestoßen war, hatten wir diesen Gegenstand erörtert, allerdings viel zu flüchtig und ohne die Hilfe erfahrener Indianer. Damals hatte Fritz Lawrence nur vier Dialektgruppen namhaft gemacht; später gestand er sein Versehen offen ein und half mit, den wirklichen Sachverhalt klarzustellen.[...]

2. Andere Einteilungsversuche

Angesichts der erweisbar richtigen und genauen Gliederung des gesamten Yamana-Volkes in fünf Dialektgruppen genügt es, die Vermutungen und Bemühungen früherer Reisender in Kürze zu erwähnen. Die betonten Unterschiede und die versuchte Aufteilung der Yamana, von denen die Seefahrer der ältesten Zeit sprechen, sind von vornherein nicht ernst zu nehmen. Ihnen kamen jeweilig anmahnende ganz wenige Familien an dieser und jener Stelle, die oft weit voneinander entfernt lagen, zu Gesicht; sehr geringfügige Sonderformen Tieren ihnen deshalb stark auf und diese haben sie in ihren Tagebüchern weit über die Wirklichkeit hinaus hervor.[...]

Seit mehreren Jahrzehnten wurden die Mitteilungen über die im Volksganzen der Yamana bestehenden Abteilungen etwas bestimmter.[...] Der erste ernstere Versuch geht auf Fitz-Roy (a): 132 zurück, der eine allgemeine Verteilung der Eingeborenenstämme des südlichen Südamerika geben wollte. Die eigentlichen feuerländischen Völkerschaften wären, je nach den Gewässern, die er für dieselben gezogen hat, die Yaruin-kunny oder "foot people",[...] dann „westward of these people, separated from them by a ridge of mountains, a tribe called Kay-nahr, Kay-yna, or Kay-es", also unsere Yamana (S. 96), und endlich schiebt er zwischen diese letzteren und die Chonos noch die „Pay-yna, living on the sea-coast", sie, ähnlich die mittlere Schicht[...] der [...] Viel zu wenig wird dem Urteil, das der maßgebende Bessere (d): 289 in dieser Hinsicht über den gesamten Yamana-Bestand mitgeteilt hat, berücksichtigt: „Among them are great differences of appearance, manners, dwellings and language." Dergleichen individuelle Eigenheiten und Sonderentwicklungen halten sich jedoch innerhalb der Variationsbreiten, wie sie einem Volke von der geographischen Ausdehnung und von der unwirtlichen Kopfzahl unserer Yamana unterstellen werden müssen.

[...] Was hierüber Bessere Anatu (b): I. 39, Bove (c): 158, Hyades (j): 148, Lista (k): 66 und Bessereau (e): 160 mitgeteilt haben, ist bedeutungslos.

[...] Zum ersten Male taucht hier die Bezeichnung "Fellfischer" für die Selk'nam und auch für die Patagonier auf, als Gegensatz zu den "Kanoefischern", womit die Yamana und Halakwulup, vielleicht auch die Chonos gemeint sind. Beide Bezeichnungen hat später Thomas Bessere in seinen vielen Schriften vollständig gemacht. Schon S. 198 ist davon gesprochen worden.

[...] Auch die Halakwulup zerfallen in drei geographisch gesonderte Zweige. Vergleiche Gusinde (a): 220.

Haiskwalup.[...] Sich selber ergänzend erwähnt er als südlich von den Yaruma-Anuny wohnend nochmals „the tribe formerly called Kay-ahoo, now probably the Tekeenika". Mag er sich auch hier wenig bestimmt ausdrücken, eine dreifache Unterabteilung kann man für seine "Tekeenika" doch herauslesen; auf Einzelheiten innerhalb einer jeden derselben geht er nicht ein.[...] Zu genauerer Abgrenzung sind erst spätere Seefahrer gelangt.

Mit geringer Abweichung von den Aufstellungen Fitz-Roy's nennt Parker Snow sieben Volksstämme und bezeichnet die Bewohner der Isla Grande statt Yaruma-Anuny glattweg als Oenenen. Diese Bezeichnung, bzw. Oena, allerdings ohne solch bestimmte Anwendung, hatte bereits Fitz-Roy (a): 205, 215 und auch Darwin gebraucht. Schon hier sei vorweggenommen, daß man gewiß nicht fehlgeht, wenn man, im Urteile unserer Stammes selber, jene gefürchteten Oena-enen als die östliche Gruppe der Yaruma betrachtet.

Der eben genannte Snow (a): I, 346 hat als erster nicht allein auf Unterschiede in der Körperbilde der Yaruma aus verschiedenen Gebieten[...] berechtigterweise hingewiesen, sondern auch mit gewisser Bestimmtheit dialektische Verschiedenheiten im Osten und in der Wulaia-Gegend, wo dergleichen wirklich bestehen, aufgedeckt. Er schreibt: „I found that the Tekeenika column of words in the vocabulary contained in Capt. Fitz-Roy's appendix to his narrative, is the correct key; and by it therefore, so far as it goes communication can be held with the natives in those parts, though not with the Yappo Tekeenika at Banner Cove [auf Isla Picton] and neighbourhood" (VP: III, 68; 1856). Nachdem die englischen Missionare die sprachliche und auch kulturelle Verschiedenheit der Yaruma von den benachbarten Selk'nam und Haiskwalup erkannt hatten,[...] ist es auch Bennett gelungen, unabhängig von Snow und mit Hilfe des Katechisten Oenenen, die dialektischen Abweichungen der westlichen von der östlichen Abteilung ausfindig zu machen.[...] Bei allem Fleiß und unermüd-[...] Folgendermaßen schreibt: „As regards the manner of these natives, I can only say, that I found a difference, both at Banner Cove, Lennox Island, and Beagle Channel, to what I had expected." (Diese Beobachtung ist bald durch die richtig berichtigt worden (S. 190).

[...] Wahrlich Stammes der gleiche Fitz-Roy (a): 180 mit den Schooe-koonoy meint, die südlich von den Kay-ahoo angesiedelt seien, soll in Band III dieses Werkes übergeordnet werden. Auf den hier geschilderten Einteilungsversuchen basiert T. Parkers eigene Völkerkarte auf. Vgl. Lamaison-Vernaux (b): 18.

[...] Zum gleichen Ergebnis ist auch Lamaison-Vernaux (b): 19 auf Grund von Fitz-Roy's Bericht gelangt.

[...] Schon 1859 äußerte sich Dumas (VP: VI, 82; 1859) dahin wie bestimmt. Der Chef Jokes spricht, am 24. August 1863, schreibt Bennett aus Gennesse (VPA: XI, 17; 1863) noch deutlicher: „I have good reason to believe that three distinct languages only are spoken in the archipelago of Tierra del Fuego, viz., the language we are now learning, which is spoken in the southern division, the Alikoolip spoken in the north-western division, and the language of the Fuegian Indians, who are confined to Tierra del Fuego."

[...] Allerdings hat Fitz-Roy (a): I selber die ersten Andeutungen an einer dialektischen Verschiedenheit gemacht. Die Leute vom Christmas Sound, die als Gäste eingeladen worden waren, hatten ihm an Bord über die Bewohner der südlichen Küste von Isla Navarino und den gegenüberliegenden Ufern erzählt, daß sie ihre Feinde seien „and that they spoke of a different language".

Eifer, mit dem Bridges das Studium der Yamana-Sprache betrieben hat, mußte er unausweichlich auf die wirklich vorhandenen Dialekte stoßen[205] und in seinem umfangreichen Dictionary sind einer guten Anzahl von Wörtern die Bemerkungen "East dialect" oder "South dialect" u. ä. angefügt. Demgegenüber befremdet es berechtigterweise, daß jener zuverlässige Kenner dieser Indianersprache sich an keiner Stelle seiner vielen schriftlichen Mitteilungen eindeutig und klar über die dialektische Verzweigung des Yamana-Volkes ausgesprochen hat. Erwiesenermaßen sind ihm dergleichen sprachliche Abweichungen zum Bewußtsein gekommen; im besonderen indes hat er sich dazu nirgends geäußert und hob nur wenige Unterschiede anderer Art hervor, ohne eine deutliche Scheidung durchzuführen oder die bestehenden Grenzen zu nennen.[206] Weil Bridges überall mit vollem Recht als einziger und maßgebender Gewährsmann in Sachen der Yamana-Sprache galt und er in unerklärlicher Weise den bestehenden Dialekten keine nennenswerte Aufmerksamkeit schenkte, ging die übrige Welt der Sprachwissenschaftler und Ethnographen arglos daran vorüber. Darum erklärt es sich, daß es erst mir im Jahre 1923 vorbehalten war, die fünf Gruppen des Yamana-Volkes mit ihrer genauen geographischen Umgrenzung endgültig zu bestimmen.

Eine eigene Gliederung der Yamana, die vorwiegend ihre körperliche Gestalt berücksichtigt,[207] hat Fuegino (r): 176 versucht. Er meint, „there seem to have been among them four principal groups. These are the Beagle Channel and Murray Narrows group, who are the best formed; the Lennox Islanders, big-headed, ugly, powerful men; the Southwesterns, about Hoste Island, the most warlike and murderously inclined; and the Wollaston Islands group, the most wretched and most dwarfish".[207] Die gezeichnete [206] Gelegentlich betont er nämlich geringfügige Unterschiede einzelner Gruppen in der Lautbildungsweise und schreibt z. B. am 1. Sept. 1880 (MM: XIV, 196; 1880): „The natives of the outer coasts of Tierland consider the natives of the inner waters inferior to themselves, because they live more upon vegetable food, and eat the cockle fish, all which they despise. On the other hand the natives of the inner coasts (not ocean coasts) called Wiiscoooofo Ou., creek men), despise the Atiolmanalu (or ocean coast men), because they eat cockle and such things, which they consider unfit for food, and because of their strange brogue, which they are much given to imitate derisively." In Mißachtung oder Unkenntnis der viel tiefer einschneidenden Dialektverschiedenheit läßt er also ganz selbstverständlich als unterscheidendes Merkmal nur die "belvedrische Mundart" der einen Bevölkerungsteile gelten.

[205] Im Anhang des vorhin angeführten Briefes fügt Bridges noch hinzu: „The natives we found at Picton Island perfectly understood Ouanana, but they spoke a different dialect to him."

[207] Auf weitreichende Unterschiede in der Körperbildung hatte Parker Snow (a): I, 246; Jahre früher aufmerksam gemacht. Später berichtete Dumont (VP: III, 69; 1856): „The whole tribe [der Wulaia-Gegend] around us inferior in physical qualities to those to the Beagle Channel and eastward." All diese Angaben beziehen sich auf bedeutungslose Einzelerscheinungen.

[207] Nach dieser Darstellung wäre neben körperlichen Abweichungen die geographische Verteilung der Unterschiede bei den einzelnen Gruppen. In unverkennbarem Gegensatz dazu betont der gleiche Fuegino (j): 7 an anderer Stelle, daß die „Yahgans comprised four Charakteristik ist zumindest unvollständig, teilweise offensichtlich unrichtig, da nach dem von ihm selber aufgestellten "migratory principle" jene Wollaston-Leute als „the weaker are forced south".[108] Sprachliche Unterschiede hat auch FURLONG nicht erkannt; er wiederholt nur mit unnötiger Weitschweifigkeit, was BRIDGES an linguistischen Arbeiten geleistet hat.

Bestimmter im Ausdruck als die Genannten sind BARCLAY (a): 63, HAHN (a): 804, MARTIAL: 129, 208 und SERGAERDS: 162; denn sie nennen kurzerhand zwei Dialektgruppen. Angesichts dessen nimmt sich die abwehrende Haltung eines HYADES (p): 339 und (j): 149 merkwürdig aus; man könnte fast von einer Erziferung seinerseits jenen gegenüber sprechen: „Je crois nécessaire d'exprimer les réserves les plus formelles au sujet de l'opinion émise par le Dr. HAHN ... d'après laquelle les Tekeruika ou Yahgan se diviseraient en plusieurs branches, dont l'une, appelée Atdamilirua, vivrait dans le New-Year's Sound, et aurait été étudiée à la baie Orange [par la Mission SCHMITSQUE]. J'ai vu, en effect, à la mission, et j'ai pu observer plusieurs individus provenant du New-Year's Sound, d'une baie appelée Atdamaya ... mais ils ne formaient nullement, pour moi, une tribu dans les Yahgan, ou bien il faudrait subdiviser les Tekeruika en autant de tribus qu'il y a de localités fréquentées de préférence par quelques groupes d'indigènes." Damit je kein Zweifel über seine an sich deutliche Meinung aufkomme, fügt er hinzu: „Il est certain qu'ils n'ont pas de nom particulier pour désigner leur pays ni leur race. Ils disent bien: les gens de la baie Packsaddle, Pamkrouaya yamana, du Pennsuly Sound, Aamakouarke yamana; mais à peu près comme nous ferions dans une ville en parlant de tel quartier ou de telle rue."[109] Freilich benennt sich jede Einzelperson nach ihrem Geburtsorte und jede Familiengemeinschaft nach der von ihr bevorzugten Gegend; diese allgemein herrschende Gewohnheit hat jedoch nichts mit den Grenzen der großen Dialektgruppen zu tun. HYADES hat somit durch sein irriges Bemühen die fortschreitende Forschung bedenklich aufgehalten.

Wer sind nun die von den Zentral-Yamana, besonders von den Bewohnern der Augustus Murray-Gegend so sehr gefürchteten Oens'men? Zuerst hat FITZ-ROY (a): 205, 225 diese Oens erwähnt, bald darauf PARKER SNOW und später manchen englische Missionare. Nach der gebräuchlichen Auffassung der family groups". Demzufolge würde das Band der Verwandtschaft den Zusammenhalt der einzelnen Gruppen bedingen. Bereits DAMMER (b): 170 hat im vorhinein mit guter Begründung derjenigen unseiner Aufstellungen abgewiesen.

[108] Zwar bezeichnet sich CORNEUS: 1, die von FURLONG (r): 136 und die von BRIDGES (d): 200 vorgenommene Einteilung auf die gleiche Linie zu bringen, indem er schreibt: „The considerable differences noted by Prof. FURLONG correspond with that the Rev. Mr. BRIDGES remarked regarding the noticeable individual and local differences in the Yahgan's physical appearance and culture." Das wirklich Trennende jedoch sind, wie ich es an anderer Stelle begründet habe, nur die Dialektverschiedenheiten, die von keinem der beiden Beobachter gewürdigt worden sind.

[109] Die gleiche Ansicht sprach HYADES (l): 710 noch an anderer Stelle aus, wo er sich auf BRIDGES (WM: XVIII, 224; 1883) berufe, ohne indes bestimmt richtig zu verstehen.

zentralen und westlichen Yamana ist die Ostgruppe ihrer eigenen Landsleute gemeint, obwohl ursprünglich damit die im Südosten der Isla Grande wohnhaften Selk'nam bzw. Haus bezeichnet wurden.

Eine dem naheliegende Vermutung hat bereits Snow (a): II, 12 ausgesprochen, hielt er doch jene Eingeborenen, die östlich der Augustus Murray vom Nordufer des Canale de Beagle her — im Gegensatz zu jenen, die vom Südufer dieses Kanals, d.h. von der nördlichen Navarino-Küste her — an sein Schiff herzuruderten, für die "dreaded Ona's-men".[100] Gewiß, man findet diesen Namen auf die Selk'nam bzw. Haus angewendet, weil beispielsweise ein solch gewichtiger Gewährsmann wie Jemmy Button selber in seinem Ausagen sich nicht gleich blieb.[101] Auf ihn sich berufend und vielleicht auch die Erfahrungen des Missionars J.G. Phillips verwertend,[102] vertritt Dumont (VP: VI,82; 1859) die „Ona men on the main-island", nämlich auf die Isla Grande. Der genannte Indianer hat, wie Snow erguet, „when in England, stated that this tribe [die zentralen Yamana] was always at war with the Ona's men", mit denen hier nur die östliche Abteilung seiner Volksgenossen gemeint sein kann. An dieser Deutung hat er auch einige Jahrzehnte später noch festgehalten. Wegen des mörderischen Überfalles auf den Katechisten J.G. Phillips und seine Begleiter in Wulaia, am 6. November 1859, wurde ein gerichtliches Verhör aufgenommen, in dem es heißt: „The massacre is attributed by Jemmy Button wholly to the Ona's men ... We feel convinced that the Ona's men were the real movers in the matter" (VP: VII, 121; 1860).[103] Jemmy Katechist, einer der Opfer in jener Metzelei, hatte ein Jahr vorher, am 1. Januar 1859 geschrieben, daß bei der Abfahrt des Missionsschiffes "Allen Gardiner" dort in Wulaia drei Eingeborene für Isla Keppel an Bord genommen wurden, „who [100] Unklar bleibt Snow in seiner Erklärung trotzdem, weil er auch die Bewohner der Grados Insel zu den "Onaemen" rechnet, was man vielleicht auch auch bei späteren Schriftstellern findet. Z.B. schreibt Stanner (MM: XVI, 115; 1869) von "Onaemen or Foot Indians".

[101] Fitz-Roy (a): 224 schreibt: „Jemmy told us that these Ona-men crossed over the Beagle Channel, from eastern Tierra del Fuego, in canoes which they seized from the Yapus Tekenika. To avoid being separated they fastened several canoes together, crossed over in a body, and when once landed, travelled over-land and came upon his people by surprise, from the heights behind Woollya. Jemmy asserted that he had himself killed one of his companions."

[102] Er sagte bereits am 30. Dezember 1858 die „Ona's-men a neighbouring tribe", die im Kano nach Wulaia gekommen waren (C. W. Phillips: 144). Nach Phillips (a): 1018 sind der „Ona-Leute von der Lennox Insel, einer benachbarten Bemannung, welcher gelegentlich Besuch in Wulaia abstattete".

[103] Im Colonial Secretary's Office auf den Falkland Inlands schrieben Jemmy Button am 12. März 1860 u.a.: „Ona's country men killed Captain Fitz; all come to Patagonians, here and never men. My country is small channel, others from big women; my country at Woollya, there never Patagonia" (VP: VII, 136; 1860). Wie können wir viele Selk'nam bzw. Haus-Leute in die Wulaia-Gegend kommen lassen, ohne eine große Zahl von Wasserfahrzeugen zu besitzen? Allen erklärt sich sofort und sehr leicht, wenn man als "Onaemen" die östliche Abteilung der Yamana annimmt. — Die hier abgebildeten Schreibweise jener Eigennamen ist beibehalten.

are of the Ona's men, living chiefly on Lennox Island and about Good Success Bay". In die begrifflichen Grenzen, die unsere westlichen Yamana der Bedeutung jenes Namens ziehen, passen die Selk'nam bzw. Haus nicht hinein; eben deshalb nicht, weil diesen beiden Stämmen Kanus und andere Wasserfahrzeuge fehlen. Indes, wegen gewisser Beziehungen der Ost-Yamana mit den Bewohnern der Isla Grande, haben Europäer zuweilen beide unterschiedslos als die Onamen angegeben; doch das geschah zu einer Zeit, in der man sich der Stammesunterschiede bei den Feuerländern noch nicht bestimmt bewußt war.

Für die Herleitung dieses Wortes fehlt jeder geschichtliche Anhaltspunkt, eine sprachliche Deutung indes liegt nicht so fern. Die letzten Zutaten, ona und mon, werden auf englische Berichterstatter oder Fragestellen zurückgehen; dann ist es nicht unbeweisbar, in ona einen Zusammenhang mit gôna zu vermuten. Sollte das wirklich zutreffen, gelangen wir auf diesem Wege zu dem bereits bekannten Ergebnis. Die Yamana bezeichnen ihre hochgewachsenen Nachbarn auf der Isla Grande, die Selk'nam und Haus, als die gôna-yémana, die Nordleute, und die Gebiete des Canal de Beagle als gôn-eléyan, der nördliche Wasserarm (Bd. I, 122).

In dieser Deutung unterstützt mich Dumont (b): 717, der schreibt: „Natives of the large island [Isla Grande] — called Ou-e-na Thin-en, anglicised Onemen, coming from Ouv-ondin-ouker" [gôndin ôkin, nördliche Insel]. In BD: 10 finden sich ana, the Fuegian Indians. Gewiß sind darunter mit Onamen zunächst die Falklandinsel gemeint,[] aber auch die östlichen Yamana. Aus der Ferne den mittleren und westlichen Yamana-Gebieten wurden jene beiden Abteilungen an ihre Bevölkerungsmasse weniger streng auseinander gehalten und wirkliche Überfälle von Leuten aus dem Osten konnten nur von den Indianerjägern, die Kanus besaßen, ausgeführt werden.[] So spricht vieles dafür, daß in der näheren Vorstellung jener Eingeborenen mit den Onamen fast ausschließlich die Ost-Yamana gemeint sind. Überfälle dieser letzteren wurden der Anlaß, um ihnen den Phantasiegebilde des Ulôfyamana-Volkes zu schaffen.

Viel zu spät ist das Bestehen von fünf deutlich getrennten Dialektgruppen der Yamana erkannt worden, um jetzt noch die sprachlichen Eigenarten einer jeden darstellen, neben einigen wenigen auf dem Gebiete der wirtschaftlichen und gesellschaftlichen Ordnung, sogar in der Grundwerk, vollständig und sicher herausarbeiten. Die wenigen Überlieferungen der ganzen Yamana-Stämme aus allen Teilen ihres Gebietes haben sich in den letzten Jahrzehnten mehr oder weniger eng zusammengeschlossen; bei diesem andauernden gegen-

[] Bei BD: 300 finden sich: ewiyo for ona of the natives of New Fleuse and neighbouring islands and main.

[] Aus Dumont's Berichten (b): 717 Water skills on islands Ona, which did also Onamen, called by natives, Yaruki, coast down upon canoes, bring on the shores of Wardsbrown (Beagle Channel), bow and sometimes kill them, and take away their wives, but they do not, as supposed, cross the channel to Navarin Island, as they have no skill or confidence in canoes".

einigen Versuche ging ihre sprachliche Eigenart verloren. Nur durch Fragen, die zuweilen unendlich beantwortet werden, läßt sich andeutungsweise ein Bild der früheren Wirklichkeit entwerfen.[]

c. Allgemeine Körperform

Kaum je dürfte ein Naturvolk so einstimmig von vielen Beobachtern in den empfindlichsten, je bei widerlichen Farben gezeichnet worden wie die Yamana. Würde man zu diesem Bilde noch den trüben Hintergrund zugesellen, den die trostlose, wilde und unbeständige Natur, in die dieses Volk hineingestellt ist, abgibt, und der greift seine unerfreulichen Schatten auf die Bewohner selber wirft,[] man würde nicht viel zum Vorteile dieser gewinnen. Sie würden um so mehr erschreckend abstoßend, wenn man Gelegenheit hätte, kaum vorher die schlanken Gestalten, die vornehmen Gesichtszüge und das sicheren Selbstbewußtsein in Gang und Gebärde der benachbarten Selk'nam zu bewundern.[*]

Das einzelnige Urvolk aller Seefahrer und Reisenden seit der Entdeckungszeit bis in unsere Tage verkörpert wird Wirklichkeit und liefe sich trotz übereinstimmender Vorbilder für dieses stillstehende Volk auf der Erde nicht von der Welt schaffen. James Cook (s.): 99, der in sein Reisework die Zeichnung von einem Yamana-Mann aufgenommen hat (Abb. 11), beurteilt diesen Indianerstamm unter zweifacher Rücksicht sehr ungünstig: „They are dwarfish in stature, dwarfish in mental development." Viel zu bekannt und überall leicht erreichbar ist die Zeichnung, die Darwin von der körperlichen Gestalt der Yamana entworfen hat, als daß sie hier wiederholt zu werden brauchte. Fitz-Roy (s.): 127, der sie als "natives upon wretched" bezeichnet, bewegt sich mit dem in fast gleichem Ausdrücken, wenn er beispielsweise schreibt: „The Tekenika, natives of the south-eastern portion of Tierra del Fuego, are low of stature, ill-looking, and badly proportioned. Their color is that of very old [] Knapp vier Jahre nach seinem letzten dortigen Aufenthalte schrieb Lawrence (b): 138 auf die gleichen Schwierigkeiten: „Today it is difficult to learn just what dialect was in bearing, because the few surviving Yahgans live regularly south of the river and have learned their speech." Die sprachlichen Spezialstudien bei diesem Volke zu lesen, die Eric Hagen verfaßt.

[] Bishop eine Dissertation (b): 178, „que hay un punto de comparación en el colorido de nuestra campiña, los que han detenido a los Yahganes como centro respectivo y de superficie muy fina y casi impalpable. Esta comparación parecía haber sido sentada por el mismo naturalista de Abandonar en que se representaban una hoja pues los que quedaban en nuestro Mar". Dagegen eingewendet Hornung, von Bel. Pyrenaeum (s): 111 zu lesen ist: „Bishop sind die Leute sicher, aber auch sicher zu abschreckend, wer von einiger Observation Indianer diesem Bericht."

[*] Auf diesen fast unbeschreiblichen Eingeborenen machte Fitzroy (b): 124 mit folgendem Wortlaut aufmerksam: „A tribe de este grandioso espectáculo de la naturaleza, digno ciertamente de alguna y estimación, vive, casi ocupan a Dios, en pequeñas canoas hechas de cortezas de árbol, sin casa de ningún tipo, sin ropa, sin mujeres, sin manufacturas, que conozcan en ellos, pues prácticamente son inferiores antediluvianos, no conocen comparación con los hombres que a pesar lograse de diversos habitan la misma tierra", ebenfalls mit den Selk'nam.

mahogany, or rather between dark copper and bronze. The trunk of the body is large in proportion to their cramped and rather crooked limbs. Their rough, coarse, and extremely shiny black hair half hides yet heightens a villainous expression of the worst description of savage features . . ."[20]

Aus den vom Bremen anderfach veröffentlichten Beschreibungen der Körperform jener Eingeborenen genügt hier ein einziger kurzer Auszug: „The people are invariably stout in their trunk, having little or no narrowing at the waist, and are short-necked, deep-chested, and of a vigorous frame. But in these particulars there are all degrees, some being even in health decidedly slender. In limbs, upper and nether, they are small, and their hands and feet are smallish . . . Features vary greatly as well as complexion, and the bone of the persons depends upon whether exposed or exposed. Some have flat and very wide noses to an ugly degree, and others quite are the reverse. With many the eyes have the Chinese dip, but in many this cannot be traced. The colour of the eyes varies from light hazel to deep black. The height of the men varies from 5 feet 2 inches to 5 feet 9 inches" (Bremen[d]: 299).

In der ersten Hälfte des Jahres 1902 hat Sievers (c): 125 reichliche und genaue Beobachtungen gemacht; aus anderen hat er sich bei den Zentral-Yamana aufgehalten, von denen er sagt: „Los varones es arbustada, ancha y gruesa, las piernas sobresalientes, la frente baja y estrecha hacia la línea de los ojos; la nariz chata y ancha, los ojos en general muy oscuros, pequeños, vivos, llenos de siniestros animales. Los labios son gruesos. Tienen las quichadas muy fuertes y sobresalen de dentro hoffitiamente, entre los cuales los incisivos son, por el constumo son, tan agudos que difieren muy poco de los de sus perros. La desproporción entre la cabeza, el tronco y los miembros es tan notable, que parecen pertenecerse a dos especies diferentes. Los pieruas y los brazos son de una flaqueza sorprendente y aun se adelgaza como aquellas partes, contrario una cabeza tan voluminosa, y un pecho tan desarrollado. Es admirable también la pequeñez de sus manos y pies."[21] Einige gute Ergänzungen hierzu bietet Lovisato (b): 120, Sievers Beobachtungen, der sagt: „Trovammo uomini e donne di [illegible] piccolo bassa, raggrinzaprati in media 1 metro e 22 cent., testa con [illegible], cervelli, sopraffatti, [illegible] spaziali, sempre liscri, mai molto lunghi, [illegible] schiacciata, larga, piatta, di colorito olivastro; fronte bassa e larga sulla linea degli occhi, che sono inclinati, piccoli, chiusi, lacrimevoli, aperti, incrociati; naso schiacciato, narici molto pronunciate, zigomi sporgenti, denti bianchi, brillanti; viso ed collo cortissimi, braccia e gambe corte e sottili che sostengono un corpo grossissimo di larga cintura; mani e piedi piccolissimi; muscoli di pelo in tutte le parti del corpo." Noch im Jahre 1902 schrieb Dom: 82 u. a.: „Sie sind klein und hässlich, krummbeinige und zusammengeschrumpfte Gestalten, in denen Darwin einmal fast das fehlende Glied [missing link] zu finden vermeint hatte." Fast gleichlautend klingt das Urteil, das Anserme: 272 im Jahre 1924 gefällt hat und demzufolge „die Jahgan und Alakaluf mittelgestaltet, schwächlich und rachitisch sind".

[20] Das wurde von spätern Beobachtern (Sievers erläuterungsweise, Reisigbrecher bekannt: J. G. Paterson, als Sitz der ersten Yamana am 21. Oktober 1833 auf Isla Lennox an Gerichtsbeamter: „They were not so indescribably as the photo in Captain Fitzroy's book represents them" (Paterson: 14). Wenige Wochen darauf schrieb er über die Eingeborenen der Wulaia-Gegend: „Some of both sexes among the natives are good-looking, and the children are pretty fat. Fingers: I have been agreeably disappointed in this respect."

Doch genug der Urteile aus dem letzten Jahrhundert. Unvermeidlich drängt sich die Frage vor, ob die körperliche Ausrüstung der Yamana wirklich so mangelhaft und ihre Gestalt tatsächlich außergewöhnlich unschön ist.[*] Darauf gibt Hyades (q): 122, der viel länger als die vorher genannten Beobachter, nämlich ein ganzes Jahr lang im Gebiete jener Eingeborenen sich aufgehalten und als Verfasser genauer Untersuchungen über ihre Körperbildung ausgeführt hat, folgende Antwort: „La plupart des voyageurs, surtout les anciens, parlent des Fuégiens[] comme d'une race rabougrie et chétive. Les qualificatifs de 'laid', 'chétif', 'mal fait', 'maingre', 'dégénéré' se rencontrent à chaque pas dans leurs descriptions. Il nous semble qu'il y a là beaucoup d'exagérations. Si l'on rencontre, en effet, parmi les Fuégiens, des individus laids et amaigris par suite de jeûnes prolongés, il y en a d'autres qui, étant bien nourris, présentent des formes très régulières et propres aux hommes de petite taille en général. La même remarque s'applique aux femmes; si certaines d'entre elles ressemblent à de vieilles sorcières, d'autres, au contraire, pourraient rivaliser par la beauté de leur corps avec les femmes européennes le mieux faites. Dans l'aspect des femmes extérieures, la question de nourriture prime toutes les autres, et tel individu affamé et exténué de fatigue, qui paraît laid et mal fait, acquiert souvent une grâce et une beauté de formes inattendues après quelques jours d'un bon régime alimentaire." Mit absoluten Maßen und mit Verhältniszahlen begründet er ausführlich seine Aussagen.

Zu dieser zweifarben, sich widersprechenden Beurteilung meinerseits Stellung zu nehmen fällt nicht schwer. Zunächst kann ich aus eigener Beobachtung die Meinung anderer Reisender bestätigen, daß es, um mit P. Snow (a): I, 325 zu reden, dem Yamana-Stamme nicht an „fine, powerful-looking men" fehlt. Unter den ersten Yamana, denen der Katechist J. C. Parker auf Isla Lennox im Oktober 1855 begegnete, befand sich „a very fine-looking young man, who had regular features, expressive eyes, and a beautiful row of white teeth"; neben ihm standen aber „two women, to whom an opposite description would apply" (C. W. Parker: 63). Von den Brüdern des vielgenannten Jemmy Button heißt es, sie seien „fine featured men" (VP: III, 69, [*] Da für den III. Band dieses Werkes eine umfassende Darstellung der Körperform aller drei feuerländischen Stämme vorgesehen ist, genügt vorläufig eine kurze Zeichnung der hervorstechendsten äußeren Merkmale der Yamana. Vgl. Gusinde (ee).

1856). Demnach kann es unter den jüngeren Frauen an ungewöhnlich Gestalten nicht mangeln, was auch unbefangen unmittelbar hervorgehoben wird. Bei diesen Personen beiderlei Geschlechtes, mehr bei Frauen als bei Männern, prägt sich mit den fortschreitenden Jahren das Mißverhältnis zwischen Rumpf und Gliedmaßen stärker aus. Daß hierfür ganz allgemein die Lebensweise der entscheidende Anlaß ist, bedarf keines Beweises. Die Frauen verbringen den Großteil des Tages in zusammengekauerter Hockstellung, sei es in ihrem Faltenrock oder in ihrer Hütte; dann gesellt sich im Kanu noch die starke Belastung der Arm- und Brustmuskeln durch anhaltendes Rudern. Demzufolge entwickelt sich der Oberkörper unverhältnismäßig unter Benachteiligung der Unterarme und der Beine.[] Obwohl jenes Mißverhältnis sich bei Männern im allgemeinen in engeren Grenzen hält,[*] erreichen weder sie noch die Frauen einen ganz aufrechten Gang; durch den auffällig weiten Vorwärtsneigen der Knie bei beiden Geschlechtern wird der Eindruck einer völlig unsicheren Stellung erweckt. Zu wirklichen Jammergestalten werden diese Indianer durch Abmagern bei unhaltbar ungenügender Ernährung. Läuft schließlich noch ein Zittern im eiskalten Winde oder im schweren Regenschauer über diese nackten, zusammengeschrumpften Körper, dann ist für den erstmaligen Beobachter das vollständige Bild des Elends fertig. Aber wenn man sich einmal daran gewöhnt hat, die unbeholfenen Gestalten zu sehen und ihre Form zu erkennen, ohne sich beim Anschauen von dem auffallenden Schmutze behindern zu lassen, wird man rasch entdecken, was auf den Augen und auf das Schönheitsgefühl eines überhöflichen Europäers gänzlich und sogar ungewohnt wirkt.[] Sehr gefällige Längenverhältnisse der einzelnen Körperteile untereinander, ungewöhnlich Formen und weiche Glättung der gesamten Körperoberflächen treten sonst bei regelmäßig gebildeten jüngeren Personen in die Erscheinung.

Überprüft man die Urteile der meisten ernsthaften Beobachter, wird man gewisse Übereinstimmungen merken und auch erkennen, daß dieselben fast ausschließlich über diese Personen gefällt sind. Doch gilt es in Wirklichkeit auch unter diesen bestens gepflegten Gestalten. Allerdings starben, wie [] Nach Lesson (II): 48 „the women Yahgans, it is asserted, had better developed legs than the other groups because they hauled more frequently on shore".

[*] Bernin Wessels: I, 191 hat durchaus beigestimmt, „that being cramped in sitting their legs are ill formed, and the females, who are the bearers of the canoes, from that circumstance are worse shaped in the lower extremities than the men".

[] Dieglichkeit mag Bernatzik (VP.IV, 101, 102) schon bald nach seinem Besuch mit entschlossenem Zusammenstellen mit jenen Völkern erfahren haben, wo seine eindrucksvolle Schilderung erfolgtem hat: „It is a strange sight to see placed side by side the savage and civilized man. The first impression is one of disgust, the naked form, the long matted hair, which increased the apparent size of the head, the distinct of the groins, and the strange unsteady gestures, all contributed to produce an unfavourable impression. The women particularly appear very ugly. But as the eye becomes accustomed to the naked form, and the entire want of attention to the toilet, and observes more fully the form and expression of the features, the impression of ugliness wears off, and some appear even quite looking."

Körperform entstehungs, die Männer nicht selten kürzer den Frauen erreicht.[*] Ein wenig Körperpflege schafft bei beiden Geschlechtern innerhalb kürzester Zeit eine überraschend günstige Umwandlung.[]

In einem anderen Zusammenhange werden die Beobachtungen früherer Reisender und meine eigenen Untersuchungen über die Körperform der Tonsen zur Darstellung gelangen. Als Ergänzung der oben zusammengestellten Angaben folgt hier eine knappe Zeichnung der körperlichen Besonderheiten dieses Stammes. Die Tonsen sind eine kleinwüchsige Rasse. Als Mittelwert ergeben Sarn (k): 166 für 14 Männer 157.4 cm, Kunz für 27 Männer 158.7 cm, Hvamm (g): 116 für 26 Männer 157.1 cm Ivet, was für diese 67 Tonsen im Mittelwert 157.7 cm ergibt. Dumm (k): 179 nennt 158.5 cm als mittleren Maß von 209 Männern. Ich selbst (w) gewann aus den Messungen von 14 Männern 160.0 cm. Weitere Einzelheiten, auch solche über die Variationsbreite der Körpergröße, lasse ich vorläufig beiseite[]; es genügt, daß nach Hvamm (g): 117 bei Männern „le taille le plus fréquente est celle de 156 cm". Naturgemäß liegt die Körpergröße der Frauen unter der der Männer; hier aber ist sie niedriger als man erwarten würde. Von 23 Frauen haben Hvamm (g): 119 genau 147.4 cm, Sarn 147.5 cm und Kunz 147.1 cm errechnet, was im Mittel 147.3 cm ergibt. Am häufigsten findet sich bei Frauen eine Körpergröße von 145 cm und 146 cm. Somit beträgt der Höhenunterschied zwischen beiden Geschlechtern im Mittel 10.4 cm.[*] Ich selbst habe bei 19 Frauen ein Mittelmaß von 147.8 cm gefunden und daraus ergibt sich der mittlere Größenunterschied zwischen beiden Geschlechtern auf 12.2 cm. Das vom Normalen abweichende Längenverhältnis zwischen Rumpf und Gliedmaßen[] stimmt gut mit dem bei anderen kleinwüchsigen Rassen überein. Demnach sind Die natürliche Hautfarbe zu bestimmen ist nicht leicht, diese Frage läßt sich ebensowenig mit einem Worte sagen. Als Grundton mag allgemein ein hier Braun oder hier Gelb künstlicher schwarz abgetönter Weiß vorhanden sein, das aber an allen gezeigten Stellen bis in tiefe Dunkelbraun übergeht, teils unter dem Einfluß des Rauchens vom Nikotinfarben, teils unter der Schärfe der rauhen Luft. Da für Körperreinlichkeit fast nichts getan wird, zeigt die ganze Oberfläche, sowohl ein volles Gesicht, einen spiegelnden Fettglanz, der einen weiten Hut etwas hebt.

Die Yaruros sind in ihrer Körperbildung dem Hakkwadup etwas ähnlich, durch gibt es auch bedeutende Unterschiede. Sehr Übereinstimmungen bestehen bei den Männern beider Stämme. Das Gesicht der Hakkwadup ist zweifelsohne größer und massiger als das der Yaruros, dafür aber besitzen diese letzteren im Durchschnitt einen geringeren Körperumfang. In den letzten Jahrzehnten hat die bequemere Lebensführung dieses Stammes den Fettansatz bei Frauen sehr begünstigt und einige sind zu unförmlichen Fettklumpen angeschwollen, daß ihre Erscheinung als Abbildung vieler Unerkindlichkeiten wirklich abschreckt.[...] Ohne diesen Unterschied zu tun, muß man sie, so weit es sich um die Schärfe der Erscheinungen handelt, als eine Rasse im großen und ganzen mit unsymmetrisch gebildeten Körper und mit unmutigem Ausdruck bezeichnen.[...] Dieses rohe Bild, das jeden Beobachter unbefriedigt läßt und den tellurischen sogar abstößt, wird allerdings nur wenig aufgehellt durch seltene sympathische Personen,[...] denen sich einige Männer in mittleren Lebensjahren und die meisten jugendlichen Personen erfreuen.[...]

Die Kapitale eines Stammesvolkes einer bestimmte Stammesgliederung genau zu erkennen ist mit erheblichen Schwierigkeiten verbunden. Sie stellen sich auch, wenn dieses Volk, wie eben unsere Yaruna, in kleinere, nach Zahl schwankende Verwandtschaftsverbände zerfällt oder gar in Einzelfamilien sich auflöst, die, jede für sich, in dem unübersichtlichen Gewirr von Wasserläufen und Kanälen sich auch freier Wahl zusammen. Die Mitteilungen aus der ersten Zeit des Zusammenstoßes dieser Eingeborenen mit Europäern beschränken sich den Wert von wenig sicheren Vermutungen. In glaubwürdiger Bestimmtheit gelangen später die englischen Missionare wegen ihres unbefriedenden Verkehres mit der Mehrheit jener Völker. Aus dem Vergleich ihrer Mitteilungen mit den Handzeit Überlieferungen, die sich bis in unsere Tage noch am Oberlauf erhalten konnten, erwächst nun das farbenbunte Gemälde, das innerhalb von etwa achtzig Jahren die ehemals ungeschmälerte Vehemenz und dann sich verminderten Stoß, so daß nunmehr die Lesenen dieses Stammes in kürzester Zeit vom Erdboden verschwunden werden.

1. Schlußsätze aus älterer Zeit

Die Forschungsgeschichte der Yaruna beweist zur Genüge, daß sich den Seefahrern der früheren Zeit kaum je die Möglichkeit geboten hat, ausführlichere Schilderungen über diese Volksstamm zu verwerten. Ihre Schiffe gingen nur an einem oder höchstens noch an einem anderen Hafen vor Anker, wo sie den zufällig dort anwesenden Eingeborenen unbeachtet wurden und sich diese kaum durch Zeichen während einer kurzen Zeitspanne verständlich machten. Da viel aber haben sie mit Bestimmtheit versichert, daß jene Gegend nur sehr dünn bevölkert war. Dieses gaben sie sich besonders dann Rechenschaft, wenn das gleiche Kanu mit seiner Insassen diesen Hafen nach Verlassen einen Hafen bald darauf an einer anderen Stelle wieder begegnete, wo andere Leute meist nicht zu sehen waren.

Aus älterer Zeit bilden dennoch genaue Nachrichten über die Kapitale der Yaruna. Einzig Hermann Fuerten hat im Dezember 1771 eine bemerkenswerte Vermutung ausgesprochen. Im Pater Christmann hat er mit anderen Eingeborenen Bekanntschaft gemacht und gelangte zu folgender Erwägung: „Die Zahl der Fischfänger ist so gering, daß ich auf diesem gesamten Lande, welches durch wenigstens mit der Hilfe von Inland gleicher Größe hat, ebenmäßig weder als vorgenannt Menschen ausfinden kann, die dauerhaft in ganz kleinere Familien zerstreut wohnen, oder vielmehr herumirren" (Fuerten Fuerten [Ed.] 1900). Bei dieser Schätzung hat er sich unbewußt von der
